
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

GoogleTM books

<https://books.google.com>

This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

GoogleTM books

<https://books.google.com>

INDIANA UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

INDIANA UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

THE ACADEMY SUPPLEMEN
July 15, 1905

THE ACADEMY

JANUARY—JUNE

1905

VOLUME LXVIII

C. H. C.
PUBLISHING OFFICE

Digitized by Google

54417

AP4
A16
v. 68

9-12-05

FICTION—continued.

"Barham of Beltana," W. E. Norris	240
Barlow's (Jane) "By Beach and Bogland"	240
"Before the Crisis," F. B. Mott	335
"Bell and the Arrow, The," Mrs. W. H. Chesson	336
"Bell in the Fog, and Other Stories," Gertrude Atherton	420
Bennett's (Arnold) "Tales of the Five Towns"	127
Benson's (E. F.) "An Act in a Backwater"	106
Birmingham's (George A.) "The Seething-Pot"	137
Blissett's (Nellie K.) "The Silver Key"	281
"Bloomsbury," C. F. Keary	240
Bramah's (Ernest) "The Mirror of Kong-Ho"	541
Brown's (Mrs. W. P.) "Tragedy and Trifle"	243
Brown's (Katherine Holland) "Diane"	128
Brown's (Vincent) "The Disciple's Wife"	448
"By Beach and Bogland," Jane Barlow	335
Cabell's (J. B.) "The Eagle's Shadow"	133
Cahan's (A.) "The White Terror and the Red"	472
Callum's (Ridgwell) "The Hound from the North"	62
"Captain Balaam of the Cormorant," Morley Roberts	473
Castle's (Agnes and Egerton) "Rose of the World"	519
"Cavern of Laments, The," Catherine Mallandaine	13
Chambers' (Robt. W.) "In Search of the Unknown"	241
Chesson's (Mrs. W. H.) "The Bell and the Arrow"	420
"Child Andrea, The," Karin Michaelis	128
Cleeve's (Lucas) "Stolen Waters"	176
"Clansman, The," Thomas Dixon	337
Cobb's (Thomas) "The Friendships of Veronica"	592
Coldridge's (Gilbert) "An Instinctive Criminal"	334
Colvill's (Helen Hester) "The Stepping Stone"	337
"Confessions of an Ambitious Mother, The," a Young Lady	8
"Conscience of a King, The," Archibald G. Gunter	66
"Countermine, The," Arthur Wenlock	616
"Country House Party, The," Dora Sigerson Shorter	616
Coulander's (Alphonse) "Soth of the Cross"	472
"Creatures that Once Were Men," Maxim Gorky. Translated by K. Shirazi	280
"Crittenden," John Fox	336
"Cut Laurels," M. Hamilton	175
Dale's (Allan) "Wanted a Cook"	364
"Dark Lantern, The," Elizabeth Robins	639
"Day's Journey, A," Nett Syrett	343
Deakin's (Dorothy) "The Poet and the Pierrot"	128
"Diane," Katherine Holland Brown	66
"Disciple's Wife, The," Vincent Brown	448
Dixon's (Thomas, jun.) "The Clansman"	337
Dodd's (Catherine I.) "A Vagrant Englishwoman"	616
"Dorset Dear," M. E. Francis (Miss. Francis Blundell)	494
Driscoll's (Clara) "The Girl of La Gloria"	398
"Dryad, The," Justin Huntly McCarthy	464
Dudenny's (Mrs. Henry) "The Wise Woods"	592
"Duke's Son," Cosmo Hamilton	364
"Eagle's Shadow, The," James Branch Cabell	133
"Edge of Circumstance, The," Edward Noble	16
"Elizabeth Grey," E. M. Green	362
Fairless's (Michael) "The Grey Brethren and Other Fragments in Prose and Verse"	520
"Fate of Felix, The," Mrs. Coulson Kernahan	142
Fellows' (Charles) "Mr. Chippendale of Port Welcome"	639
Fitzroy's (Isobel) "A Quixotic Woman"	544
"Flute," Pan, A Romance," John Oliver Hobbes	619
"Fond Adventures," Maurice Hewlett	413
Fox's (John) "Crittenden"	337
France's (Anatole) "Sur la Pierre Blanche"	332
Francis's (E. J.) "Dorset Dear"	494
"Friendships of Veronica, The," Thomas Cobb	592
"Fugitive Blacksmith, The," Charles W. Stewart	560
"Girl of La Gloria," Clara Driscoll	398
Gissing's (Algernon) "Baliol Guard"	616
Glaville's (Ernest) "A Rough Reformer"	420
Glyn's (Elinor) "The Vicissitudes of Evangeline"	241
"Godfrey Martin, Undergraduate," Charles Turley	128
"Golden Bowl, The," Henry James	14
Gorky's (Maxim) "Creatures that Once were Men," Translated by K. M. Sherazi	280
"Gossip," Benjamin Swift	240
Gowing's (Mrs. Aylmer) "Lord of Himself"	338
Green's (Anna Katherine) "The Millionaire Baby"	568
"E. M." "Elizabeth Grey"	362
"Grey Brethren, The, and Other Fragments in Prose and Verse," Michael Fairless	520
Guillaumin's (Emile) "La Vie d'un Simple: Mémoires d'un Métayer"	591
Gull's (C. Ranger) "A Story of the Stage"	175
Gunt's (Archibald G.) "The Conscience of a King"	66
Hamilton's (M.) "Cut Laurels"	175
Hamilton's (Cosmo) "Duke's Son"	364
Harris' (Joel Chandler) "A Little Union Scout"	150
Harrod's (Frances) "The Taming of the Brute"	429
Hawes' (F. W.) "A Prima Donna's Romance"	616
"Hae Fever," Walter Herries Pollock and Guy C. Pollock	493
Healy's (Chris) "Heirs of Reuben"	176
"Hearts of Wales, An old Romance," Allen Raine	448

Actor, The Personality of the	179
"Agatha" at His Majesty's Theatre	281
"Alice-Sit-by-the-Fire" at the Duke of York's Theatre	424
"Becket" at Drury Lane	497
"Business Is Business" at His Majesty's Theatre	543
Comic Idea, The: Great Friends and "Mrs. Dering's Divorce"	108
"Du Barri" at the Savoy Theatre	338
"Elga." A nocturne by Gerhart Hauptmann	243
"Everyman" at the Shaftesbury Theatre	450
French Players in London, The Earliest	619
"Hamlet" at the Adelphi Theatre	397
Harvey, Mr. Martin, as Hamlet, Lyric Theatre	570
"Hawthorne, U.S.A.," at the Imperial Theatre	594
"Henry V."	87
"Her Own Way" at the Lyric Theatre	473
"John Chilcote, M.P.," at the St. James' Theatre	497
"King Richard II." at His Majesty's Theatre	497
"Lady Ben" at the Comedy Theatre	368
"L'Age d'Aimer" at Terry's Theatre	619
"Leah Kleschna" at the New Theatre	497
"Mollentreuve on Woman" at the St. James' Theatre	185
"Much Ado About Nothing"	150
"Notre Jeunesse" at the Shaftesbury Theatre	641
"Orestean Trilogy, The" ("Agamemnon," "Liba- tion Bearer," "Furies"), at the Coronet Theatre	243
"Othello" at the Shaftesbury Theatre	423
"Palace of Truth, The," at the Great Queen Street Theatre	566
"Peter Pan"	19
Repertoire Theatre, The	470
"Romeo and Juliet" at the Imperial Theatre	674
"Royalty Theatre"	527
Signora Duse	572
Sudermann, The Plays of	13
Translations from the French, On	66
Triplet of Plays, A	202
"Trojan Women, The," at the Court Theatre	423
"What Pamela Wanted" at the Criterion	497
"You Never Can Tell" at the Court Theatre	497

Anti-Jacobin, The, Gillray, and Canning	345
Arch-Diarist, The	40
Art and Morality	574, 596
Bhagavad Gita, The	89
Brook, The	107

FICTION—continued.

	PAGE
"Heirs of Reuben." Chris Healy.	176
"Helen of Troy, N.Y." Wilfrid S. Jackson.	150
"He that Eateth Bread with Me." H. A. Mitchell Keays.	83
Herbertson's (Jessie Leckie) "The Stigma."	568
Hewlett's (Maurice) "Fond Adventures."	41
"Hill, The: A Romance of Friendship." Horace Annesley Vachell.	495
Hobbes' (John Oliver) "The Flute of Pan. A Romance."	615
Houldsworth's (Annie E.) "A New Paolo and Francesca."	150
"Hound from the North, The." Ridgwell Cullum.	62
"House of Barnkirk, The." Amy McLaren.	520
"House of Merrilees." Archibald Marshall.	198
Howard's (Kebble) "Love in June."	639
"In Search of the Unknown." Robert W. Chambers.	241
"Instinctive Criminal, An." Gilbert Coleridge.	337
"In the Arena." Booth Tarkington.	472
Iota's "Patricia: A Mother."	397
Jackson's (Wilfrid S.) "Helen of Troy, N.Y."	150
James' (Henry) "The Golden Bowl."	128
"Jeannie Jonima Jones."	175
"Julia." Katharine Tynan.	15
Keary's (C. F.) "Bloomsbury."	281
Keays' (H. A. Mitchell) "He that Eateth Bread with Me."	83
Kelly's (M. Harding) "Showing the White Feather."	593
Kelly's (Myra) "Little Citizens."	336
Kernahan's (Mrs. Coulson) "The Fate of Felix."	149
"Knight of the Needle Rock and his Days, 1571-1606." Mary J. Wilson.	473
"Lady Penelope." Morley Roberts.	151
Lane's (Elinor Macartney) "Nancy Stair."	149
Le Queux's (William) "The Mask."	63
"Letters of Theodora, The." Adelaide L. Rouse.	420
"Little Citizens." Myra Kelly.	336
"Little Union Scout, A." Joel Chandler Harris.	150
Lloyd's (Nelson) "The Soldier of the Valley."	15
Loyd's (W. J.) "The Morals of Marcus Ordeyne."	66
London's (Jack) "The Sea Wolf."	14
"Lord of Himself." Mrs. Aylmer Gowing.	366
Lorimer's (G. H.) "Old Gorgon Graham."	128
"Love in June." Kebble Howard.	639
McCarthy's (Justin Huntly) "The Dryad."	336
McChesney's (Dora Greenwell) "Yesterday's Tomorrow."	127
"Macdonnells, The." J. A. C. Sykes.	495
Machray's (Robt.) "The Ambassador's Glove."	63
McLaren's (Amy) "The House of Barnkirk."	520
"Maid at Large, A." A. Leaf.	398
Mallandaine's (Catherine) "The Cavern of Laments."	15
Marchant's (Bessie) "Yew Tree Farm."	15
"Marian Sax." E. Maria Albanesi.	544
"Marriage of William Ashe, The." Mrs. Humphry Ward.	227
Marsh's (Richard) "A Spoiler of Men."	367
" " " "Confessions of a Young Lady."	83
Marshall's (Archibald) "The House of Merrilees."	198
Martin's (Helen R.) "Tillie: A Mennonite Maid."	664
"Mask, The." William le Queux.	631
"Master Mummer, The." E. Phillips Oppenheim.	420
"Memoirs of Constantine Dix." Barry Pain.	639
Merriman's (C. E.) "A Self-made Man's Wife."	473
Michaelis' (Karin) "The Child Andrea."	128
"Millionaire Baby, The." Anna Katherine Green.	568
Milo's (Louise Jordan) "A Woman and her Talent."	664
"Mirror of Koung-Ho." Ernest Bramah.	241
Mitchell's (S. Weir) "The Youth of Washington."	63
"Monarch, The Big Bear." Ernest Thompson Seton.	398
Moore's (F. Frankfort) "The White Causeway."	366
"Morals of Marcus Ordeyne." William J. Locke.	664
Mott's (F. B.) "Before the Crisis."	336
"Mr. Chippendale of Port Welcome." Charles Fellows.	639
"Mrs. Galer's Business." W. Pett Ridge.	198
"Nancy Stair." Elinor Macartney Lane.	149
"New Humanity, A, or the Easter Island." Adolph Wilbrandt. Translated from the German by Dr. A. S. Rappoport.	567
"New Paolo and Francesca, A." Annie S. Houldsworth.	150
"Next-Door Neighbours." W. Pett Ridge.	14
Noble's (Edward) "The Edge of Circumstance."	63
" " " "Waves of Fate."	568
Norris' (H. L.) "Rice Papers."	241
Norris' (W. E.) "Barham of Beltana."	240
"Old Gorgon Graham." George Horace Lorimer.	128
"Olive Kinsella." Curtis Yorke.	63
Oppenheim's (E. Phillips) "The Master Mummer."	420
"Outlet, The." Andy Adams.	665
Pain's (Barry) "The Memoirs of Constantine Dix."	639
Pasture's (Mrs. Henry de la) "Peter's Mother."	149
"Patricia: A Mother." Iota.	397
"Peace on Earth." Reginald Turner.	592
"Peter's Mother." Mrs. Henry de la Pasture.	149
Phillipotts' (Eden) "The Secret Woman."	83
"Poet and the Pierrot, The." Dorothea Deakin.	664
Pollock's (W. H. and G. C.) "Hay Fever."	495
"Prima Donna's Romance, A." F. W. Hayes.	606
"Prisoner of Mademoiselle, The." Charles G. D. Roberts.	14
Q's "Shining Ferry."	520
"Quixotic Woman, A." Isobel Fitzroy.	544
Raine's (Allen) "Hearts of Wales."	448
Rawson's (M. Stepney) "Tales of Rye Town."	398
"Reformer, A Rough." Ernest Glanville.	420
"Rice Papers." H. L. Norris.	544
"Rice Papers." H. L. Norris.	241
"Rice Papers." H. L. Norris.	198
" " " "Next-Door Neighbours."	14

FICTION—continued.

	PAGE
Roberts' (C. G. D.) "The Prisoner of Mademoiselle."	14
Roberts' (Morley) "Captain Balaam of the Cormorant."	473
" " " "Lady Penelope."	151
Robins' (Elizabeth) "The Dark Lantern."	543
Rodocanachi's (E.) "Tolla the Courtesan." Translated by F. Lawton.	639
"Root, The." Orms Agnus.	175
"Rose of the World." Agnes and Egerton Castle.	519
Rouse's (Adelaide L.) "The Letters of Theodora."	420
Rowland's (Henry C.) "To Windward."	198
"Sandy." Alice Hegan Rice.	544
"Sea Wolf, The." Jack London.	14
"Secret Woman, The." Eden Phillipotts.	83
"Seething-Pot, The." George A. Birmingham.	335
"Self-Made Man's Wife, A. Her Letters to Her Son, being a Woman's View of a Certain Famous Correspondence." Charles Eustace Merriman.	473
"Seth of the Cross." Alphonse Courlander.	472
Seton's (Ernest Thompson) "Monarch the Big Bear."	398
"Shining Ferry." Q.	520
Shorter's (Dora Sigerson) "The Country House Party."	616
"Showing the White Feather." M. Harding Kelly.	593
"Silver Key, The." Nellie K. Blissett.	240
"Spoiler of Men, A." Richard Marsh.	367
Silberrad's (Una L.) "The Wedding of the Lady of Lovell."	336
"Soldier of the Valley, The." Nelson Lloyd.	15
"Stepping Stone, The." Helen Hester Colvill.	367
Stewart's (Charles D.) "The Fugitive Blacksmith."	569
"Stigma, The." Jessie Leckie Herbertson.	568
"Stolen Waters." Lucas Cleeve.	176
"Story of the Stage, A." C. Ranger Gull.	175
"Sur la Pierre Blanche." Anatole France.	231
Swift's (Benjamin) "Gossip."	240
Sykes' (J. A. C.) "The Macdonnells."	495
Syrett's (Netta) "A Day's Journey."	639
"System, The." Percy White.	106
"Tales of Rye Town." M. Stepney Rawson.	398
"Tales of the Five Towns." Arnold Bennett.	83
"Taming of the Brute, The." Frances Harrod.	449
Tarkington's (Booth) "In the Arena."	472
"Three Dukes, The." G. Ystridde.	150
Thurston's (E. Temple) "The Apple of Eden."	105
"Tillie. A Mennonite Maid." Helen R. Martin.	664
"Tolla the Courtesan." E. Rodocanachi. Translated from the Italian by Frederick Lawton.	639
"To Windward." Henry C. Rowland.	198
"Tragedy and Trifle." Mrs. W. P. Browne.	543
Turley's (Charles) "Godfrey Marten, Undergraduate."	14
Turner's (Reginald) "Peace on Earth."	592
Tynan's (Katharine) "Julia."	15
Vachell's (Horace Annesley) "The Hill: A Romance of Friendship."	495
"Vagrant Englishwoman, A." Catherine I. Dodd.	616
"Vicissitudes of Evangeline, The." Elinor Glyn.	241
"Vie d'un Simple. Mémoires d'un Métayer." Emile Guillaumin.	591
Vorst's (Marie van) "Amanda of the Mill."	24
"Wanted: A Cook." Alan Dale.	366
Ward's (Mrs. Humphry) "The Marriage of William Ashe."	227
"Waves of Fate." Edward Noble.	568
"Wedding of the Lady of Lovell, The." Una L. Silberrad.	336
Wenlock's (Arthur) "The Countermine."	664
"White Causeway, The." F. Frankfort Moore.	366
"White Terror and the Red." A. Cahan.	472
White's (Percy) "The System."	106
Wilbrandt's (Adolph) "A New Humanity, or the Easter Island." Translated by Dr. Rappoport.	567
Willcocks' (M. P.) "Widdicombe."	367
Wilson's (Mary J.) "The Knight of the Needle Rock and his Days, 1571-1606."	473
"Widdicombe." M. P. Willcocks.	367
"Wise Woods, The." Mrs. Henry Dudeney.	592
"Woman and her Talent, A." Louise Jordan Miln.	664
"Yesterday's To-morrow." Dora Greenwell McChesney.	127
"Yew Tree Farm." Bessie Marchant.	15
Yorke's (Curtis) "Olive Kinsella."	63
"Youth of Washington, The." S. Weir Mitchell.	63
Ystridde's (G.) "The Three Dukes."	150

FINE ART

Academy, The Royal	498, 640
Art Sales	371, 424, 499, 524, 545, 571, 594, 619, 641, 667
Art, The Ultimate Significance of	88
Chantrey Fund, The	544
Colour Drawings, Mr. Rackham's	370
Craftsman's Ideals, A	109
Events and Tendencies in 1904	134
Etchers, The Painter-	178
Etchings of Maxime Lalanne	178
" " " "Old and New"	423
Exhibitions, Minor	570
Fantin-Latour	202
Forbes (J. S.) Collection at the Grafton Gallery	544
Impressionists, The	60
Internationals, The	38
Jewels, M. Lalique's	571
Lalanne, Maxime, The Etchings of	178
Miniatures, Ancient and Modern	282
Morland, George	244
New Gallery, The	499
Painting in Little	618
Pastel Society, The	666
Picture Market and Contemporary Art, The	475
Porcelains, Old English	593

FINE ART—continued.

	PAGE
Portraits, Historical, at Oxford	523
Process Engraving at South Kensington, The	400
Loan Exhibition of	203
Rodin, Auguste	666
Society of Painters in Tempera, The	666
Society, The Pastel	422
Temperament in Painting	451
Tradition and Modern Schools	640
Velasquez, The Boston	339
The Historical Pictures of	20
Watts, G. F.	155
Whistler	524
Whistler and Watts

ILLUSTRATIONS

BOOK ILLUSTRATIONS:—
"The Mill on the Floss."	57
"The Rathaus, Cologne."	77
"The Road in Tuscany."	9
PORTRAITS:—
"Gairdner, Dr. James."	5
"Marzials, Sir Frank T."	27

LITERARY CAUSERIES

Andersen, Hans Christian	365
Bloomfield, Robert	661
Boccaccio	471
Brown, Thomas Edward	566
Character and Style	518
Coleridge	277
Dorset Poet, The	493
Dublin School, The	447
Elegy, The Poet of the	614
Fuller, Thomas	410
Herbert, George	237
Herrick, Robert	334
Lovelace, Richard	542
Peacock, The Novels of Thomas Love	396
Places	638
Reading, My Early	591

LITERARY NOTES

Pages	5, 27, 55, 75, 95, 127, 139, 163, 187
-------	---------------------------------------

LITERARY WEEK, THE

Pages	225, 261, 321, 353, 381, 402, 435, 459, 485, 509, 533, 557, 581, 603, 627, 651
-------	--

MONTHLY PRIZE COMPETITION

Japan	70
"Vivian Grey." Benjamin Disraeli	157

MUSIC

Bach in Churches	246
"Caractacus" and "Everyman"	453
Digression, A	669
Dr. Elgar's Oratorio "The Apostles" at the Albert Hall	343
Handel's "Messiah"	476
" " "Popularity in England"	572
"L'Après-Midi d'un Faune." Claude Debussy	427
Music from Without	620
National Music	595
Opera, The Failure of	343
" " "Use of"	501
Piano Music	181
Schools of Music	401
Schubert	643
Strauss, The Man Richard	131
"Symphonia Domestica"	204
" " "Another View"	284, 342
Symphony, A Modern	373
Wagner and Colour	547
Wagner's "Parsifal"	453

NEW WRITERS' COLUMN

Art and Literature	21
--------------------	----

POETRY

"A Song at Sunset." Jane Barlow	335
"Eton." C. R. S.	540
"Hands." T. Sturge Moore	446
"Melancholia." Robert Bridges	364
"New Clothes." T. Sturge Moore	515
"On a Redbreast Singing at the Grave of Plato." Fiona Macleod	239
"Renaissance Gentlemen." Anodos	540
"Ricordi." Laurence Binyon	477
"The Ancestral Secret." Charles Dalmon	492
"The Arrow." Wilfrid Wilson Gibson	564
"The Founts of Song." Fiona Macleod	470
"The Mad Spinner." Dorothy Frances Gurney	397
"The Mystic's Prayer." Fiona Macleod	616
"The Rondeau." H. Raphoe	613
"The Two Arrows." Norman Gale	280
"The Woods of Peace." Margaret Dorothy Routledge	660
"To ———." Robert Bridges	492
"Winnower's Song to the Winds." A. E. J. R.	515

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Amazon Stones, 431. Applause, 72. "Arcades Ambo," 72, 136. Authors, Titled, 136.
Bag of Tricks, The Whole, 41. Beantest, 24, 41, 208.
Beards, Taxes on, 403. Blue Beans, 22, 92.
Bohemian, 22, 41, 72. Braut and Bräutigam, 92.
"Brave Prince William," 112, 136. Brazilia, 92.
Brick, A, 22, 72, 184. Pighton, 183. Britton Hall, 207.
Brownbill Men, An Army of, 136, 160, 183, 208.
Browning and Darwin, 92, 160.

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
"Copyright, The Law of, in Works of Literature and Art," Walter Arthur Copinger	62
"Coryat's Crudities," Thomas Coryat	488
Courtney's (W. P.) "A Register of National Bibliography"	563
Coutts's (Francis) "Musa Verticordia"	61
"Crammer, Thomas, and the English Reformation," Frederick Alfred Pollard	440
"D'Arbly, Madame, Diary and Letters of," edited by her niece Charlotte Bassett; preface and notes by Austin Dobson	311
"Demeter. A Mask," Robert Bridges	607
Dent's (Edward J.) Alessandro Scarlatti: His Life and Works	147
"Derbyshire, Highways and Byways in," J. B. Firth	609
Dexter's (T. F. G.) "Senior Arithmetic"	51
Dhaleine's (L.) "N. Hawthorne: Sa Vie et son Œuvre"	359
"Dickens, W. Teignmouth Shore	126
"Dickens Country, The," Frederick G. Kitton	126
"Dickens' Novels, Synopses of," J. W. McSpadden	126
Dobbs' (F. W.) "Practical Geometry for Beginners"	50
"Dog, The," G. E. Mitton	35
"Donne, William Bodham, and his Friends," edited by Catherine B. Johnson	211
"Do We Believe?"	146
"Dream of Provence; Orgeas and Miradou," "To Nancy," Frederick Wedmore	71
"Dream-Come-True," Laurence Binyon	52
"Dream of the Rood, The," edited by Prof. Albert S. Cook	445
Duff's (The Right Hon. Sir Mountstuart E. Grant) "Notes from a Diary, 1896-1901"	356
"Dufferin and Ava, The Life of the Marquis of," Sir Alfred Lyall	111
"Durer, Albert," T. Sturge Moore	77
"Dury's General History," translated and revised by E. A. Grosvenor	48
"Dutch Pottery and Porcelain," W. Pitcairn Knowles	79
"Dutch Republic, History of the Rise of the," John Lothrop Motley	10
Eaton's (F. A.) "The Royal Academy and its Members, 1768-1830"	511
"Economics, The Principles of," W. Stanley Jevons	609
"Education, an Unwritten Chapter in the History of," Dr. H. Kingshill Moore	52
"The Principles of," T. Raymond	51
Eggar's (W. D.) "Practical Exercises in Geometry"	50
"Elizabethan Virginal Book, An," E. W. Naylor	562
Elphinstone's (the Hon. Mountstuart) "The History of India. The Hindu and Mahometan Periods"	358
"Emerson, Poet and Thinker," Elisabeth Luther Cary	13
"England, A History of Modern," Herbert Paul Short History of," E. P. Cheyney	463
"English Language, Etymological and Pronouncing Dictionary of the," Rev. James Stormonth	47
"Epistle to the Ephesians," Joseph Parker, D.D.	50
"Epistles to the Thessalonians, The," edited by E. G. Findlater	32
"Essays and Addresses, Miscellaneous," H. Sidgwick	49
" of Travel, by R. L. Stevenson," "Recollections of R. L. Stevenson in the Pacific," Arthur Johnstone	45
"Études Économiques sur l'Antiquité," Paul Guiraud	629
" Critiques sur la Vie de Colomb, avant ses Découvertes," Henry Vignaud	274
"Europe, Western, in the Eighth Century and Onward: An Aftermath," E. A. Freeman	633
"Falstaff Letters, The," James White	58
"Fiji, Tales from Old," Lorimer Fison	124
Firth's (J. B.) "Constantine the Great: the Reorganisation of the Empire and the Triumph of the Church"	272
" " "Highways and Byways in Derbyshire"	465
Fison's (Lorimer) "Tales from Old Fiji"	609
Fitzgerald's (Percy) "Lady Jean: The Romance of the Great Douglas Cause"	272
"Florence and Some Tuscan Cities," painted by Col. R. C. Goff, described by Clarissa Goff	147
"Florentine History, The Two First Centuries of," Prof. Pasquale Villari	235
"Florilegium Tironis Græcum," Profs. Burrows and Walters	271
Forrest's (G. W.) "Cities of India"	49
Foster's (V.) "Practical Geometry for Beginners"	358
"France, From the Monarchy to the Republic in," Sophia H. MacLehose	50
" Home Life in," M. Betham Edwards	48
Fraser's (D.) "A Modern Campaign, or War and Wireless Telegraphy in the Far East"	561
"French Course for Schools, New," C. C. Perry and W. A. Reum	173
" Profiles," Edmund Gosse	49
Freeman's (E. A.) "Western Europe in the Eighth Century and Onward: An Aftermath"	58
Frere's (A. Goodrich) "In a Syrian Saddle"	615
"Friends of England, The," the Hon. Geo. Peel	270
"Friendships of Art," Bliss Carman	170
Furley's (Sir John) "In Peace and War"	610
"Furniture, Chats on Old," Arthur Hayden	272
"Garden Colour," Margaret Waterfield	465
" of Pleasant Flowers, A," John Parkinson	196
"Gardener's Year, A," H. Rider Haggard	60
Gardner's (Percy) "A Grammar of Greek Art"	660
Garlick's (A. H.) "Senior Arithmetic"	51
Geikie's (Sir Archibald) "Landscape in History"	193

"Academy, The Royal, and its Members, 1768-1830," J. E. Hodgson and F. A. Eaton	511
Adam's (Mme. Edmond) "My Literary Life"	34
Adams (C. L.) "The Ancient Castles of Ire- land"	50
"Adventures Among Books," Andrew Lang	324
"Age of Chivalry," Age of Fable," Legends of Charlemagne," Thomas Bulfinch	49
Allcock's (C. H.) "Theoretical Geometry for Be- ginners"	50
"Amateur Spirit, The," Bliss Perry	332
"America, North, The Fight with France for," A. G. Bradley	330
" " New Voyages to," Baron de Lahontan	386
"Americans, The," Hugo Münsterberg	389
"Anersen, Hans, Select Tales of," edited by Rev. H. J. Chaytor	49
"Angel of Syon, The," Dom Adam Hamilton	273
"Angler's Hours, An," H. J. Sheringham.	416
"Annotation, A Chapter in the History of: being Scholia Aristophanica," vol. iii. William G. Rutherford.	586
"Archæology and False Antiquities," Robert Munro	586

REVIEWS—continued.	PAGE
"Geometry, A New, for Junior Forms" . . .	51
" " " " Schools," S. Barnard and J. M. Child . . .	50
" " " " for Beginners: Practical," V. Foster and F. W. Dobbs . . .	50
" " " " Theoretical," C. H. Alcock . . .	50
" " " " Practical, Exercises in," W. D. Eggar . . .	50
"German Reader for Technical Schools," E. F. Seckler . . .	49
Gibson's (G. A.) "Treatise on Graphs," and "Introduction to the Calculus" . . .	51
Gladstonian Ghosts," Cecil Chesterton . . .	512
Glasfurd's (A. I. R.) "Rifle and Romance in the Indian Jungle" . . .	632
Goff's (Col. R. C.) "Florence and some Tuscan Cities" . . .	235
"Golden Age of Apuleius, The," translated by Francis D. Byrne . . .	358
"Gorki, Maxim," Hans Ostwald, translated by Frances A. Welby . . .	656
Gosse's (Edmund) "French Profiles" . . .	78
" " " " Coventry Patmore . . .	265
" " " " The Plays of Sheridan . . .	659
Gould's (S. Baring) "A Book of South Wales" . . .	632
Graham's (J.) "Commercial Practice Connected with the Export and Import Trades: Spanish, German, French" . . .	49
"Graham of Claverhouse, John, Viscount of Dundee, 1648-1689," C. Sanford Terry . . .	228
"Graphs, Treatise on," G. A. Gibson . . .	51
Gray's (J. W.) "Shakespeare's Marriage: His Departure from Stratford, and Other Incidents in His Life" . . .	357
"Greek Studies, A Companion to," edited by Leonard Whibley . . .	102
" " " " Subjects, Harvard Lectures on," Prof. S. H. Butcher . . .	48
Greenidge's (Prof. A. H. J.) "History of Rome" . . .	48
Greville, Henry, Leaves from the Diary of, Countess of Stafford . . .	12
"Growth of the Manor, The," Dr. P. Vinogradoff . . .	125
"Guildford in the Olden Time," George C. Williamson . . .	62
Guiraud's (Paul) "Études Économiques sur l'Antiquité" . . .	274
Gwynn's (Stephen) "Thomas Moore" . . .	97
Haeckel's (Ernst) "The Evolution of Man" . . .	489
" " " " The Wonders of Life" . . .	82
Haggard's (H. Rider) "A Gardener's Year" . . .	60
Hakluyt's (Richard) "The Principal Navigations Voyages Traffiques and Discoveries of the English Nation" . . .	630
"Hakluytus Posthumus: Purchas his Pilgrimes," Samuel Purchas . . .	234
Hall's (H. S.) "Elementary Course of Mathematics" . . .	50
Hamilton's (Dom Adam) "The Angel of Syon" . . .	273
Hancock's (H. I.) "The Physical Culture Life" . . .	491
Harnack's (Adolph) "The Expansion of Christianity in the First Three Centuries" . . .	32
"Harrison, Thomas, Regicide and Major-General," C. H. Simpson . . .	273
Harrison's (F.) "Chatham" . . .	267
Hart's (Jerome) "Two Argonauts in Spain" . . .	540
"Hauff's Tales," translated by Sybil Thesiger . . .	269
"Hawker, R. S., The Life and Letters of," C. E. Byles . . .	168
"Hawthorne, Nathaniel, Sa Vie et Son Œuvre," L. Dhaleine . . .	359
Hayden's (Arthur) "Chats on Old Furniture" . . .	272
Heath's (T. E.) "Our Stellar Universe. A Road-Book to the Stars" . . .	469
"Heavens, A Popular Guide to the," Sir Robert Ball . . .	82
"Hellenism, The Progress of, in Alexander's Empire," John Pentland Mahaffy . . .	536
Helm's (W. H.) "Aspects of Balzac" . . .	268
Henson's (Canon H. Hensley) "Notes on Popular Rationalism" . . .	32
"Heretics," Gilbert K. Chesterton . . .	655
"Heures d'Après Midi, Les," Émile Verhaeren . . .	587
Hewett's (G. M. A.) "The Rat" . . .	35
Hewlett's (Maurice) "The Road in Tuscany" . . .	9
"Histoire de la Langue Française des Origines à 1900," Ferdinand Brunot . . .	475
"Historical Mysteries," Andrew Lang . . .	24
Hodgson's (J. E.) "The Royal Academy and its Members, 1768-1830" . . .	511
Holyoake's (G. J.) "Bygones worth Remembering" . . .	145
"Homeric Study, A Handbook of," Henry Browne . . .	169
"Homes of the First Franciscans in Umbria, the Border of Tuscany and the Northern Marches," Beryl D. de Sincourt . . .	387
"Horace. Odes, Epodes and Carmen Sæculare," edited by Dr. E. C. Wickham . . .	49
Huddy's (Mrs. Mary E.) "Matilda, Countess of Tuscany" . . .	194
Hueffer's (Ford Madox) "The Soul of London. A Survey of a Modern City" . . .	559
Hume's (Martin) "Spanish Influence on English Literature" . . .	99
Hunter's (Robert) "Poverty" . . .	51
"Hymns, Latin," Prof. W. A. Murill . . .	49
"In a Syrian Saddle," A. Goodrich Frere . . .	635
"India, Cities of," G. W. Forrest . . .	388
" " " " The History of the Hindu and Mahometan Periods," the Hon. Mount-stuart Elphinstone . . .	388
" " " " Early History of," V. A. Smith . . .	48
Innes' (Gen. J. J. M.) "The Life and Times of General Sir James Browne" . . .	610
"In Peace and War," Sir John Furley . . .	59
"Ireland, The Ancient Castles of," C. L. Adams . . .	59
"Italian Letters of a Diplomat's Wife," Mary King Waddington . . .	443
Jane's (L. Cecil) "The Coming of Parliament. England from 1350 to 1660" . . .	78
Jebb's (R.) "Studies in Colonial Nationality" . . .	469

REVIEWS—continued.	PAGE
Jevons' (W. Stanley) "Principles of Economics" . . .	609
"Jewish Encyclopedia, The" . . .	170
"Johnson, Samuel, Prayers and Meditations of," Johnstone's (Arthur) "Essays and Travels by R. L. Stevenson" . . .	33
" " " " Recollections of R. L. Stevenson in the Pacific" . . .	629
"Jörn Uhl," Gustav Frenssen; translated by F. S. Delmer . . .	464
Kaiser's (R.) "Choix de Lectures Françaises" . . .	49
"Keats, John, The Poems of," edited by E. de Selincourt . . .	326
Kent (Armine Thomas) "Otia: Poems, Essays and Reviews" . . .	80
Khan's (Hadji) "With the Pilgrims to Mecca. The Great Pilgrimage, A.D. 1318-A.D. 1902" . . .	329
Kitton's (F. G.) "The Dickens Country" . . .	126
Klado (N.) "The Russian Navy in the Russo-Japanese War" . . .	588
Knowles' (W. Pitcairn) "Dutch Pottery and Porcelain" . . .	79
"Knox, John," Rev. D. Macmillan . . .	357
" " " " and the Reformation," Andrew Lang . . .	584
Knox's (John) "The History of the Reformation of Religion in Scotland" . . .	357
Kropotkin's (Prince) "Ideals and Realities in Russian Literature" . . .	656
"Lady Jean, The Romance of the Great Douglas Cause," Percy Fitzgerald . . .	147
Lahontan's (Baron de), "New Voyages to North America" . . .	386
"Lamb, The Life of Charles and Mary," edited by E. V. Lucas . . .	605
Landor's (A. Henry Savage) "Tibet and Nepal" . . .	101
"Landscape in History," Sir Archibald Geikie . . .	193
Lang's (Andrew) "Adventures Among Books" . . .	324
" " " " Historical Mysteries" . . .	24
" " " " John Knox and the Reformation" . . .	584
Langland's (William) "The Vision of Piers the Plowman" . . .	440
"Latin Course, Longmans," W. H. Spragge . . .	49
Laughlin's (C. E.) "Stories of Authors' Loves" . . .	395
"L'Avocat Patelin," (the famous fifteenth century farce), translated by Samuel F. G. Whitaker . . .	445
"Law, Thomas Graves, Collected Essays and Reviews of," edited by P. Hume Brown . . .	81
"Lectures Françaises, Choix de," R. L'Asser . . .	49
"Life, The Wonders of," Prof. Ernest Haeckel . . .	82
"Life's Questionings, A Book of Experience," William Romaine Paterson . . .	332
"Literary Portraits," Charles Whibley . . .	13
"Literature, Russian, Ideals and Realities in," Prince Kropotkin . . .	656
" " " " English, Spanish Influence on," Martin Hume . . .	99
" " " " Main Currents in Nineteenth-Century," George Brandes . . .	583
"Little Arthur's England," Lady Calcott . . .	48
"Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia, The, and their Place in the Plan of the Apocalypse," Wm. Ramsay . . .	81
Lodge's (Sir Oliver) "School Teaching and School Reform" . . .	658
"Logic of Human Character, The," Charles J. Whitby . . .	416
"London, The Soul of, A Survey of a Modern City," Ford Madox Hueffer . . .	559
Loti's (Pierre) "La Troisième Jeunesse de Madame Prune" . . .	462
"Louvre, The Art of," Mary Knight Potter . . .	34
Lovel's (S.) "The Elements of Trigonometry" . . .	51
Lyall's (Sir Alfred) "The Life of the Marquis of Dufferin and Ava" . . .	144
MacArthur's (M.) "British History in Review" . . .	48
"Macaulay's England in 1685," edited by H. C. Notcutt . . .	48
MacDonagh's (Michael) "The Viceroy's Post-Bag" . . .	12
MacDougall's (W.) "Physiological Psychology" . . .	415
MacLagan's (R. C.) "The Perth Incident of 1596 from a Folk Lore Point of View" . . .	328
MacLehose's (Sophia H.) "From the Monarchy to the Republic in France" . . .	48
Macmillan's (the Rev. W.) "John Knox" . . .	357
MacPherson's (Hector) "Scotland's Battles for Spiritual Independence" . . .	467
McSpadden's (J. W.) "Synopsis of Dickens' Novels" . . .	126
Mahaffy's (J. P.) "The Progress of Hellenism in Alexander's Empire" . . .	536
"Man, The Evolution of," Ernst Haeckel, translated by Joseph McCabe . . .	489
"Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, The Thoughts of the Emperor," translated by George Long . . .	467
"Martineau, James: Theologian and Teacher. A Study of his Life and Thought," J. Estlin Carpenter . . .	560
Matarazzo's (Francesco) "Chronicles of the City of Perugia," translated by Edward Strachan Morgan . . .	634
"Mathematics, Elementary Course of," H. S. Hall and F. H. Stevens . . .	50
"Matilda, Countess of Tuscany," Mrs. Mary E. Huddy . . .	194
"Mecca, With the Pilgrims to, The Great Pilgrimage, A.H. 1318-A.D. 1902," Hadji Khan and W. Sparrow . . .	329
"Medieval Lore from Bartholomew Anglicus," Robert Steele . . .	391
"Meditations of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, The," translated by R. Graves . . .	467
Mendes' (Cataline) "Scarron: Comédie Tragique en Cinq Actes" . . .	395
Merrill's (Prof. W. A.) "Latin Hymns" . . .	49
"Minor Poets of the Caroline Period," edited by George Saintsbury . . .	635
Milton's (G. E.) "The Dog" . . .	35
"Modern Utopia, A," H. G. Wells . . .	474
"Momerie, Dr., His Life and Work," Mrs. Momerie . . .	468

REVIEWS—continued.	PAGE
Moore's (Dr. H. Kingshill) "An Unwritten Chapter in the History of Education" . . .	52
"Moore, Thomas," Stephen Gwynn . . .	79
Moore's (T. Sturge) "Albert Durer" . . .	173
Motley's (J. L.) "History of the Rise of the Dutch Republic," "The United Netherlands," "Life and Death of John Barneveld" . . .	10
Munro's (Robert) "Archæology and False Antiquities" . . .	586
Münsterberg's (Hugo) "The Americans" . . .	389
"Musa Verticordia," Francis Coult . . .	61
"My Literary Life," Madame Edmond Adam . . .	34
"Mythology of the British Islands," Charles Squire . . .	58
"Napoleon and England, 1803-1813" . . .	59
Naylor's (E. W.) "An Elizabethan Virginal Book" . . .	562
"Netherlands, The United," John Lothrop Motley . . .	10
Newbolt's (Henry) "The Year of Trafalgar" . . .	658
"New Testament, The Corrected English. A Revision of the Authorised Version" . . .	538
"Notes from a Diary, 1896 to January 1901," the Right Hon. Sir Mountstuart E. Grant Duff . . .	356
Ochsenbein's (Dr. Wilhelm) "Die Aufnahme Lord Byrons in Deutschland und sein Einfluss auf den Jungen Heine" . . .	441
Okey's (Thomas) "The Story of Venice" . . .	271
"Old English Squire, The," John Careless . . .	274
Oliver's (A. S.) "Commercial Practice Connected with the Export and Import Trade" . . .	49
"On a Recently Discovered Fragment of Juvenal," Alfred Davies Cope . . .	331
Ostwald's (Hans) "Maxim Gorki," translated by F. A. Welby . . .	656
"Otia: Poems, Essays and Reviews. Armine Thomas Kent," edited by H. Hodge . . .	80
Parker's (Joseph) "Epistle to the Ephesians" . . .	32
Parkinson's (John) "A Garden of Pleasant Flowers" . . .	196
"Parliament, The Coming of: England from 1350-1660," L. Cecil Jane . . .	78
"Parsival, The Birth of," R. C. Trevelyan . . .	171
Paterson's (W. R.) "Life's Questionings. A Book of Experience" . . .	332
"Patmore, Coventry," Edmund Gosse . . .	465
Paul's (Herbert) "A History of Modern England" . . .	463
"Peculiar People, A: The Doukhobors," Aylmer Maude . . .	608
Peel's (the Hon. Geo.) "The Friends of England" . . .	270
"Penthesilea, A Poem," Laurence Binyon . . .	412
Perry's (Bliss) "The Amateur Spirit" . . .	332
" (C. C.) "New French Course for Schools" . . .	49
"Personal Study of the Upper House, The," Kosmo Wilkinson . . .	391
"Perth Incident of 1396, from a Folk-Lore Point of View, The," R. C. MacLagan . . .	328
"Perugia, Chronicles of the City of, 1492-1503," Francesco Matarazzo, translated by Edward S. Morgan . . .	684
"Philology, Harvard Studies in Classical" . . .	392
"Physical Culture Life, The," H. I. Hancock . . .	491
"Physics, Text-Books of: Heat," J. H. Poynting and J. J. Thomson . . .	51
"Pickwick Papers, The," Charles Dickens . . .	533
"Plato, The Myths of," J. A. Stewart . . .	325
Pollard's (F. A.) "Thomas Cranmer and the English Reformation" . . .	440
"Porcelain, French. A History and Description of," E. S. Auscher, translated by William Burton . . .	393
"Portraits of the Seventeenth Century, Historic and Literary," C. A. Sainte-Beuve, translated by Katharine P. Wornley . . .	60
"Port Arthur. Three Months with the Besiegers," Frederick Villiers . . .	173
Potter's (Mary Knight) "The Art of the Louvre" . . .	34
"Poverty," Robert Hunter . . .	51
Poynting's (J. H.) "Text-books of Physics" . . .	51
Pratt's (Edwin A.) "Railways and their Rates" . . .	635
"Principal Navigations Voyages Traffiques and Discoveries of the English Nation," Richard Hakluyt . . .	630
"Prose and Verse, Studies in," Arthur Symonds . . .	8
"Psychology, Physiological," W. McDougall . . .	415
" " " " Principles of Physiological," Wilhelm Wundt, translated by Prof. Titchener . . .	8
Purchas' (Samuel) "Hakluytus Posthumus: Purchas his Pilgrimes" . . .	234
"Railways and their Rates," Edwin A. Pratt . . .	635
Ramsay's (Wm.) "The Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia and their Place in the Plan of the Apocalypse" . . .	81
Ranke's (Leopold von) "History of the Reformation in Germany" . . .	440
Rannie's (D. W.) "The Student's History of Scotland" . . .	48
"Rat, The," G. M. A. Hewett . . .	35
"Rationalism, Notes on Popular," Canon H. Hensley Henson . . .	32
Raymont's (T.) "The Principles of Education" . . .	51
"Real Life in London; or, The Rambles and Adventures of Bob Tallyho, Esq., and his Cousin the Hon. Tom Dashall Through the Metropolis" . . .	654
"Reason, The Life of," George Santayana . . .	588
"Reformation in Germany, History of," Leopold von Ranke, translated by Sarah Austin . . .	440
"Religion, History of the Reformation of, in Scotland," John Knox . . .	37
"Reminiscences of a Radical Parson," Rev. W. Tuckwell . . .	360
"Renan, Ernest," William Barry . . .	585
Reum's (W. A.) "New French Course for Schools" . . .	49
Rhodes' (J. F.) "History of the United States" . . .	80
Richmond's (W. R.) "The Story of Somersetshire" . . .	394
"Rifle and Romance in the Indian Jungle," Capt. A. I. R. Glasfurd . . .	632
"Road in Tuscany, The," Maurice Hewlett . . .	9

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
"Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius," Samuel Will . . .	47
"Rome, History of," Prof. A. H. J. Greenidge . . .	48
"Painted by A. Pisa. Text by M. A. R. Tucker and Hope Malleson . . .	633
"Ruskin, John, Letters of, to Charles Eliot Norton . . .	123
"Russell's (Geo. W. E.) 'Sydney Smith' . . .	122
"Russian Navy in the Russo-Japanese War," Capt. N. Klado . . .	588
"Peasantry, The," G. Stepiak . . .	659
"Rutherford's (William G.) 'A Chapter in the History of Annotation: being Scholia Aristophanica, vol. iii.' . . .	586
"St. Boniface, The Life and Times of," James M. Williamson . . .	33
"Sainte-Beuve's (C. A.) 'Portraits of the Seventeenth Century, Historical and Literary,' translated by Katharine P. Wormsley . . .	60
"Saintsbury's (George) 'Minor Poets of the Caroline Period' . . .	625
"Santayana's (George) 'The Life of Reason' . . .	588
"Sastrow, Bartholomew, being the Memoirs of a German Burgomaster," translated by Albert Vandam . . .	328
"Scandinavia: A Political History of Denmark, Norway and Sweden," R. Nisbet Bain . . .	172
"Scarlatti, Alessandro: His Life and Works," Edward J. Dent . . .	147
"Scarron. Comédie Tragique en Cinq Actes," Catulle Mendès . . .	395
"Schools, German, Notes on," W. H. Winch . . .	51
"School Teaching and School Reform," Sir Oliver Lodge . . .	658
"Scotland's Battles for Spiritual Independence," Hector Macpherson . . .	467
"Scotland, The Student's History of," D. W. Rannie . . .	48
"Scott's Peerage, The," edited by the Lord Lyon King of Arms . . .	361
"Scott's (Sir Walter) 'Waverley' . . .	535
"Scripture, Holy Expositions of. The Book of Genesis," Alexander MacLaren . . .	32
"Seckler's (F.) 'German Reader for Technical Schools' . . .	49
"Sélincourt's (Beryl de) 'Homes of the First Franciscans in Umbria, the Borders of Tuscany and the Northern Marches' . . .	387
"Sermons Addressed to Individuals," R. J. Campbell . . .	32
"Shakespeare's Marriage: His Departure from Stratford, and Other Incidents in his Life," Joseph William Gray . . .	357
"Shakespearean Tragedy: Lectures on Hamlet, Othello, King Lear, Macbeth," A. C. Bradley . . .	229
"Shakespeare, The Sonnets of" . . .	61
"Sheridan, The Plays of: with an Introduction to each play" by Edmund Gosse . . .	659
"Sheringham's (H. J.) 'An Angler's Hours' . . .	416
"Shore's (W. Teignmouth) 'Dickens' . . .	126
"Shorthouse, J. H., Life, Letters and Literary Remains of," edited by his Wife . . .	437
"Siche's (Edith) 'Catherine de' Medici and the French Reformation' . . .	439
"Simpkinson's (C. H.) 'Thomas Harrison, Regicide and Major-General' . . .	273
"Simpson's (A. Nicol) 'Familiar Scottish Birds' . . .	467
"Skye, A Summer in," Alexander Smith . . .	491
"Sociological Papers" . . .	103
"Smith's (Alexander) 'A Summer in Skye' . . .	491
"(V. A.) 'Early History of India' . . .	48
"(R. Bosworth) 'Bird Life and Bird Lore' . . .	360

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
"Somersetshire, The Story of," W. R. Richmond . . .	394
"South Wales, A Book of," S. Baring Gould . . .	632
"Sparrow's (W. H.) 'With the Pilgrims to Mecca' . . .	329
"Spenser of His Age, The, being Selected Poetry from the Works of Phineas Fletcher" . . .	385
"Spragge's Latin Course" . . .	49
"Squire's (Charles) 'Mythology of the British Islands' . . .	58
"Steele's (Robert) 'Medieval Lore from Bartholomew Anglicus' . . .	391
"Stellar Universe, Our. A Road-Book to the Stars," T. E. Heath . . .	469
"Stepniak's (G.) 'The Russian Peasantry' . . .	659
"Stevens's (F. H.) 'Elementary Course of Mathematics' . . .	50
"Stewart's (J. A.) 'The Myths of Plato' . . .	325
"Stories of Authors' Loves," Clara E. Laughlin . . .	395
"Stormonth's (Rev. James) 'Etymological and Pronouncing Dictionary of the English Language' . . .	50
"Strafford's (Countess of) 'Leaves from the Diary of Henry Greville' . . .	12
"Street's (G. S.) 'Books and Things. A Collection of Stray Remarks' . . .	142
"Sündberg's (Gustav) 'Sweden, Its People and Its Industry' . . .	172
"Sweden; Its People and its History," Sündberg (Gustav) . . .	172
"Sydney Smith," George W. E. Russell . . .	122
"Symons' (Arthur) 'Studies in Prose and Verse' . . .	8
"Tennis Players, Great Lawn," G. W. Beldam, P. A. Vaile . . .	148
"Terry's (Sanford) 'John Graham of Claverhouse, Viscount of Dundee, 1648-1689' . . .	228
"Thackeray's (W. M.) 'Vanity Fair' . . .	535
"Thirlmere's (Rowland) 'Letters from Catalonia' . . .	540
"Thomson's (J. J.) 'Text-Books of Physics' . . .	51
"Tibet and Nepal," painted and described by A. Henry Savage-Landor . . .	101
"Tolstoy's (Count) 'Childhood,' 'Boyhood,' 'Youth,' 'The Incursion,' 'A Landed Proprietor,' 'The Cossacks,' 'Sevastopol,' translated by Leo Wiener . . .	100
"Towards a Social Policy" . . .	512
"Track of a Rolling Stone, The," Hon. Henry J. Coke . . .	413
"Trafalgar, The Year of," Henry Newbolt . . .	658
"Tragic Drama in Æschylus, Sophocles and Shakespeare," Prof. Lewis Campbell . . .	46
"Trevelyan's (R. C.) 'The Birth of Parsival' . . .	171
"Trigonometry, The Elements of," S. H. Lovey . . .	51
"Troisième Jeunesse de Madame Prune, La," Pierre Loti . . .	462
"Trojan Women of Euripides," translated by Gilbert Murray . . .	232
"Tuckwell's (Rev. W.) 'Reminiscences of a Radical Parson' . . .	360
"Two Argonauts in Spain," Jerome Hart . . .	540
"United States, History of the," James Ford Rhodes . . .	80
"Valle's (P. A.) 'Great Lawn-Tennis Players' . . .	148
"Vanity Fair," W. M. Thackeray . . .	535
"Venice, The Story of," Thomas Okey . . .	271
"Verhaeren's (Émile) 'Les Heures d'Après Midi' . . .	587
"Viceroy's Post-Bag, The," Michael MacDonagh . . .	12
"Vignaud's (Henry) 'Étude Critiques sur la Vie de Colomb, avant ses Découvertes' . . .	633
"Villari's (Prof. Pasquale) 'The First Two Centuries of Florentine History' . . .	271
"Villiers' (Frederick) 'Port Arthur, Three Months with the Besiegers' . . .	174

REVIEWS—continued.

	PAGE
"Vinogradoff's (W. P.) 'The Growth of the Manor' . . .	125
"Vision of Piers the Plowman, The," William Langland, done into modern English by Professor Skeat . . .	444
"Waddington's (Mary King) 'Italian Letters of a Diplomat's Wife' . . .	443
"Walpole, Horace, The Letters of," edited by Mrs. Paget Toynbee . . .	195
"Walters' (Prof.) 'Florilegium Tironis Græcum' . . .	49
"Watson, William, The Poems of" . . .	11
"Waterfield's (Margaret) 'Garden Colour' . . .	465
"Waverley," Sir Walter Scott . . .	535
"Wealth, The Distribution of," Prof. T. N. Carver . . .	51
"Wedmore's (Frederick) 'Dream of Provence: Orgeas and Miradou,' 'To Nancy' . . .	171
"Wells' (H. G.) 'A Modern Utopia' . . .	414
"Whibley's (Charles) 'Literary Portraits' . . .	13
"Whitby's (C. J.) 'The Logic of Human Character' . . .	416
"White's (James) 'The Falstaff Letters' . . .	124
"White, Mr. Andrew Dickson, Autobiography of" . . .	538
"Whitefield's Journals, to which are prefixed his Short Account and Further Account," edited by William Wale . . .	197
"Wilkinson's (Kosmo) 'Personal Story of the Upper House' . . .	391
"Williamson's (Geo. C.) 'Guildford in the Olden Time' . . .	62
"(James M.) 'The Life and Times of St. Boniface' . . .	19
"Will's (Samuel) 'Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius' . . .	47
"Winch's (W. H.) 'Notes on German Schools' . . .	51
"Wundt (Wilhelm) 'Principles of Physiological Psychology,' trans. by Prof. Titchener . . .	8
"Yellow War, The," O. . . .	6
"York: The Story of Its Walls and Castles," J. P. Cooper . . .	59

SCIENCE

Associated Sensation . . .	571
Atomic Architecture . . .	283
Cosmos in Category, The . . .	107
Death, The Fear of . . .	177
Emotion and Truth . . .	642
Exposure, A Belated . . .	372
Imagination, The Place of . . .	200
Infancy, Helpless! . . .	87
Knowledge, The Limits of Human . . .	245
"and Reality" . . .	134
Life, The Origin of . . .	667
Light, The Pressure of . . .	546
Matter, The New Theory of . . .	131
Optimism, The Grounds of Rational . . .	451
The Varieties of . . .	426
Point of View, A . . .	525
Question, A Controverted . . .	619
of Questions, The . . .	499
Spirit, The Scientific . . .	594
Sun, The Future of the . . .	68
Universe, The Life of the . . .	341

SHORT NOTICES

Pages . . .	15, 35, 63, 84, 104, 129, 151, 176, 196
-------------	---

SUPPLEMENTS

Education Supplement . . .	45
Spring Announcements . . .	293

CHATTO & WINDUS, PUBLISHERS.TALES OF THE FIVE TOWNS.

By ARNOLD BENNETT, Author of "Anna of the Five Towns." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Jan. 10.]

FLEUR-DE-CAMP: A DAUGHTER OF FRANCE.

By A. GODRIC CAMPBELL. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Jan. 19.]

A SPOILER OF FRANCE.

By RICHARD MARSH, Author of "The Beetle." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [March.]

THE YOUNGEST MISS BROWN.

By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "The House on the Marsh." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [March.]

THE ERROR OF HER WAYS.

By FRANK BARRETT, Author of "Fettered for Life." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [April.]

THE MISSING ELIZABETH.

By ADELINE SERGEANT, Author of "The Story of a Penitent Soul." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Shortly.]

HEIRS OF REUBEN. By CHRIS HEALY, Author of "The Endless Heritage." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Shortly.]MORGANATIC.

By MAX NORDAU, Author of "Degeneration." Translated by ELIZABETH LEE. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Shortly.]

MR. SWINBURNE'S POETICAL WORKS.

COLLECTED LIBRARY EDITION IN SIX VOLUMES. Price 36s. net for the Six Volumes. Now Complete.

A COLLECTED EDITION of Mr. SWINBURNE'S DRAMATIC WORKS in 5 volumes at 6s. net each is in preparation.

A CHANNEL PASSAGE, AND OTHER POEMS.

By ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE. THIRD EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

A DICTIONARY OF THE DRAMA.

A Guide to the Plays, Playwrights, Players, and Playhouses of the United Kingdom and America, from the Earliest Times to the Present.

By W. DAVENPORT ADAMS. Vol. I. (A to G). Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

THE ISLAND OF TRANQUIL DELIGHTS.

By C. WARREN STODDARD. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. net. [Shortly.]

STUDIES IN ASTRONOMY.

By J. ELLARD GORE, F.R.A.S. With 8 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

DR. GEORGE MACDONALD'S WORKS.Works of Fancy and Imagination. Ten Vols. 16mo, cloth gilt, in case, 21s.; or separately, Grolier cloth, 2s. 6d. each.

Vol. I.—Within and Without—The Hidden Life.

Vol. II.—The Disciple—The Gospel Women—Book of Sonnets—Organ Songs.

Vol. III.—Violin Songs—Songs of the Days and Nights—A Book of Dreams—Roadside Poems—Poems for Children.

Vol. IV.—Parables—Ballads—Scotch Songs.

Vol. V. and VI.—Phantastes.

Vol. VII.—The Portent.

Vol. VIII.—The Light Princess—The Giant's Heart—Shadows.

Vol. IX.—Cross Purposes—The Golden Key—The Caracoyne—Little Daylight.

Vol. X.—The Cruel Painter—The Woe o' Riven—The Castle—The Broken Swords—The Gray Wolf—Uncle Cornelius.

Poetical Works of George MacDonald. Two Vols. crown 8vo, buckram, 12s.A Threefold Cord. Post 8vo, cloth, 5s.Phantastes. With 25 Illustrations by J. BELL. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.Heather and Snow. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.; post 8vo, illustrated boards, 2s.Lilith. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.*An Illustrated Humorous Book.HUMOURS OF CYCLING.

By JEROME K. JEROME, H. G. WELLS, BARRY PAIN, CLARENCE ROOK, W. PETT RIDGE, J. F. SULLIVAN, and others. NEW EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. net. [Jan. 19.]

KING KOKO: the Pretty Princess and the Lucky Lover.

A Conjuror Entertainment in form of a Fairy Tale, with Practical Instructions.

By Professor HOFFMANN. With 25 Illustrations by H. L. SHINDLER. Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s. net.

THE DECAMERON OF BOCCACCIO. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net. Leather, gilt edges, 3s. net.THE MASSARENES.

By OUIDA. A NEW EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. Also, shortly, an Edition in medium 8vo, at 6d.

THE LADY OF LYNN.

By SIR WALTER BESANT. With 12 Illustrations by G. DEMAIN HAMMOND. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each.

POPULAR BOOKS.ELIZA'S HUSBAND. By BARRY PAIN.HARRY FLUDYER AT CAMBRIDGE, &c. By R. O. LEHMANN.YOUNG MRS. CAUDLE. By GEORGE R. SIMS.

Fcap. 8vo, 1s. each; cloth, 1s. 6d. each.

THE LIFE WE LIVE. By GEORGE R. SIMS.THE FOOLISH VIRGINS. By ALFRED SUTRO.NEW SERIES OF POPULAR NOVELS. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net each; leather, 1s. 6d. net each.TWO LITTLE WOODEN SHOES. By OUIDA. THE FROZEN DEEP. By WILKIE COLLINS. THE WANDERING HEIR. By CHARLES READE. [Jan. 19.]

Pott 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net each;

THE ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY.

leather, gilt edges, 3s. net each

Nature Near London. By RICHARD JEFFERIES. [Shortly.]London. By SIR WALTER BESANT.All Sorts and Conditions. By SIR WALTER BESANT.The Deemster. By HALL CAIN.The Woman in White. By WILKIE COLLINS.Robinson Crusoe. By DANIEL DEFOE. (The Two Parts.) With 37 Illustrations

by GEORGE CRUIKSHANK.

Under the Greenwood Tree. By THOMAS HARDY.Condensed Novels. By BRET HARTE.The Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table. By OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

With Illustrations by J. G. THOMSON.

Across the Plains. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. [Shortly.]The Life of the Fields. By RICHARD JEFFERIES.The Open Air. By RICHARD JEFFERIES.The Cloister and the Hearth. By CHARLES READE."It is Never Too Late to Mend." By CHARLES READE.Memories and Portraits. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.Virginibus Puerisque. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.Men and Books. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.New Arabian Nights. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.The Pocket R. L. S. Favourite Passages from STEVENSON'S WORKS.Sketches. By MARK TWAIN.The Complete Angler. By WALTON and COTTON.POPULAR SIXPENNY*COPYRIGHT NOVELS.

The following are NEW in this form, and will be issued during the Spring.

DOROTHY FORSTER. By SIR WALTER BESANT. Jan. 12.GOD AND THE MAN. By ROBERT BUCHANAN.RED SPIDER. By S. BARING GOULD.CHANDOS. By OUIDA.PARIS. By EMILE ZOLA.LOST SIR MASSINGBERD. By JAMES PAYN.A BIRD OF PASSAGE. By B. M. CROKELL.A TERRIBLE TEMPTATION. By CHARLES READE.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111 St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

THE BOOK MARKET

Booksellers' Reports of the Best Selling Books

England

BATH:

Mr. John D. Baillie,
Grand Pump Room Library

General Literature

1. The Gospels in Art. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. Life & Letters at Bath in the Eighteenth Century. Barbeau. (Heinemann.)

Fiction

1. The Truants. Mason. (Smith, Elder.)
2. Whoever Shall Offend. Crawford. (Macmillan.)

Messrs. B. & J. F. Meehan,
32 Gay Street

General Literature

1. Local Guides.
2. Life & Letters at Bath in the Eighteenth Century. Barbeau. (Heinemann.)

Fiction

1. Curiosities. Pain. (Unwin.)
2. Cardigan. Chambers. (Constable.)

Mr. S. W. Simms,
The Bath and County Library

General Literature

1. Life & Letters at Bath in the Eighteenth Century. Barbeau. (Heinemann.)
2. Who's Who. (Black.)

Fiction

1. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)
2. The Prospector. Connor. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

BIRMINGHAM:

Messrs. Cornish Brothers, Ltd.,
37 New Street

General Literature

1. Memorials of Edward Burne-Jones. (Macmillan.)
2. Great Englishmen of the Sixteenth Century. Lee. (Constable.)

Fiction

1. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)
2. The Abbess of Vlaye. Weyman. (Longmans.)

Mr. Achilles Taylor,
198 Corporation Street

General Literature

1. The Open Secret. Horton. (Free Church Council.)
2. Adventures of Cock Robin. Kearton. (Cassell.)

Fiction

1. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)
2. God's Good Man. Corelli. (Methuen.)

BOURNEMOUTH:

Mr. Horace G. Commin,
Old Christchurch Road

General Literature

1. English Idylls. (Dent.)
2. On the Old Road through France to Florence. (Murray.)

Fiction

1. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)
2. The Prospector. Connor. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

BRIGHTON:

Mr. S. Cambridge,
56 Church Road, Hove

General Literature

1. The Gospels in Art. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. Life & Letters of Mandell Creighton. (Longmans.)

Fiction

1. God's Good Man. Corelli. (Methuen.)
2. John Chilcote, M.P. Thurston. (Blackwood.)

Mr. W. Junor,
72 Queen's Road

General Literature

1. Memorials of Edward Burne-Jones. (Macmillan.)
2. Thin Paper Editions, various.

Fiction

1. Dialstone Lane. Jacobs. (Newnes.)
2. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)

BRISTOL:

Messrs. James Fawn & Son,
42 Queen's Road

General Literature

1. Colour Books. (Black.)
2. Famous Fighters of the Fleet. Fraser. (Macmillan.)

Fiction

1. The Abbess of Vlaye. Weyman. (Longmans.)
2. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)

CAMBRIDGE:

Messrs. Galloway & Porter,
30 Sidney Street

General Literature

1. Cartoons in Rhyme and Line. Lawson. (Unwin.)
2. Multiple Personality. (Appleton.)
3. England a Nation. Johnson.

Messrs. Macmillan & Bowes,
1 Trinity Street

General Literature

1. The Works of Arthur Clement Hilton. (Macmillan.)
2. Miscellaneous Essays and Addresses. Sidgwick. (Macmillan.)
3. The Sin of David. Phillips. (Macmillan.)

Fiction

1. Ghost Stories. James. (Arnold.)
2. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)

DOVER:

Messrs. Voile & Roberson,
176 Snargate Street

General Literature

1. The Gospels in Art. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. Omar Khayyam. (Routledge.)

Fiction

1. God's Good Man. Corelli. (Methuen.)
2. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)

EASTBOURNE:

Mr. Henry W. Keay,
72 Terminus Road

General Literature

1. Japan. Hartshorne. (Kegan Paul.)
2. Private Lives of William II. and his Consort. Fischer. (Heinemann.)

Fiction

1. The Truants. Mason. (Smith, Elder.)
2. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)

Mr. J. Pulsford,
"The Royal Library,"
80 Terminus Road

General Literature

1. Psalms in Human Life. Prothero. (Murray.)
2. Colour Books. (Black.)

Fiction

1. The Abbess of Vlaye. Weyman. (Longmans.)
2. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)

KINGSTON-ON-THAMES:

Messrs. G. Phillipson & Sons,
Market Place

General Literature

1. The Gospels in Art. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. Japan. Menpes. (Black.)

Fiction

1. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)
2. The Last Hope. Merriman. (Smith, Elder.)

LEICESTER:

Messrs. Spencer & Greenhough,
102 Granby Street

General Literature

1. Adventures of Cock Robin. Kearton. (Cassell.)
2. The Gospels in Art. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Fiction

1. God's Good Man. Corelli. (Methuen.)
2. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)

LINCOLN:

(Sent in without name or address.)

General Literature

1. The Gospels in Art. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. Life of Hugh Price Hughes. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Fiction

1. God's Good Man. Corelli. (Methuen.)
2. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)

LONDON:

Messrs. Burns & Oates, Ltd.,
28 Orchard Street, W.

General Literature

1. Feasts of Mother Church. Salome.
2. Sermons preached in St. Edmund's College Chapel. Burton.

Fiction

1. A Spoiled Priest. Sheehan.
2. The Riddingdale Boys.

Messrs. Farmer & Sons,
(Young's Library),
179 Kensington High Street, W.

General Literature

1. The Sin of David. Phillips. (Macmillan.)
2. Faith of Church and Nation. Ingram. (Gardner.)

Fiction

1. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)
2. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)

Mr. J. Jacob,
149 Edgware Road, Hyde Park, W.

General Literature

1. Familiar London. Barton. (Black.)
2. Whistler Portfolio. ("The Studio.")

Fiction

1. God's Good Man. Corelli. (Methuen.)
2. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)

Messrs. Jones & Evans, Ltd.,
77 Queen Street, Cheapside, E.C.

General Literature

1. Memorials of Edward Burne-Jones. (Macmillan.)
2. English Idylls. (Dent.)

Fiction

1. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)
2. The Sea-Wolf. London. (Heinemann.)

Messrs. Lamley & Co.,
1, 3 & 7 Exhibition Road, S.W.

General Literature

1. The Old Road. Belloc. (Constable.)
2. Familiar London. Barton. (Black.)

Fiction

1. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)
2. The Abbess of Vlaye. Weyman. (Longmans.)

Messrs. Marris & Révéne,
68 High Street, South Norwood

General Literature

1. The Gospels in Art. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. Diplomatist's Wife in Japan. Fraser. (Hutchinson.)

Fiction

1. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)
2. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)

THE BOOK MARKET—continued

LONDON—continued

Messrs. Truslove & Hanson, Ltd.,
153 Oxford Street, W.

General Literature

1. Bonnie Scotland. Palmer and Moncrieff. (Black.)
2. Memorials of Edward Burne-Jones. (Macmillan.)

Fiction

1. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)
2. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)

Mr. Alfred Wilson,
18 Gracechurch Street, E.C.

General Literature

1. Bonnie Scotland. Palmer and Moncrieff. (Black.)
2. The Gospels in Art. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Fiction

1. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)
2. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)

MANCHESTER:

Mr. R. S. Chrystal,
11 Market Street

General Literature

1. Reminiscences of Sir Henry Hawkins. (Arnold.)
2. The Gospels in Art. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Fiction

1. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)
2. The Last Hope. Merriman. (Smith, Elder.)

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE:

Mr. A. Denholm Brash,
County Hotel Buildings

General Literature

1. The Gospels in Art. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. New Methodist Hymn-Book.

Fiction

1. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)
2. God's Good Man. Corelli. (Methuen.)

NORWICH:

Messrs. Jarrold & Sons, Ltd.,
London Road

General Literature

1. The King's Homeland. Dutt. (Black.)
2. The Gospels in Art. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Fiction

1. God's Good Man. Corelli. (Methuen.)
2. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)

OLDHAM:

Mr. W. E. Clegg,
30 Market Place

General Literature

Collected Writings of Samuel Laycock.

Fiction

1. God's Good Man. Corelli. (Methuen.)
2. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)

OXFORD:

Social Reformers' Bookshop,
56 High Street

General Literature

1. Theosophy and the New Psychology. Besant. (T.P.S.)
2. Do We Believe? (R.P.A.)
3. Christianity and Rationalism on Trial. (R.P.A.)
4. People's Classics, various. (Daniel.)

RAMSGATE:

Messrs. Blinko & Sons,
27 Queen Street

General Literature

1. The Gospels in Art. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. Pocket Novels and World's Classics. (Collins.)

Fiction

1. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)
2. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)

RUGBY:

Mr. G. E. Over,
3 High Street

General Literature

1. Temple Classics. (Dent.)
2. Pocket Editions, various.

Fiction

1. God's Good Man. Corelli. (Methuen.)
2. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)

SCARBOROUGH:

Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son,
(late Messrs. Theakston, Ltd.),
31 St. Nicholas Street

General Literature

1. Colour Books. (Black.)
2. Reminiscences of Sir Henry Hawkins. (Arnold.)

Fiction

1. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)
2. God's Good Man. Corelli. (Methuen.)

TORQUAY:

Messrs. A. Iredale & Son,
13 Strand

General Literature

1. Bonnie Scotland. Palmer and Moncrieff. (Black.)
2. Artist Series. (Newnes.)

Fiction

1. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)
2. The Affair at the Inn. Wiggin and others. (Gay & Bird.)

VENTNOR:

Mr. W. J. Knight,
147-9 High Street

General Literature

1. Life and Times of St. Boniface. Williamson. (Frowde.)
2. Books and Booklets. Miller. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Fiction

1. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)
2. The Prospector. Connor. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

WESTON-SUPER-MARE:

Mr. Frank Gill,
15 Waterloo Street

General Literature

1. A Corner in Arcady. Knight. (Dent.)
2. The Glamour of the Earth. Dewar. (Allen.)

Fiction

1. Whosoever Shall Offend. Crawford. (Macmillan.)
2. The Last Hope. Merriman. (Smith, Elder.)

WEYMOUTH:

Burt's Library,
St. Mary Street

General Literature

1. The Roadmender. Fairless. (Duckworth.)
2. Faith of Church and Nation. Ingram. (Gardner.)

Fiction

1. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)
2. God's Good Man. Corelli. (Methuen.)

Scotland

ABERDEEN:

Mr. J. G. Bissett,
85 Broad Street

General Literature

1. The Gospels in Art. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. Bonnie Scotland. Palmer and Moncrieff. (Black.)

Fiction

1. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)
2. The Prospector. Connor. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Messrs. A. & R. Milne,
229 Union Street

General Literature

1. The Gospels in Art. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. John Knox. Stalker. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Fiction

1. John Obilcote, M.P. Thurston. (Blackwood.)
2. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)

ABERDEEN—continued.

Messrs. D. Wyllie & Son,
247 Union Street

General Literature

1. Life of Hugh Price Hughes. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. The Gospels in Art. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
3. Old Time Traders. Cook. (Bon-Accord Press.)

Fiction

John Obilcote, M.P. Thurston. (Blackwood.)

EDINBURGH:

Mr. R. W. Hunter,
19 George IV. Bridge

General Literature

1. The Gospels in Art. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. Humours of Scottish Life. Gillespie. (Blackwood.)

Fiction

1. John Obilcote, M.P. Thurston. (Blackwood.)
2. The Prospector. Connor. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

GLASGOW:

Messrs. Robert Gibson & Sons, Ltd.,
45 Queen Street

General Literature

1. Edinburgh. Fulleylove and Masson. (Black.)
2. Practice of Self-Culture. Black. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Fiction

1. John Obilcote, M.P. Thurston. (Blackwood.)
2. God's Good Man. Corelli. (Methuen.)

GREENOCK:

Mr. James W. Black,
17 West Blackhall Street

General Literature

1. Memorials of Edward Burne-Jones. (Macmillan.)
2. Cartoons in Rhyme and Line. Lawson and Gould (Unwin.)

Fiction

1. Our Village, Cranford, &c. (Dent.)
2. Two Little Savages. Seton-Thompson. (Richards.)

KIRKCALDY:

Mr. James Burt,
184-186 High Street

General Literature

1. New "Library Edition" of Ruskin. (Allen.)
2. Chambers' Encyclopedia. (Chambers.)
3. Illustrated Books. Menpes, &c. (Black.)

Fiction

1. The Prospector. Connor. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)
3. Sets of Dickens &c.

Ireland

ENNIS:

Mr. James Hayes,
Church Street

General Literature

Irish Prayer-book. (Catholic Truth Society.)

Fiction

1. His Share of the World. Griffin. (Greening.)
2. Caidair Connoi. (Connrad na Saebilge.)

Wales

CARDIFF:

Principality Educational Depot,
Y.M.C.A. Buildings

General Literature

1. Quiet Talks on Prayer. Gordon. (Revell.)
2. Pocket Editions of Classics.
3. Alexander's Hymns and Tunes.

Cassell & Company's ANNOUNCEMENTS.

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE LANTERN

By Sir FREDERICK TREVES, K.C.V.O., &c. &c.
With Rembrandt Frontispiece and 39 Full-page Plates from Photographs by the Author. 12s. net.
[Ready shortly.]

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF MONCURE CONWAY

(With Portraits.) 2 vols., 30s. net.
"These two volumes stand out like twin gems from the rubbish heap of biographical works with which this generation is confronted."—Daily Chronicle.

THE NAVY AS I HAVE KNOWN IT

By Admiral Sir E. R. FREMANTLE, O.M.G. 16s. net.
"A book which will fascinate civilians and should be in the hands of every naval officer."—Daily Telegraph.

FIFTY YEARS OF PUBLIC SERVICE

By Major ARTHUR GRIFFITHS. 18s. net.
"There is not a dull line. Its contents have a weird fascination."—Standard.

THE ADVENTURES OF COCK ROBIN AND HIS MATE

By R. KEARTON, F.Z.S.
With upwards of 120 Illustrations from Photographs direct from Nature by O. and R. KEARTON.
Second Impression. 6s.

"We have learnt much from this book. The photographs are of never-ending interest, and we strongly recommend the work."—The Times.

CASSELL'S CABINET CYCLOPÆDIA

Concise and Comprehensive.
With several hundred Illustrations and Diagrams specially prepared. 12s. 6d. net.
"Strongly bound and capably illustrated. The summaries are judiciously done, and new features in science are noted."—Athenæum.

POCKET EDITIONS OF WORKS BY R. L. STEVENSON

2s. net each; or leather, 3s. net each.
Kidnapped—Catriona—The Master of Ballantrae—The Wrecker—Island
Nights' Entertainment—The Black
Arrow—Treasure Island.
The seven volumes are also issued in a box—cloth,
15s. net; leather, 21s. net.

PART 1 Ready January 27, price 6d. net, of THE EMPIRE EDITION OF CASSELL'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND

With 2,000 Illustrations, Rembrandt Photogravures, Coloured Plates and Maps.

THE DON QUIXOTE TERCENTENARY. The FIRST FORTNIGHTLY PART will be READY JANUARY 27, 6d. net, of a NEW FINE ART EDITION

DON QUIXOTE PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED BY GUSTAVE DORÉ.

* Those selecting Presentation Volumes will be saved much trouble by consulting CASSELL'S GUIDE TO NOTABLE BOOKS OF THE SEASON, just issued, a copy of which will be sent post free on application.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LTD.,
La Belle Sauvage, London, E.C.

NOW READY, POST FREE, 4½d.

"THE BUILDER" NEW YEAR'S NUMBER, JANUARY 7, 1905.

CONTENTS:

ILLUSTRATIONS OF LIVERPOOL CATHEDRAL
as proposed, drawn by W. Curtis Green; "The Maker of the Song" (Coloured Print), by J. Staines
-abb; Interior, "The Palace of Art," by the Editor;
Kingston Bridge, drawn by W. Monk; Decoration,
"Peace," and Cartoon of Figure from ditto, by G. H.
Short; Loggia de Lanzi, Florence, drawn by A. O.
Conrade; Belem Church Porch and Belem Church Interior, by A. O. Conrade; Luton Church Tower and some Old London Heraldry, drawn by R. W. Paul; Scheme for the Treatment of King's Cross Station Facade, by A. O. Dickie; Old London Sites in the Neighbourhood of Whitehall; two plates (from drawings in the Grace Collection); Sculpture from the Paris Salon. Also the Commencement of a Series of Articles (Student's Column) on "Typical Structures in Concrete-Steel," with other interesting matter, both literary and artistic.

LONDON: The Publisher of "The Builder," Catherine Street, W.O.

FOR THE PROMPT & MOST ABLE CRITICISM

OF CURRENT LITERATURE

SEE THE MANCHESTER COURIER,

Which commands the services of a large and distinguished

STAFF OF REVIEWERS.

THE MANCHESTER COURIER

PUBLISHES THE

Best Special Articles

On Literary and Social Topics of any Daily Paper outside London.

NOTICE.

An Educational Supplement of special interest will be given with next week's issue of "The Academy and Literature."

— K. L. Montgomery's
Major Weir (6s.) "is a powerful book; it is a witty book;
it is rich in style, full of humour, full of hairbreadth escapes, pulsing with blood and life."—Academy.

A SONG OF A SINGLE NOTE

By AMELIA E. BARR. 6s.

A fascinating love story with a historical setting, by the Author of "Prisoners of Conscience."

— "I do not know when I read a story that held me so breathless from start to finish as K. L. Montgomery's Major Weir" (3s) — Truth.

CARTOONS IN RHYME & LINE

Verses by Sir Wilfrid Lawson.
Fifty original Drawings by F. C. Gould.

Fcap. 4to, 4s. 6d. net.

— The British Weekly says Major Weir (6s.) "must take its place among the very few great novels of Edinburgh."

THE YOUTH OF WASHINGTON

By S. WEIR MITCHELL. 6s.

The story of the great leader's life up to his twenty-seventh year told in the form of an autobiography.

— The Athenæum, Times,
Spectator, Literary World, and practically the whole press unite in testifying to the remarkable interest and high literary quality of Major Weir, by the Author of "The Cardinal's Pawn."

T. FISHER UNWIN, London.

The Academy and Literature

EDITED BY W. TEIGNMOUTH SHORE

No. 1705. Established 1869.

London: 7 January 1905.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17s. 6d. a year.]

Notes

IN view of the activity now shown in regard to the Shakespeare Memorial I reprint some notes on the subject from THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE for February 20 and 27, 1904:

"But what is the memorial to be? Not a statue, I hope, or, as has been suggested, a Shakespeare school of dramatic art. What is wanted is a thoroughly practical institution in connection with Shakespearean study and Elizabethan London. A library, a museum of relics, pictures, maps, &c., of Elizabethan London, a portrait gallery of Shakespearean actors, critics and commentators, and a lecture and meeting room (possibly this last could be combined with the picture gallery). But, above all, what is required is enthusiasm, and surely this will not be difficult to arouse. The study of Shakespeare and his times is fascinating if only rightly approached, and the scheme outlined above would be welcomed, I believe, and generally supported by all lovers and students of Shakespeare.

"The institute suggested in last week's ACADEMY would, I believe, both live and last. I see it in my mind's eye as a centre of Shakespeare enthusiasm and scholarship, a meeting place for students and a proud possession of London citizens. I trust I shall be forgiven for going somewhat into detail. First of all as to architecture: can there be any doubt that the building should be in Tudor style, such a building as Shakespeare must have seen in his own London? Then as to accommodation: a good entrance hall, which might be decorated with replicas of the statues and busts of the poet; then sufficient rooms for a library, galleries for pictures, accommodation for the librarian and keeper, and spare ground for future extension. In the library should be gathered together all editions of the plays and poems, works of every character dealing with them and books treating of Shakespeare's London. In the picture gallery and museum copies of the portraits of Shakespeare, portraits of critics, commentators and players, pictures, maps, plans and relics of Shakespeare's London. The large gallery should be sufficiently commodious to seat a considerable audience for costume recitals of the plays, for meetings of societies, lectures, assemblies and so forth. Then the stern money side of the question. If a demand be made by a large body of representative citizens the London County Council, it is to be hoped, would see its way to make a grant of sufficient ground out of that now being cleared between Westminster and Lambeth, for the Shakespeare Institute should look out upon Shakespeare's beloved Thames. Then money will be wanted for the building and for an endowment fund for maintenance, salary of the librarian and keeper, &c., &c.; £200 or £300 a year from the County Council would not be felt by the rate-payers, but would break the back of the necessary endowment; a further source of income would be the letting of the large gallery to associations, Shakespeare societies and other bodies, and a small fee—6d.—might be charged to visitors to the galleries. The library should be under much the same regulations as the British Museum. A separate fund would probably have to be raised for the purchase of books. Such an institute as that outlined above would, I believe, prove beneficial and popular; its usefulness would increase from year to year; it would be a living memorial. But whatever scheme it be decided to put forward, there can be no question that London should have a worthy memorial of her greatest citizen, a memorial of the man, the poet, the dramatist, the actor and of his London. We have many splendid buildings still in our midst which adorned Elizabethan London, as recent illustrations in THE ACADEMY have shown; few are the passers-by who even glance at them, thinking that Shakespeare looked upon them too. Fewer still are those who realise how much we know of Shakespeare's London, how detailed is the knowledge of it we can obtain from contemporary books and pamphlets, maps and views, and for the right understanding of Shakespeare's plays an intimate knowledge of Shakespeare's London is essential. Therefore it is fitting that this proposed memorial should be a memorial not only of the great citizen, but of the great city in which he dwelt."

DR. JAMES GAIRDNER

[Photo. Russell & Sons]

THE three Scottish printing clubs have now held their annual meetings, the New Spalding Club being the last to submit its report. Unlike the Scottish History and the Scottish Text Societies, the New Spalding Club professedly deals with the history and literature, not of the whole of Scotland, but only with the north-eastern counties. The club is a revival of an older Spalding Club, which, according to Hill Burton, "produced fully as much valuable historical matter as any other club in Britain." It took its name from John Spalding, believed to have been Commissary Clerk of Aberdeen, but of whom the only positive knowledge is that he left extremely valuable "Memorials of the Troubles in Scotland and in England" from 1624 to 1645.

THE work announced in the latest report as about to be undertaken by the club is of the widest Scottish interest. In the year of the constitution of the New Spalding—that is, in 1887—an annotated transcript of the Register of the Scots College at Rome was put upon the list of agenda. The transcript was prepared, but was lost on the death of Monsignor Campbell, who had undertaken the work. Now, however, the committee of the club are able to announce not only that the Rome Register will be printed, but that the registers of the Scots Colleges at Douai, Madrid, Valladolid and Ratisbon will also be included among the publications. The finances of the New Spalding Club are in a flourishing condition.

PAISLEY has just inaugurated its annual art exhibition, which always takes a leading place among the shows promoted by the larger Scottish towns. This ancient town, famous for its poets and its thread, numbers among its citizens and neighbours many owners of fine collections of pictures, whose treasures provide unfailing examples of the highest class of pictorial art. On this occasion two local gentlemen have lent three portraits by Sir Joshua Reynolds, Mr. Holms sending "Mrs. Jordan" and "Mary, Countess Delenvarr" (sic in Catalogue), and Sir Thomas Glen-Coats "Miss Palmer." Naturally, Scottish artists are largely represented. Sir James Guthrie, the President, and Sir George Reid, the ex-President of the Royal Scottish Academy, have each sent a portrait, the ex-President's being a presentment of a local celebrity, Principal Hutton. Most of the leading Scottish painters now working are represented, whilst the artistic past of the country is shown in examples by such men as John Phillip Alexander Fraser and Sam Bough, usually reckoned among the Scots.

THE battle around which Scott wrote his romance of "The Fair Maid of Perth" is one of the historical events about which little is known. The Exchequer accounts show that the national funds provided the lists, but even the clans that participated are unknown, though tradition gives them names not now identifiable. An attempt to expiscate the subject by the aid of reasonable conjecture is about to be made in a book by Dr. MacLagan, which Messrs. Blackwood are to publish in the spring.

It certainly seems a long cry from Schiller's "Räubern" to Milton's "Paradise Lost"; but I have just been reading an article in this month's "Deutsche Rundschau" on the place of "Die Räubern" in the literature of the world, which does much to establish what might at first sight appear to be but a forced and fanciful similarity. Apart from the fact that the styles of the two works derive their inspiration to a great extent from the Bible, both "Die Räubern" and "Paradise Lost" exhibit that militant Puritan spirit, that insistence on a complete reconciliation between God and man, which is one of the cardinal features of the old Germanic spirit. But, as was only natural in an age whose chief mark was the emancipation of the individual, it was the character of Satan which exercised the greatest influence on Schiller, an influence practically acknowledged by the following reference by Schiller in his own edition of his play: "Milton, who wrote the panegyric of hell, can make for a few moments even the most sensitive of readers into a fallen angel." The following pair of passages reveal, moreover, an analogy so pronounced as to border dangerously on imitation. In Milton's "Paradise Lost," I., 248, Satan says:—

"The mind is its own place and in itself
Can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven."

In Schiller's "Die Räubern" Karl Moor gives vent to precisely the same sentiment. "Externals are merely the varnish of man; I myself am my heaven and my hell." Though, however, I think the analogy holds good, the writer strikes me as unhappy in his choice of quotation. The idea in both passages is good, but is it not one that was bound to have suggested itself to almost any vigorous mind? Does it not, in fact, date as far back as Omar Khāyām?

SCHILLER, however, admired Shakespeare even more enthusiastically than he did Milton, and the writer of the article proceeds to trace the psychological genealogy of Franz Moor from Richard III., Iago and Edmund. The analogy with the latter character is particularly striking, as both Franz and Edmund intrigue against their brothers by means of a forged letter and lay violent hands on their own fathers. But Schiller's literary outlook was cosmopolitan, and it is interesting to see from the following extracts from the preface and the revised edition the extent to which he was influenced by Plutarch and Cervantes:

"And so was finished this extraordinary Don Quixote whom as Robber Moor we fear and love, wonder at and pity. This extraordinary individual [Karl Moor] owes his main features to Plutarch and Cervantes, who, after the method of Shakespeare, have been blended by the poet's spirit into a new character that is at once true and harmonious."

I cannot but think, however, that the writer exaggerates the importance of the play in European literature. Is not the significance of "Die Räubern" rather psychological than artistic? In spite of the fact that it still keeps the stage in Germany, the play should rather be regarded as the outlet for the ferment of Schiller's adolescence than as a serious literary achievement of the first rank. A propos of "Die Räubern," I do not remember ever having seen noticed the striking analogy between the robber scenes of this play and "Contarini Fleming." Disraeli must have been undoubtedly drawing on Schiller. It is well known that he had a considerable acquaintance with the modern German literature of his day.

THE Literary Year-Book for 1905, published by Messrs. Routledge, is a very workmanlike production, essential to every worker with the pen. In former years there was a considerable amount of "padding," but now the Year-Book is a thoroughly handy and practical work of reference, compact of useful information. Among the new features are "Books of 1904," arranged under subject headings, an "Index of Titles" and "Law and Letters." The information is full and accurate. I wish the same could truthfully be said of all annuals. Messrs. Mudie have sent me a copy of their fine Library Catalogue—a useful compilation for those who desire a guide to the recent literature on any given subject.

Bibliographical

LAST week I referred to some "half-forgotten" books—to use the wholly illogical term—mentioned in Dr. Moncure Conway's autobiography, but perhaps there will be more interest in three announcements of forthcoming books which are incidentally made in the same work. Writing of Francis William Newman—younger brother of the Cardinal—for whose character and work Dr. Conway has the highest admiration, he adds: "His letters are of historical value, and it is among my hopes to write a monograph concerning him." Such a work would be widely welcomed by readers who know anything of the life and writings of the versatile scholar and indefatigable searcher after truth. By the way, in October last it was seven years since F. W. Newman's death, so that the copyright in his earlier and more interesting writings has now lapsed. There should certainly be room for cheap reissues of "The Soul, Her Sorrows and Aspirations" (1849) and "Phases of Faith, or Passages from the History of my Creed" (1850).

The next announcement, or hint of such, which I notice in Dr. Conway's work concerns a Scots lady who became famous in America many years ago, but who is, I imagine, not widely known on this side of the Atlantic. It is Frances Wright—or Fanny Wright as she is in many references in American books—afterwards Mme. d'Arusmont. Born in Dundee in 1795, she became inspired from reading with an affection for the United States and its institutions, and in 1818 journeyed thither and wrote a most enthusiastic book on the country. Later she started a scheme for freeing the slaves, and later still she became a zealous member of the Owenite Colony at New Harmony, and one of the first female lecturers in America, her subjects being mainly connected with slavery and female suffrage. Says Dr. Conway: "A biography of this noble lady is a desideratum in both English and American literature, which I have some reason to hope will be supplied by the poetic pen of her cultured kinsman, the Reverend William Norman Guthrie." Such a book should certainly be interesting. When Mme. d'Arusmont revisited her native town a few years before her death (1852) a small pamphlet "biography" was issued from a local press (1844), and it was reprinted in Boston four years later. This I have read. After her death, in Cincinnati, another pamphlet life was issued in that city.

The third announcement which I find in Dr. Conway's pages concerns a distinguished scholar and writer on philosophy, education and art—Thomas Davidson. He, too, was a Scotsman who followed the tide of empire westward. Davidson's most memorable works are perhaps his account and translation of "The Philosophical System of A. Rosmini-Serbati" (1882)—one of the most remarkable thinkers of modern Italy—and his "History of Education," published in the year of his death, 1900. We are told that Professor Knight, of St. Andrews, "is writing a life of that marvellous man," and the information will no doubt interest many readers. Davidson has been written about in the magazines as "democratic philosopher" and "wandering scholar," but there has been no biography of him published, and by a strange oversight he is not dealt with in the Dictionary of National Biography Supplement, though he died on September 14, 1900.

The late Reverend John Mackenzie Bacon was best known to members of the general public as an aeronaut, but he was also an astronomer and took part in several expeditions for taking observations during the total eclipse of the sun. On the theme with which he had popularly identified himself he published two books within recent years—"By Land and Sky" (1900) and "The Dominion of the Air: the Story of Aerial Navigation" (1902). Earlier books which are credited to him are: "A Short Analysis of Paley's Evidences of Christianity" (1870), "Hints on Elementary Statics" (1870), "Short Notes on the Acts of the Apostles" (1870), "On the Gospel of St. Matthew" (1883) and "On the Gospel of St. Luke" (1885).

Mr. Edward John Payne, the late Recorder of High Wycombe, was the author of several important works, chiefly of an historical character: "Select Works of Edmund Burke" in the Clarendon Press Series (1874-76); "History of European Colonies" (1877); "Voyages of the Elizabethan Seamen to America," from Hakluyt (1893-1900); "History of the New World called America" (1892-99); "The Colonies," in "The British Citizen Series" (1902). Mr. Payne also contributed the two opening chapters—"The Age of Discovery" and "The New World"—to the first volume of the great "Cambridge Modern History" (1902).

WALTER JERROLD.

Forthcoming Books, &c.

A cheaper issue of Mr. Ralph Richardson's "George Morland, Painter," with numerous illustrations, is announced by Mr. Elliot Stock to be issued early in next year.—Mr. John Long will publish during January the following new six-shilling novels: "The Mask," by William Le Queux; "Confessions of a Young Lady," by Richard Marsh; "The Face in the Flashlight," by Florence Warden; "Love and Twenty," by John Strange Winter; "Olive Kinsella," by Curtis Yorke; "The Night of Reckoning," by Frank Barrett; "The Fate of Felix," by Mrs. Coulson Kernahan; "Little Wife Hester," by L. T. Meade; "The Provincials," by Lady Helen Forbes; "From the Clutch of the Sea," by J. E. Muddock; "Lord of Himself," by Mrs. Aylmer Gowing; "Strained Allegiance," by R. H. Forster; "The Temptation of Anthony," by Alice M. Diehl; "The Informer," by Fred Wishaw; "Rosamond Grant," by Mrs. Lovett Cameron; and "The War of the Sexes," by F. E. Young. In the same month he will issue at five shillings: "In Spite of the Czar," by Guy Boothby, with eight full-page illustrations by Leonard Lindsay.—Mr. Elliot Stock announces two new novels for early publication—"The Pains of Happiness," by Cassa Torriani, a story the incidents of which are laid in Italy; and "Phases of Life," a story of English domestic life, by Mary Adams Collings.—On Monday Mr. Unwin will publish Mrs. Amelia E. Barr's novel, "A Song of a Single Note"; also "The Youth of Washington," by Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, which tells in the form of an autobiography the story of the great leader's life up to his twenty-seventh year.

Reviews

PRINCIPLES OF PHYSIOLOGICAL PSYCHOLOGY

By Wilhelm Wundt. Vol. I. Translated by Professor Titchener. (Sonnenschein. 12s.)

THE appearance of the initial volume of this translation, which deals only with preliminary matters, is not a suitable occasion for any but general discussion of the teaching of this great work, which for thirty years has been without a rival or anything like a rival in the realm of psychology.

It would be unkind, if instructive, to compare this book with those upon which contemporary English psychologists base their modest claims to fame. We know that "good German philosophies, when they die, go to Oxford," but Wundt's philosophy, as illustrated by this edition of 1902, is so very much alive that it has not yet been received into our Kant-worshipping Universities. Wundt, of course, is a disciple of the great Teuton-Scot, but he is a child of the nineteenth century to boot.

Rather let us look at this man, his achievements and his philosophic equipment. He is professor of philosophy in the University of Leipzig. G. H. Lewes, we may remember, seeing the futility of philosophy as understood by its self-accredited hierophants, desired the abolition of all philosophical chairs. But he wrote before the idea of evolution had gained the throne of thought. Otherwise he might have been content to await such a metamorphosis as the Leipzig Chair of Philosophy illustrates to-day.

Here we have a man who is thoroughly acquainted with the great generalisations of modern thought, the conservation of energy, the law of evolution and such like. He treats, as he must, of physics and chemistry with the pen of the men who know what they know and what they do not know. He has that absolutely impartial mind which is the rarest and most precious of all intellectual possessions. He has the characteristic German thoroughness and love of detail: that intimate knowledge of the history of his subject and of the contemporary work upon it, which is the product of extreme assiduity alone. We place beside this volume two or three works on psychology by the living Anglo-Saxons. These bear to it much the same relation that a physical text-book for children by the present reviewer, who never performed or even imagined a new experiment in physics, would bear to Lord Kelvin's (Thomson and Tait's) "Natural Philosophy." Here we have an author who has written a noteworthy book on ethics, who has produced the most profound philosophic generalisations, and yet who has to his credit thousands of the most minute experiments upon the conductivity of nerves, the action of the neurotic poisons and such like matters, in which he has repeatedly corrected men who have no ideas outside a revolving drum covered with smoked paper, and the sciatic nerve and calf muscles of a frog. Anything more finished and judicial than Wundt's description of the anatomy of the brain we have never met anywhere. It is perhaps no small compliment to an author to say that his description of a subject over which the reader has spent laborious years at first hand, reads with the freshness and interest of a monograph on a new subject.

This is by no means due to Professor Wundt's style, which has in abundance all the familiar faults of scientific and philosophic German: nor is it due to the translator, whose admirable work has not extended to the giving style and lucidity where these were totally to seek: it is simply due to the abundance of the author's new and valuable thought on every subject he touches.

Apart from his own permanent work in experimental psychology—a term we owe to him—there is to Wundt's credit the establishment in Leipzig in 1878 of the first psychological laboratory, which has since attracted brilliant students from all parts of the world. Try to imagine an English professor of philosophy or psychology, seated on a three-legged stool, "messaging about" with a frog's nerve and a mirror galvanometer!

The reigning theory in psychology at the present day, the reader may remember, is Professor Wundt's. Here it may be briefly mentioned, not that it is discussed in the present volume, but for its contemporary importance. It is the doctrine of psycho-physical parallelism, which asserts the relation between mind and body to be that of parallel series of changes, psychical states causing other psychical states, brain or physical states causing, pari passu, other physical states, but the psychical never standing in causal relation to the physical or vice versa. The observation that the present reviewer owns no jot of allegiance to this doctrine is here made only because it may serve to add a presumption of impartiality and sanity to the almost unqualified honour which, like all other unpledged students of psychology, he accords to the great thinker and worker of Leipzig.

C. W. SALEEBY.

STUDIES IN PROSE AND VERSE

By Arthur Symonds. (Dent. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE advisability of reprints from reviews is always questionable, and especially so when these make no pretence to a complete treatment of their respective subjects. Most of Mr. Symonds' essays aim at the mere rendering of some particular feature of the person under consideration, and make no attempt to depict the entire man. If, however, there is place in art for the sketches of an impressionist, so there may be in literature for the like brief and fugitive, but often picturesque and incisive, memoranda on really notable aspects of things. We can scarcely expect this volume to add to Mr. Symonds' reputation, or to occupy any considerable place among his writings, but we are certainly glad that so many excellent remarks have been rescued from the oblivion of the periodical press and preserved in a form admitting of easy reference. Some of the writers he discusses are barely worth the pains taken with them; yet even when treating of a Zola or a Maupassant Mr. Symonds frequently enunciates views of far wider interest than themes so unpromising would have appeared capable of affording; while such remarks as the following on the poetry of Robert Bridges show how well he can appreciate the unobtrusive beauty of a really noble writer: "He has left, by the way, all the fine and coloured and fantastic and splendid things which others have done their utmost to attain, and he has put into his poetry the peace and not the energies of life, the wisdom and not the fever of love, the silences rather than the voices of nature. His whole work is a telling of secrets, and they are told so subtly that you, too, must listen to overhear them." The excellent essays on Hawthorne and Yeats, more elaborate in treatment than usual with Mr. Symonds in this volume, teem with similar felicities of criticism. Sometimes he may seem to refine overmuch, as when he propounds a sort of apology for the imbecilities of Tolstoi's art criticisms on the ground that Tolstoi is not, as he imagines, writing out of his own mind, but, as in his fictions, expressing the mind of his peasant public. "The fatal difference is that in the stories he knew that he was speaking dramatically, while, in the doctrines and theories, he imagines that he is speaking in his own person." We are confident that Tolstoi is didactic in his own person, and that, in this department, he is as much of a boor as any peasant in Russia.

It will be seen that Mr. Symons' book is rather one for the literary critic than for the general reader. The latter important personage will find little to attract him either in the matter or the manner, but the student, whether of literary psychology or of literary expression, will find it not only a book to be read, but one to be preserved for reference. Taken by itself, it would convey an unfavourable notion of the sanity of nineteenth-century literature. Mr. Symons' business is mainly with the decadents, and even when he deals with really great authors like Tolstoi, Meredith, or Stevenson, he is led by his momentary point of view to regard them on their weakest sides. We should certainly derive from him the impression that the nerves of the period had been cultivated at the expense of its brains. He knows well, however, that this corner of the vineyard is a very small one, and we are glad to find him pledged to a general history of English nineteenth-century poetry, a work demanding the most catholic sympathies. Even in this volume he has in one instance gone far afield with excellent effect, in the case of the Spanish poet Campoamor, whose shrewd and terse epigrams, excellently rendered by Mr. Symons, indicate that the mantle of his countryman Martial has fallen upon him.

THE ROAD IN TUSCANY

By Maurice Hewlett. 2 vols. (Macmillan. 21s. net.) In the first chapter of the first of these two volumes, Mr. Maurice Hewlett advances his reasons for writing a guide-book to Tuscany on a new plan. We certainly do not sympathise with his implied objections to the standard authorities; we have found Herr Baedeker and Mr. Murray very useful, Mr. Grant Allen time-saving, and Professor Ruskin inspiring. Nevertheless we were most anxious to see our beloved Tuscan friends under the escort of the author of "The Forest Lovers"; surely he would be an ideal travelling companion in the high-ways and byways of their native land.

"My commentary upon Tuscany was dictated by the logic of the roads, diverted only from its course by the accidents of travel, the humours of the moment, or by the freaks of memory and such like familiar sprites of ours. I hope that I may say I have been strict with myself. I have always preferred a road to a church, always a man to a masterpiece, a singer to his song; and I have never opened a book when I could read what I wanted on the hillside or by the river-bank."

This in the opening paragraph—we who have trodden those roads, talked to those men, and listened to those songs may be forgiven if we conjured up a distinct vision of the delights in store for us in these two volumes. As we read on, we soon found ourselves under the spell of those "freaks of memory" which led the author to tell us the history of Tuscany in so fascinating a manner. Then we were entrapped into numerous discussions on art-criticism; in spite of Mr. Maurice Hewlett's sarcasm, we could not lightly let go the "salvation of the tourist," who upholds Ruskin's reputation, and believes with him that Giotto painted the "Meeting of Joachim and Anna" in the cloister of Santa Maria Novella; we compared our experience in the Uffizzi Gallery with that enjoyed in a very qualified degree by our author; and we held to our opinion that the Brancacci frescoes by Masaccio are impregnated with poetry, charm, and significance. As we proceeded, we feasted on the hillside and by the river-banks on reminiscences of the books which the author must have read before he set out on his travels, and we were very content.

Then we were pulled up sharp in the last chapter of the second volume, and received a shock which recalled us from the realms of emotional and intellectual enjoyment back to the path along which we started with a definite purpose. Says our author:

FIESOLE

[Illustration from "The Road in Tuscany" (Macmillan)]

"Let it be assumed, for argument's sake, that I have made one thing—nay, two things—clear up to this point: the first, that the heart of Tuscany is worth the getting at; the second, that there is no sure road to it through the plastic arts."

Here we suddenly remembered the goal for which we had set out. True we had sighted it many times, but we had been drawn aside so often into alluring byways, that peradventure we had frequently been led again into the highroad without knowing it. Looking back on our journey, we are prepared to agree with our author in his deduction simply because we are so entirely at one with him in his thesis. The heart of Tuscany is indeed worth getting at, but no art, not even the genius of Mr. Maurice Hewlett, can discover a royal road to it. Immediately we set foot on Tuscan soil we feel—well, at the present moment we feel grateful to our author as we borrow one of his expressions and add "how the deuce is one to put it?" So soon as we have wed this beauteous bride, so soon as those first thrilling moments are past, when no intrusions can be tolerated, we acknowledge our debt to the plastic arts, to Mr. Maurice Hewlett himself and to his friend Mr. Pennell, whose illustrations enrich the book, for their individual methods of linking intelligence with emotion. By this means alone can a lasting affection be ensured.

We wander into a delightful bypath, for we cannot leave these volumes without specially referring to that chapter "Concerning the theory that the world is a garden." Some day we hope it may be printed separately, or, better still, bound up with those essays by Bacon and Cowley, which would combine to give us the perfect fairy story of how once upon a time God Almighty planted a garden. EDITH A. BROWNE.

FIGURE-DRAWING

By Richard G. Hatton. (Chapman & Hall. 7s. 6d. net.) THOROUGHLY to fathom the secret of what to reject is one of the rarest achievements of the successful artist, and in no branch of his profession does the neophyte require more stringent direction than in his study of anatomy, that may easily defeat its own purpose if wrongly pursued. The reason for this unfortunate waste of energy is well explained by Mr. Hatton in his most valuable work on figure-drawing, that will be of infinite service to the beginner and of no little use even to the practised draughtsman, in meeting the ever-fresh problems that arise for solution in his daily work. "The study of anatomy," says this most efficient guide, "instead of being directed to the correction and development of the ideas already present in the mind concerning the form of the figure, is dissipated among a multitude of accurate little statements, the very accuracy of which tends to rob them of their utility to the artist. Often," he adds, "a student will labour to remember the location . . . of the insertions of a muscle and will all the time omit to notice the general character of the muscle and its form." Valuable time is thus wasted, and the disheartened worker is in danger of falling into the fatal error of believing that truth of form is, after all, of less importance than expression.

Approaching his subject from a draughtsman's standpoint instead of that of a surgeon, Mr. Hatton corrects the many crude ideas that have so long been current, yet triumphantly proves that the truer the form the more powerful the expression. The first section of his exhaustive examination of the principles that should control figure-drawing is devoted to "Method and Proportion," such details as drawing in line, by planes, by contour, in black lines, with colour, &c., being carefully dealt with. The foundations of the science, for science it certainly is, of figure-drawing being thus firmly laid, the author proceeds to consider the various portions of the human frame, enforcing his meaning with a large number of admirable drawings, every line of which tells, that fully prove how strong a grip he himself has of the lessons he wishes to enforce. Even without the impressing text these drawings form a practical guide to the right treatment of the figure, and the student who has thoroughly examined them is not likely to go far astray. Some of the drawings, notably those elucidating the proportions of the figure, are as beautiful as they are instructive, arousing a feeling of regret that their author is not himself a professional artist.

A very typical example of Mr. Hatton's method is his chapter on facial expression, in which he displays an insight into human emotion and its unconscious betrayal that would be no discredit to the greatest masters of portraiture. Every page is, indeed, full of pregnant suggestion, as when he says: "The draughtsman must be careful to carry the expression throughout the body and not to limit it to the features. Especially should the hands be considered . . . the two hands must belong to the head and they must evince the same emotion. Such movements of the hands as are thus necessary are to be rendered with the greatest delicacy. It is not the gesture merely, but the gesture in its refinement, that is expressive. This means that some delicate turn of the wrist, some delicate relative position of the fingers, and so on, have to be considered." Another remarkable chapter is the analysis of gracefulness in women, a quality Mr. Hatton thinks serious students are in danger of overlooking in their dread of sugary elegance, and his remarks on drapery, with their accompanying drawings, might well be studied by all who would fain see beauty of costume restored, as well as by the practical designer and painter. In a word, the book goes to the very root of the matter, overlooking no detail, however apparently insignificant, yet inculcating forcibly the too often forgotten truth that the laborious realisation of any single part of the anatomical structure militates against the harmonious effect of the whole. NANCY BELL.

HISTORY OF THE RISE OF THE DUTCH REPUBLIC (3 vols.); THE UNITED NETHERLANDS (4 vols.); LIFE AND DEATH OF JOHN OF BARNEVELD (2 vols.)

By John Lothrop Motley. (Murray. 10s. 6d. per volume.) THIS noble edition, with its finely reproduced portraits, is a worthy presentment of an invaluable work. The revolt of the Netherlands lends itself better than most periods to the dramatic treatment; it was in itself a mighty drama, working out to its consummation within a single lifetime, gathering about a few strongly individualised central characters, and provided, alas, with its ironic anti-masque in the story of John of Barneveld with its revelation of the ingratitude of republics. Motley's broad sweep of thought and brilliant style are admirably adapted to his subject. Later research may indeed modify his conclusions at times and introduce more subtle distinctions into some of his portraits. There are a few points on which, did space permit, a question might be raised, were it but for the pleasure of discovering how little Motley needs to be set right by later students. Motley, in fact, is that rarest of writers, the picturesque historian with a sense of justice. He marshals the great pageant of the time with a touch as sure and effective as that of Froude, but, unlike Froude, he indulges in no distorting favouritisms. It may be said, indeed, that Motley's historic or dramatic genius—the two are more akin than is commonly realised—swayed him to justice almost against his will. His ardours are all for the Netherlands, and against Philip, Spain, and Catholicism. The natural hero of his story is William of Orange, whose steadfast and selfless courage, wise statesmanship, and magnanimous spirit receive full recognition at his hands. Alexander Farnese, Duke of Parma, Philip's great general and a foe more terrible, because more skilful, than Alva's self to the Protestant cause, is outside the pale of his professed sympathies. Yet he cannot miss the heroic traits in Farnese's character: the indomitable will, the unerring generalship, the flawless loyalty to an unworthy master. Motley protests, he insists on Parma's unscrupulous diplomacy; he warns his readers pathetically against the domination of a personality to which he has himself succumbed. It is all in vain; Parma stands out no less a hero in the tragedy than William's self. It is the same throughout. Don John, the young hero of Lepanto, who was to fail and die heartbroken in the struggle against William's sagacious policy and his own King's ingratitude, is as vividly and pathetically portrayed as Louis of Nassau, "the Bayard of the Netherlands," who shed a brief lustre of romance across the austere cause of the Calvinists. In contrast to the impassioned loyalists and reformers, Elizabeth of England shows in her least heroic aspect, that of the colossal time-server, neither Catholic nor Protestant at heart; averse from giving aid to rebellion against a crowned King, yet resolved that the Netherlands shall cause Philip all possible embarrassment. Not the Good Queen Bess of English tradition, this, but the suspicious, penurious Elizabeth of unflattering history. In his handling of the courteous duel between Parma and Elizabeth, as in many other passages, Motley proves his possession of that final gift of the historian: a sense of humour.

Within the limits of a brief review it is impossible even to suggest the scope and scholarship of this work, or to consider the larger issues of the conflict. Neither can justice be done to Motley's power of description, whether of the sieges of Leyden or Antwerp or of the Joyous Entry at Brussels. What can be said is that here is an historian who can give the movements of the time with force and fairness, yet never forget, amid his abstractions, that history is a record of human beings, swayed by individual will and genius; that it is, in short, the great drama, which can only be truly told not by a dry-as-dust, but by a dramatist.

DORA GREENWELL MCCHESENEY.

THE SHADE OF THE BALKANS

Being a collection of Bulgarian Folksongs and Proverbs, here for the first time rendered into English, together with an essay on Bulgarian Popular Poetry and another on the Origin of the Bulgars. (Nutt. 7s. 6d. net.)

THE merit of this book is that the folksongs and proverbs are given intact, and that based upon them is a study in ethnology of a very interesting kind. But the best authorities, including Dr. Ripley, agree that the Bulgarians are by race Slavonised Finns. The dual origin ought to show itself in their folklore, and it does so. Cropping up in a verse, an expression, an allusion or even a name, there is evidence of pre-Christian and non-Aryan, if we may use the term, belief. Side by side with this are the Christianised forms of the older faiths, and the two influences thus appearing struggling for mastery present a most interesting study to the folklorist.

The songs themselves do not appeal to us very strongly. They are commonplace almost, not only dealing with the ordinary events of peasant life, but in an ordinary manner. Even rent and prices are quoted. The effect is, of course, to give a very graphic picture of the people's life, but it is not quite so poetical in form as we expect in folk-songs. Bulgaria may be divided into three song provinces: north and south the chief sources of the Leiduck songs, the Rhodope mountains of the love-songs, western Bulgaria of the hero-songs. This is an interesting feature, and it may be asked is there anything corresponding to it, are there song provinces in our own country? Music and dancing are the most prominent features. A certain number of them seem to date from classical times, and the beautiful hymn to spring may be quoted as a good example. Heaven is only earth in a better form; angels are little gods; and ploughing, digging and shepherding constitute the work which God and the angels are engaged in. Add to this that there are many references to Old Testament characters though not in Old Testament surroundings, while the New Testament is only represented by the Mother of God, Christ and the Apostles, Peter and John, and we have the chief characteristics of this interesting collection.

The simplicity of the songs is the chief point to be noted:

"In Neda's yard the sun was shining;
Yet it was not the sun,
It was Neda.
In Neda's garden a willow grew;
Yet it was no willow tree,
It was fair Neda," does not call forth much admiration as a love-song. Somewhat better are the narrative songs:

"Stoyan came down from the mountain
With three wagon loads of wood,
And in front of them he strutted,
Piping ever on his flute.
So he met a pretty maiden,
Clad in garments new and comely;
On her forehead was a flower
And a jug upon her shoulder," is the old story told so often in language as simple as this, but we think with more poetry in it. But the picture is complete. The word "strutting" in this song is exactly what was wanted, and it is therefore used. In a word, the songs are true to Bulgar life and therefore of value to all students. LAURENCE GOMME.

THE POEMS OF WILLIAM WATSON

2 vols. (Lane. 9s. net.)

WE have already had a collected edition of Mr. Watson's poems, compiled by himself; and since then, comparatively recently, a selection by himself. Now we have another collected edition, Mr. Watson's share in which seems rather obscure. So far as we can determine from the introduction contributed by Mr. J. A. Spender, it would appear to have been compiled by that gentleman under Mr. Watson's general supervision and approval. Mr. Spender only says that he has "played a subordinate part" in the collection of the poems. But since he writes as though everywhere responsible for their selection and arrangement, we take it that the fact is as we have conjectured. We are, however, explicitly told that Mr. Watson has personally revised the poems included, and even "considerably" altered a few of them. "The Dream of Man," "The Hope of the World," "Domine, quo Vadis?" "Lakeland once More," the first part of "The Prince's Quest," and the last part of "Lacrimæ Musarum," are particularly mentioned in regard to these alterations.

Mr. Spender (assuming we are correct) must on the whole be praised for his work. It is certainly a good and representative collection. It is not a complete collection of what Mr. Watson has published; but the poet in his own previous edition deliberately elected to suppress much which he had produced, and this casts the net wider than did that. We are not sure whether Mr. Watson, for example, even included his "Epigrams" (he certainly shut them out from the subsequent volume of Selections), of which Mr. Spender rightly makes a leading feature in the present edition. The poet not only makes happy use of the form, but his literary and æsthetic criticism in this shape is quite distinctive, so that he could not be adequately represented were it not fully exemplified. The addition of some early poems, the "Prince's Quest" at their head, has at least an historical value; for they show that Mr. Watson began as a disciple of the pre-Raphaelite poets, the romantic school of Rossetti and William Morris, in polar antithesis to the style by which he is known. A few, indeed, of his finest poems are in a richer and more romantic style than that of the Wordsworthian school to which he gives wonted allegiance; but it is rather the vein of Keats or Shelley than of the romantic poets proper. Such are the "Autumnal Ode," the "Hymn to the Sea," the Swinburnean "Ode to May" and the exquisite brief lyric, "Thy voice from inmost dreamland."

The arrangement is new, very good and clear. The second volume (besides the early poems) is entirely given over to miscellaneous and political sonnets, political poems and epigrams. The grouping together of all these is certainly an advantage in itself, and also in that it leaves clear the poems purely poetic in subject-matter. As for the alterations, Mr. Watson is eminently a writer who can be trusted with his own business in such matters. We think this edition will commend itself to his admirers as sufficiently representative. For the exclusions, let a poet have that needed right while he lives. Perhaps one day he will even be suffered to retain it after death. At present the inevitable "complete edition," with its impertinent trivialities, adds a new terror to posterity.

FRANCIS THOMPSON.

LEAVES FROM THE DIARY OF HENRY GREVILLE

Third Series. By the Countess of Strafford. (Smith, Elder. 14s.)

The Countess of Strafford has been well advised in publishing an additional series of the journals of her uncle, Henry Greville, two series of which appeared twenty years ago. She is no doubt far from expecting for them a celebrity rivalling that of the journal of Mr. Greville's brother Charles, which, as she justly says, has become a classic, and for the continuation of which we should be very thankful. Henry Greville possessed neither his brother's mental power nor his exceptional opportunities, but he was a more amiable and generally acceptable person, mingled more freely in general society, and gave up none of his time to racing. He was good-natured, open-minded, and friendly with men of various opinions, although himself a Liberal Churchman and moderate Whig. A stronger contrast can hardly be imagined than between his generally sunny picture and the vitriolic etchings of an earlier stage of society in the recently published letters of Creevey; and it is pleasant to find good ground for believing the difference to lie not merely in the temper of the writers, but to bear testimony to a real improvement in manners, morals, and general good feeling. The defect of the Diary is, that except in the case of a crime so interesting as to be talked about in fashionable circles, it never travels beyond the narrow limit of exclusive society; its merit that it shows what the society of the period was thinking and talking about, and recalls to memory many interesting circumstances more than half forgotten. It covers five years, 1857 to 1861 inclusive, beginning shortly before the outbreak of the Indian Mutiny, and terminating with the death of Prince Albert, whose disorder had two days before been regarded as a gastric fever, likely to run for twenty-one days. This is by no means the only instance of mistaken anticipation in the Diary, whose general lesson, as in the diary of the author's brother, is the remarkable want of foresight among public men, frequently occasioned by their inability to take account of popular forces. It seems to occur to nobody that the decision of the Italian and American questions, for example, must ultimately rest with the people of those countries. Even Fanny Kemble, writing from Washington just before the outbreak of the Civil War, and with the strongest personal as well as humanitarian grounds for her abhorrence of slavery, thinks that the Northern States will not resist secession by force of arms. In the light of present circumstances, it is amusing to look back upon the opinion then entertained of Japan, just opened to European intercourse, and described as "a droll mixture of high civilisation and infantine simplicity." Such simplicity as the simplicity of Mercury in Homer's hymn! Domestic politics include three ministerial upsets and two premature dissolutions of Parliament. The frequent mentions of leading statesmen contribute nothing to modify the general estimate of their characters, although an Englishman may read with complacency the naive surprise of the French ministers that Lord Palmerston and Lord Clarendon should hold exactly the same language out of office as they had held in it. There are frequent dramatic and musical references, especially to the brilliant career of Ristori. Of literature there is not much, but the death of Macaulay calls forth an encomium upon him for qualities for which he has not always received due credit, his good humour and courtesy, and his tact in putting interlocutors at their ease by the tacit assumption that they must be as well acquainted as himself with the subject of conversation. Had Mr. Greville known Dickens and Thackeray and Tennyson and George Eliot personally, they would no doubt have been honoured by his notice. Science is even less in his way; the laying of the first Atlantic cable, so long abortive, is chronicled; but there is not a word on the one epoch-making event of the period, the publication of "The Origin of Species." R. GARNETT.

THE VICEROY'S POST-BAG:

Correspondence, hitherto unpublished, by the Earl of Hardwicke, First Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland after the Union. By Michael MacDonagh. (Murray. 12s. net.)

MR. MACDONAGH appears to aspire to fill the part so long played by the late Mr. W. J. Fitzpatrick. His period is the same as that of his predecessor, the late eighteenth- and early nineteenth-century history of Ireland, and his penchant is like Mr. Fitzpatrick's for the personalities of history. A skilful journalist, Mr. MacDonagh wields a more nimble and attractive pen than the author of "The Sham Squire," but he is less intimately acquainted with the times with which he deals. "The Viceroy's Post-Bag" is something between Mr. Fitzpatrick's "Secret Service under Pitt" and "Mr. Gregory's Letter-Box," the entertaining volume edited a few years back by Lady Gregory. Chronologically it may be said to fill the space between the two. The Viceroyalty of Lord Hardwicke lasted from 1801 to 1806. It was his business to inaugurate the first Union administration of Ireland, and his Government witnessed the exciting episode of the Emmet rising. As the "Secret Service under Pitt" describes from original sources the engagements entered into by the British Government in connection with the passing of the Act of Union, so "The Viceroy's Post-Bag" shows us from official sources how those engagements were fulfilled. And as the former book is much occupied with the hidden history of '98, so the present is largely devoted to the inner workings of the Emmet insurrection, the measures taken for its prevention and the punishment of the actors. But although Mr. MacDonagh presents us with much authentic and original material, his book is lacking in freshness and his editorial comment is apt to be meagre and inadequate. His accounts of minor but important personages, such as John Keogh, the Catholic leader, are sometimes singularly uninforming. The earlier part of the volume strikes us as the fresher and more valuable. The chapters on episcopal promotion in the Church of Ireland, and on the distribution of tithes and dignities to politicians who had supported the Union are unedifying enough, but they throw valuable light upon the time. And it is but fair to Mr. MacDonagh to say that he is no literary muck-rake, poking among the garbage of history for whatever is discreditable and scandalous. His book is compiled without bias or prejudice. If the revelations in these letters are little creditable to the system which it was Lord Hardwicke's business to administer, they are at the same time damaging enough to some great popular reputations. We cannot but deplore the stain which the publication of his letters to the Government casts upon the great name of Curran. But it is impossible to read the letters printed at pages 360 and 410 without reluctantly assenting to Mr. MacDonagh's verdict that the conduct of the great orator was ignoble and unworthy.

We have noted some errors which seem to us to show that Mr. MacDonagh's knowledge of Irish history is not sufficient to protect him from mistakes which ought not to be committed in a book of this kind. The statement at page 156 that Lord Clare was the first Irishman that ever filled the office of Chancellor is absurdly misleading. Without discussing the pre-Reformation Chancellors, many of whom were certainly of Irish birth, several of the seventeenth-century Chancellors were undoubtedly Irish. Sir Maurice Eustace, the first post-Restoration Chancellor, and Michael Boyle were natives of the country, and in the eighteenth century the careers and connections of such Chancellors as Brodrick, Cox, and Jocelyn were exclusively identified with Ireland. At page 161 we read of Mr. Denyer as Lord Clare's secretary. It should be Dwyer. We must enter a protest against Mr. MacDonagh's practice of separating each paragraph by asterisks. It is a journalistic practice which ought not to be carried into a book of this kind. Yet it is followed even in the brief introduction of three pages.

EMERSON, POET AND THINKER

By Elisabeth Luther Cary. (Putnam. 15s. net.)
 "BEWARE when the great God lets loose a thinker on this planet." We are seldom called upon to remember this piece of Emersonian advice, but it must certainly be borne in mind by every reader who is not prepared to sacrifice his Emerson for our author's ideal. She gives us a volume packed with original thought, and any extracts quoted are but wedged in to prevent the chance of her own theories being damaged. A vast knowledge of men and things, and the sympathetic emotions which must inevitably have inspired this work, combine to give us an able critic. Even those critics whose opposition to Emerson's philosophy has hitherto been considered perfectly sane are brought up for judgment, and we are almost inclined to agree when they are condemned.

Indeed, the author's steadfast aim to arrive at truth in an impartial manner is so evident throughout this book, and so absolutely conclusive are many of her arguments, that only the man who has stable convictions can quarrel with her logic.

At the very outset the unwary reader is disarmed by being told that all Emerson says "throbs with personality." Now the personal element such as we understand it is exactly what Emerson wanted to suppress. Of course, his whole essay on Self-Reliance and innumerable passages from all his works can be quoted to prove that he constantly urged man to preserve individuality. But with individuality written in its abbreviated form "ego" he was entirely unsympathetic. He could only recognise the paradoxical individuality of human beings as "dissolving types of universal life."

Consequently he bids us abandon self in order to be at one with and "live with the immeasurable mind." Our author makes this point clear to the initiated as she proceeds, but the casual reader of Emerson is apt to be led by her early reference to seek in those transcendental writings that which can never be found—solace and help in a purely human crisis.

In the essay by Maeterlinck, which is included in this book, we get at the more exact limitations of Emerson's power as a guide, a teacher and a friend. "He is the sage of the common day," we are told, "and common days make up the sum of our existence." But common days make possible the uncommon days; and it is on the uncommon days, when we seem to understand why man was given a heart when he was created in the image of God with a soul, that Emerson's purely spiritual philosophy is not sufficiently all-embracing.

We are unsatisfied with what Miss Cary tells us in regard to Emerson's ideas on Friendship—but it must not be inferred that we are dissatisfied. Her criticism of the essay on this subject is indeed short, but it is sufficiently keen to make us wish that she had pursued it very much further. For here again Emerson seems to fail us at the critical moment. Better counsel we could not have on the ninety-nine common days; but on the hundredth uncommon day, when we are called upon to affirm or to acknowledge in Emerson's own words that "no love can be bound by oath or covenant to secure it against a higher love," what immediate comfort is there to be found in his "sturdy theory of friendship"?

With these slight reservations Miss Cary's book deserves unqualified praise. It is a comprehensive survey of Emerson's philosophy by an author who possesses the essential qualifications of a critic—inspiration, knowledge and enthusiasm.

LITERARY PORTRAITS

By Charles Whibley. (Constable. 7s. 6d. net.)
 Of the three hundred and odd pages in Mr. Whibley's new volume over one-third are devoted to Rabelais, the balance being divided between Philippe de Commines, Philemon Holland (the "Translator-Generall"), Montaigne, Robert Burton and Jacques Casanova. This proportion is fully borne out by the matter, for the paper on Rabelais is worth all the others put together. "Strangely enough," says Mr. Whibley, "we know more of Rabelais than of many another great man: we can trace his shifting action, and follow his august vagabondage." Quite true; we do. And, moreover, "august vagabondage" is good, and shows that Mr. Whibley approaches his subject in the true spirit, which is only right and proper. Authorities as to Rabelais are not lacking: from that wonderful sketch by the brothers Scévole de Sainte-Marthe, and the MS. researches of the theologian Antoine le Roy, which were used by that indefatigable mole le bibliophile Jacob in his "François Rabelais, sa Vie et ses Ouvrages," to the work of Heulhard, "Rabelais en Voyage," the scholarly work of M. L. Barré and a trio of remarkable sketches in "Macmillan's Magazine" 1873, "Harper's" 1880 and "Cornhill" 1867, with an intervening mass of literature on the subject, all of which Mr. Whibley appears to have assimilated, sifted and collated in the most careful and conscientious manner. There was obviously not much that was new to be said about Rabelais. What was wanted was a concise non-controversial aperçu of the man, his life, his works, his opinions and his influence. This Mr. Whibley has given us, in a tale of commendable brevity, with little or nothing that is superfluous.

and with a most welcome absence of that literary affectation of preciosity which many who write about the Master think it expedient to adopt. The translators into English, Sir Thomas Urquhart and Peter Motteux, receive their due meed of praise, and the very obvious difference in the styles of their translations, the one distinguished, learned and wonderful, the other brilliant, facile and flippant, is very clearly set forth. On the whole Rabelais has no reason to complain of his most recent biographer. The essay on Montaigne is somewhat less satisfactory. Mr. Whibley seems to miss, to a certain extent, the man's subtle personal charm, his nearness to ourselves, his close intimacy with every one of his readers. It is a portrait from the outside, not unlike, not unpleasing, full of plain facts and incontrovertible statements, but wanting sympathy and possibly intuitive discernment. Montaigne says of himself: "Je suis moins faiseur de livres que de nulle autre besogne," and yet we get him here as a bookman first and last, which he certainly was not. It takes a non-bookish man to appreciate Montaigne to the full, whereof Landor may be cited in proof. The other papers in the book, especially that on "The Library of an old Scholar," are thoroughly sound, in parts even brilliant. The appreciation is clear and just, and the author is to be congratulated on the decision and delicacy of his touch and the simplicity of his style. The average of the volume is fully up to that high standard of culture which is evident in all Mr. Whibley's published works.

FRANK SCHLOSSER.

Fiction

THE SEA-WOLF

By Jack London. (Heinemann, 6s.) "The Sea-Wolf" is no mild love story. It streams blood from beginning to end. The decks of "The Ghost" are red with it; it dances before the eyes of the crew, and makes them rend one another like wild beasts. Mr. Jack London shouts at us from its pages in no uncertain voice. Certainly he will be heard, but it is not great art. Wolf Larsen, the captain of "The Ghost," is a notable figure, a figure which might have been made still more impressive had the author moderated his pen. "He was a magnificent atavism, a man so purely primitive that he was of the type that came into the world before the development of the moral nature. He was not immoral, but merely unmoral." Wolf Larsen gets into his clutches a young literary dilettante who is rescued from the sea and compelled to go on a long seal-hunting cruise to Japan. He is physically a weakling, but when he escapes from Wolf Larsen he is able to stand on his own feet. Wolf is a colossal egoist, an utter materialist, a disciple of Nietzsche, almighty on board by his enormous physical strength and utter callousness. A primitive savage in conduct, yet a reader of Spenser and Omar Khayyam. In reply to the contention that the highest conduct is that which benefits the man, his children and his race, he replies: "I cut out the race and the children. I would sacrifice nothing for them. It's just so much slush and sentiment. . . . Might is right, and that is all there is to it. Weakness is wrong." It may be that such brutality as that depicted on "The Ghost" exists on seal-hunting schooners, but it serves no good purpose to rake over filth and garbage. Mr. London does not even give us in compensation such wonderful sea pictures as would Mr. Conrad. He flings the most violent colours on to his canvas, thus attracting but not keeping attention. We do not wish to deny the cleverness of much in "The Sea-Wolf," but we must protest against this picture of rampant inhumanity and brutality.

NEXT-DOOR NEIGHBOURS

By W. Pett Ridge. (Hodder and Stoughton, 5s.) Just a score of stories in the key of sympathy and understanding of those classes of society which have hitherto escaped exploitation. Mr. Pett Ridge, with rare cunning, much observation and a great gift of reticence, has for some years past drawn for us the inside life of that portion of the population which counts—numerically, if in no other way. He is the chronicler—not of small beer, but of small gingerbeer—and as such is inimitable, original, and awfully pathetic. In "First Impressions," in "A Riverside Garden," notably, however, in "Sunday Morning," he strikes a note of sheer humanity which no writer (no, not even excepting Dickens) has ever struck before. Quite ordinary folk people his tales, and in the bare recital of their joys and woes, a mere phrase, two words of popular street slang, he makes a picture that those who know and love these classes, at once our governors and our slaves, will recognise and appreciate. Mr. Pett Ridge is a great artist. He knows his limitations and his possibilities. He has done much good strong work before now, but nothing better than this collection of real tales of the people.

THE PRISONER OF MADEMOISELLE

By Charles G. D. Roberts. (Constable, 6s.) Mr. Roberts can write a romantic love story with rare distinction. In reading "The Prisoner of Mademoiselle" one realises that an adventurous romance need not be written in a high falutin' unnatural manner, and although a story be full of incident it can still be literature. One is perhaps in danger of forgetting this, for the romantic novel has lately fallen on evil days from a literary point of view. True many of the hastily written cheap romances which are issued enjoy an enviable popularity, but they are anything but literature. The prisoner of Mademoiselle is Lieutenant Zachary Cowles, of the brig "God's Providence," of Boston, who rashly adventuring in a small boat to explore the shores of a hostile country, is cut off from his ship by a dense fog and thus taken prisoner by Mademoiselle. Mademoiselle is a delightful creation, proud yet tender-hearted, a wilful child yet a true woman. Naturally the prisoner falls in love with his jailer, who locks him up in a lonely blockhouse in the midst of a forest. The Bostonians are in ill odour with the governor of the island, who swears that any Englishmen he can catch shall swing from the tallest trees around Port Arthur. Partly from compassion, partly, perhaps, from awakening love, Mademoiselle determines that Lieutenant Zachary Cowles shall remain her prisoner and her prisoner only. To do this much stratagem is necessary, much clever plotting and cajolery, which provide capital reading. The ultimate fate of Zachary can easily be surmised. Mr. Roberts in the course of the narrative gives us some truly delightful descriptions of forest life. He is famous as a lover of nature, and with sympathetic insight depicts her ways and moods. He makes known to us the vast trackless Acadian forests, with their animal life and their great solitudes, their profusion of bloom and their massive timbers. A book of very considerable charm.

GODFREY MARTEN, UNDERGRADUATE

By Charles Turley. (Heinemann, 5s.) This book is a worthy successor to "Godfrey Marten, Schoolboy," and forms an excellent guide to Oxford life, that should be appreciated both by public-school boys and by freshmen. All the leading features and personalities of the 'Varsity' are admirably portrayed: wardens and tutors, "bloods" and "smugs," debating societies and wine clubs, football and cricket matches, Eights Week and the Long Vacation, proctors and "rags." Godfrey Marten, the hero of the book, who tells the tale, is, however, something more than the mere peg on which is hung a description of undergraduate life. In spite of being the typical English public-school man, he convinces the reader that he possesses a very definite personality. The other characters are equally living, especially Jack Ward, Denison the blood, and F. Foster, cricket "blue," and one is led to suspect that in their delineation Mr. Turley has been drawing largely on his own personal reminiscences of his Oxford days. The book is crowded with incidents, of which the best are the pursuit of Denison from Magdalen Bridge to within a mile of Iffley by an imaginary "bulldog," and the splendid dissimulation of Thornton, the supposed "greenhorn," who, when elected by some foolish practical jokers to the presidency of an imaginary club, turns the tables neatly on his adversaries by dissolving the club with all due solemnity.

JULIA

By Katharine Tynan. (Smith, Elder, 6s.) The girl whose name supplies the title is not the most interesting personage in the novel, although her rather yellow complexion may be said to give her a certain distinction among heroines. Nor is the rather goody-goody hero a creature of considerable attraction, except during one heroic moment when the reader gets a glimpse of a "steel" muscle situate somewhere in the neighbourhood of his wrist. Women novelists are much enamoured of the method of describing physical fitness in terms of ironmongery. But hero and heroine are sympathetic, and the same may be said of Mary Craven and her tortoise-hearted lover Jim. The story is in the school of Miss Rhoda Broughton with some tittle-tattle on the lines of "The Autobiography of a Scandal." There is the same old-world flavour, something of the same skill in description and portraiture and in the making of much out of little. The author's very real love of Ireland is not the least of her charms in the way of style, and the story, slight though it be, is brilliantly told.

THE SOLDIER OF THE VALLEY

By Nelson Lloyd. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.) This wholly ineffectual book gives such a thorough sense of the futility of life that one is left wondering, at its close, what induced the author to go through the labour of writing it; and, being written, what hope of reward, in the shape of sales, could have induced the publishers to go to the expense of bringing it from overseas. The heroine is wholly paltry. The man who wins her is a mere shadow. Indeed, nothing in the book matters—except that the dogs are a good example of faithfulness to the ladies.

THE CAVERN OF LAMENTS

By Catherine Mallandaine. (Long, 6s.) If the author of this novel were to take her pen and strike out pages of wearying description of eyes and hair and glances and scenery and rely on dramatic statement, if she were to write her novels almost as severely as a play, and trust to creating life thereby, she would produce a work that would yield all her best qualities without the need of much skipping to find them. As it is, if the reader be a practised skipper, he will find a good story, with the atmosphere of the island of Sark for picturesque background. This is not condemning a novel for its length; but a long novel must be rich in wisdom and beautiful things, or it becomes but a garden of yawns.

YEW TREE FARM

By Bessie Marchant. (S.P.C.K., 3s. 6d.) This is a fairly good story of the type that would be read by girls and young women in country places. The plot is interesting, the morals are pure, the life of the plucky girls who determine to run a farm on their own account is well told, and the atmosphere of the hop-fields and of the oast-house is distinctly good. The curate need not be afraid of it for his village library. And as regards love, there is plenty of it. The plot contains a villain and a fool or two, and the story of Edith's suffering from unjust suspicion and of her rescue from arrest is almost exciting. The author would be well advised to leave the explanation of model-farming to the agricultural gazettes and give her whole strength to the study of the humanities and the emotions—she has something of the seeing eye.

THE EAGLE'S SHADOW

By James Branch Cabell. (Heinemann, 6s.) Should anybody be in search of a delightful story, charmingly and wittily and crisply written, to send as a welcome gift at this time of the year, we would say, buy "The Eagle's Shadow." Its illustrations are good, its end-papers are a joy, and the written words between those end-papers weave a healthy and tender story that it is a pleasure to read. The author has "gotten" the English Colonel most excellently well, except that an English officer should not say "gotten." The hero and the heroine, however, dominate the book; and they are very much alive. The little world round about the girl is very gracefully presented. And the observation, though not very deep, is always true and often very sly. "She cared no more for Shakespeare than the average woman does, and she was never quite comfortable when he was alluded to." That is very neatly put—as, indeed, are most things in this pleasant volume.

Short Notices

EDINBURGH

Painted by John Fulleylove, R.I.; described by Rosaline Masson. (Black, 7s. 6d. net.) Mr. Fulleylove could have no more inspiring subject for his pencil, or Miss Masson for her pen, than beautiful picturesque Edinburgh. "There is the 'Marmion view' from the south—the view that Scott loved and Turner painted—but with a denser massing of suburb than they saw, reaching high up to the furzy knoll where Marmion stood. Here is the Castle in all its majesty, with the Grassmarket and Cowgate huddled picturesquely under its precipices, and the old dark descending spine of the High Street, with St. Giles's open crown over the roofs, and then all the maze and glitter of a newer world, with its many domes and steeples and the Forth beyond." Do we not again see Edinburgh as we read Miss Masson's words, even without the help of Mr. Fulleylove's brush? Can we not again hear the one o'clock gun boom forth from the Castle as we stroll along Princes Street, with its noisy cars and constant stream of traffic? This is Edinburgh of to-day. It is much changed since the days when Scott used to stamp along the North Bridge "with the hurried pace and fervent shake of the head which strong pithy poetry excites." It is cleaner, too, to-day than when Dr. Johnson grumbled to Boswell as they picked their way through the city—"I can smell you in the dark." One sighs for the return of yesterday as one recalls the famous literary coterie which Edinburgh once sheltered, the many famous figures that walked her streets. They crowd in on one's memory as one harks back. One can imagine the Ettrick Shepherd paying his first visit to Scott in Castle Street, and other visitors—Crabbe, Robert Chambers, William Allan, Kirkpatrick Sharpe, Sir Alexander Boswell, Joanna Baillie. We are reminded of Gavin Douglas, George Buchanan and John Napier, the notorious Major Weir with "a grim countenance and a big nose," Allan Ramsay, David Hume, John Knox. Miss Masson revives the mooted question whether Shakespeare visited Edinburgh or not. But Scotland cannot claim his birthplace even though an ingenious Scot tried to justify his assumption that Shakespeare was born at Paisley by saying that "his abeilities would justify the inference." Ben Jonson greatly admired Edinburgh, who so gracefully gave him the freedom of the city. Steele, in 1717, paid her a visit, afterwards saying that he had "drunk enough native drollery to compose a comedy." Miss Masson gives a delightful picture of Goldsmith in presenting to us an entry in a tailor's account of 1753, from which it appears that Goldsmith was supplied with a suit of sky-blue satin and black velvet and a "superfine small hatt." It is regrettable to recall that the account was "carried over." There is very little mention in the book of Thomas Carlyle and none of "Lavengro," which is bad; but a whole chapter is devoted to Robert Louis Stevenson, whose fame is not yet confirmed by time. Mr. Fulleylove has done his share of the work admirably. Lovers of Edinburgh will be glad to have so delightful a presentment of the Athens of the North. Occasionally his pictures are somewhat too thin and grey, but then, Edinburgh is a grey city. No more competent writer could have been chosen than Miss Masson, who knows Edinburgh thoroughly, and also brings to her task a facile and practised pen.

SHAKESPEARE SELF-REVEALED IN HIS SONNETS AND PHENIX AND TURTLE

The texts, with an introduction and analyses by J. M. (Sherratt & Hughes, 5s. net.) There is in this little book so much genuine love for Shakespeare and so extensive a knowledge of his works and period that it is painful to have to condemn it as, from a critical point of view, devoid of all value. That such must be the case, however, will be apparent from the mere statement of the author's theory that the sonnets are addressed by Shakespeare to himself, and not merely embody an autobiographical element but are entirely autobiographical and expressive of his devotion to the Spirit of Ideal Beauty; the mysterious "Mr. W. H.," therefore, is not Southampton or Pembroke, but "William Himself"; a notion already propounded by a German. The initial sonnets, in which, to the vulgar apprehension, the poet seems to be exhorting his friend to marry, are in sober truth exhortations to himself to perpetuate his renown by allying himself with Beauty; and the Dark Lady of the concluding sonnets is no other than Fame. We have seldom seen love and learning so hopelessly divorced from common sense. New lights on Shakespearean matters are for the most part simply ludicrous, but "J. M.'s" hallucinations are largely leavened with pathos. He has loved not wisely but too well; and Love has not produced the effect upon him which it produced upon Cythna.

DIARY AND LETTERS OF MADAME D'ARBLAY

As edited by her niece, Charlotte Barrett. With preface and notes by Austin Dobson. In six volumes. Vol. I. (Macmillan, 10s. 6d. net.) It is now sixty years since a standard edition of Madame d'Arblay's "Diary" was edited by her niece Mrs. Charlotte Barrett. Mr. Austin Dobson's edition, superior in every respect, succeeds to this position, and may expect to occupy it for at least an equal period. Substantially, of course, there can be no great gap between any two editions of the "Diary"; the one initial fact is the "Diary" itself, which altereth not, like the law of the Medes and the Persians. Much, however, might be done by a judicious annotator well versed in the social history of Fanny Burney's time and able to supply the deficiencies of the last editor, whose knowledge, indeed, was considerable, but whose standard was inadequate. No editor can be better qualified in this respect than Mr. Austin Dobson, who further deserves high credit not only for what he has done, but for what he has left undone. It would have been easy for an editor of his knowledge to have burdened a bright text with a ponderous commentary, but this he has forborne, and his terse notes, limited to the strictly needful, enliven as well as inform. Another indication of advance since the Early Victorian days is the number and excellence of the illustrations, which include not only the portraits we have almost come to claim as a right, but a view of Thrale's villa at Streatham and a facsimile of a long letter from Mrs. Thrale.

LIFE OF OMAR-AL-KHAYYAMI

By J. K. M. Shirazi. (Foulis.) At first sight one is disposed to condemn this beautifully printed book as a superfluity. What! more lives of Omar Khayyam? Upon close investigation, however, it is seen to have a distinct individuality, agreeably expressed by the pretty Persian pattern of the binding. The author, according to his own statement, is a Persian, and as such is able to treat his subject from a national point of view. This might easily have been one of great disparagement of Omar, whose name he admits to be "no less execrated by the Shi-ite mob than it was in his own day." This is far from his own view, and he severely blames the cultured classes, men of light but not of leading, who are quite ready to quote and praise Omar before strangers and sojourners, but shrink from enlightening their own countrymen. It occurs to us, nevertheless, that the motive may not be always mere timidity, but in some instances perception of the unsuitability of Omar's epicureanism to a nation urgently in need of political and spiritual regeneration. A Persian Milton or Carlyle is the kind of man demanded by the needs of the age; if, as some think, he came in the leaders of the Bab sect, he came in a shape highly unsympathetic to Omar. The writer's local knowledge enables him to correct some misconceptions; as, for instance, he points out the improbability of one so highly educated as Omar having been a handicraftsman, and conjectures that he was descended from an Arab clan so called from its vocation of tent-making. The existence of this clan does not appear to be demonstrated, but it does appear that a considerable Arab immigration into Nishapur took place about the time of Omar's birth. Another interesting feature of the book is the number of extracts relating to Omar. All agree respecting his heretical opinions and his scientific attainments, but there is a great dearth of direct testimony respecting both. His reputation as an astronomer is admitted by all, and must certainly have been well established in his lifetime, or he would not have been invited to aid in the reformation of the calendar, but it is connected with no special discovery, dictum, or theory: unless some theoretic innovation is indicated by the testimony of a hostile biographer, his involuntary admirer, that "he taught the necessity of studying science according to the principles of the Greeks." If nothing more definite is ascertainable, this is not the fault of Mr. Shirazi, whose elegant little book is a desirable companion to FitzGerald's or any other version of Omar.

UNDER THE CARE OF THE JAPANESE WAR OFFICE

By Ethel McCaul. (Cassell, 6s.) This little book, liberally illustrated from photographs, gives many interesting glimpses of the kindly side of war, which is so strangely contrasted with its essential savagery. Miss McCaul went out to study the Japanese methods of nursing and their hospital system; and, unlike the newspaper correspondents, she seems to have been shown everything. Japanese secretiveness, with its, perhaps, unnecessary suspicion and restriction, did not come into play. Recommended by our Queen, Miss McCaul and her companion were made free of all the hospitals, and escorted by a talented Japanese lady, and the generals and officials at the front and elsewhere seem to have tried to make their journeys as pleasant as possible. Of course, the nurses had not time to see much of the inner side of Japanese life and thought—few Europeans can have any knowledge of this—but they saw much, and recorded it in simple but graphic description. In completeness and scientific method the Japanese Red Cross Society certainly seems to distance the best-organised European societies of similar purpose; the contrast between the Russian Red Cross organisation, with its scandalous speculation in high places, and the corresponding system of their "yellow" toes must be painful to those who desire the victory of a "Christian" nation. But Miss McCaul did not inspect the hospitals alone; she saw the Russian prisoners in the mildest of captivity, and picked up many characteristic little traits of the strange blend of East and West that is the Japanese of to-day. One young officer, entrusted with the important and (in Japan) peculiarly difficult duty of collecting horses, bade a dear friend farewell because he did not believe he could carry out his mission properly, and was resolved not to survive failure. If our remount officers had had a touch of this spirit, the Boer War would have been over far sooner.

THE HARDY COUNTRY: LITERARY LANDMARKS OF THE WESSEX NOVELS

By Charles G. Harper. (Adam and Charles Black, 6s.) In his wonderfully informing book, "The Art of Thomas Hardy," the late Lionel Johnson expressed the hope that some one would devote a volume to a description of that wonderful Wessex which every Hardy-lover, and therefore every reader of good books, knows so well, and yet is only able to describe so vaguely from a topographical point of view. Mr. C. G. Harper has stepped into the breach, and has done the work remarkably well. Not only are we told, as we—approximately—knew before, that Castle Royal is Windsor, Aldbrickham Reading, Kennetbridge Newbury, Alfredston Wantage, Marygreen Fawley Magna (Jude Fawley gives the clue), Quartershot Aldershot, Sandbourne Bournemouth, Swanwich Swanage, and Casterbridge of course Dorchester, but we are taken on a literary and pictorial pilgrimage through upper and lower Wessex, so that the Hardy country becomes to us something nearer than a mere geographical expression. Stoke Barehills we recognise as Basingstoke, where, one remembers, Jude and Sue visit the Agricultural Show and are observed by Arabella, Jude's sometime wife, with some jealousy. We see Bere Regis Church, with its Turberville window and quaint gargoyles of Toothache and Headache. We tramp the heaths to the north-west of the four-mile road from Corfe to Wareham, where plays the dire story of the Return of the Native. Mr. Harper draws as well as he writes, and his pictures, which are lavishly scattered through the book, are unaffected black-and-white notes of interesting places mentioned in the novels. Lastly, there is a map of Wessex with both the real and the Hardy names of towns and villages; and a well-compiled index.

LITERARY LANDMARKS OF THE SCOTTISH UNIVERSITIES

By the late Laurence Hutton. (Putnam, 5s. net.) The proofs of this posthumous volume were not revised by the author; but we are assured that "the manuscript was prepared with conscientious care, and it is doubtful if Mr. Hutton would have changed a single line." If that be so, then it must be said that this piece of bookmaking is but a poor service to render to the country of the author's ancestors. It is evidently the result of special cramming, and Mr. Hutton has not always gone to the proper authorities. Quoting from Froude, he tells his readers that in the earlier part of the nineteenth century the Scottish universities had no prizes to offer, no fellowships, no scholarships. This is not true. In 1787 Francis Jeffrey was sent to Glasgow, as Cockburn tells us, with a view to the Oxford exhibitions, for none of the "other colleges had such academic prizes." For more than two centuries Glasgow has been sending to Balliol on the munificent Snell exhibition men of the highest class, among them Adam Smith, John Gibson Lockhart, Mr. Andrew Lang and George Douglas Brown. Then Mr. Hutton seems to have known nothing of the long history of the Edinburgh Speculative Society, with its wealth of names, including those of Scott and Stevenson. A tale of "literary landmarks" which omits mention of John Major, of Knox, of George Buchanan, of Francis Hutcheson, and of Thomas Reid—to name only these—is unpardonably incomplete. Finally, too much space is given to university constitutions and transatlantic comparisons, and far too little to the ostensible object of the book. An enthralling subject and a lost opportunity.

STORIES OF THE WIND.

By Karlott Blossé. (Drane, 3s. 6d.) The stories which the wind told are refreshingly simple and unpretentious, although we could wish that the author had not always underlined the moral. The writer, too, should guard against a slight tendency to make the characters talk in an unnatural and inappropriate manner. For the rest, they are straightforward simple little stories of what the wind did; how he helped to restore lost Toney to his anxious parents, what a lesson he gave the purse-proud Colonel, and how he and the star, Isa, between them made a man of Richard.

THE YOUNG GARDENERS' KALENDER.

By Dollie Radford. (Moring.) Here we have a daintily bound, prettily illustrated calendar for the little ones. There is a set of verses for each month, reminding the youthful gardener what seeds to sow and when to expect the blooms. Every child likes to have a little corner of father's garden for his or her very own, to dig and rake over, to plant seeds and watch them grow, to water in the cool of the evening and pluck therefrom a posy for mother. For these children Dollie Radford has written her verses, and L. E. Wright has drawn the pictures.

New Books Received

Theological and Biblical

- Parker, J., The Epistles to the Colossians, Philemon, and Thessalonians (Hodder & Stoughton), 5/0.
The Exposition, Vol. X. (Hodder & Stoughton), 7/6.
 Barry, the Right Rev. A., D.D., The Christian Sunday (S.P.C.K.), 1/6.
 Walrond, Mary L., Launching Out into the Deep; or, The Pioneers of a Noble Effort (S.P.C.K.), 2/0.
 "Vinisius to Niera": a Fourth-Century Christian Letter written in South Britain and discovered at Bath (deciphered, translated, and annotated by E. W. B. Nicholson) (Frowde), 1/0 net.

Poetry, Criticism, Drama, and Belles-Lettres

- Russell, C. E., The Twin Immortalities and Other Poems (Chicago: Hamersmark Publishing Company), $1.50 net.
 Goetz, P. B., Interludes (Boston: Badger).
 Verlaine, Paul, Poems (selected and translated by Ashmore Wingate) (Walter Scott), 1/0.
 Revised Versions: Quips and Oddities, by V. E. X., (Edinburgh: Hay).
 Folliott, T., Life's Golden Thread (Fifield), 1/0 net.
 Manzoni, A., The Sacred Hymns and the Napoleonic Ode (translated by the Rev. J. F. Bingham) (Frowde), 12/0 net.
 Lodge, G. C., Cain: a Drama (Houghton, Mifflin), $1.00 net.
 Coates, Florence E., Mine and Thine (Houghton, Mifflin), $1.25 net.
 Aldrich, T. B., Judith of Bethulia: a Tragedy (Houghton, Mifflin), $1.00 net.

Art

- Potter, Mary K., The Art of the Louvre (Bell), 5/0 net.
 Bushell, S. W., Chinese Art, Vol. I. (Board of Education).

Travel and Topography

- Williamson, G. O., Guildford in the Olden Time (Bell), 5/0 net.
 Nicholls, the Rev. W., History and Traditions of Prestwich (Manchester: Sutton).
 Edinburgh Vignettes: Verses by A. H. Begbie (Edinburgh: Hay).

History and Biography

- Coquelle, P., Napoleon and England, 1803-1813: a Study from Unprinted Documents (translated by G. D. Knox, with Introduction by J. Holland Rose) (Bell), 5/0 net.
 Larson, L. M., The King's Household in England before the Norman Conquest (Madison, Wisconsin: The University), 50c.

Educational

- Clifton and McLaughlin, Nouveau Dictionnaire Anglais-Français et Français-Anglais (Paris: Garnier Frères), 5f.
 Ellery, T. B., The "Council" Arithmetic for Schools (Black), 0/3 and 0/4.

Miscellaneous

- Sir Henry Cotton's Presidential Address, Indian National Congress (British Committee of the Indian National Congress), 0/3.
 A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles: Fargeter—Pennachod, Vol. VII. (Frowde), 7/6.
 De Lisle, A., The Story of the Red Cross Movement (Office of "The Banner"), 1/0.
 The Jewish Encyclopedia, Vol. VIII.: Leon—Moravia (Funk & Wagnalls).
 Steiner, B. C., Descriptions of Maryland (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press).
 Knapary, J., The Humanitarian View of the Public School Question (Humanitarian Publishing Company), 0/3.
 A Catalogue of Modern English Literature (Boots), 1/6.
 Mudie's Select Library Catalogue, 1905 (Mudie), 1/6.
 Budge, E. A. W., Cook's Handbook for Egypt and the Sūdān (Cook), 10/0.
 Reynolds-Bell, E. A., Cairo of To-day (Black), 2/6.
 The Literary Year-Book and Bookman's Directory, 1905 (Routledge), 5/0 net.
 The Catholic Directory, 1905 (Burns & Oates), 1/6 net.
 Mathieson's Handbook for Investors, 1905 (Mathieson), 2/6 net.
 Mining Highest and Lowest Prices, Dividends, etc. (Mathieson), 1/0.
 "Apollo," Ju-Jitsu: What it Really is ("Apollo's" Magazine).
 Weale, J. C. M., The Case against the Aberdeen Public Library (Smith), 2/0.

Reprints and New Editions

- The Diary of Samuel Pepys, Vols. III. and IV. (Bell), 5/0 net per vol.
 Pellico, S., Francesca da Rimini (translated by the Rev. J. F. Bingham) (Frowde), 8/0 net.
 The Twentieth Century New Testament (Horace Marshall), 2/6 net.
 The Poets and the Poetry of the Nineteenth Century: George Crabbe to Samuel Taylor Coleridge; John Keats to Edward, Lord Lytton; Southey to Percy Bysshe Shelley (edited by A. H. Miles), 3 vols. (Routledge), 1/6 net each.
 The Adventures of a Post Captain, by a Naval Officer (Methuen), 3/6 net.

Fiction

- Marsh, R., "Confessions of a Young Lady" (Long), 6/0; Boothby, G., "In Spite of Cæsar" (Long), 5/0; Le Queux, W., "The Mask" (Long), 6/0; Dabbs, G. H. R., "Mr. Watch, Pawnbroker" (London Argus Library of Fiction), 1/0; Keays, H. A. M., "He that eateth Bread with Me" (Methuen), 6/0; Sergeant, Adeline, "The Mystery of the Moat" (Methuen), 6/0.

Periodicals, &c.

- "Fortnightly Review," "Book News," "Cornhill," "Contemporary Review," "Windsor Magazine," "Journal of the Society of Comparative Legislation," "The Greyfriar," "Pearson's," "The Girl's Realm," "Lady's Home Magazine," "The Antiquary," "Ethnological Journal," "Sunday at Home," "Leisure Hour," "Good Words," "Sunday Magazine," "Ainslee's," "Humane Review," "Casell's Magazine," "Friendly Greetings," "Girl's Own Paper," "Boy's Own Paper," "The Commonwealth," "Bible Society," "Gleanings," "The Bible in the World," "Casell's Russo-Japanese War," "Blackwood's Magazine," "Harper's Monthly Magazine," "Independent Review," "Bible Treasury," "Monthly Review," "Macmillan's Magazine," "Temple Bar," "Century Illustrated Monthly," "Empire Review," "St. Nicholas," "The [American] Bookman," "The Indian Antiquary," "The Conservator," "The Johns Hopkins University Circular," "Journal of the Royal Colonial Institute," "Lippincott's," "The Connoisseur," "International Quarterly," "Burlington Magazine," "British Food Journal," "Child's Own Magazine," "The Herald of the Cross," "The Book Monthly."

Booksellers' Catalogues

- Messrs. Boots' Booklovers' Library (General), 29 Farringdon Road, and Nottingham; Mr. C. Higham (Theology and Philosophy), 27a Farringdon Road.

Foreign

Poetry, Criticism, Drama, and Belles-Lettres

- Hedenns, H., Syre Corneus, ein mittellenglisches Gedicht (Erlangen: Junge & Sohn).
 Handschin, C. H., Das Sprichwort bei Hans Sachs (Madison, Wisconsin: The University), 50c.

Periodicals, &c.

- "Mercure de France," "Deutsche Rundschau," "La Vérité sur le Congo."

My Book of Memory

FOR some nights past my bed-book has been "Pepys' Diary," which has ever been a delight to me, even in the old incomplete version. I have asked myself again and again why Master Samuel wrote this record of his daily deeds and misdeeds, but no answer that comes to me from within or without seems at all satisfying. The reasons for which he did not write it are evident; no thought of publication can have been entertained by him, or of any human eye ever unravelling his shorthand. This being so, why did he preserve these pages, or why did he not at any rate leave instructions for them to be destroyed after his death? Did he keep them by him to look over now and again, to refresh his memory of days past? We can scarcely imagine this, for the small talk, the tittle-tattle, so quaint and interesting for us could have possessed little charm for him. They were not written for practical use, for the business entries are few in number compared with mere details of gossip and entries of no lasting import to the man himself.

The man himself, perhaps there lies the key to the mystery; if I can but come to know the man himself, his very innermost self, then I may be able to satisfy myself as to why he kept this Diary. Over and again it has been said that seldom if ever has there been so complete an exposure of a man's life, heart, soul, as this of Pepys, but such a statement is easier to make than to prove. We know of Pepys all that he has set down in his Diary, that and no more, and there is no means of proving whether he has told the whole truth and nothing but the truth. Untruth I cannot believe him to have given us deliberately, for he could not hope to deceive himself—his only reader—by his lies; furthermore, so much of what he has set down is detrimental to his character that he need not have been squeamish of anything that has been left unsaid. So, on the whole, I take it that he has written truthfully, but other points remain to be considered. May he not have been deceived with regard to himself and many things that he was and did? Was he more capable than any other man of seeing himself entire, naked? He seems to have been a man of no particular gift of insight into the character of his fellows, and probably saw himself with partial eyes as we all see ourselves. He may have limned his portrait as well as he knew how; there may be no wilfully wrong touch of colour, but after all the likeness is that of Samuel Pepys as he appeared to himself, not necessarily that of Pepys as he really existed. Nor must it be taken for granted that he painted the picture in darker or in brighter colours than he should have done; it may be one way or the other, or in part one and in part the other; we do not know; we never can know, any more than we can know ourselves. I suppose I am not uncommon in fancying that every now and then I do obtain a peep at my real self; some crisis—big or little—tears aside the outer covering of imagination all compact with which I clothe myself, and I see my very soul—naked. Then the mists gather again, and I travel on with the shadowy image of myself which I have set up as egomet. Perhaps Pepys in this place—or in that—though we cannot say where—gives glimpses of his naked self; but all I can surely count upon is that he has told me very much of what he did; from that it remains for you and me to guess—only to guess—what he was. And who am I that I should take for granted that I can judge this man aright? So far am I incapable that in one mood of my mind he appears to me to be quite different from the man as he shows himself to me when my mood is changed. No; I know him not. I fancy him to be a wine-bibber, and a runner after petticoats, not a little of a hypocrite, very vain, not altogether scrupulous in matters of honour—and being such, how can I reconcile with probability the fact that he wrote this Diary? Again I come to the point—why did he write it? And again echo says "Why?"

Many a person has written his autobiography with one eye on himself and one eye upon his reader. We do not believe all they tell us, and we suspect them of hushing up many matters which would but tarnish their reputes were they known. But knowing that these writers are not telling all the truth, are even at times making mis-statements, we are not only not deceived but are very often able to see through the clothes into the heart of the man, when he thinks himself safe hid. But it is not so with Pepys—all we know is that he wrote this Diary, that he could aim at deceiving no one save himself, that probably he aimed at telling absolute truth, but how far he attained his aim no man can say. I am told that the truth of the thing is apparent; but I remember that appearances are often deceitful.

Have you ever attempted to keep such a Diary as this? It needs must be a curiously brave or a sadly obtuse man who would paint himself in such colours as has Pepys. I never dared attack the task, but realising once upon a time how fascinating in Pepys are the little details of everyday life, I strove to keep some such record as his for a few months, but only succeeded in achieving dismal failure. I found when I sat down at night to record the events of the day, my meals, my ingoings and outgoings, my expenditure, the men and women I had met, and so forth, that I simply could not do it. Then I endeavoured to note down something of my thoughts and emotions—but could not do it. There was a heart-breaking coldness about it all that froze the ink in my pen. From which I learned one thing of Pepys—either he was the bravest writer of fiction that ever lived, or was totally lacking in imagination. Yes, after all, I do feel that he wrote the very truth as it appeared to him; as he saw himself so he painted, but he had not the imagination to question whether he saw himself truly or not, whether he was better or worse than the fellow he has portrayed. But still I am no nearer an answer to my question, Why did Pepys write his Diary? All I am absolutely certain of is that I am sincerely grateful to him for having done so. E. G. O.

The Human Will

V—Freedom and Determinins

THE word free-will is used in at least three different senses—whereby confusion is worse confounded. In its completest sense the term is used to signify the doctrine that the human will acts independently of prior causes, and is undetermined by any exterior or interior facts whatsoever, so that, if he will, a man can act against the stronger of two warring motives. Contradicted alike by universal experience, common speech and every relevant fact and generalisation of philosophy, this theory will not here be discussed.

Then, again, the term is sometimes misapplied—as I see it—to indicate that man can act by the light of reason, preferring immediate to remoter ends; that he is a rational animal, whereas the lower animals are instinctive. Against this doctrine, with the reservation that reason can be discerned in the lower animals, scientific psychology enters no demurrer.

Closely allied to this last is the connotation that man can obey the dictates of his higher nature when the lower would assert itself. This I assuredly do not dispute.

To-day, however, we find even many theologians prepared to assert that by free-will they mean to indicate only that man is conscious of a power of choice. To some of us it may appear that the use of the term free-will to indicate this consciousness of choice is an abuse of language: but this opinion does not relieve us from the necessity of examining and attempting to analyse this fact of choice: anti-dogmatic dogmas, like all others, being always at the mercy of facts.

When we deny the freedom of the will, be it observed, we do not deny the existence of will itself. Without choice there could surely be no volition. To assert that we can choose, then, is no more than to assert that we can will, which determinism is not so insane as to dispute. Libertarianism, however, takes this indisputable fact as the fundamental proof of its position; and there certainly is no argument for freedom like that which is given in the immediate testimony of consciousness. At this moment I know, as a fact which laughs at all theories, that I can finish this essay to-night, or leave it till to-morrow morning—which would be quite soon enough, and spend the next hour with Wordsworth—which I please. I am free to do either, surely. This is immediately given in consciousness. What is not immediately given, however, but can be readily discerned by reflection, is that my decision, when made, will have been determined by circumstances within or without me. I may be interrupted to-morrow. On the other hand, interruption is improbable, and at worst there remains the afternoon. If I say that I continue "just because I want to," thereby demonstrating that my will is free, I am simply returning the (alleged) woman's reason for doing a thing, "Just because": which is no answer in her case or mine.

But without admitting that this case, as it stands, involves no moral considerations, let us take an obviously moral issue, since that is the sphere in which the free will question is supposed to be of importance. Let us suppose that I have promised my wife to finish this article to-night, and so I feel that I ought to do so. If I keep my word, despite the temptation to be lazy, and despite the perfect feasibility of deceiving my wife, why do I? Here it looks as if I were free, because the determining cause is not external but within myself. The case is a subtler one. But I think Schopenhauer has fairly explained it. If I keep my word it might well be hazarded by a looker-on that I have frequently kept my word before. I have a self-observed norm, at which I endeavour to maintain myself. My experience of myself is that I usually keep my promises, and I do not mean to fall below my own level now. In such a case a man is indeed self-determined, to use the libertarian term: but it is obvious that we must now inquire what has gone to the making of the self or norm which I take as my standard. Nor does it need much consideration to show that my habit of promise-keeping, in such a case, could certainly be referred either to heredity or environment or both.

Perhaps this instance may serve to show that when the determinist refers the issue of all volition to the influence of heredity and environment, this latter term has a far wider meaning than is often given it. Environment includes more than material circumstances, such as the satisfactoriness or otherwise with which my fountain-pen happens to be working to-night, though that might well determine my action. Every content of my consciousness, every memory of my past behaviour in such circumstances, every subconscious memory somewhere recorded—ingrained—in my brain-cells (in other words, every ingrained habit) is part of the environment which helps to determine my action to-night. Thus properly interpreted, to heredity and environment may be referred all the motives, all the pros and cons, which compete within me until one or other, or the sum of several, finally determines me to work or refreshment.

The libertarian will not dispute that my character will decide my action in regard to promise-keeping. If he knows a man's character he "cannot imagine him doing such and such a thing in given circumstances." There are men—I suppose—whose character is such that they cannot steal, even from a railway company or the State. They are not free to steal, though doubtless many such utterly honest persons would be the first to attack determinism. They cannot steal because their whole nature—their character—forbids them. They do not see that if it is possible to form character—that is, to cause character—it is proportionately possible to cause the volitional acts which character determines. And to assert determinism is merely to assert that the human will is caused.

C. W. SALESBY.

"Peter Pan"

MR. BARRIE'S new play is a quaint mingling of pathos and fun, reality and unreality, pirates, Redskins and fairies. To deal with its weaknesses first. It is to be feared that in aiming at the pleasing of both old and young folk Mr. Barrie may fall between two stools; in truth, any other writer would surely have done so, but he stands by himself and can achieve successfully that which to others would surely bring failure. The touches of tender pathos, the exquisite picture of a mother's love and suffering and joy can come home to but few of the young ones and to most of them must appear out of place in an entertainment which they look upon as gotten up in their behoof; on the other side the oldsters must now and again grow weary of the Redskins and the pirates, who have stepped alive out of the dead and forgotten books they read years ago. One other grumble: Mr. Gerald Du Maurier's mimicry of several leading actors of the day is exceedingly clever, but quite out of place; further, quite a puzzle to the children, who will ask, as a youngster did behind me, "What's it all about?" But it would be ungracious to be cantankerous over so graceful a fantasy as this latest of Mr. Barrie—as uncivil as it would be to grow angry over a few stray raisin-stones in an otherwise admirable Christmas pudding.

To such a sweetmeat "Peter Pan" may fairly be likened; plot there is practically none, loose ends there are a many; but who recks of this as he watches and laughs over this wild panorama of whimsies? Peter Pan and his band of boys, who dwell in the Never, Never, Never Land, all unfortunates who have fallen out of their perambulators and are doomed to live motherless for ever: Wendy Moira Angela, John Napoleon and Michael Nicholas, delightful Darlings who are taught to fly by Peter and who use their accomplishment to betake themselves to the Never, Never, Never Land; Nana, the big dog, who superintends Mrs. Darling's nursery department, hanging the clothes to warm before the fire, bathing the three children and dosing them with physic; the bold, bloodthirsty pirates, whose atrociously wicked captain is pursued by an emerald-eyed alligator, whose approach he is able to avoid, being warned of it by the ticking of the clock which the monster has swallowed; the Redskins in full feather and war-paint; Tinker Bell, the fairy, who dances through the piece as a flickering light and whose voice is as the bells of a sleigh; and Liza, cherubic-faced, who wanders amiably and indefinitely, keeping a bright eye on everybody and seeing that everything goes right. Quaint scenes follow on with bewildering rapidity; the nursery, where fairydom and real life shake hands; the forest and its cave dwelling; the Indian camp; the pirate ship—we have seen them all before many a time, but never upon the stage, never painted by so cunning a brush. But of what avail to attempt to describe this merry dreamland fancy? Mr. Barrie has caught it for us; he only could have set it forth for us.

The actors have served him very well; Mr. du Maurier is natural and amusing as the father of the three children, and Miss Dorothea Baird brings tears to our eyes with a touching and beautifully shown bit of pathos—one of the sincerest pieces of acting we have seen this many a long day. Miss Nina Boucicault is Peter Pan to the life, if that be a fitting description of a personage wholly imaginary; Miss Hilda Trevelyan is Wendy. In short, all were "real as real can be."

All who wish to laugh and be merry without being troubled to see the reason why, must take the acquaintance of "Peter Pan."

W. T. S.

G. F. Watts

THE strenuous artistic career of Watts has much of the same guidance for us as the stormy artistic career of the Russian Tolstoi—I speak not of the worldly but of the emotional career. Both men began their artistic lives in a time of technical stress and change and war in the theories and aims of art. Both men accepted placidly the "isms" of that day, triumphed each in the stronghold of his artistic parish, and, planting his standard on the topmost battlements, awoke to find that art was a greater and more majestic and more vital thing than the gabble of the studios and the laws of the critics—a greater activity, in fact, than what they themselves had thought it. Tolstoi recanted in his philosophic and powerful critical work "What is Art?" and came at last very near the truth, though not the whole truth. Watts recanted and also came near the truth, but still not the whole truth. Yet such born artists were both these giants that in all they did they created art, even when their theories clashed with their achievement. Watts began with the Greek ideal that Art is Beauty—an absolutely pagan idea—and so passionate was the desire for beauty in this man's very soul, that he set himself not to wrestle for the bays against the achievement of his own day, but boldly tried his strength against the whole majestic achievement of Greece in its ideal of sheer beauty; and he who walks through the rooms of the Royal Academy to-day may see how triumphant he stands amidst the splendour of Greece, with his masterpiece of womanly beauty in paint entitled "The Wife of Pygmalion" and his superb masterpiece in marble entitled "Clytie." In these two pieces alone, whether we consider the exquisite technical perfection, or the physical beauty that is created by such high craftsmanship, Watts thrusts himself into a place that any Greek would have held with pride. It is given to many to feel the beauty of a masterpiece vaguely; but what painter can stand before the "Wife of Pygmalion" and not be thrilled by the strange wizardry of its supreme craftsmanship? The painting of the flesh, the mystic beauty of womanhood, the subtlety and the mastery of the brushwork, the glow of the colour—there is not a hesitating note—it is the fascinating and mystical fact called creation—the creation of the emotion called forth by Beauty through and by great craftsmanship. This stage, the rivalry with Greece, we may call his second period. For he had already topped the heights of the school in which he was born, the romantic decorative school in which, not yet in his thirtieth year, he painted the golden, glowing, limpid canvas which he called "Aurora." And the strange falterings of genius! It is almost incredible that two years after such an achievement he should have perpetrated the utterly silly "Lady Dorothy Nevill." What a strange forerunner indeed is this thin affair when compared with the glorious portrait of a fair-haired woman whose beautiful face and hair tell with such beauty against that glowing green background in "Miss Edith Villiers (Countess of Lytton)" or that great portrait of "John, First Lord Lawrence," that is one of the portraits of the last century.

Yes, Watts and Tolstoi reached the heights of technical beauty, looked down from the vantage of their mastery, and found that it was not all—not enough. They both flung themselves with fiery zeal into the question of what lay beyond all this the beautiful husk of art—and they both realised that art was something far more vast, far more wonderful than the exquisite technique which was their tool. Tolstoi went into a wrong road by confusing art with religion, and Watts into a road not quite so wrong by confusing the greatness of art with the greatness of the idea or subject—nevertheless, a greatness nearer the truth than mere beauty, as also was Tolstoi's, for in following their newly revealed aims both artists came nearer to the all-overwhelming fact that art is not the mere priggish joy of the cultured lover of the beautiful, but is an universal need of the human hunger and the human soul—that art is the interpretation of life through the emotions. But Watts' theory that great art should "teach the mysteries of life and death" missed the fact that art's function is not to teach; it is far greater; it is to make one feel. In other words, art alone creates when it is so beautifully uttered that we sense the emotions of another's emotional experience, whereby we become enriched in experience of life—just as through speech we become enriched in experience of life through the thinking of others. And it is meet and right that if we wish to live the fullest life we should not only experience our own puny and limited adventures of living, but that we should hold out eager hands and open eager hearts to the emotions of the world; and, if we are not little mean souls, we shall, courage helping us, essay to know the tragedy and the pain and the agony of life as well as its more pleasant splendours and its more alluring mysteries, that we may thereby grope the deeper into life than did the beauty-seeking Greek,

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS

OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti,
Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from FREDK. HOLLYER, 8 Pembroke Square, London, W.
Illustrated Catalogue 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

setting up Pity and Nobility and Gentleness and the Wiping Away of Tears as a part of our godhood so that Beauty alone shall be but the carpet of our heavens.

HALDANE MACFALL.

Correspondence

Shakespeare's Globe

SIR,—Your correspondent "A. S.," in a letter headed "The Fascination of the Unique," makes a valuable suggestion. Why not a life-size model of Shakespeare's Globe Theatre? Such a playhouse would be far the best monument that London could raise to her great dramatist. Our public statues of great Englishmen are seldom happy; and though one may imagine some superb realisation in stone by M. Auguste Rodin of what the poet means to him, or beautiful crystallisations of Shakespearean symbolism by Mr. Gilbert or Mr. Frampton—yet, on the whole, one agrees with Mr. Punch's vision of the poet in deprecating any proposal for the erection of a statue. At the excellent performance, the other day, given by the Mermaid Society, at the Royalty, of Beaumont and Fletcher's "Knight of the Burning Pestle," one longed to see the play acted in a theatre of the Elizabethan type. Those seated on the stage who criticise and add to the humour of the piece—the bloods with their tobacco pipes, the citizen grocer and his wife (played by the incomparable Mrs. Theodore Wright)—were inevitably crowded closely together and could scarcely take their ease on the boards as was the case with their prototypes. Our modern convention of a gilded frame for living pictures allows scant room for so interested and interesting an audience. But with a reproduction of the Elizabethan stage-platform jutting out, like a promontory, into the well or the pit of the house—we should obtain a clearer view of things Shakespearean. The longest speeches would interpret themselves not merely as splendid rhetorical feats or passages of unparalleled poetry, but as genuine expressions of living drama—when the actor must, perforce, justify his very existence among the audience and cannot take refuge for his shortcomings amid an overpainted Forest of Arden or hide behind the skirts of Lady Macbeth.—Yours, &c. A. R. BAYLEY.

The Elians

SIR,—May I ask the hospitality of your columns to propose the formation of a new literary club to be called The Elians, and to be composed of all those who love Elia and care to join the club? The members might meet once a year in London to dine and talk together; other local meetings might be arranged, and so forth. I should be very glad to enrol myself as a member, but could take no active part in the formation of the club or society, a task which should be undertaken by those less unknown than—Yours, &c.

A LOVER OF ROAST PIG.

Philistinism and Art

SIR,—Is it the Philistinism of the moneyed classes or the unenlightened conscientiousness of our nation that retards artistic achievement? I refer to the purism, amounting to prudishness, which insists on insipid perfection. This symptom may be classified as the overbread of the grotesque. Long training is required before art can bow to simple truth, or before truth can conform its primitive rudeness to art. How is the man in the street honestly to admire the horsemen in the Elgin Marbles when he sees the highest type of English gentleman apparently riding in an inadequate costume of shepherd's hat and plaid? If the hat were but turned up on one side he might look like a South African Volunteer, but as it is there is a stumbling-block of offence. This class of difficulty is more universal and genuine than is supposed, and can only be met in one way. In all such cases we have only to say to ourselves, "What is good enough for Phidias, or Dante, or Shakespeare, as the case may be, is good enough for me." If such a sentence were inscribed over the door of an Elizabethan theatre, for instance, we should be enabled on entering to leave prejudice behind and to enjoy an unhackneyed pleasure to the full.—Yours, &c.

A. S.

A Mistake

SIR,—In the friendly notice of my book "Johnson's Table-Talk," which appeared in THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE of December 31, 1904, my name was wrongly given as W. A. Lewis Bellamy, instead of Bettany—a hard name, perhaps, to get right. I should be much obliged if you could see your way to correcting the mistake.—Yours, &c.

W. A. LEWIS BETTANY.

The New Writers' Column

Art and Literature

"LITERATURE is only literature because it is art, and for no other reason." An interesting and natural statement coming, as it does, from the lips of a consummate artist; but perhaps it would be more truthful to say that "literature is only literature because it is life."

There are those who look upon literature as art alone: these are the doctors, the formalists, the Pharisees. There are those who look upon literature as huge chunks, cut from the block of life, laid out bleeding for inspection: these are the realists, the zealots, the assassins. There are yet others who hold that literature is divorced neither from art nor life—rather is their union in marriage the perfect state: these are the men of letters, the born writers, the poets.

Every scribbler sets out upon his literary journey with an idea that books can be manufactured out of his own head, and in this conceit he labours until time pulls him up and he has to take stock of his progeny—a few blind mice! That is the crucial moment. In presence of blindness his eyes are opened, and he must elect his own salvation, or ruin; to go forward, as an explorer, into the fringed mysteries of life, or to sit down locked within the decayed sanctuaries of withered tomes. Nay, there is not much election to be done, for his will is not his own. The genius that watched over his infancy shall direct his manhood and guard his destiny. Whether he shall be a dilettante in the courts of life, his fingers ever careless upon the keyboard of song; or whether his feet shall strike down the lilies of languor, his lips muttering wild tunes and kisses; it is not his word shall decide. But one thing is assured: his genius in literature shall be measured by his intimacy with life. With what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again.

Hundreds of books, concocted yearly, are wellnigh perfect in artistry and yet remain dull, dead bones; no spark lights up the page, no torch proclaims a conquest; a great deal of learning, much cunning speculation, but the whole stands condemned because it is untrue.

Great thinking presupposes great doing, and writers of genius are first in the ranks of action. Where the pulse beats and the blood stirs, there is life; and where words throb and sentences roll, there is the writer's glory.

Art is not nurtured in barbarous climes; she is the gentle associate of civilisation: she holds the records of his wanderings, his loves, and his fancies. Art is the record, the creation of man; life is man himself, the creation of God. However fair and brave her rivals, Literature (with a capital) may reply, not boastfully, but reverentially, with a subtle truth: In the beginning was the Word.

WILLIAM MIDGLEY RUSSELL.

Monthly Prize Competition

REGULATIONS.

We shall give, until further notice, a monthly prize, value £1 ls., for the best criticism of a specified book. The prize will take the form of a £1 ls. subscription to Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son's Circulating Library. In the case of any prize-winner living too far from the nearest branch of this library, or for any other good reason not desiring to subscribe to it, the subscription will be transferred to another library, to be chosen by the prize-winner. If already a subscriber to a library, the guinea will run from end of present subscription or be added to it at once. The prize-winner will be sent an order on the library selected, a cheque for £1 ls. being forwarded with proper notification to the proprietors. The winning criticism will be printed, with the writer's name, in THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE. Style and independence of view will be chiefly taken into account in awarding the prize. We need not remind competitors that they are not called upon to buy the selected books, but can obtain them from a library.

RULES.

1. The criticism must not exceed eight hundred words or be less than five hundred.
2. All communications must be addressed to "The Competition Editor, THE ACADEMY, 9 East Harding Street, London, E.C."
3. The Editor's judgment in awarding the prize must be considered final.
4. The MS. must be clearly written by hand, or typewritten, on one side only of the paper.
5. No competitor can win the prize more than once in three months. In case a previous prize-winner sends in the best criticism, his (or her) paper will be printed, the prize going, however, to the next best sent in by a non-prize-winner.
6. The competition coupon must be filled in and sent with the MS. (See page 2 of Cover.)

SUBJECT FOR THIRD COMPETITION

JAPAN, AN ATTEMPT AT INTERPRETATION. By Lafcadio Hearn. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d. net.)

Competitors' MSS. must reach this office not later than January 16.

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 9 East Harding Street, London, E.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper, which must bear the sender's full name and address, not necessarily for publication. The Editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archaeology, Folk-lore, Art, Music and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published. Questions must not be such as can be answered from the ordinary works of reference.

COMPETITION.

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5/- each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to "Academy" Questions and Answers.

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The names and addresses of prize-winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk. Each prize will consist of 5/- worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5/-. No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

One of the four weekly prizes will be awarded, whenever possible, to a Shakespearean Question or Answer.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" carries disqualification.

NOTE.

THE SCAVENGER.—Whilst our thoroughfares continue in such a filthy state one's reflections naturally revert to the official whose duty it is to abate the nuisance, and whose name has a peculiar interest. The word "scavenger" is taken directly from the Latin scabo, whence the "scabine," an official, adopted to displace the Lombardic word scapen of A.D. 803; which itself is from the Greek σκαπός, Sanscrit spag, to see. Both ranks, as scabine and scapen, held the office of alderman or sheriff; so, as with the episcopus or bishop, an overseer; the full term survives in German as Schöppe, a sheriff, &c. But corruptions arose; so from scabo we got scavage, skevin, and the French échevin; which forms never took full root in England, they being replaced by "showage," A.S. sceawian, to examine; so an inspector of goods subject to Customs duties. The gradations run thus: A.D. 840 Low Latin scavatus; 996 scabiones; 1004 scapiones; 1065 scaviones, scavagiones; so a curia scavagierum, appointed to search and survey the "pavements," but with operatives under them, called "rakers," to do the menial work; and from this curia we have derived our commission of sewers and sanitary department.—A. HALL.

Questions

SHAKESPEARE.

SIR FOR REVEREND.—There are several instances in Shakespeare of a priest being called "Sir," as Sir Hugh in "The Merry Wives of Windsor"; Sir Nathaniel in "Love's Labour's Lost"; Sir Oliver in "As You Like It"; and Sir Topas in "Twelfth Night." Was it a common occurrence in Shakespeare's days, or is there any other explanation?—H.J.M.

SHAKESPEARE AS SCHOOLMASTER.—Is there any foundation for the rumour, quoted by Professor E. Dowden in his "Shakespeare Primer," that William Shakespeare was schoolmaster at the Grammar School at Stratford-on-Avon? Edith Philip.

* DUCDAME.—Has any satisfactory explanation ever been given for the question propounded in "As You Like It," II. v., "What's that 'duc-dame'?" Could the word be a popular mistake for the Latin duc ad me, which would be appropriate for an "invocation," though not Greek?—H.F. (Norwich).

LITERATURE.

* STRADA AND THE TELEGRAPH.—Famianus Strada, in his "Prolusiones Academicæ" (ii. 6), introduces Lucretius, the poet, discoursing of two persons who, by means of a loadstone which influenced a pair of needles, conveyed their thoughts "in an instant" across "a whole continent." Each needle being fixed upon a dial-plate inscribed with letters, one friend would direct his needle to any required letter, "making a little pause at the end of every word or sentence." The other meanwhile saw "his own sympathetic needle moving of itself to every letter which that of his correspondent pointed at." Thus they conversed "over cities or mountains, seas or deserts" (Addison, "Spectator," 241; "Guardian," 119). Zachary Grey, in the 1744 edition of Butler's "Hudibras," quotes this from the "Guardian," and comments: "the telegram." Were any recorded experiments in magnetic telegraphy made before Strada wrote? Or do we owe subsequent experiments, directly or indirectly, to the suggestion of this early seventeenth-century writer?—B.M.G.

RECAL AND RECALL.—In writing an answer for these columns recently I used the expression "This recalls." This was printed "This recalls." I desire to disclaim this orthography. There is no question with regard to the general principle regulating such compound verbs; it is readily illustrated by comparing the following infinitives and participles: Appal, appalled; annul, annulled; rebel, rebelled; expel, expelled; excel, excelled. Webster has "recall . . . also recal"; the latest edition of Ogilvie has "recall . . . also spelled recal"; Walker (1863) has "recall . . . The second i is generally omitted"; Todd's Johnson (1827) and Latham (1870) have "recall," but their illustrations include "The soul should never once recal" (Locke) and "They who recal the church" (Hooker). Richardson (1858) has "recall," but his illustrations include "When division them recalls" (Beaumont), a classical precedent for the very inflection which I employed. My question therefore is: Having regard to general principle and to authority, is not the spelling "recal" preferable to the spelling "recall"?—George Nevall.

AUTHOR WANTED.—

As the trees began to whisper and the wind began to roll,
Heard in the wild March morning the angels call his soul.

Can any one tell me the author of this quotation, which occurs at the end of Chapter II. in Kingsley's "Two Years Ago," and from what poem it is taken?—K.C.B.

GENERAL.

THE GOOSE-STRIDE EARL.—There is an old observation—viz., "The days are getting a goose-stride longer"—which, in the North at least, is still in use shortly after the New Year. There is a popular tradition to the effect that the coining of this saying won an earldom for a London innkeeper. He and his immediate successors were, so it is said, nicknamed "The goose-stride earl." Can any one supply particulars? Who was the lucky peer?—Goblin (South Shields).

RABBITS.—Many children believe that if, on the first day of the month, they succeed in saying the word "Rabbits" before it is said to them, they will receive a present. What is the origin of this belief?—D.M. (Bexley Heath).

A BRICK.—What is the origin of the expression "You are a brick"?—H.J.M.

JNO. FOR JOHN.—Why is Jno. used as an abbreviation for John? Have the "n" and the "o" changed places?—K.C.B.

BLUE BEANS.—What is the origin and meaning of a saying I have more than once come across, "Three blue beans in a blue blown bladder," or, as it is sometimes given, "Three blue peas in a blue bladder," and why blue? It reminds one of Mrs. Cadwallader's comparison of Mr. Casaubon's talk to "the rattling of dry peas in a bladder."—H.F. (Norwich).

PORT ARTHUR.—Can any of your readers tell me why "Port Arthur" is so called, and whether this is the name by which Russians know it? No one seems able to explain why it should bear an English name, and ordinary books of reference fail one.—H.F. (Norwich).

A GERMAN MYSTIC.—Can any of your readers tell me who is the "quaint German mystic" referred to by Walter Pater (in Chapter II. of "Marius the Epicurean") as asserting that the "red rose came first," and that "white things were ever an after thought—the doubles or seconds of real things, and themselves but half-real, half-material"?—V.W.F.B.

GUBBINS.—Can any reader give the origin of this designation or any references to literature pertaining to these people? I already know the references in Camden, Fuller, Browne, and Mrs. Bray ("The Banks of Tamar and Tavy"). Kingsley mentions them in "Westward Ho!" but quotes Fuller as his authority.—H.J.N. (Edinburgh).

TELL THAT TO THE MARINES.—What is the origin of the expression, "Tell that to the Marines"?—G.B.

MARGUERITE.—Who was the "Marguerite" so frequently referred to by Matthew Arnold in his poems?—G.B.

BOHEMIAN.—What is the origin of, and the reason for the use of, the term "Bohemian"?—G.B.

Answers

SHAKESPEARE.

* KING LEAR.—A version of the story of "Child Rowland" is given in "English Fairy Tales," collected by Joseph Jacobs (published by D. Nutt). In the notes at the end of the volume the source is stated to be a ballad reproduced in Jamieson's "Illustrations of Northern Antiquities," p. 397.—Barbara Smythe.

BY REQUEST

Many have written pointing out that while the present offer of "The Academy" Model Williams Typewriter at 40% discount is a very fine one, it does not interest them, because they want a "brief" size machine (The Williams No. 3). The success of our offer has been so great and so immediate that we are encouraged to meet this request, and now offer the Brief Size (i.e. a machine which takes brief paper) Williams Typewriter for £14 : 14 : 0 net cash, or on the instalment plan for 12s. 6d. per month. This machine is of the utmost value to barristers, solicitors, builders, architects, and to all who have to draw up specifications or tenders of any sort. Full details will be sent you if you will write for them to "The Academy" Typewriter Department, 9 East Harding St., London, E.C., or will be given to you if you will call at the Williams Typewriter Office: London, 57 Holborn Viaduct; Aberdeen, 115 Union St.; Belfast, 71 Ann St.; Birmingham, 28 High St.; Burnley, 9 Grimshaw St.; Cardiff, 8 St. John's Square; Dublin, 5 Upper Ormond Quay; Edinburgh, 19 Shandwick Place; Exeter, 31 Queen St.; Glasgow, 69 Bothwell St.; Leeds, 3 Park Lane; Leicester, 60-64 Halford St.; Leigh, 64 Bond St.; Liverpool, 16 Union St., Exchange; Manchester, 267 Deansgate; Middlesbrough, Royal Exchange; Newcastle, 21 Collingwood Street; Nottingham, Prudential Buildings; Portsmouth, 154 Queen St.; Southampton, 12 Portland St.; Sheffield, 72 Queen St.

LITERATURE.

KEY TO "CONINGSBY."—As far as I know there is no authentic key to "Coningsby," but it is generally believed that "Rigby" represents the late Right Hon. J. W. Croker, who was an important official in the Tory Administrations of the earlier part of the nineteenth century, and also a writer in the "Quarterly Review," though not, I think, ever editor. He incurred the bitter hostility both of Macaulay and of Disraeli, but was trusted by the old Tory leaders. He was not a brilliant writer, but was certainly not stupid, though Whig writers always abused and ridiculed him. He is one of the few characters in "Coningsby" who can be confidently identified; there is doubt about most, but the Marquis of Monmouth (like Thackeray's Marquis of Steyne) is also supposed to be the third Marquis of Hertford, while Lord Henry Sidney is understood to be Disraeli's trusted friend and colleague, Lord John Manners, the present Duke of Rutland.—H.B.F. (Hastings).

WILD FIRE.—Explained by the late Dr. Hyde Clarke as "a composition of wet gunpowder, &c., which readily takes fire"; also applied to the complaint called erysipelas, or St. Anthony's fire, in animals.—A.H.

GENERAL.

* THE DOG IN THE MANGER.—This proverbial expression is, of course, applied to a malicious person who deprives another of a benefit, even though he does not want it himself. It occurs in Latin as "Canis in praesepe," and in Greek as "ἡ κύνε φάριγγ κύνε." Probably it came into the English language from its Greek origin, through the medium of "Æsop's Fables." It is also found in Lucian's satires and in the Greek Anthology.—Percy Selver.

[Replies also received from Max Plowman: R.S. (Sunderland); M.A.C. (Cambridge); Hilda M. Wood (Manchester); and J.W.T. (Ely).]

CARRINGTON.—Put for the territory of Keredig, or Caradoc, a son of Cunedda, circa 410 A.D., and reputed godfather of St. David; it also includes the so-called Caractacus, see Caer Caradoc, in Shropshire. The Welsh Caer is identical with the Hebrew Keer, a wall, city, stronghold, citadel, as in the Biblical Kir Moab. It was car in Accadian, ikur in Assyrian; Greek κῶρα, and see κῶρα, a vallum, so a camp.—A. Hall.

[Reply also from M.A.C.]

ST. EULALIA.—Your correspondent who inquires about St. Eulalia will find what is known of her in Smith & Wace's "Dictionary of Christian Biography." She was a virgin martyr in Diocletian's persecution; but there are two saints of this name, both Spaniards, one of Merida and one of Barcelona.—H.B.F.

ST. EULALIA.—St. Eulalia is said to have suffered martyrdom under the Emperor Maximian. The legend says she was first condemned to be burnt, but the flames did not hurt her, so the Emperor commanded that she should be beheaded. Her soul flew up to heaven in the form of a dove. The story of St. Eulalia forms the subject of the oldest monument of French literature, the "Prose de Sainte Eulalie."—Barbara Smythe.

[The reply of Mrs. Nelson cannot be used, as it does not comply with the very simple rules.]

CURBAR EDGE.—This is a small locality near Bakewell, in Derbyshire.—A.H.

BEAN-FEAST.—This is much the same as waye-goose—viz. a feast given by an employer to those he employs. The bean goose is next in size to the grey lag goose. The term comes from the northern counties, where the bean (goose) is common.—Hilda M. Wood (Manchester).

"O DU LIEBER AUGUSTIN."—Do not the words of the ditty sufficiently explain the reason for the whistling of the air on occasions when something unpleasant is supposed to be in store? They run:

O du lieber Augustin, Augustin,
O du lieber Augustin, Alles ist hin!
Geld ist weg, Mäd'l ist weg,
Alles weg, Alles weg!
O du lieber Augustin,
Alles ist hin!

—M.A.C.

"GREAT SCOTT."—I have always heard that this was a corruption of the German "Grüss Gott!"—H. Pearl Humphry.

AUTHOR FOUND.—"The fatal flower beside the rill." This is the daffodil, and the quotation is taken from Jean Ingelow's poem, "Light and Shade," which was originally written for the "Portfolio Society," and is usually known as "Persephone." It is founded on the old legend concerning Persephone, the daughter of Demeter, who, while wandering one day among the meadows and springs of Enna to pluck daffodils, fell asleep, and was discovered and carried off by Pluto, the god of the infernal regions, who made her his wife. A fact little known is that the "fatal flower" with which Persephone had wreathed her hair was white, but that the touch of Pluto turned it to the colour of gold.—M.C.R.

PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain, on application at the following booksellers, Five Shillings' worth of books. Notices have been dispatched to the several winners and to the following booksellers:

Messrs. Jarrold & Sons, London Road, Norwich.
Messrs. Kent & Matthews, 234 Lavender Hill, S.W.
Messrs. Farmer & Sons, 179 Kensington High Street, W.
Messrs. Trusclove & Hanson, 64 Sloane Street, S.W.

A NEW lectureship in the History of Art has recently been instituted at University College, London, the Lecturer being Mr. D. S. MacColl, M.A. (Lond.), B.A. (Oxon.). During the past term Mr. MacColl delivered lectures on "The History of Art from Hogarth to Constable." He will continue his course in the coming term on alternate Fridays at 4.30, beginning on January 13, the subject of this course being "English Art from Constable to the Present Time." The course will deal with Wilkie, Watts, Madox Brown and the Pre-Raphaelites, Burne-Jones, Morris and Whistler. The lectures are open to the general public as well as to students on payment of the fee of one guinea. Application for tickets should be addressed to the Secretary of University College.

HISTORICAL MYSTERIES

By Andrew Lang. (Smith, Elder. 9s. net.)

NOTHING in the way of a subject comes amiss to Mr. Andrew Lang; when he is not writing romance with all the scrupulous care and verisimilitude of an historian or history with the picturesque touch of the romancist, he is wandering blithely into by-paths of poetry, criticism and psychical research. In this volume he is in his happiest mood, for historical mysteries appeal to several of the ingenious and erudite writers who, so to say, are Mr. Andrew Lang. To enter into the details of the various problems here set forth would require almost unlimited space and the knowledge of a specialist in each case. It may be briefly said, however, that Mr. Lang brings strong proof in favour of his contention, whenever he condescends to have a contention; as, for example, in "The Gowrie Conspiracy," where he turns a most effective edge of irony on the theory that James I. and VI. had the audacity to conceive and the nerve to carry out the peculiarly hazardous plot with which he is often credited—or discredited. Again, in "The Murder of Escovedo" Mr. Lang gives with unusual gravity a black chapter of Spanish history, dealing with the assassination, by the orders, direct or indirect, of Philip II., of the closest friend of Philip's brother, the brilliant and brilliantly futile Don John of Austria. The sketch of Don John, slight as it is, is admirably suggestive; and the unravelling of the threads of intrigue seems probable: more can hardly be said by those best acquainted with the sombre secrets of Philip's Court.

In others of his studies the author does not commit himself to a definite opinion. He takes up the problem, plays with it, points out its difficulties and puts it away again unsolved, while the reader cherishes the aggrieved conviction that he could probably say the final word if he so chose. As a matter of fact, in many of these cases the mystery itself is of little interest compared with the manner of handling it. Who, at this time of day, cares profoundly about the real birth and condition of Kaspar Hauser? It may be assumed that that abnormal youth is not of much importance to anybody: even his lies lack their original zest, but Mr. Lang's burlesque of the high-flown style of romantic narrative makes very good reading, none the less. Even the much-worn story of "The Cardinal's Necklace" becomes entertaining in the hands of a narrator who draws a parallel between the romantic French nation, duped by the charming Jeanne de Valois, and the religious English one led astray by "such a seductive divine as Dr. Oates." On the other hand, the picture of the mystic "Saint Germain the Deathless," in companionship with the witty and mondain Horace Walpole, who pronounced him "mad and not very sensible," is delightfully piquant in itself.

The book is full of odd corners of history, of out-of-the-way research: it is also very full of Mr. Andrew Lang, who is perhaps the only man who writes with a candid self-revelation, as the immortal egoists of yore wrote essays and diaries. He cannot get through without a stab at the Regent Moray and a glowing tribute to Montrose, always his hero, in laudation of whom, indeed, he has at times been less than just to some of the fellow-loyalists of "the Great Marquis." The responsive reader, glancing through "Historical Mysteries," will be tempted to pounce on half a score of episodes and characters as the very stuff of romance; the wise reader will decide to leave them alone, considering that Mr. Lang has already evoked the romance.

The Small Advertisements on this page are inserted at 6d. per line, in the readable type shown (minimum 5 lines).
The Displayed Advertisements are charged at 5s. per inch.

THE INTERNATIONAL BOOK CIRCULAR, No. 139,

Containing a special article, entitled:
"SOME CONTEMPORARY FOREIGN CHEMISTS,"

By Dr. M. O. FORSTER, together with an exact bibliography of their publications and a double plate of their portraits.—Specimen copies gratis.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, Book Importers,
14 Henrietta st, Covent Garden, W.C.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C.,
AND 4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both
Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale
Commissions executed.

"Four Catalogue for 1903 is the most delightful production of its kind that ever came my way."

THE MOSHER BOOKS

THE NEW CATALOGUE for 1904, choicely printed in red and black,
done up in old style blue wrapper,
uncut edges, mailed free on request.

THOS. B. MOSHER, Portland, Maine, U.S.A.

AUTHORS' MSS., Sermons, Plays, Envelopes,
&c., carefully typed at home (Remington),
9d. per 1,000 words. Orders promptly executed.
—M. M. L., 7 Vernon Road, Clapham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING.—All kinds. Novels, 9d.
1,000. Translations. — Miss HANDLY,
Berkhamsted.

ROYAL HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

(INCORPORATED BY ROYAL CHARTER.)

AN ordinary MEETING of the Society will be held on Thursday, January 19, at 5 p.m., in Clifford's Inn Hall, Fleet Street, when the following Paper and Communication will be read and made:—

"THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE INCLO-SURE MOVEMENT IN ENGLAND," by Miss
E. M. LEONARD, F.R.Hist.S.

"BONDMEN IN SURREY," by Mr. H. E.
MALDEN, V.P. and Hon. Sec.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately
done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references. — Address, Miss MESSEY, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

*Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of THE ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher,
9 East Harding Street, E.C.*

THE ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,

ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY, W.

TUESDAY next (January 17), at Five o'clock,
Professor L. C. MIALL, D.Sc., F.R.S.,
Fullerian Professor of Physiology, R.I. First of Six Lectures on "Adaptation and History in the Structure and Life of Animals." One Guinea the Course.

Thursday, January 19, at Five o'clock, Professor CHURTON COLLINS, M.A. First of Two Lectures. I. "The Religion of Shakespeare." II. "The Philosophy and Significance of 'The Tempest.'" Half-a-guinea.

Saturday, January 21, at Three o'clock, Professor CHARLES OMAN, M.A., F.S.A. First of Two Lectures on "Wat Tyler in London."
Half-a-guinea.

Subscription to all the Courses in the Season,
Two Guineas.

Friday evening, January 20, at Nine o'clock,
Professor Sir JAMES DEWAR, M.A., LL.D.,
D.Sc., on "New Low Temperature Phenomena."

Surplus Library Books and New Remainders OFFERED AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES

The JANUARY LIST, NOW READY, contains Popular Works on Sport, Travel, Biography, and Fiction.
Sent POST FREE on application to

MUDIE'S LIBRARY,
30-34 New Oxford Street, London.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIUMS

Newspapers making a special feature of Reviews and Advertisements of New Books, &c.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.
THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN
AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current
Literature, and without doubt the best
Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.
Next to Literary Matter every Day.

Offices: NEWTON ST., HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S.
appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR
PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS

The Morning Newspaper for Aberdeen
AND THE
Northern Half of Scotland.

Reviews of books appear on Mondays and
Thursdays, and on other days as required.

Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.

NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.

LONDON OFFICE: 149 FLEET STREET, E.C.

EVERY DAY

18

PUBLISHERS' DAY

IN THE

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

Special literary issue
on Saturdays.

THE DUNDEE COURIER

Has double the circulation of any Morning
Paper North of the Forth.

Literary Notes on Mondays.

Reviews on Wednesdays.

London Office, 109 Fleet Street, E.C.

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN

Established 1821.

Published Daily. Price One Penny.

Has a circulation peculiar to itself among the more cultivated classes of Great Britain in every district, and claims, with justice, to be one of the leading papers in the country.

Contains special columns devoted to literary matters.

THE IRISH TIMES

DUBLIN.

The largest and most influential circulation in Ireland.

Special page of book reviews every Friday.

London Editorial Offices: 153 FLEET STREET.

Advertisement Offices: 61 FLEET STREET.

Applications for these spaces should be made to Messrs. Crossley & Co., 57a Coleman Street, London, E.C. Special Rates for
a Series will be quoted.

HOMELY HINTS

ON FOOD AND COOKING, DIGESTION AND INDIGESTION, With Over 140 Simple, Practical, and Economical Receipts.
Handsomely bound in cloth, 1s.

"HOMELY HINTS," a shilling publication which has been recently issued, an exceedingly useful and instructive little book, is bound to find its way into quarters where the more bulky tomes could never possibly penetrate. The book is divided into three parts. Chapter I. deals with the value of the various kinds of food; Chapter II. treats of digestion, how to prevent and how to cure indigestion; Chapter III. comprises a most complete selection of recipes of popular French, English and American dishes, with minute details as to their preparation. It is neatly bound, and is sure to be in great demand by all classes of the community."

PUBLISHED BY ALF. COOKE, Ltd., CROWN PRINTING WORKS, LEEDS.

ROUTLEDGE'S NEW UNIVERSAL LIBRARY

In Pott 8vo (6½ × 3½ in.), the size of THE WORLD'S CLASSICS, which has proved so attractive to the public all over the world.

Green cloth extra, full gilt back, gilt lettered, 1s. net.

As already announced, the first two Volumes of this New Series are :

On Representative Government. By JOHN STUART MILL.
On Liberty. By JOHN STUART MILL. [Ready]

Each with an INDEX now first added.

These will be immediately succeeded at very short intervals by the following volumes :

- | | |
|--|--|
| Tom Brown's School Days. By THOMAS HUGHES.
 Tom Brown at Oxford. By the SAME.
 On Translating Homer. By MATTHEW ARNOLD; with F. W. NEWMAN'S "Homeric Translation in Theory and Practice."
 The Golden Treasury of Songs and Lyrics. By F. T. PALGRAVE.
 Grimm's Fairy Tales.
 Andersen's Fairy Tales.
 Aids to Reflection. By S. T. COLERIDGE, edited by THOMAS FENBY.
 Uncle Remus. By J. C. HARRIS.
 Nights with Uncle Remus. By the SAME.
 Essays from the Edinburgh Review. By FRANCIS JEFFREY. I.—English Poets.
 Macaulay's Essays. Vol. I.
 Horae Subsecivae. By Dr. JOHN BROWN. Vol. I.
 Dissertations and Discussions. By J. S. MILL. Vol. I.
 John Halifax, Gentleman. By Mrs. CRAIK.
 Dialogues. By LEOPARDI, translated by the late JAMES THOMSON and edited by BERTRAM DORRILL.
 Letters and Journal to Stella. By DEAN SWIFT. | Sartor Resartus. By T. CARLYLE.
 Short Studies on Great Subjects. By J. A. FROUDE. Series I Utilitarianism. By J. S. MILL.
 Essays. By GEORGE BRIMLEY.
 Guesses at Truth. By A. J. and J. C. HARE.
 Poems (Authorised Selection). By Sir LEWIS MORRIS.
 Peacock's Novels (in 2 vols.). Vol. I.
 The Channings. By Mrs. HENRY WOOD.
 Breakfast Table Series. By O. W. HOLMES. 3 vols.
 Laocoon. By LESSING. Translated.
 Essays of Elia. By CHARLES LAMB
 Essays. By MONTAIGNE, translated by FLORIO. 3 vols.
 Cranford. By Mrs. GASKELL.
 The Citizen of the World. By OLIVER GOLDSMITH.
 Essays. By DAVID HUME.
 Life of Shakspeare. By VICTOR HUGO. Translated.
 Adam Graeme. By Mrs. OLIPHANT.
 Heroes and Hero Worship. By T. CARLYLE.
 The Warden. By A. TROLLOPE. |
|--|--|

THE MUSES' LIBRARY.

Under the Editorship of A. H. BULLEN.

Pott 8vo, blue cloth extra, full gilt back, 1s. net cloth; gilt lambskin, 2s. net.

- | | |
|--|--|
| Keats. Introduction by ROBERT BRIDGES; Notes by G. THORN DRURY. 2 vols.
 Donne. Introduction by Prof. SAINTSBURY; Notes by E. K. CHAMBERS. 2 vols.
 Coleridge. Edited by RICHARD GARNETT, C.B. 1 vol.
 Marvell. POEMS, 1 vol.; SATIRES, 1 vol. Edited by G. A. AITKEN.
 Waller. Edited by G. THORN DRURY. 2 vols.
 Drummond of Hawthornden. Edited by W. C. WARD. 2 vols. | Herrick. Introduction by A. C. SWINBURNE; Notes by A. POLLARD. 2 vols.
 Gay. Edited by J. UNDERHILL. 2 vols.
 Vaughan. Introduction by Canon BEECHING; Notes by E. K. CHAMBERS. 2 vols.
 Carew. Edited by A. VINCENT. 1 vol.
 Browne of Tavistock. Edited by GORDON GOODWIN. 2 vols. |
|--|--|

IN PREPARATION:

- | | |
|--|---|
| Early Italian Poets. By D. G. ROSSETTI.
 Poetical Works of Coventry Patmore, with an Introduction by ALICE MEYNELL. | Legends and Lyrics. By ADELAIDE ANN PROCTER.
 Blake's Poetical Works. Edited by W. B. YEATS. |
|--|---|

THE FIRST THREE VOLUMES ARE NOW READY OF POETS AND POETRY OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY

Edited by A. H. MILES. 12 vols., pott 8vo, red cloth extra, full gilt back, 1s. 6d. net; lambskin gilt, 2s. 6d. net.

A unique and very comprehensive series of specimens of the representative verse of the century, with elaborate and judicious notices of each poet. The editor has been unusually fortunate in having obtained permission to include in his work a large number of copyright pieces, the absence of which would have destroyed its representative character, and in having in many instances enjoyed the personal counsel and assistance of the poets.

- Crabbe to Coleridge (including also Blake, Rogers, Bloomfield, Hogg, Wordsworth, Scott). 576 pages.
Southey to Shelley (including also Tannabill, Landor, Lamb, Campbell, Moore, Elliott, Knowles, Tennant, Hunt, Peacock, Procter, Byron, De Vere, &c.). 612 pages.
Keats to Lytton (including also Clare, Talfourd, Carlyle, H. Coleridge, Darley, Motherwell, Hood, Thom, Macaulay, Taylor, Wells, Barnes, Praed, Horne, Beddoes, Whitehead, Hawker, &c.). 656 pages.

* * THE REMAINING NINE VOLUMES TO FOLLOW RAPIDLY.

LIBRARY OF HISTORICAL LITERATURE.

Large 8vo, dark green buckram, gilt, red morocco labels, each 5s.

TWO NEW VOLUMES:

- Ranke's History of the Reformation in Germany. Translated with the Author's Notes by SARAH AUSTIN; edited, with additional Notes and an Introduction, by R. A. JOHNSON, M.A., and a copious Index.
Carlyle's History of the French Revolution. 808 pages, with 32 fine portraits and plates.

ALREADY PUBLISHED:

- Buckle's History of Civilization. Edited, with all the Author's Notes and additional Notes and an Introduction, by JOHN M. ROBERTSON, Author of "Buckle and His Critics," &c., and a copious Index. 968 pages.

READY SHORTLY:

- Fepys' Diary, with the Notes by LORD BRAYBROOKE: a verbatim reprint of the edition of 1848-49, with a copious Index.

- Bacon's Complete Philosophical Works, with the Essays, New Atlantis, &c. Containing all the Original Notes of J. SPEDDING, R. L. ELLIS, and D. D. HEATH; the whole edited, with Additional Notes and an Introduction, by JOHN M. ROBERTSON.

LITERARY YEAR-BOOK, 1905

"The Literary Year-Book" is to the reviewer and the writer what 'Whitaker' is to the man in the street, or 'Bradshaw' to the traveller."—Pall Mall Gazette.

PART I.

- Calendar.
 Authors' Directory.
 Authors' Assistants.
 Obituary, 1904.
 Catalogue Raisonné and Reader's Guide to the Best
 Books of 1904.
 Nobel Prizes.

PART II.

- Law and Letters.
 Royalty Tables.
 Publishers.
 Periodical Publications.
 Societies.
 Booksellers.
 Libraries.
 Book Production.

&c., &c.

SUPPLEMENT.—INDEX OF CONTEMPORARY LITERATURE, 256 pp. Also published separately. Cloth, 1s. net.

THE LITERARY YEAR-BOOK, 1905.—Ninth Annual Volume, Revised and Re-set throughout, with many New Features, cloth, extra gilt, blue and red sprinkled edges, 928 pp., 5s. net.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, LTD., Broadway House, Ludgate Hill, London.

The Academy and Literature

EDITED BY W. TEIGNMOUTH SHORE

No. 1706. Established 1869.

London: 14 January 1905.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17s. 6d. a year.]

Notes

I SEE from the analytical table of books issued in "The Publishers' Circular" that the number of works published in 1904 was practically the same as in 1903. The chief increase is in works on political and social economy, which, under the influence of the Fiscal Question, have risen to the figure of 775, an advance of more than a hundred and fifty on the previous year. Next come the educational works, which count 836—just less than a hundred more than in 1903. Bibliographical and historical works have also increased by about eighty, so that they now number 153. A similar advance is also to be noticed in the number of books on travel, which, owing to the Tibet Mission and the Russo-Japanese War, amount this year to no less than 289. Poetry and the drama number 407, which is approximately the same as in 1903. It is interesting, however, to observe that though in the previous year belles-lettres, essays and monographs counted no less than 300, they have fallen in 1904 to the low total of 220. Yet this is a tendency which I am glad to welcome, if it denotes, as I hope it does, that a keener struggle for existence is now taking place in the sphere of essays and belles-lettres. It is possible to derive a certain modicum of enjoyment from the perusal of a second- or third-rate novel, but there is small excuse for an essay or monograph unless it be of conspicuous merit.

THE London Institute of Economics and Political Science offers a most attractive syllabus for the Lent term. The lectures cover an extremely wide field, ranging from ethnology and palæography to railway law, banking and sociology. Though it may appear invidious to make distinctions among so many eminent lecturers, I think that the following should prove the most interesting items of an exceptionally interesting course: twenty lectures on Sociology by Professor Westermarck, in continuation of the course begun in the Michaelmas term; two lectures on Japanese Civilisation by Mr. Okakura; eleven lectures by Professor Ashley, on the Political Position of the Great Powers, including the United States, from 1848 to 1871; and the eleven lectures by Mr. Sargent on the Economic Position of the Great Powers, 1848-1871. The interest manifested at Oxford and Cambridge in political economy, political science and sociology is so very slender that it is with unusual pleasure that I welcome so wide and vigorous a programme in London.

WHAT, I wonder, is the real value of punctuation? This question is suggested to me by the publication of "Punctuation Simplified," by Mr. T. Bridges, which gives in concise form all the rules and definitions of the science. I feel myself that punctuation is only advisable in so far as it is necessary to complete lucidity. With punctuation for punctuation's sake, the pedantic desire for meticulous accuracy, I have small sympathy. Yet in many cases it is interesting to trace the characteristics of the writer emerging in his punctuation; to observe the verve and insistence of the notes of exclamation; the caution and orthodoxy of the commas; or the hurry and unconventionality of that writing which practically dispenses altogether with stops.

SIR FRANK T. MARZIALS, C.B.

[Photo. Russell & Sons]

THE following extract from an able article on Nietzsche, entitled "La Folie Géniale," in the December

"Mercure de France," by M. Paul Bjerre, seems to point palpably at Herr Max Nordau and Signor Lombroso, with special reference to their well-known works "Degeneration" and "The Man of Genius":

"Combien n'aurait-il pas été préférable qu'on eût réussi d'emblée à trouver le critérium psychologique qui sépare le génie de la folie, qui existe nécessairement, et à défaut de qui toute discussion reste un vagabondage dans les ténèbres.

"Alors, l'humanité n'aurait pas connu le fléau de ces hommes de science modernes qui compilent de détestables journaux d'hôpital au sujet de tous ceux qui ont contribué, en quoi que ce soit, à l'évolution de l'espèce humaine. Aussi longtemps, donc, que ce critérium n'est pas trouvé, le sage devrait s'abstenir de...divaguer sur ces questions."

I cannot but feel that the stricture is deserved. "Degeneration" is as bad science as it is excellent journalism. Starting from a basis of actual fact Herr Nordau has developed and exaggerated his pet theory to such an extent that he too gives one the impression of being one of those "one-idea" persons whom he has himself so graphically described.

In Nietzsche, moreover, there is the reverse as well as the obverse side of the medal, and, as M. Bjerre points out, his mental malady cuts both ways. It should be regarded, in fact, not so much as a disease which tainted and vitiated his writings, but rather as the price he paid for a marvellous and unique psychic state. This condition raising him beyond the more limited and normal states of the intellect enabled him to write the most brilliant German that has yet been written and to view the problems of humanity with a mind free from those conventional ideas which even the most revolutionary author must otherwise inevitably inherit. To exemplify this point more in detail I quote yet again from M. Bjerre:

"En poursuivant le chemin que le mal a pris dans ses attaques successives et heureuses sur l'esprit de l'infortuné, on trouve qu'il n'a pas seulement laissé ses traces dans de nouveaux symptômes maladiques: en écrasant ce qui était, il ouvrait la voie à des possibilités nouvelles; et où il passait, de nouveaux mondes naissaient. Il faut le dire, jamais Nietzsche n'aurait créé Zarathustra, s'il était resté en santé. C'est qu'à l'instant où le mal le terrassait en tant qu'homme il le rehaussait comme poète et penseur; il anéantissait sa personnalité humaine, mais elle rendait en même temps possible l'accomplissement de l'œuvre de cette personnalité. C'est la connaissance de ceci qui répand une clarté conciliatrice sur toute la tragédie; mais aussi dévoile-t-elle l'extrême tréfonds du drame.

"Pour lui, sa maladie signifiait l'ivresse chronique qui, à la fin des fins, dissolvait toute l'existence. Elle arracha chaque centre d'énergie psychique de la place où la nature l'avait fixé. Elle déplaça les montagnes que, jusqu'alors obstacles infranchissables, avait rencontrées la pensée agressive. Elle déchira les associations d'idées qui par des développements millénaires s'étaient enracinées dans la vie humaine. Et elle ne se contenta point de couper, de fendre, de saper. Elle écrasa tout ce qu'elle rencontrait, et le réduisit en poussière. Elle volatilisa ce qui avait résisté aux flammes les plus chaudes de la pensée."

After all, extremes always touch and the healthy normal man can almost be considered as at any rate negatively insane with regard to his ignorance on those points on which Nietzsche, in spite, or rather because, of his mental state, showed so prodigious a perspicuity.

THE current number of "The Fortnightly Review" has a singularly interesting article on Ste-Beuve by Mr.

Francis Gribble. The writer is chiefly concerned with the personality of the great critic. It is a significant fact that Ste-Beuve had originally set his heart upon being a great poet and only drifted into criticism as a pis-aller—a truly classic example of Disraeli's epigram. In his private life he exhibited that mixture of sensuality and mysticism so characteristic of many of the great French writers. Not only Ste-Beuve, but Verlaine and, in particular, Baudelaire, show how intimate is the relation in which sex stands to religion. Ste-Beuve, however, posed not only as a Don Juan, but as a "Man of Sentiment" into the bargain; and apropos of the ludicrous failure of the "Livre d'Amour" I quote the following from Mr. Gribble:

"It certainly did not fail because it was bad prose.

Sainte-Beuve's prose was never bad. On the contrary, it was always very good. But the success of such work as he was attempting depends less upon the quality of the style than upon the quality of the man. The man whose "confessions" are to attract sympathetic attention need not be good, or heroic, or consistent. The case of Rousseau would seem to prove that he need not even have the instincts and habits of a gentleman. But he must at least be interesting. That is where Sainte-Beuve was at a disadvantage as compared with Benjamin Constant and Chateaubriand. If they were indiscreet about their amours, it was at least notorious that they had amours to be indiscreet about, and they were the sort of men by whose commanding personalities tremendous emotions were naturally suggested. The case of Sainte-Beuve was very different. In spite of the ardour of his temperament, he was ugly. In spite of his intellectual acumen, he was insignificant. In the abstract, no doubt, his right to his emotions was recognised; but the concrete expression of them seemed a presumption and an impertinence. No one felt the least curiosity about his sentimental life. There was, if not a tendency to scepticism, at least a disposition to pass by on the other side, saying contemptuously: 'It is only Sainte-Beuve.' Trying to pose, in short, he only succeeded in making himself ridiculous; and De Goncourt accurately summed up the general opinion of this phase of his career when he wrote that 'Sainte-Beuve spent his life in gnashing his teeth in his disgust that he was not a handsome young subaltern of hussars.'

Of Ste-Beuve as a critic Mr. Gribble writes as follows:

"Fundamentally he was a student, avid of knowledge, devoured by curiosity, sane in his judgments, incapable, in literary matters, of bad taste. Though he failed as a professor, first at Lausanne and afterwards at Paris, where the students not only shouted him down, but so intimidated him that, for a period, he never walked abroad without carrying a dagger hidden in his sleeve for his protection against an assault that no one contemplated, he had all the professorial endowment except a ready tongue, a resonant voice and an authoritative presence. It was natural to him to co-ordinate, to classify, to see the particular as a manifestation of the general, to refer to first principles, to discover that the new flowers of literature had their roots in the past. By the exercise of these gifts he found a raison d'être for the romanticism of Hugo, and performed a similar service for many other movements in which he interested himself from time to time."

Yet the judgments of this prince of critics were frequently warped by the promptings of an ignoble jealousy, and Mr. Gribble's article strikes me as slightly inadequate in its treatment of so salient and so important a feature in Ste-Beuve's character. His jealousy was not only responsible for his well-known attack upon Chateaubriand, but also for the animus which he exhibited toward Hugo, Lamartine, Vigny, Musset, Balzac and Michelet. It was his jealousy, moreover, which dictated his exaggerated appreciation of second- and third-rate writers. Not only did their study titillate his own sense of personal superiority, but they formed a useful counterblast to the fame of many of those really first-class artists whom it was Ste-Beuve's joy to pull down from their lofty eminence.

By a stupid blunder Mr. Richard Marsh's "A Spoiler of Men" was printed as "A Spoiler of France" in last week's ACADEMY.

Bibliographical

OF the details of Shakespeare's life we have but the scantiest knowledge; yet there are probably more "Lives" of our national poet than of any other individual—and that, of course, quite apart from special studies of his work. Yet among the first books to be given us by 1905 we are to have a new "Life of Shakespeare," by Dr. William J. Rolfe, while from Professor Walter Raleigh we are to have a volume on Shakespeare in the "English Men of Letters Series." Last year we had the late Charles I. Elton's large volume on "William Shakespeare, his Family and Friends," Mr. Charles Creighton's "Shakespeare's Story of his Life" and Mr. Alfred Ewen's "Miniature Series" volume "Shakespeare." In 1898 we had Mr. Sidney Lee's "A Life of William Shakespeare," and ten years before that a capital translation of Dr. Karl Elze's "William Shakespeare, a Literary Biography" was added to "Bohn's Standard Library." Besides these there are at least a score of biographies of one sort or another. It looks as though the very scantiness of the actual knowledge of facts combined with the extraordinary opulence of his works to make the elusive personality of the poet one of the most fascinating to many writers, for, as one of his biographers said many years ago, "Every life of him must to a certain extent be conjectural."

"A House of Letters" is announced as the title—the quaint, but not, I think, felicitous, title of a volume of correspondence written during the first half of last century. The volume is to give us letters of the Lambs, Southey, Coleridge, as well as of less well-known folk such as Lady Jerminham and Matilda Betham. Matilda Betham wrote poems which won the commendation of her illustrious friends, but are now practically forgotten, except of the curious student; and she also compiled "A Biographical Dictionary of the Celebrated Women of Every Age and Country." She was, apparently, an aunt of "the measureless Bethams" of whom Lamb wrote to Walter Savage Landor on April 9, 1832, and to whom he refers in his "Lepus" essay on "Many Friends" as "Beachams."

I notice that Messrs. Methuen announce for early publication a second volume of Robert Southey's "English Seamen" is not Southey's, it may be mentioned, Hannay, was issued about ten years ago. The title "English Seamen" is not Southey's it may be mentioned, the lives forming part of his five-volume "Lives of the Admirals" (1833-40)—a work which was completed by Robert Bell. It is strange that these "Lives of the Admirals" have not been more often drawn upon for reprinting, seeing the great popularity of Southey's "Life of Nelson," of which upwards of a dozen different editions have been published since 1890, and of which we shall probably see more than one reissue this year, in view of its being the centenary of the Battle of Trafalgar.

Charles Causse, better known by his pen-name of Pierre Maël, whose death is reported from Paris, was one of the most prolific and successful of French fiction writers of the day. So far as I am aware, only one of his stories has been translated into English, and that was published in 1893 as "Under the Sea to the North Pole." Previously, I fancy, it ran serially through the pages of "Boys," a short-lived periodical for young readers.

A Nathaniel Hawthorne bibliography, by Miss E. Browne, is promised for publication during the spring. This should be welcome; the only Hawthorne bibliography we have of which I know is that prepared by Mr. J. P. Anderson, of the British Museum, as a supplement to Dr. Moncure Conway's life of Hawthorne in the "Great Writers Series."

With the new issue of "The Literary Year-Book" is given, by way of supplement, an "Index of Titles," which, more fully and more carefully compiled, might be a really useful work; but then it would have to outgrow its present bounds. In a few preliminary words we are told that "this Index to Contemporary Literature, which answers the eternal question 'Who wrote so-and-so?' includes every title mentioned in the Author's Directory, the Books of 1904 and the Obituary 1904." If it did this the index would not be as complete as such a work of reference should be to be truly serviceable. If we ask "Who wrote 'The Amazing Verdict'?" the index promptly informs us, and if we ask "Who wrote 'The Adventures of Harry Revel'?" it as readily affords the information; but if we ask "Who wrote 'The Amazing Marriage'?" or "Who wrote 'The Adventures of Harry Richmond'?" it can give us no answer. Yet a list of Mr. Meredith's novels is duly given in the Author's Directory portion of the work. If we should be in doubt as to the author of "Far from the Madding Crowd" or "Under the Greenwood Tree" the index is equally uninforming, though many of Mr. Hardy's books are given in the Directory. Other writers who are treated in the same fashion as Mr. Meredith and Mr. Hardy in having their books omitted from the index can scarcely grumble at being left out in such great company. It is to be hoped that this feature of "The Literary Year-Book"—the result of a distinctly happy idea—will be more thoroughly looked after in future, for such a work of reference should be not only as accurate but as full as possible.

WALTER JERROLD.

Forthcoming Books, &c.

Messrs. Sampson Low announce new editions of Julien's "French at Home" and Miss Alcott's "Rose in Bloom." General Sir William Butler's "Red Cloud"; Mr. Clark Russell's "Wreck of the Grosvenor"; and Rev. J. Paterson Smyth's "Old Documents."—In connection with the Tercenary of the first publication of "Don Quixote," Mr. John Lane will issue a new "Life of Cervantes," by Mr. Albert F. Calvert.—Mr. Edward Arnold will publish this month a new collection of essays by Mr. Philip Gibbs, the author of "Knowledge is Power," under the title of "Facts and Ideas: or Short Studies of Life and Literature."—Mr. A. Henry Savage Landor's new book, "Tibet and Nepal," will be published within the next few days as one of Messrs. A. & C. Black's Colour Books.

NOTICE.—The Monthly Competition
closes on Monday next. See p. 40.

1904

THERE are several ways of looking at the books of a given year. We may look at them statistically and hold up the hands of amazement at the sum total. Between eight and nine thousand books were published in 1904—or close upon eight thousand if we exclude the miscellaneous pamphlet literature—and if taking the large issues with the small, the virile with the still-born, we average them as being in editions of a thousand copies we get an enormous number of volumes to be disposed of—if it be only as remainders. The number includes, of course, a goodly proportion of new editions and reissues, and over two thousand five hundred novels or other works of fiction, including books for the young. Another way in which we may look at the books of a given year is from the point of view of popularity, and another is from that of literary value—and these are, it is scarcely necessary to say, often wholly unrelated. Or we may try to pick out the work or works which will represent the year in question to coming generations of readers. The last were the more difficult task. Standing as near as we do we have rather to judge representative books of the year partly by their popularity and partly by the judgment of competent critics upon them as contributions to knowledge and to literature.

To look back over the results of the year's publishing is rather like trying to recall the features of a country through which we have passed. We have a more or less confused impression of the whole with really definite memories of but this or that point. A pessimistic critic might suggest that looking over the books of 1904 was like looking back over the desert, an arid waste for the most part with here and there an oasis that might be a centre of fertility—and might be only a mirage; and the pessimist would be, as pessimists so often are, right to a certain limited extent. Several thousands of new books were published during last year, as has been said, and it is merely a recognition of facts to acknowledge that the great majority of those lacked sufficient vitality to carry them on into another year. Out of those thousands no single reader could of course have handled many hundreds, so as to gain any fair knowledge of them, but it may be confidently stated that there were no sensationally outstanding books; yet when we come to consider the more important of the new works we find several in each department which claim something more than curt dismissal as mere units swallowed up in the thousands.

Each reader will remember two or three books which have for one reason or another especially appealed to him, and if we take those which have appealed to representative men and women we probably narrow the tale of the year's publishing down to its most important minimum, although it is only fair to recognise that such selections generally illustrate the special studies or predilections of the selectors. In recent numbers of this journal several distinguished men and women named the two books of the year which they had read with the greatest interest and pleasure, and in all their returns but three works were mentioned by more than one reader—Mr. Maurice Hewlett's "The Queen's Quair" by three, Mr. E. V. Lucas' "Highways and Byways in Sussex" by two, and two also mentioned Mr. W. H. Hudson's "The Purple Land," which was not a book of 1904 at all but a re-issue of one already nearly twenty years old.

Among the veteran literary leaders Mr. George Meredith was represented but by an introduction which he contributed to Thackeray's "The Four Georges," Mr. Swinburne published a new volume marked by all his old opulence of language and metre, "A Channel Passage and Other Poems," and Mr. Thomas Hardy gave us something of an impressive tour de force in his "The Dynasts."

BIOGRAPHY

It was in the department of biography, with which we may fairly bracket reminiscences and letters, that the year gave us most that was notable, though here we had no dominant great work such as Mr. Morley's "Life of Gladstone" of the year before. There were quite a large number of works in this class of more than average importance and excellence—though the important and the excellent were not invariably found in combination. Herbert Spencer's "Autobiography," which had been most eagerly looked forward to, was one of the most widely discussed; it could not fail to be interesting, but will hardly take a place among classic works of the kind. On the general reader "The Memorials of Edward Burne-Jones," which came at the close of the year, will much longer continue its hold, while Mrs. Creighton's "Life and Letters of Mandell Creighton" must also be counted among the more successful intimate memoirs. Professor Bain's "Autobiography" has made a lasting impression on us. Science, art and the Church—Mr. W. H. Hutton's "Letters of Bishop Stubbs" should also be mentioned—were thus all strongly represented in this department of letters. In law the most memorable volumes were the racy "Reminiscences of Sir Henry Hawkins (now Lord Brampton)," and the more "stodgy" "Life and Correspondence of John Duke, Lord Coleridge," by Mr. Ernest H. Coleridge. A memorable volume of reminiscences—rich in its references to people of note on both sides of the Atlantic—was Dr. Moncreu Conway's "Autobiography: Memories and Experiences." Inherently interesting but somewhat clumsily put together was "A Later Pepys" (Sir William Pepys, Bart.), giving much information about "blue stocking" circles of a century or so since; another volume of a similarly mixed character was General Grant Wilson's "Thackeray in the United States"; while permanently interesting additions to epistolary literature were made in "New Letters of Thomas Carlyle," in "Thackeray's Letters to an American Family" and in the delightful volume of "Letters of Lord Acton to Mary Gladstone." But it was not only in big "official" memoirs and new collections of letters that the biographical bookshelves were strengthened last year, there were also some capital books, the result of careful study, and among such perhaps a first place should be given to Miss Mary F. Sandars' "Honoré de Balzac," while Mr. E. I. Carlyle's "William Cobbett" and Mr. Walter Sichel's "Disraeli: a Study in Personality and Ideas" possess value which should make them pass current long after the year which saw their publication. In this connection, too, mention must not be omitted of the new additions to the "English Men of Letters" series—additions which include the late Sir Leslie Stephen's fine monograph on "Leviathan" Hobbes. Among patient compilations which have their lasting usefulness should be mentioned Mr. Thomas Wright's "Life of Edward FitzGerald" and his more valuable collection of the letters of William Cowper.

POETRY AND BELLES-LETTRES

In poetry it must be acknowledged that 1904 had nothing sensational to add to the body of our literature. Mr. Swinburne, as we have said above, published in "A Channel Passage and Other Poems" a volume marked by all his familiar qualities, and he also gave us—long looked for come at last—a collected edition of his poetical works. From Mr. Hardy we had something in the nature of an experiment, an experiment of but doubtful success, in his eccentric "The Dynasts," of which we have said before that it is "a great canvas upon which he seeks to unroll after the fashion of a panorama the whole drama of the Napoleonic wars." From the younger men came little that can be described as anything but a "marking time," and no new poetical planet swam into the ken of those watchers of the literary skies, who are ever on the look-out for the hint of such a galaxy as marked the opening decades of the nineteenth century. Mr. Stephen Phillips' "The Sin of David" may be a good stage play, but it is by no means remarkable as poetry; Mr. Newman Howard's "Savonarola: a City's Tragedy" contains much very fine poetry, and we note that it seems scarcely actable. From Mr. John Davidson we have had another of his searching "Testaments," "The Testament of a Prime Minister." "A. E." in "The Divine Vision and Other Poems," Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer in "The Face of the Night," Mr. T. Sturge Moore in "Toleda and Other Odes" and Mr. Alfred Noyes in "Poems," have published work which makes us look forward with anticipatory eagerness to their future books.

In criticism and the belles-lettres again there has been considerable activity, resulting in much that is excellent and but little that will be recognised as remarkable. There has been something of a new awakening of interest in Shakespeareana, and there have been quite a number of additions in this class which are worth recalling and rescuing from among the great mass of the year's books. First comes Professor A. C. Bradley's admirable "Shakespearean Tragedy," lectures on "Hamlet," "Othello," "King Lear" and "Macbeth," while other books which may range along with it are Mr. Charles Creighton's "Shakespeare's Story of his Life," Mr. J. Churton Collins' "Studies in Shakespeare," the late Charles I. Elton's "William Shakespeare: his Family and Friends," and Dr. Richard Garnett's fanciful "William Shakespeare, Pedagogue and Poet." A notable volume issued in the early part of the year was the late Sir Leslie Stephen's "English Literature and Society in the Eighteenth Century"—the Ford Lectures, the delivery and the preparation of which for the press by the author were rendered impossible by the breakdown of health which ended in his death. Two further volumes were issued completing the "History of English Literature" by Dr. Richard Garnett and Mr. Edmund Gosse, and there was a further instalment of Professor Brandes' "Main Currents in Nineteenth Century Literature." In Mr. Arthur Symonds' "Studies in Prose and Verse" we had a delightfully individual collection of thoughtful essays; in Mr. W. L. Courtney's "Development of Maurice Maeterlinck" and "The Feminine Note in Fiction" some stimulating and suggestive criticism. Mrs. Craigie's "Letters from a Silent Study," Mr. George A. B. Dewar's "The Glamour of the Earth," Mr. W. J. Courthope's further volume of his "History of English Poetry," Professor Campbell's "Tragic Drama in the Greek Poets" and Mr. Charles Whibley's "Literary Portraits" are all memorable, each in its own way.

HISTORY

In the department of history, too, there are many books which appear to possess all the elements of lasting value. First and foremost there were two further volumes of the great "Cambridge Modern History," planned by the late Lord Acton, dealing respectively with the periods of "The Reformation" and "The French Revolution." A less liberal use of the word "modern" marks another history of a very different character, Mr. Herbert Paul's full and readable "History of Modern England," which means for him, roughly speaking, the England of the past half-century or so. Part of the same period, too, was covered in Sir Spencer Walpole's "History of Twenty-five Years." Dr. J. Holland Rose followed up his now standard Life of the great Napoleon with a volume of "Napoleonic Studies," and Mr. Edmund G. Gardner produced a capital book in "Dukes and Poets in Ferrara," while Mr. Andrew Lang issued the third volume of his "History of Scotland." The great war between Russia and Japan in the Far East, where history is a-making, produced even in its earlier stages a number of tentative histories and other works of topical interest, and mostly of ephemeral value.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY

Of travel books each year produces a goodly crop, and of topographical works, too, there is a constant succession and, it might almost be said, constant improvement in the matter and in the manner of their presentation. Among these books one of the best appreciated and, perhaps, if we may venture so near to prophecy, one of those which will longest be read, is Mr. Maurice Hewlett's "The Road in Tuscany." Mr. A. H. Savage-Landor issued a fresh account of his wanderings under the title of "Gems of the East"; Major A. St. H. Gibbons gave a detailed and interesting record of a journey through "Africa from South to North"; and Dr. Sven Hedin added to his other fascinating volumes an account of "Adventures in Tibet." Mr. Archibald R. Colquhoun, turning from East to West, published a work on "Greater America"; Mr. E. G. Gardner contributed a capital volume on "Siena" to the "Mediæval Towns Series"; and, to come to our own country, Mr. E. V. Lucas published his pleasant account of wanderings about "Highways and Byways in Sussex," to the success of which reference was made in our opening paragraphs. The late Sir Walter Besant's "London in the Time of the Tudors" is an attractive miscellany of information, which increases our gratitude to the late novelist for his devotion to the London cult. A new manifestation of topographical literature—the large volume liberally illustrated with coloured pictures—was greatly strengthened during the past year: Holland, Edinburgh, Oxford, Rome, Paris, Naples, London and the Channel Islands were among the places which had new volumes of this character devoted to them.

PHILOSOPHY AND SCIENCE

When we come to the departments of science and philosophy it is a little difficult for a mere layman in these matters to pick out the most important books from a year's publishing, though on looking back over 1904 certain volumes are remembered as having something more than temporary importance, something more than a merely specialised interest. In philosophy, after the autobiographies of Herbert Spencer and Professor Bain, both of which have been referred to above, perhaps most readers would pick out Professor Caird's "Evolution of Theology in the Greek Philosophers" and Mr. R. B. Haldane's "The Pathway to Reality" as among the most notable; and in science we chiefly remember the translation by Professor J. A. Thompson of August Weissmann's "The Evolution Theory," the opening volume of Mr. J. G. Millais' magnificent work on "The Mammals of Great Britain and Ireland," Mr. Havelock Ellis' "The Study of British Genius," and Dr. C. W. Saleeby's "The Cycle of Life according to Modern Science."

FICTION

In the class of fiction—numerically and popularly the most important of the sections into which the year's publishing is divisible—we have again to record great activity in the matter of production. As has been said above, there were over two thousand five hundred works of fiction (including new editions and books for juveniles) published during the past year—or about seven for each day in the year, holidays and Sundays not excepted. Such a total includes, of course, a vast amount of rubbish which should never have been published; and, being published, serves no good purpose beyond keeping a certain number of printers, paper-makers, binders (and reviewers) at the work to which they owe their daily bread. But if among our thousands are many works of fiction of worse than indifferent quality, there is, as one who has to read much fiction is compelled to acknowledge, a distinct advance going on in the average of excellence. A reviewer who receives in these days a batch of half a dozen novels can generally count upon half or two-thirds of the number being marked by some distinctively good qualities. If there be on the whole an improvement in the matter of workmanship, there is also, as we realise on looking back over the year, an absence of any signal achievement; there is no book standing out as "the novel of 1904." The year has shown, too, further developments in the production of fiction which may be looked upon as natural consequences on the passing a few years since of the "three-decker." One such development is that of the rate of production of stories by individual novelists; where writers used to produce a novel in about two years, many of them turn out two, three, four and even more in a single year. From one who must indeed be afflicted with the pen of a ready writer we can recall at least half a dozen new books during the past twelve months! Another feature of modern fiction, brought home to us by a consideration of last year's output, is the number of novelists who have established themselves in the public favour as purveyors of fiction. These writers may owe their popularity to the most divergent qualities—even to the most divergent sections of the public: but whatever their varying values may be in literary quality, they have something which commands attention. Out of the writers who contributed to the heavy total of works of fiction there are probably fifty who may be said to have a definite standing in the public regard. The year saw new volumes from Mr. Rudyard Kipling, Mr. Stanley Weyman, Mr. Robert Hichens, Mr. Rider Haggard (two), Mr. W. D. Howells, Mr. Pett Ridge, Mr. Eden Phillpotts, Mr. W. E. Norris (two), Mr. S. R. Crockett (two), John Oliver Hobbes, Katharine Tynan (three), Mrs. Campbell Praed, Miss Braddon, Sydney C. Grier, Mr. Joseph Conrad, Mr. Quiller-Couch (two), Mr. Marion Crawford, Anthony Hope, Sir Gilbert Parker, Mr. H. G. Wells, Miss Marie Corelli, Mr. Hall Caine, Mr. Guy Boothby, Mr. Le Queux, Mr. Max Pemberton (two) and Mr. Marriott Watson (two). Each of these was represented in the year's output of fiction, and each of these may be said, in the cant phrase of the day, to "have a public." Nor is the list by any means exhaustive. Then, too, there were posthumous works of George Gissing, H. S. Merriman, Maclaren Cobban and B. L. Farjeon. Despite the fact that we had novels from all these and more established favourites, as well as from a host of fresh candidates for the novelist's laurels or popularity, it is not possible to pick out any specially dominating novel from the crowd. The writers named gave, for the most part, such stories as they have accustomed us to, but did not touch any new heights. The late Mr. George Gissing's "Veranilda," it is true, contrasted strongly with his earlier work; and although some readers thought it his finest achievement, the opinion was by no means general. Mr. Robert Hichens' "The Garden of Allah" was perhaps one of the most memorable of the year's novels and Miss Elizabeth Robins' "The Magnetic North"—a remarkably virile piece of work—was another; while others that stand out in memory somewhat above the rest are Mr. Conrad's "Nostromo" and Mr. Hewlett's "The Queen's Quair." Among writers who followed up initial successes were Mrs. Katherine Cecil Thurston and Mr. Vincent Brown; but good as are "John Chilcote, M.P." and "The Dark Ship," they have not altogether satisfied the anticipations raised by "The Circle" and "A Magdalen's Husband."

NEW EDITIONS

Although in a hurried survey of some of the more notable of the books of the year we are chiefly concerned with the new, a word should perhaps be said for the reissues of the old; and here 1904 gave us much that is admirable, including the first portions of Mrs. Paget Toynbee's edition of "Walpole's Letters," of Mr. Austin Dobson's "Diary of Mme. d'Arblay," of Mr. A. H. Bullen's "Works of Beaumont and Fletcher," of a new "Hakluyt's Voyages" and of a new "Library Edition" of the works of Thomas Carlyle; it gave us the collected poems of Mr. Swinburne and of Christina Rossetti, the completion of Messrs. Waller and Glover's "Hazlitt's Works," and of the newly arranged "England's Garner," further portions of the fine "Library Edition" of Ruskin's works and the reissue of Canon Ainger's "Letters of Charles Lamb."

Reviews

THE EXPANSION OF CHRISTIANITY IN THE FIRST THREE CENTURIES

Vol. I. By Adolph Harnack. Translated and edited by James Moffatt, D.D. Theological Translation Library, Vol. XIX. (Williams & Norgate, 10s. 6d.)

NOTES ON POPULAR RATIONALISM

By Canon H. Hensley Henson, B.D. (Isbister, 3s. 6d.)

THE EPISTLE TO THE EPHESIANS

By Joseph Parker, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.)

SERMONS ADDRESSED TO INDIVIDUALS

By R. J. Campbell, M.A. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.)

EXPOSITIONS OF HOLY SCRIPTURE—THE BOOK OF GENESIS

By Alexander Maclaren, D.D. (Hodder & Stoughton, 7s. 6d.)

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF ST. BONIFACE

By James M. Williamson, M.D. (Frowde, 5s.)

PRAYERS AND MEDITATIONS BY SAMUEL JOHNSON

With Notes and Introduction by the Rev. H. Higgins and Preface by Augustine Birrell. (Elliot Stock, 5s. net.)

THE consignments of the theological publishers are an ever-recurring reminder of the fact that, in an admirable sense, this is a country of free thought. Moreover, these consignments furnish testimony to the interest taken by learned and half-learned alike in the discussion of subjects that group themselves in critical, exegetical and ascetical knots about the central facts of spiritual experience. It would be difficult to say whether to the majority of readers the first of the present group of books would appeal as apologetic or subversive. Certainly by the apologists of Christianity, as a supernatural revelation, the very fact that, fighting as it would seem against heavy odds, it conquered the world, has been cited as irrefragable evidence of its divine origin. And, indeed, they are well within their right in demanding of those who would place the Christian religion on a level, so far as its authority is concerned, with such forms of thought as have grown out of man's native religious sense, as a natural product of natural causes, an answer to it. Such an answer, in this volume, Dr. Harnack endeavours to furnish. He begins by frankly setting aside, as worthless, the received legends of the apostolic mission, and steadily presupposes, as he says, the results gained by critical investigation of the sources. The literary sources, fragmentary as they are, are more copious than those available for reconstituting the history of any other religion known within the Roman Empire; and Harnack claims for them that they actually suffice for a coherent sketch of the mission and expansion of Christianity, and thus enable us to understand why and how the victory was won. Briefly, the solution is to be found in the syncretistic character of Christianity—the religion that mastered and appropriated to its own ends every force and every relation in its environment. The ground was fertilised for it by its rivals. It laughed at the barriers of nationality; it embodied all popular elements save one, privative in its essence, namely, the nationalism of the Jews. Such, according to Harnack, are the reasons for the triumph of Christianity in the first ages; and these he elaborates with the wealth of illustration and the abundance of particular knowledge which we expect of his vast learning. But they will not suffice for its future. Its future depends on its capacity "to strip off once more any collective syncretism and unite itself to fresh coefficients." Dr. Moffatt's translation is excellent.

That any mind should be so limited as to suppose that by any, even an infinite, science of the processes of nature it is possible to advance to a science of the first cause is almost incredible. But if, or since, it is necessary to point out the impassable limits of natural science, it is well that it should be so well and clearly done as by Canon Hensley Henson in his "Notes on Popular Rationalism." There can be no doubt that at the present day religion is sorely hampered by the mythical cosmogony which, even to the days of our grandfathers' childhood, it knew no better than to present to the world as primitive history. The popular mind, suddenly aware of the unhistoric character of Genesis, is apt to jump in its clumsy way to wildly impossible conclusions, while it disregards as the mere evasions of interested persons the warnings (which, in fact, are to be found implicit in the writings of the great scientists from Darwin downwards) addressed to them by religion's apologists. What may be the good motives of the persons who are at pains to place such books as "The Riddle of the Universe" in the hands of the vulgar we find it impossible to imagine; but we are glad to recognise that a serious effort is now being made in more directions than one to counterbalance the mischief, and we welcome Canon Henson's book accordingly.

Our list comprises books by the late pastor of the City Temple and his successor. Both of them are highly characteristic. Dr. Parker's book on the Epistle to the Ephesians is the output of a vigorous and original mind. Its scholarship is naïve enough, but whatever Dr. Parker knew, he knew to some purpose. You may open it where you will and always you will find something to arrest attention. For "We are his workmanship" (we have reopened the book strictly at random) he suggests: "We are God's poems." "He makes us now in this measure now in that measure," he meditates; "now sublime, now more friendly and approachable, but always pregnant with thought and love and music and mercy." A good thought. And in the midst of most serious and tender utterances crops out that irresponsible humour that was famous. Who else in the world would have thought of remarking that Moses did not meet the burning bush by appointment? Dr. Campbell's collection of sermons is the outcome of his experiences in the confessional. Each of them is addressed to some conscience that has sought his direction. He is very unlike Dr. Parker in his methods. Certainly he is not humorous. But he is probably a man of more humane culture; he has wide sympathies and real insight into worldly souls, a feeling for the right word and a vein of poetry. "The Death-Song of Jesus" is a meditation on the final episode of the Last Supper that no one who heard it would be likely wholly to forget. And it was delivered, one can verily believe, by one who (to quote a phrase), looking into the face of that congregation, was conscious of a deep respect for the souls that looked back at the preacher out of its eyes. That is the temperament of the right preacher.

Dr. Maclaren's "Expositions" are of another type; they are fashioned on the model of an earlier day. They are ponderous and, it must be confessed, not a little dull. You might chance to hear, we suppose, in the humblest of conventicles, a discourse on the tragedy of man's first disobedience that should move you more, despite even more dubious grammar, than such an utterance as this: "'There is no harm in it' steals into some young man's or woman's mind about things that were forbidden at home, and they are half conquered before they know they have been attacked." So very true; but, at the same time, how unrefreshing.

Dr. Williamson gives us, in a sufficiently readable and popular manner, the life of the Englishman who, in the turmoil of the eighth century, was raised by fortune and his own merits to the primacy of the Church in Germany. The book is adorned with illustrations of his tomb and memorials at Mayence and at the monastery of Fulda, built by him, which was destined also to be the resting-place of his body, and in after ages to become a place of pilgrimage. His career is a remarkable evidence of the close intercommunion between distant lands which, in a primitive age, the missionary spirit contrived; and it is good that, even now, his faded memory should be thus sympathetically revived among his countrymen. For to them his name has long been, for the most part, but a meaningless word in the calendar. He lived the life of an apostle, and died, among the heathen Frisians, the death of a martyr. No memorial of him exists in his English birthplace.

but that at Fulda his memory is still green is testified by a fine statue erected in the last century.

"In these Prayers and Meditations" of Dr. Johnson, writes Mr. Birrell in his short preface, "the reader is admitted, let him not abuse his opportunity, into the innermost sanctuary of a soul." The warning is not superfluous; it would be easy to smile at these reiterated solemn resolutions to get up early in the morning and these recurring confessions of failure. But to Carlyle, Samuel Johnson "in the era of Voltaire purifying and fortifying his soul, and holding real communion with the Highest, was a thing to be looked at with pity, admiration and awe." It is with some such sentiment that we also for our part read these gloomy, mystic, yet obstinately rational and sober, outpourings of a great and troubled spirit. Thanks are due to the publishers for the suitable dignity of the printed page.

MY LITERARY LIFE

By Madame Edmond Adam (Juliette Lamber). (T. Fisher Unwin, 8s. 6d. net.)

THIS is the second portion of the memoirs of a woman who perhaps beyond all others has kept alive the Gallic tradition of spirituality, wit and culture, and has transmitted to our days not a little of the keen literary atmosphere of Paris during the Empire. Madame Adam had exceptional opportunities of meeting practically all the interesting folk, political, literary, musical and artistic, from the sixties to the present day; and, being gifted with an extraordinarily retentive memory and a quite exceptional skill in reproducing actual conversations, she has given us in this most interesting book lifelike sketches of extremely fascinating personalities.

We meet here with George Sand, Edmond About, Gustave Flaubert, Jules Simon, Prosper Mérimée, Ste-Beuve, Béranger, Gounod, Liszt and, above all others, that wonderful woman Madame d'Agoult, who, more than any one else, helped to shape and form the at first somewhat hazy ideas of the writer of these memoirs. With an artistic cunning which is as rare as it is admirable, Madame Adam has fashioned her recollections into a form which has all the fascination of a novel combined with the alluring veracity of a series of pictures of real men and women. Her own life-story, romantic enough in itself, is subordinated to the relation of the life-stories of those about her who helped to make the history—political, social and artistic—of the time. As a result the most brilliant epoch of Parisian intellectual activity is described from the inside with tact and discretion, and moreover with a literary ability which is as charming as it is unique.

Madame Adam's introduction to Meyerbeer; her impressions of Wagner when he first dawned on Paris; her remarks about Madame d'Agoult's daughters Cosima and Blandine, who married respectively Hans von Bülow and Emile Ollivier; her confirmation of the generally understood report that Gounod sold "Faust" to Chondans for ten thousand francs; her comparison between Berlioz and Wagner: "The only revenge that Berlioz took of his non-success was to make the Parisians admire the old masters such as Gluck, from whose genius he drew his inspiration, whereas Wagner, amid his greatest triumphs, was jealous of the smallest success of others"—all these and a thousand other touches of actuality go to make up an entirely delightful record of real men and women, told, too, with that inimitable charm which would seem to be denied to all save to the most cultured of Frenchwomen.

The story of the founding of Madame Adam's celebrated salon, which for many years was such an important factor in French politics and literature, especially the latter, concludes with Daniel Stern's (Madame D'Agoult) remark: "My dream for you, little Juliette, is that you should have a salon, quite small, very select, with the traditions of mine," and there follow a dozen succinct suggestions as to how a salon should be founded and worthily maintained.

Altogether this is a most delightful, inspiring and informative book, worth all the recent volumes of memoirs put together: the translation is quite excellent; in fact, it does not read like a translation at all.

FRANK SCHLOESSER.

THE ART OF THE LOUVRE

By Mary Knight Potter. (Bell. 6s. net.)

NO one of the great collections of pictures in the capitals of Europe has had a more chequered life-story than that of the Louvre, which, after weathering many storms, escaped as by a miracle from destruction, when the Palace of the Tuileries was burnt by the Commune in 1871. Founded as long ago as the time of François I., though the actual date of its origin is unknown, the building containing so many priceless heirlooms has from first to last shared the vicissitudes of Paris; and in spite of all the changes that have taken place in its appearance under different régimes, it still remains one of the most important examples of French Renaissance architecture that have been preserved.

Although the title of Miss Potter's new work is somewhat misleading, for she deals in it only with the oil paintings in the Louvre, her book is complete so far as it goes, and will be found useful not only by the visitors to the famous galleries, but also by all students of art history, as she fully makes good her claim that "the Louvre is the first museum of the world, possessing an unrivalled collection of representative and noble works of almost all great painters of all time," though she admits that other collections may own individual treasures more valuable than any there. She prefaces her examination of the various schools represented by an interesting summary of the history of the Louvre itself and of the gradual acquisition of its unique series of pictures, whilst into her account of them she has woven all the most recently acquired information concerning the lives of their authors. Avoiding as far as possible the expression of personal opinion on disputed points, this conscientious author enables her readers to compare for themselves the criticisms of acknowledged experts by quoting, without comment, their actual words, but at the same time she has not refrained from allowing her own special predilections for this or that master to give colour and individuality to her work. It is easy, for instance, to recognise how great is her love for Fra Angelico, the painter-monk whose works, she says, are the veritable prayers of his devout spirit; and she betrays with delightful naïveté the fact that she does not really endorse the adulation of Botticelli that is now the fashion. To her the much exploited master is a bit of a poseur, and she finds in the majority of his pictures "a certain sort of artificiality—a fascinating, sensuous, appealing artificiality, doubtless, she adds, but the forced unreal note is nevertheless nearly always there." For Luini, too, Miss Potter has a great affection; his sweetness, she says, is "never cloying, for it is backed up by vigorous if smooth modelling, by judicious colour, by skilful lighting"; and her remarks on Andrea del Sarto are full of true recognition of his peculiar excellences. Perhaps one of the best chapters in the book, however, is that on the Dutch masters, whose technical excellences are well defined, whilst their wonderful humour is evidently keenly appreciated. The concluding chapters on the French schools dealing with the wonderfully complete collections in the Salle des Etats and in the recently opened Thomy-Thiery rooms give completeness to a work representing a very considerable amount of research and that is thoroughly up-to-date. The numerous illustrations are well reproduced and fairly representative as a whole, but it seems a pity that the far from pleasing example of Ter Borch was not replaced by the more characteristic "Music Lesson." Another slight drawback is Miss Potter's habit of cutting short the names of artists. To speak as she does of "Champagne" and "Veronese" is, to say the least, undignified, and there is something almost comic in her remark that the Louvre has twenty Champaignes, and in her assertion that "Champagne Poussinized his own religious pictures."

NANCY BELL.

THE RAT

By G. M. A Hewett.

E DOG

By G. E. Mitten. (Black, 6s. each.)

It is well known that comparisons are odious, yet such is the depraved bent of our mind that we sigh for the pen of Ernest Seton-Thompson or Richard Jefferies in reading these books. We do not mean that they are not well done, but that they might have been so much better. The book on the rat is the better of the two. It does give us a glimpse into the ways of rat-land, its manners and peculiarities. The book on the dog deals too much with one particular dog and his fortunes, and might almost pass as an entirely fictional tale. The human element is bound to enter more strongly in the autobiography of a dog than in that of a rat; but surely it would have been possible to shed more side-lights on the dog's nature and habits, as well as to record the particular sensations and supposed comings and goings of a particular dog. Judged by his frontispiece portrait he was a very delightful dog indeed, and the reader soon feels an interest in him and his fortunes; but is this the aim of the series? The little sketch of Miss Louisa Sykes, the London slavey who was Louie in the morning when about her work and Miss Sykes in the afternoon when she was dressed, is amusing enough, but is it not matter in the wrong place? The coloured illustrations to both books are good, more particularly those of Stephen Baghot de la Bere, who, we think, deserves mention on the title-page.

Short Notices

THE WORKING MEN'S COLLEGE, 1854-1904:

Records of its History and its Work, by Members of the College. Edited by the Rev. J. Llewelyn Davies. (Macmillan, 4s. net.) It is impossible to ignore the Working Men's College as an important factor in the sociological evolution of the past half-century, and as this year celebrates the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation it is only fit and proper that the five still living founders should collaborate (with others) in this little memorial volume, tracing the history and development of the College. The Editor writes on F. D. Maurice, to whom, as is well known, the inception of the work was due. Messrs. J. M. Ludlow, J. Westlake, Lowes Dickinson, J. P. Elmslie, F. J. Furnivall, J. Roebuck, J. A. Forster, C. P. Lucas, Lord Avebury, A. V. Dicey (Principal), and L. Jacob (Vice-Principal) contribute interesting chapters illustrating the progress, the influence, and the early troubles of an institution which from small and tentative beginnings has now assumed its proper place as a model institution of its kind, with a history of difficulties overcome and prejudices over-borne which entitle it to something more than common consideration. The value of the book is enhanced by some excellent portraits; but it lacks an index.

AMERICA.

By John Kelly. ("Round the World." Jack, 1s. 6d.) Schoolmasters all over the country will welcome this very handy and concise little text-book. Children will find it attractive and be led to take a greater interest in their geography lessons. It has numerous illustrations, diagrams and maps. Some of the coloured pictures are perhaps over-brilliant and too wonderful, as, for example, the picture of the Rockies. Certainly it is a marvellous region, but hardly so startling as this would lead a child to suppose. This, however, is a very small and harmless grumble at what is a trustworthy and handy book.

DICTIONARY OF BATTLES.

By T. B. Harbottle. (Sonnenschein, 7s. 6d.) This volume constitutes the latest addition to Sonnenschein's excellent series of dictionaries of quotations. It contains a short summary of every battle of importance that has been fought in the history of the world "from the earliest date down to the present time." Its modernity, may be gauged from the fact that it possesses descriptions of many of the important battles of the Russo-Japanese War that took place early last year. Indeed, on the whole, the more modern battles are more efficiently dealt with than the ancient, and we look in vain for any mention of the wars of the ancient Egyptians, Assyrians and Israelites. With this exception the book is adequate. The battles are alphabetically arranged, though by a slight error the battle of Wargoom is inserted in the wrong place. The index is excellent.

Reprints and New Editions

A new reprint or, rather, edition of Coleridge's poems is the event of the week. It deserves a warm welcome, coming as it does under such able editorship as Mr. William Knight's and in such a tasteful and artistic garb (Thin Paper Classics, Newnes, 3s. 6d.). This series is doing noteworthy work, and often before have I had occasion to praise it. Mr. Knight, in a singularly modest preface, leaves it for future editors and critics to decide whether the emendation of text, punctuation, &c., that he gives is the best for posterity. It seems to me that Mr. Knight has done an excellent piece of work, and I feel certain many will agree with me. The book contains all the poems and dramatic work published by Coleridge during his lifetime. Those poems which appeared for the first time in Mr. Dykes Campbell's edition remain the copyright of the Coleridge family. Coleridge's own notes, printed in his lifetime, are given, as well as a few by the editor. As regards the dates when many of the poems were written, Mr. Knight finds that "Coleridge's own statements as to the date of the composition of his verses—especially his juvenile ones—are not always trustworthy. He erred in this respect more than Wordsworth did. His memory often failed him, and in writing familiar letters he sometimes gave a date at random, assigning a different one in corresponding with different people."—Three remarkably cheap volumes published this week are THE POETS AND THE POETRY OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY (Routledge, 1s. 6d. each net). They each contain a frontispiece portrait, and give us no mean selections from each poet's work. Indeed, it is marvellous value for the money. The volumes commence with George Crabbe, who is represented by such poems as "The Village," "The Hall of Justice," "The Parish Register," and "The Borough." A concise introduction prefaces each poet, so that the student of these three volumes may well claim a nodding acquaintance with the poets of the nineteenth century. Shall we have so many poets and so fine a collection of poems when the toll of the twentieth century shall be taken?—A small but admirably printed volume is sent me by Mr. Froude—Mrs. Browning's CASA GUIDI WINDOWS AND OTHER POEMS (Oxford Miniature Poets, Froude, from 3s. 6d.). The poems are printed on Oxford India paper, and a frontispiece portrait of the author is given.—Pepysians who are renewing their acquaintance with the DIARY in Messrs. Bell's reprint will be glad to hear that volumes three and four are now ready (5s. net each). In looking through the volumes, reading here and there a paragraph, one cannot but marvel anew at the extraordinary minuteness of the record. I have already expressed my admiration of this admirable edition, which indeed can never be bettered.—Another addition to the Illustrated Pocket Library of Plain and Coloured Books—THE ADVENTURES OF A POST CAPTAIN, by a Naval Officer (Methuen, 3s. 6d. net). The long inscription to the British Navy, it may be remembered, runs as follows: "May no Neglect mildew its Energies! May no Mishap dim the lustre of its Fame! Swift as the Gales which impel and firm as the Rocks which shelter it may its Glory and its History go hand in hand to remotest Times, the Terror of the Enemies and the Admiration of the Children of the Favoured Isle which gave it existence." The plates are very quaint and amusing; one picture, representing a seething bright green sea with a boatful of sailors in peacock-blue uniforms and tall hats, each rowing for his life, is well worth seeing. The poetry is of no very high order—

"Poor Mizen, though no melting lubber,
Spite of himself began to blubber,
And whimpered out his honest wishes
That Bowsprit yet might cheat the fishes."

—A pleasant little reprint is WUTHERING HEIGHTS (New Century Library, Nelson, 2s., 2s. 6d. and 3s. net). It also contains AGNES GREY and various poems by the Brontë sisters. A neat and workmanlike series. Those who have purchased the previous Brontë volumes have now a very presentable collection.—Fenimore Cooper's THE PATH-FINDER, with Brock's illustrations, has been sent me by Messrs. Macmillan (2s. net). It was indeed no light task "to introduce the same characters in four separate works and to maintain the peculiarities that are indispensable to identity," but Fenimore Cooper did it successfully, as all boys will testify. The fashion for underrating this writer's gifts is now happily becoming old-fashioned.—WESTWARD HO! again is reprinted by the same publishers, at the same price.—I was interested to receive a letter recently from a ten-year-old correspondent anent my remarks on Kingsley's "Water Babies," in which she assured me that my lack of appreciation is not shared by at least twenty-two little girls in Edinburgh, who "like the 'Water Babies' very much." After all, the best critic of children's books is the child himself, and very often the story that most delights the "grown-up" falls flat upon his ears. It is especially so, I think, with humorous books: the sense of humour is different in a critic of mature years from what it is in one of ten. The spirit of adventure, very rampant indeed in extreme youth, often lies dormant yet unchanged in the adult breast, but we outgrow the childish joke and marvel at it from afar. How very few of us can really keep in touch with the child mind.

F. T.-S.

New Books Received

Theological and Biblical

- Spurgeon, C. H., Sermons (Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit), Vol. L. (Passmore & Alabaster), 7/0.
Thomas, W. H. G., The Catholic Faith (Hodder & Stoughton), 1/0 and 2/0 net.
Davidson, the Rev. J., St. Peter and his Training (Dent), 0/9 net.

Poetry, Criticism, Drama, and Belles-Lettres

- Cecil, K. H. D., The Historical Tragedy of Nero (Kegan Paul), 3/6 net.
MacSweeney, P. M. (edited and translated), Martial Career of Conghal Cláiringheach (Irish Texts Society: Nutt), 10/6 net.
Japp, Dr. A. H., Robert Louis Stevenson (Laurie), 6/0 net.
Squire, C., The Mythology of the British Islands: an introduction to Celtic Myth, Legend, Poetry, and Romance (Blackie), 12/6 net.
Scott, Mary, A Robin's Song and Other Verses (Constable), 2/6 net.

History and Biography

- Rhodes, J. F., History of the United States from the Compromise of 1850, Vol. V. (Macmillan), 12/0.
Pingaud, L. (translated by C. W. W.), Saint Peter Fourier (Duckworth), 3/0.
Mitchell, S. W., The Youth of Washington (Unwin), 6/0.
Bear, Don Philip O'Sullivan, Ireland under Elizabeth (translated by M. J. Byrne), Sealy, Bryers.

Science

- Ball, Sir Robert S., A Popular Guide to the Heavens: a series of Eighty-Three Plates, with explanatory Text and Index (Philip), 15/0 net.

Educational

- Duruy, V., A General History of the World (translated from the French and revised by E. A. Grosvenor) (Dean), 8/6 net.
Bulfinch, T., Legends of Charlemagne, The Age of Fable, and The Age of Chivalry, 3 vols. (Dean), 2/6 net each.
Seckler, E. F., German Reader for Technical Schools (Blackwood), 2/0.
The Schoolmasters' Year-Book and Directory, 1905 (Sonnenschein), 5/0 net.
The Public Schools Year-Book (Sonnenschein), 2/6.
Noteutt, H. C. (edited), The State of England in 1685 (the Third Chapter of Macaulay's History) (Blackie), 2/0.
Chaytor, the Rev. H. J. (edited), Select Tales of Hans Christian Andersen (Blackie), 2/0.
Barbé, L. A. (selected and edited), A Book of French Songs (Blackie), 0/6.
Horton, H. H. (edited), Gérard de Nerval's Oriental Scenes (Blackie), 0/4.
Brigstocke, W. O. (edited), Legouvé's Jacques L'Aveugle and Mémée's L'Enlèvement de la Redoute; and Bourget's Récits de Guerre (Blackie), 0/4 each.
Preston, H. W. (edited), Daudet's La Dernière Classe (Blackie), 0/4.
Rooper, W. L., Little Tales for Little Folk: Nora's Dark Look, Honest Dolly, Fred's Run, Patty's Walk, and Ella's Fall (Blackie), 0/1 each.
Burrows, R. M., and Walters, W. C. F., Florilegium Tironis Græcum (Macmillan), 4/6.
Perry, C. C., and Reum, Dr. A., New French Course for Schools, Part I. (Macmillan), 1/6.
Graham, J., and Oliver, G. A. S., Spanish Commercial Practice, Part I.; French Commercial Practice, Part I.; German Commercial Practice, Part I. (Macmillan), 2/6 each.
Dexter and Garlick, Senior Arithmetic for Schools and Colleges (Longmans), 4/6.
Winch, W. H., Notes on German Schools (Longmans), 6/0.
Sprague, W. H., Latin Course, Part III. (Longmans), 3/0.
Wickham, E. C. (edited), Horace, Vol. I. (Oxford Press), 6/0.
Ramsey, G. G., Exercises in Latin Prose, with Vocabulary, Parts I., II. (1/6 each), and III. 2/6 (Oxford Press).
Barnard and Child, A New Geometry for Schools (4/6), A New Geometry for Junior Forms (2/6), and A New Geometry for Senior Forms (Macmillan), 3/6.
Hall and Stevens, Elementary Course of Mathematics (2/6), and A School of Geometry, Parts I.-VI. (Macmillan), 4/6.
Eggar, W. D., Practical Exercises in Geometry (Macmillan), 2/6.
Allcock, C. H., Theoretical Geometry for Beginners, Parts I., II., III. and IV. (Macmillan), 1/6 each.
Foster and Dobbs, Practical Geometry for Beginners (Macmillan), 2/6.
Gibson, G. A., An Introduction to the Calculus, and An Elementary Treatise on Graphs (Macmillan), 3/6 each.
Loney, S. L., The Elements of Trigonometry (Cambridge Press), 3/6.
Beasley, H. R., The Book of Notable Days (Jack), 0/8.
Paton, J. L., English Public Schools (Bournville: Saint George Press), 0/6 net.
Webster, A. C., The Dynamics of Particles and of Rigid, Elastic, and Fluid Bodies (Leipzig: Teubner), 14m.
Rip Van Winkle, and Rab and his Friends and Our Dogs (Jack), 0/3 each.

Miscellaneous

- Mottos and Badges (Routledge), 1/0 net.
Who Wrote That? (Routledge), 1/0 net.
Latham, E., A Dictionary of Abbreviations (Routledge), 1/0 net.
Heilprin, Angelo, The Tower of Pelée (Lippincott).
Jacberns, R., Sunday Talks with Girls (Brown, Langham), 2/6 net.
Fenn, F., and Wyllie, B., Old English Furniture (Newnes), 7/6 net.
Knowles, W. P., Dutch Pottery and Porcelain (Newnes), 7/6 net.
History of the Library of Congress, Vol. I.: A. L. A. Catalog, 1904; Select List of Books relating to the Far East; Check List of Large Scale Maps published by Foreign Governments; Lists of Books on Banks and Banking, Immigration, and Railroads (Washington: Government Printing Office).
Home, B. J., Old Houses in Edinburgh, Part I. (Hay), 1/0 net.

Reprints and New Editions

- Eliot, G., The Mill on the Floss (Blackie), 2/6.
Lever, C., Tom Burke of "Ours" (Blackie), 2/6.
Wiss, M., The Swiss Family Robinson (Blackie), 2/0.
Shakespeare, The Tempest (Blackie), 1/0 and 1/6 net.
Stormonth, the Rev. J., Dictionary of the English Language (Blackwood), 5/0 net.
Brontës, The, Wuthering Heights, Agnes Grey, and Poems (New Century Library), 1 vol. (Nelson), 2/0 net.
Coleridge, S. T., Poems and Dramatic Works (Newnes), 3/6 net.
Tebb, Wm., and Vollum, Col. E. P., M.D., Premature Burial (Sonnenschein), 6/0.
Ealand, F., Sermons from Browning (Brown, Langham), 2/6 net.
The Muses' Library: The Poems of Edmund Waller, 2 vols.; William Browne, 2 vols.; Henry Vaughan, 2 vols.; John Keats, 2 vols.; John Gay, 2 vols.; John Donne, 2 vols.; William Drummond, 2 vols.; Samuel Taylor Coleridge; Thomas Carew; Andrew Marvel; and Satires of Andrew Marvel (Routledge), 1/0 net each.
Seneca, a Selection, by H. C. Sidley (Bell), 1/0 net.

Fiction

- Bennett, Arnold, "Tales of the Five Towns" (Chatto & Windus), 6/0; A. E., "The Mask of Apollo" (Dublin: Whaley), 2/6 net; Lucas, St. John, "Aubrey Ellison" (Brown, Langham), 6/0; Barr, Amelia, "The Song of a Single Note" (Unwin), 6/0; Farrow, G. E., "The Food of the Dogs" (Brimley Johnson), 1/0 net; Harris, J. C., "A Little Union Scout" (Duckworth), 3/6.

Periodicals, &c.

- "Samhain," "Arts and Crafts," "Architectural Review," "Geographical Journal," "School World," "Hibbert Journal," "Field Naturalists' Quarterly," "Musical Home Journal," "All the World," "Animals' Friend," "The Reliquary," "The Bookman," "Dana," "Faraday House Journal," "The Author," "Collector's Magazine," "Westminster Review," "Readers' Index," "Current Literature."

Booksellers' Catalogues

- Messrs. Hatchards (Books of To-day and To-morrow), 187 Piccadilly; Mr. James Miles (General), Leeds; Mr. Henry Gray (International Bulletin), Goldsmiths' Estate, East Acton.

My Book of Memory

A good friend has written, asking me various questions concerning my ideal of a book-room. For an ordinary man such as myself a library, either in the sense of a large number of books or of a room devoted entirely to them, is unfortunately a dream which can never be fulfilled. I am compelled to be content with a very modest collection of volumes and to bestow these upon shelves wherever I can find room for such accommodation. And I take it that this is the lot of the average book-lover. I am asked, do I love "a large or small room, morning or afternoon sun, or a clear north light?" To most of which my replies must perforce be unsatisfactory. Whether my book-room be large or small, alas! is not with me a matter of choice; it must be small; in fact, it is my sitting-room, the room in which I live when not abed, and there I like to have around me the friends who make life worth the living. But there is not space for all of them in this room, so some unfortunates are banished to outer passages and others reside in my dressing-room, receiving at least a friendly nod of a morning and at night. My personal taste shudders at a room built for books; books belong to the daily life and should grow up around one, just as should all the household gods—pictures, furniture, small treasures of every kind. It is for this reason that I have never felt quite at home in any of the new public libraries which it has been my chance to visit: they are so spick, span and business-like; they are warehouses for the storage of books, not homes. A friend once said to me that he would not mind being burnt out, for that then he would be able to purchase everything anew, books and all. The idea made me shiver, for I knew how unhappy I should be if by any ill fortune my books were to be destroyed. Had I the wealth of Cræsus I could not replace them. I have picked them up by ones, by twos, by threes; I have slowly gathered my friends around me, and in exchange for them I would not accept a blank cheque which would bring me twice the number of books that I now own. No; I do not want a book-room, but I do desire to have books in each of my rooms and many in that one which I mostly use. As for light, what care I from what point of the compass it may come so long that there be sufficient by which to read? And living in London, East and West do not, at any rate in the winter months, make much of a difference; we so seldom see the sun's jolly red face; his light is filtered through mists and grey clouds.

Then "do I favour open shelves or glass doors?" The last I abominate. A cupboard for books is a prison-house, a musty, fusty cell in which I should be ashamed to lock up my good comrades, as if I were ashamed to have them hear all I said of them or as if they were mere curios that I kept because they were rare. As for the dust, if I am worthy of my books, little dust will accumulate upon their heads: if I am unworthy, keeping them fast shut in a glass house will not remedy matters. No, the open shelf for me! Then, "do I like my room away from wife, children and servants?" All that I ask for is that it shall be away from those who love not my books as dearly as I do myself, away from all the merely curious, away from such as do not treat books with reverence and respect! Many are there who do not. No more than myself should my books be hidden away from those I love and trust. Then, "Do I like a coal fire or a gas fire?" The question hurts me to the soul; a gas fire in the same room as my loved volumes, to crack their backs and dry the blood out of them? No, never! Rather would I shiver in their midst than so insult them. For lights, candles of wax if one can afford them, set in silver candlesticks; no other illumination is so kindly and so mellow. The next best I hold is the electric light; it is clean and convenient and has a certain shininess in it. Indeed, I know a man who, upon dull mornings when the skies frown, turns on the electric light, breakfasts beneath it and swears that it is as good to him as sunshine. But he may be jesting.

After all said, is not the housing of our books a matter of personal taste, qualified by the power or impotence of our purses? You may like this and I that method; and there an end, there can be no ground for quarrel and little for debate. As I have said, I like my various bookcases—no two alike—not so much for any value or beauty they may have, but because I have acquired them one by one as my need called for them, and because they are old cronies. I sometimes fancy that they love the books they hold as much as I do myself, and that sometimes I cause a pang of regret when I move a volume from one bookcase to another.

Yet, dreamer that I am, I have an ideal, one with the great merit that an ideal it must always be. I have dreamed that by some good fortune I have gone to live at Oxford, and that there—overlooking an ancient college garden which shall be nameless—I am living in an ancient house, unspoiled by the hands of any vandal decorator. There, in a long, low room, with uneven floor, wainscoted walls, beamed ceiling and open hearth, I chiefly pass my days; the polished floor is relieved by a few thick rugs; the furniture is of old-time fashion, substantial, shapely, comfortable; round the whole room run low bookcases, some four feet high, upon the shelves of which rest my old familiar friends; there is a lattice window with deep window-seat, red curtains and pots of flowers. What a cosy room; cool and shady in the summer days, warm and shadowy of winter nights. Could the soul of bookman ask for more? But the days of fairies who grant to us our dearest wishes seem to be gone, and this wish of mine must, I fear, remain for ever unfulfilled. Such a room does not appeal to you? Well, it is not yours, or, if it be, prithee exchange it for mine own. But though you like not my chamber, you would be welcome in it, and you be a true bookman, one who loves books, not merely reads them. And therein you and I would sit, discussing our friends and, maybe, a glass or two of sound Oxford port. Wine; some day a connoisseur will write for us a learned and delightful treatise upon wine and books: for of a surety there be certain liquors which should be drunk when reading certain books, as, for example, canary sack with Master Shakespeare; a glass of cyder—though cyder be no wine—with the Reverend Mr. Herrick; a bottle of port with Mr. Henry Fielding; (a dish of tea with Dr. J n); Bordeaux with Mr. Sheridan; a glass of sherry with Miss Jane Austen; a bottle of Rhenish with Mr. Thackeray; and a bottle of ale—or should it be a brimmer of toddy?—with Mr. Dickens. But, here I go: I set out to write of realities and I prose of dreams: of the housing of books and I chatter about the drinking of wine. Verily I am a vagabondish-minded fellow, and I love rambling.

E. G. O.

American Copyright Reform

MR. DOUGLAS SLADEN has initiated a timely discussion upon the reform of American Copyright in the columns of "The Standard."

The support he has received from such well-known people as Lord Avebury, Mr. Hall Caine, Sir A. Conan Doyle, Miss Beatrice Harraden, Mr. Rider Haggard, Mr. F. Anstey Guthrie, Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. John Murray, Sir Lewis Morris, Mr. Rowland Prothero and many others is enough to prove the lively interest which the question excites in its present somewhat peculiar phase. It may be frankly stated that there is nothing very alarming about the projected amendment of the American law, giving, as it will, if and when it becomes law, writers in a foreign tongue a year's grace in which to have their works translated into English and to protect their copyright. The truth is that the American Copyright Act—which, with all its imperfections, has conferred very solid benefits upon a large number of British authors—has remained a dead letter so far as foreign writers are concerned. The obligation to print and publish simultaneously with the country of origin has proved prohibitive in an immense number of cases, while in others it has only been discharged at the cost of enormous delay and practical inconvenience. The suggested amendment, which came over in draft form in January 1904, will be nothing but a tardy act of justice if, which seems unfortunately to be extremely doubtful, it becomes law. The Platt Bill of 1902, upon which it is founded, was shelved.

As regards English writers it seems wise to consider, before we advocate retaliation, whether the half loaf they now possess is not better than no bread at all. It is now perfectly possible to obtain a good American copyright, provided the work in question is simultaneously published with the English edition from type set within the United States. Now simultaneity is not an American invention. It is a cardinal principle of English law that prior publication outside of the countries within the Berne Convention is fatal to the acquisition of a sound English copyright. If, therefore, we wish to attack the principle of simultaneity, we must first amend our own law and give to America the same close time we demand for ourselves. It would enormously strengthen our case if we came with open hands and said: "We will give you a month, or six months, or twelve months, if you will reciprocate this civility." This would be far better than to attempt to bring about a change by "calling names."

The manufacturing clause is, no doubt, annoying, but it arises out of tariff policy, and not merely from the "cussedness" of the Typographical Union. During a visit to the United States, when I saw several of the many earnest and high-minded American copyright reformers, who set an example we should do well to emulate, nothing impressed me so much as the utter hopelessness of attacking a principle which would raise far wider issues than are apparent on the surface. I do not believe that any American authors or publishers would object to the immediate repeal of the clause, but I am confident that no movement for its rescission is likely to receive much support either in the House of Representatives or the Senate. The Dayton Bill of 1901, which rescinded it, met with a short shrift. Considered as a part of the domestic law of the United States, is it prima facie an act of iniquity to grant American copyright only upon condition of paying a printer's bill by way of entrance fee? And can we fairly call a people who impose the condition "thieves"? There is, however, a hardship which presses severely upon the large class of writers to whom American copyright is prohibitive. An import duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem is charged on all English-printed books. Mr. Douglas Sladen has made a legitimate point in advocating retaliatory duties, and this impost might be usefully borne in mind if and when the question of a duty on foreign manufactured goods comes within the range of practical politics. If it be impracticable to establish an English manufacturing clause it would be a perfectly fair rejoinder to the American Tariff to impose analogous duties. This would to some extent, moreover, obviate the danger of the manufacture of works of international importance passing into American hands, while it would further lead to the much more general importation of "plates" instead of "sheets," and so throw a considerable amount of machining into the English market, to the advantage of English printers, paper-makers and even book-binders. The Presidential Proclamation, under which our admission to the benefits of American copyright rests, is based upon the principle of reciprocity. It may be questioned whether a reactionary policy is likely to command wide support outside of the literary profession. Whether the competition of books inter se is so real a grievance as to be demonstrably tangible is an open question. But the spirit with which Parliament has always regarded literary property is wholly antagonistic to any protection of the profession at the expense of the public. Agitation is much more likely to be productive of definite result if we begin at home and press the reform of domestic copyright upon Parliament so that we may have something more satisfactory to offer "strangers within our gates." It will be time enough then to talk of revising our International bargains.

W. MORRIS COLLES.

The Internationals

THE catalogue of the Internationals has for its text the splendid untruth, "Art is the Science of the Beautiful"—WHISTLER; but it may be shrewdly suspected that "Art is the Science of the Beautiful—WHISTLER" is as Whistler would have had it printed—largely indeed what he believed. At least, if this catchpenny were sufficient to inspire Whistler to his master-work, then the catchpenny was worth the coining. Still, it is to be hoped for the sake of Art that the members of the Society will make themselves neither the slavish idolaters of Whistler's splendid genius nor of his most questionable laws upon Art. However, on entering the rooms of this winter's exhibition one finds much that treats of things that are anything but beautiful, though art is achieved thereby—wherefore the catchpenny is but the big dog's bark after all. What the Internationals would do well to remember, however, is that whilst Art is neither a Science

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS

OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti,
Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from FREDK. HOLLYER, 8 Pembroke Square, London, W.
Illustrated Catalogue 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

nor the Beautiful, yet the means whereby Art is uttered—that is to say, Craftsmanship—is to a certain extent Science, though to a greater extent Skill, and must be Beautiful. Now this is a very different thing. One of the finest paintings on those walls to-day is that of a little street corner—"Café at Dieppe," by Mr. William Nicholson. There is nothing vastly beautiful in this coffee-house at Dieppe, but there is much that is vastly interesting about it. What William Nicholson has found interesting about it he has stated with such beauty of utterance that he has made us feel his personal emotion in relation to it so that it holds us with the charm of a palace, with the charm of an enchanted house out of the "Arabian Nights." The exquisite beauty of his colour, of his arrangement, indeed, of all he says, draws us to this street corner until he rouses in us the reality of the fascination of the place. It seems to hold the very atmosphere of France. There is not one meretricious stroke or touch on the canvas from end to end. It is a perfect piece of painting; but it is far more than that—it is the placing of the sensation aroused in him by the place into our own experience so that we love that corner house as he loves it, see it as he sees it. Let us turn to another fine piece of painting—a study of flowers, by Mr. Arthur Chaplin, entitled "A Bouquet"—a piece of work in which the sheer technical achievement is as high as that of the great Dutchmen who painted immortal flower-pieces. Indeed, the mastery of painting throughout these galleries, like the high excellence of technical achievement on every hand in art as in literature to-day, is as pronounced as is the strangely disturbing sense that it is not producing very great Art. The emotions are being planed down to a modest level, and the resulting lack of majesty and dignity, the lack of the great sensations that stir within us and increase our experience of life, is becoming as obvious a lack in the art of colour as in the art of literature. It is a disturbing fact—it is a fact due in great measure to the desire to excel in sheer craft alone—it is a state of affairs largely due to the dread of "story" or mere subject, which of course has also nothing to do with the emotions as such. In the statement I have made as to William Nicholson's work it may be said that it acclaims him a genius. Certainly. He is nothing less. And his brother Beggarstaff, Mr. Pryde, has genius, as his painting here proves. And it is in the full recognition of all their exquisite gifts and in these very rooms that I have been led to this train of thought, not unmingled with regret, that Art is being largely lost at the cost of a marvellous gain in craftsmanship. Take the work of another man of genius, the wood-engraver Timothy Cole—and what superb work it is!—you will find in those small wood-blocks of his from the masterpieces of the giants, Turner and Constable and Wilson, a majesty and a largeness of vision, an epic daring and a dramatic magnificence that resound in one's senses, crying out to us in their dignity and their greatness, even as translated through this man's genius in a space little more than the size of the hand, the emotions felt by these great masters were large and splendid emotions—they saw Nature with the great seeing eye: they were unafraid; they faced the vastness of the firmament, the breathless drop of the abyss, the rush and tumult of water and the vast stillnesses with fearless eyes and with hands undaunted, and they set these majestic sensations down reckless of criticism and the squabbles of the schools and the "isms" of fashion. One man may have had this technical leaning, another man that, but they knew and recognised that these things were craftsmanship, tricks of thumb. The great thing was Art, the emotional statement, so that when we stand before the work of their hands we are swept away first by the power of the statement and not by the perfection of the grammar in which they uttered that statement.

HALDANE MACFALL.

Correspondence

Shakespeare Memorial

SIR.—I quite concur in all your correspondent A. R. Bayley says anent an Elizabethan playhouse. It is said of those of to-day that they eagerly pursue all enterprises likely to yield high profits. Now what greater gain to our youth could be devised than connecting their intelligences by pleasurable associations with the mind of Shakespeare? It is true every curriculum, from the university to the board school, includes study of his works, but how few comparatively of our scholars ever see a play acted! It is as though we trained a nation to witness plum puddings in the making but never allowed them to be tasted! A country lad in Shakespeare's time had opportunity of seeing histories and mysteries played. Such must almost have formed part of the school year. We still enter the very hall under the Stratford Grammar School where Shakespeare as a lad must have witnessed these performances. With what zest must his creative mind have flown to Holinshed and Plutarch after forming one of the audience and experiencing the thrilling domination of the drama! Perhaps he borrowed these books from his master and devoured them under a mulberry tree, as Walter Scott drank in the Percy Reliques under an Oriental plane in a quaint formal garden. Chief among the objections to the drama for youth is the expense and dissipation of time in "getting up" theatricals. Now it surely should be a national concern that we had an Elizabethan theatre here in London, in which performances could be given at trifling cost, both by daylight and at night, to which our scholars had easy access. It might almost be prophesied that by this means alone the prosperity of our Empire might be centupled in a decade.—Yours, &c.

A SCHOOLMASTER'S SISTER.

The Art of Watts

SIR.—It is matter for regret that Mr. Macfall did not avail himself of the opportunity afforded by the Academy exhibition to pass in review the achievement of the artist. Permit me a tilt with him in regard to one statement contained in his article. "Watts," he writes, "began with the Greek ideal that Art is Beauty—an absolutely pagan idea." Now why absolutely pagan? It is an irrefragable truth which did it obtain with the Greeks obtains none the less to-day with the true artist, painter, or musician—and must obtain with him ever. Mr. Macfall seems to presuppose that beauty is of the eye; whereas it is of the mind. Pictures such as, say, Millet's incomparable "The Pig-killers" and "Man with the Hoe" are none the less beautiful that they are rugged presentments of things of which the world, with its so very pathetic hypersensitiveness, much prefers to remain uncognisant. Truth has often a rude, almost brutal way of declaring itself, but so a picture be true it is beautiful, and therefore art is beauty, though admittedly mere physiognomical beauty should there be flaws in its possessor is not necessarily of art so far as by art is understood the perfect. Wherefore, why the pother?

Had Watts prevailed more in the councils of the Academy, we might have been spared the national humiliation consequent on the maladministration of the Chantry Bequest. His, truly, was a magnificent life. Beset in middle age by physical ills, he yet, on the borderland of ninety, passed to his rest—a fighter to the last—leaving an enduring monument in "Physical Energy." Watts recognised and lamented the paucity of British artists: "the power and solid magnificence of British enterprise are almost entirely without corresponding expression in English art"; was untiring in his encouragement of the talented unknown; and by his work—work which has risen triumphant from the morass of fatuous superlatives—has done much to atone for the deficiency. The present exhibition, me judice, is but a poor tribute to a departed genius. Its comprehensiveness doubtless appeals strongly to the maw of the dear, obtuse British public, but the massing of pictures without regard to merit is to a lover of art “a thing imagination boggles at.” It is murder—is only comparable with the Academy’s jaundiced treatment of Whistler. If we needs must have everything—good, bad and indifferent—surely some taste, some discrimination might have been exercised; or, if not exercised, at least essayed. Is it really necessary for such a body as the Academy to leap straight to the large bosom of the public? If it is, was there any earthly reason—other than the apathy of those responsible for the direction—why the finest of Watts’ pictures, such as “Aurora” and the “Jacob and Esau,” should not have been grouped in one gallery and those of lesser merit relegated to the others? As things stand the superlative and the negligible are hung cheek by jowl, and the inferior derogate almost inestimably from the worth of such as are good but not, in many cases, comparable with the greatest. Such paintings as could not claim inclusion in the gallery representing the artist’s highest achievement need not have been indiscriminately huddled together like the books on a second-hand bookseller’s shelves, but might well have been so arranged (without particular regard to date) as to illustrate different phases of, and influences on, Watts’ career.

One cannot deny that the exhibition reflects great credit on those upon whom the work of collection devolved. There are many pictures which have been hitherto almost unknown to the world at large, and one in particular, which I, at least, have never before seen, is an exquisite portrait executed with the craftsman’s sheer joy in craftsmanship—the “Countess of Lytton.” Presumably the magnificent “Alfred Inciting his Subjects to Prevent the Landing of the Danes” was not available; or in a hurried survey I did not notice it.

Could not Mr. Macfall devote a few articles to a review of the art of Watts? Critically executed, they should form ψυχῆς ἰατρικὸν. Yours, &c.

NORMAN BENNETT.

The Arch-Diarist

SIR,—If a small “Ego” may aspire to break a lance with your great Cham, I would point out that Samuel Pepys lived in an age of corruption, and that his “Diary” was prepared as a personal exculpation, founded on his own sense of fiscal morality. Further, that it was intended for perusal; all his surroundings were familiar with his system of shorthand, and that, for intentional obscurity, certain equivocal passages were written in Greek, Latin, or Spanish. This further precaution implies expected perusal. His love of pleasure is transparent; his powers of exacerbation involved cruelty, shown in his use of rod and lash—so brutal as to induce Mrs. Pepys to pinch his nose with a red-hot pair of tongs! His love of money peeps out in the transport of his guineas from town to Huntingdonshire, and their burial in a back-garden, while his anxiety as to exposure and loss is shown in the recounting. His dealings with his kind relative and patron, the Earl of Sandwich, are very compromising; Pepys enjoyed a lucrative office as stop-gap for another, under contract to refund, yet he paid over the proceeds as loans, and claimed repayment as for a debt.—Yours, &c.

A. HALL.

Omar el Khayyám

SIR,—The novel spelling of this poet’s name in your current issue attracted my attention to Mr. Shirázi’s explanation of it, which I cannot think quite satisfactory. It is certainly improbable that Omar (more correctly ‘Omar, since a consonant unknown to our language precedes the “O” uttered by constricting the glottis) was himself a tent-maker, although so named, especially as he was a Persian, and his name (probably also his descent) Arabian. One might as well expect all British subjects of the name of Shumacher to be makers of shoes, when it does not even follow that such English names as Baker, Fisher, or Cartwright convey such an idea, though very likely their respective ancestors were engaged in those trades. There is therefore not the slightest necessity to tack on an “i” or “y,” which would turn the noun into an adjective and simply imply, as Mr. Shirázi’s own name—if it is his—does, that he or his ancestors were only connected with a certain craft or place of residence. Indeed, in the absence of a known tribe surnamed Khayyám, there is no ground for such a supposition, and the poet’s name has been too long accepted as we know it in his own land to propose amendments.—Yours, &c.

BUDGET MEAKIN.

Monthly Prize Competition

REGULATIONS.

We shall give, until further notice, a monthly prize, value £1 ls., for the best criticism of a specified book. The prize will take the form of a £1 ls. subscription to Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son’s Circulating Library. In the case of any prize-winner living too far from the nearest branch of this library, or for any other good reason not desiring to subscribe to it, the subscription will be transferred to another library, to be chosen by the prize-winner. If already a subscriber to a library, the guinea will run from end of present subscription or be added to it at once. The prize-winner will be sent an order on the library selected, a cheque for £1 ls. being forwarded with proper notification to the proprietors. The winning criticism will be printed, with the writer’s name, in THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE. Style and independence of view will be chiefly taken into account in awarding the prize. We need not remind competitors that they are not called upon to buy the selected books, but can obtain them from a library.

RULES.

1. The criticism must not exceed eight hundred words or be less than five hundred.
2. All communications must be addressed to “The Competition Editor, THE ACADEMY, 9 East Harding Street, London, E.C.”
3. The Editor’s judgment in awarding the prize must be considered final.
4. The MS. must be clearly written by hand, or typewritten, on one side only of the paper.
5. No competitor can win the prize more than once in three months. In case a previous prize-winner sends in the best criticism, his (or her) paper will be printed, the prize going, however, to the next best sent in by a non-prize-winner.
6. The competition coupon must be filled in and sent with the MS. (See page 2 of Cover.)

SUBJECT FOR THIRD COMPETITION

JAPAN, AN ATTEMPT AT INTERPRETATION. By Lafcadio Hearn. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d. net.)

NOTICE.

Competitors’ MSS. must reach this office not later than January 16, Monday next.

“Academy” Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 9 East Harding Street, London, E.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner “A.Q.A.” Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper, which must bear the sender’s full name and address, not necessarily for publication. The Editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archaeology, Folk-lore, Art, Music and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published.

Questions must NOT be such as can be answered from the ordinary works of reference.

COMPETITION.

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5/- each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to “Academy” Questions and Answers.

The Editor’s decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The names and addresses of prize-winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk. Each prize will consist of 5/- worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5/-. No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

One of the four weekly prizes will be awarded, whenever possible, to a Shakespearean Question or Answer.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of “Questions and Answers” carries disqualification.

Questions

LITERATURE.

* DICKENS' MRS. RUDGE.—In his novel of "Barnaby Rudge" Dickens frequently speaks of Mrs. Rudge as "the widow," when really she is not a widow, a fact one sees after having finished reading the book. Was this an oversight on Dickens' part, or did he knowingly perpetrate a literary falsehood for the sake of keeping up an illusion?—A. W. Bain (Edinburgh).

COMMANDER OF TWENTY LEGIONS.—"The ancient philosopher declined a dispute with the emperor who commanded twenty legions." Who was this "ancient philosopher," and what were the circumstances of the dispute?—A. W. Bain (Edinburgh).

* ROBINSON CRUSOE.—"I remember reading in the "Academy Questions and Answers" that Defoe did not write the first part of "Robinson Crusoe." Can any one tell me what authority there is for this statement and give me full particulars?—Arthur D. Calman (Malta).

AUTHOR WANTED.—Attached to Burne-Jones's picture "Green Summer" are the lines:

There is sweet music here, that softer falls
Than petals from blown roses on the grass.

In what poem of what poet do they occur?—H.E.A.

REFERENCE WANTED, for the following lines, supposed to be Browning's:

If you loved only what were worth your love,
Love were clear gain and wholly well for you,
Make the low nature better by your throes,
Give earth yourself, go up for gain above.

—T.F.J. (Greenock).

GENERAL.

TURKEY TRIAL.—Can any one tell me what is meant by a "Turkey Trial"?—B.B. (Sheffield).

WHOLE BAG OF TRICKS.—What is the origin of this expression? Did it arise from familiarity with the feats of a conjurer?—A.R.B. (Malvern).

* ORDER REIGNS AT WARSAW.—What was the historical occasion on which this despatch—which has become proverbial—was sent?—H.E.A.

Answers

SHAKESPEARE.

SHAKESPEARE AS SCHOOLMASTER.—It is not certain, though probable, that Shakespeare was educated at the ancient Grammar School at Stratford-on-Avon. That he acted there, for a time, as an assistant master, before leaving his native town for London, is a mere rumour, though it is, quite possibly, founded on fact. The poet certainly displays a close acquaintance with the chief school books of his period.—A.R.B. (Malvern).

* SIR FOR REVEREND.—The title Sir was given to Bachelors of Arts at the Universities as a translation of the word Dominus, but was usually attached to the surnames and not to the Christian names. It was also given to such of the inferior clergy as were only readers of the service and were not admitted to be preachers. A thirteenth century tombstone is said to have had the following inscription:

Sire Riocard le Petit, Jadia
Personne de ceste yglise ci gist;
Receyve la Alme Jesu Christ.—A.R.B. (Malvern).

DUCDAME.—Thomas Doucedame, about 1327-8, was plaintiff as to land in the Isle of Sheppey, Kent; so the word "Ducedame" seems Anglo-French for "sweet lady." She might be the goose girl of fable; socially a female herd or "dey," who, as mother goose called her flock "into a circle"; "you goose" is a polite form for "fool." Melancholy Jaques was not ill-informed, and Shakespeare was quite as clever as Dickens in "picking up" names.—A. Hall.

"DUCDAME."—This is probably a corruption of a Gaelic phrase meaning "this ground is mine," used as a challenge in some old British game like "Tom Tiddler's Ground," in which a boy would take up his position on a hill and dare his comrades to drive him from it. "This old British phrase" (says Dr. Mackay) "continued to be used in England by children and illiterate people long after the British language had given way to the Saxon English, and was repeated by boys and girls in the game now called 'Tom Tiddler's Ground' so lately as forty years ago, when I myself heard it used by children on the Links of Leith and the Inches of my native city of Perth." In time the real meaning and correct form of the original Gaelic would be lost, and "ducdame, ducedame," seems to have been used as the burden of a song. Thus in a MS. of "Piers the Ploughman" Halliwell found the phrase "dusadam-me-me" in a passage where the best texts have the song-burden "Hou, trolly, lolly"; and "dusadam-me-me" certainly looks like a variation of "ducdame." This explanation of the expression "ducdame" as originally connected with a game gives a key to Jaques's otherwise quite unintelligible words, an "invocation, to call fools into a circle." All the old theories—such as duc ad me ("bring him to me"), huc ad me—may be dismissed. But the explanation that Jaques pronounces "ducdame" as if it were "duc damné" is ingenious. It is quite likely that he uses this old song-burden "ducdame" with a quibbling reference to "duc damné," the thought in his mind being "a plague on the Duke for bringing us all here." But if he does hint at "duc damné" he is careful not to say so.—Winifred Annie Horwood (Brockley).

DUCDAME.—I take the following from Dr. Sigerson's "Bards of the Gael and Gall": "At the time of Shakespeare's writing there was an Irish ballad current. Evlin Cavanagh, the secret love of a forbidden suitor, was about to be married. Her lover, disguised as a harper, came to her mansion, and with impassioned song besought her to come with him. 'Dincatu' is the phonetic form of the question 'Wilt thou come?' Her reply is 'Tiucams,' which she repeats, 'I will come.' Here we have the invitation, and the answer a verse to this note. It is not Greek, but being Irish it is as unintelligible to Amiens."—Edward Quinn.

DUCDAME.—This is neither Greek nor Latin, but pure gibberish, invented by Jaques to parody Amiens' song, and passed off on him as Greek—a thing Jaques would be very likely to do. Invented words were not uncommon in Elizabethan verse—and acted as choruses or burdens to songs. It belongs probably to the same order of words as the "Hey, ninny nonny," or "With a hey and a ho, and a hey nonino," of other Shakespearean songs.—K.K. (Belfast).

DUCDAME.—The word is an intentional piece of nonsense on the part of Jaques. His line

Ducedame, ducedame, ducedame, is meant to reproduce the rhythm of the line in the preceding song:

Come hither, come hither, come hither.

Hammer gave the "duc ad me" interpretation; others have read "huc ad me." The word may be an ancient refrain of Celtic origin. Halliwell notes that "dus-adam-me-me" occurs in a MS. of "Piers Plowman," where ordinary texts read "How, trolly, lolly." It is, perhaps, a survival of some British game like "Tom Tiddler," and is said to mean in Gaelic "this land is mine." At any rate it served "to call fools into a circle."—A.R.B.

LITERATURE.

"THE FATAL FLOWER BESIDE THE RILL."—This occurs in Jean Ingelow's "Persephony." The authoress has introduced this flower into the story. As given by Ovid in "De raptu Proserpine" the maidens strayed gathering various flowers, "Illa legit calthas; hinc aut violaria curae," but Miss Ingelow makes a particularly beautiful daffodil, "one of rarer growth than orchis or anemone, attract her heroine and make her stray to the fated spot where the coal-black horses rise."—William Rauby (Coventry).
[Reply also from H.M.W. (Manchester).]

AUTHOR FOUND.—The lines occurring in Kingsley's "Two Years Ago" are wrongly quoted—altered, probably, to suit the text. They are from Tennyson's "May Queen, Conclusion," and run as follows:

The trees began to whisper and the wind began to roll,
And in the wild March morning I heard them call my soul.

—K.K. (Belfast).

[Similar replies from J.B. and H.B.F. (Hastings).]

GENERAL.

BOHEMIAN.—Trench ("On the Study of Words") suggests that a wandering tribe was first mistaken for an expelled tribe of Hussites from Bohemia, and hence the epithet as applied to any nomadic strangers, just as "Gypsies" appears to imply that Egypt was the origin of the "wanderers." In the case of "Bohemian," the mistake is not so inappropriate when the etymological meaning of the word is known (Old High German Heim and Boii, the home of the Boii), and any individual in search of a home comes to be a Bohemian, and going further, Bohemia has come to represent the home of the artist—the wandering soul! [Compare this idea of "wandering" in the German Zigeuner, Hungarian Tzigane, and Spanish Zingari.]—Max Judge.

BOHEMIAN.—Since their first appearance in the fifteenth century the gipsies have been called Bohemians by the French, because they were thought to come from Bohemia, or possibly entered the West through that country. The word later was applied to vagabonds or adventurers in general, and in this sense was introduced by Thackeray into English in "Vanity Fair" (lxiv).—A.R.B.
[Similar replies from D.M. (Bexley Heath) and H.H.]

BEAN FEAST.—Compare "bonum festum" in some Latin, so under corruption by similarity of sound; but taken literally it is a banquet on "beans and bacon." Fairlop Fair originated in the annual distribution of sacks of beans for a public feast, about 1750.—Old Hand.

BEANFEAST.—This is an annual dinner, given by employers to their workpeople. The derivation of the word seems uncertain. One explanation is that beans or a bean-goose appeared as a prominent dish on such occasions. Others derive it from the Middle English word "Bene" (=prayer or request), from the custom of soliciting subscriptions at these festivals.—Percy Selver.

"GREAT SCOTT."—Surely the connection of this with Gen. Wingfield Scott, mentioned by your correspondent last week (it is given by Barrère and Leland), is doubtful—probably a mere Volks-etymologie, or story invented to account for a word not otherwise understood. Mr. Baron Russell's "Current Americanisms" (London, circa 1890) merely defines it as a "Euphemistic oath of no great force and very uncertain origin." He must have been acquainted with the Wingfield Scott story, and (as he is elsewhere very hospitable to fancy derivations) must have had reasons for rejecting this one; but it is odd that he did not record the fairly obvious corruption of Ger. "grüss Gott."—N.D. (Cambridge).

PORT ARTHUR.—This name was given about fifty years ago to commemorate Lieutenant Arthur of H.M.S. "Algerine," son of the Rev. James Arthur, rector of Atherington, in Devon. The flagship "Acton" being disabled, Lieutenant Arthur towed her into an unnamed harbour, which was afterwards called after him.—B.F.

* PORT ARTHUR.—The Chinese and Japanese call this place Lü-shun-keu; this is the modern orthography. Morrison would have written it Leu-shun-khow. The Russians call it Port-Arthur; it is always printed with a hyphen, and declined as if it were a single word, genitive Port-Artura, instrumental Port-Arturum, etc. The Russians got this name from the English. We named it from Captain Arthur, who commanded one of H.M. ships on the China station when the coast-line of Manchuria and Korea was being surveyed.—James Platt, Junior.

PORT ARTHUR received its name from Commander (afterwards Rear-Admiral) William Arthur, who was surveying there in H.M.S. "Algerine" in 1860. He was a Devonshire man, born July 4, 1830; served with distinction in the Maori, Kafir, Crimean, and Chinese wars; naval attaché at Washington, 1879-82; C.B. and Aide-de-Camp to Queen Victoria; died at Egham, November 16, 1886, aged 56. For a detailed list of his services, honours, etc., see "Overland Mail" for November 19, 1886, page 37, and other service papers of that date. A portrait of him appears in the "Sphere" for November 19, 1904.—H.E.A.
[Replies also from A.R.B. (Malvern) and H.H.]

TELL THAT TO THE MARINES.—This expression, surely, originates with Jack Tars, and embodies their contempt for the supposed credulity of the marines as "Land lubbers."—D.M.

NOTE.—Several correspondents again fail to comply with the rules. D.R.C. (Glasgow), for instance, does not give name and address on each slip. M.S. (Holland Park) asks a question (Runaway's Eyes) which was answered in THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE of February 27 and May 14 last. Other correspondents appear to look upon these columns as a fit channel for questions which almost savour of the kindergarten, and could be answered by reference to any library. "Who were Diogenes and his Assasin?" "What do £ and D stand for as denoting pounds and pence?" "What does piling Pelion on Ossa mean?" These are only a few examples of the kind of question which is not admissible.

PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain, on application at the following booksellers, Five Shillings' worth of books. Notices have been dispatched to the several winners and to the following booksellers:

Messrs. Wm. Blackwood & Sons, 45 George Street, Edinburgh.
Mr. James H. Hartley, 89 Junction Road, N.
Messrs. Woods & Co., Royal Library, Malvern.
Mr. Joseph Sims, 13 Station Parade, Willeiden Green.

TWO SIZES

THE ORDINARY "ACADEMY" MODEL (WILLIAMS No. 2)
THE BRIEF MACHINE (WILLIAMS No. 3)

Direct from the Manufacturers with all the latest improvements at a discount of 40 %

Full details will be sent you if you will write for them to "The Academy" Typewriter Department, 9 East Harding Street, London, E.C., or will be given to you if you will call at the Williams Typewriter Office: London, 57 Holborn Viaduct; Aberdeen, 115 Union St.; Belfast, 71 Ann St.; Birmingham, 28 High St.; Burnley, 9 Grimshaw St.; Cardiff, 8 St. John's Square; Dublin, 5 Upper Ormonde Quay; Edinburgh, 19 Shandwick Place; Exeter, 31 Queen St.; Glasgow, 69 Bothwell St.; Leeds, 3 Park Lane; Leicester, 60-64 Halford St.; Leigh, 64 Bond St.; Liverpool, 16 Union St., Exchange; Manchester, 267 Deansgate; Middlesbrough, Royal Exchange; Newcastle, 21 Collingwood St.; Nottingham, Prudential Buildings; Portsmouth, 154 Queen St.; Southampton, 12 Portland St.; Sheffield, 72 Queen St.

EDUCATION SUPPLEMENT.

Cambridge University Press

THE CAMBRIDGE MODERN HISTORY

Planned by the late LORD ACTON.

Edited by Dr. A. W. WARD, Dr. G. W. PROTHERO, and STANLEY LEATHES, M.A.

To be completed in 12 vols., royal 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 16s. net each.

TIMES on Vol. I.—“The opening volume of what promises to be one of the most important books of our time.”

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—“This promises to be the standard modern history for long years to come.”

New Volume Ready January 18th :—

Vol. III.—THE WARS OF RELIGION

The following Volumes are already published :—

- | | |
|---|--|
| Vol. I. THE RENAISSANCE. Third Impression, 16s. net. | Vol. VII. THE UNITED STATES. Second Impression, 16s. net. |
| Vol. II. THE REFORMATION. Second Impression, 16s. net. | Vol. VIII. THE FRENCH REVOLUTION. 16s. net. |

TERMS TO SUBSCRIBERS.—Subscriptions will be received for the Complete Work at £7 10s. net, which may be either paid in advance or by payments of 12s. 6d. net for each Volume on publication.

A PROSPECTUS WILL BE SENT ON APPLICATION.

Cambridge English Classics.—New Volumes.

A Series of Classical English Writers, based upon a Uniform Plan, and giving faithful Reproductions of the Original Texts. Prospectus, with Specimen Pages, will be sent on application.

ROGER ASCHAM.—ENGLISH WORKS. Toxophilus; Report of the Affaires and State of Germany; The Scholemaster. The Text edited by W. ALDIS WRIGHT, M.A., Vice-Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. Large crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Now ready.]

SAMUEL BUTLER.—HUDIBRAS: Written in the Time of the Late Wars. The Text edited by A. R. WALLER. Large crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Nearly ready.]

The Cambridge Historical Series.—New Volumes.

General Editor: G. W. PROTHERO, Litt.D.

EUROPE AND THE FAR EAST. By Sir R. K. DOUGLAS, Keeper of Oriental Printed Books and MSS. British Museum. Crown 8vo, with 4 Maps, 7s. 6d.

SCANDINAVIA: a Political History of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden from 1513 to 1900. By R. NISBET BAIN, Author of “The Daughter of Peter the Great,” “Charles XII. and the Collapse of the Swedish Empire,” &c. Crown 8vo, with 5 Maps. [Nearly ready.]

THE LITERATURE OF THE FRENCH RENAISSANCE. By ARTHUR TILLEY, Fellow and Lecturer of King's College, Cambridge. Demy 8vo, 2 vols., 15s. net.

A COMPANION TO GREEK STUDIES. Edited for the Syndics of the University Press by LEONARD WHIBLEY, M.A., Fellow of Pembroke College, University Lecturer in Ancient History. Demy 8vo, with Maps and Illustrations. 18s. net.

A HISTORY OF CLASSICAL SCHOLARSHIP. From the Sixth Century B.C. to the end of the Middle Ages. By JOHN EDWIN SANDYS, Litt.D., Fellow and Lecturer of St. John's College, and Public Orator in the University of Cambridge. Large crown 8vo. With 22 Illustrations. 10s. 6d. net.

SPECTATOR.—“As a work of reference his book is of the highest value. The fact that there is no book of a similar character in English, together with the exactitude and extent of the information it contains, make it indispensable to all interested in scholarship.”

THE TRAGEDIES OF SOPHOCLES. Translated into English Prose by Sir RICHARD C. JEBB, Litt.D., Regius Professor of Greek and Fellow of Trinity College. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE SPEECHES OF ISAEUS. With Critical and Explanatory Notes. By WILLIAM WYSE, M.A., late Fellow and Lecturer of Trinity College, Cambridge, sometime Professor of Greek in University College, London. Demy 8vo, 18s. net.

NICETA OF REMESIANA: his Life and Works. By A. E. BURN, D.D., Trinity College, Cambridge, Rector of Handsworth and Prebendary of Lichfield, Examining Chaplain to the Lord Bishop of Lichfield. Crown 8vo, 9s. net.

THE PLATONIC CONCEPTION OF IMMORTALITY and ITS CONNEXION WITH THE THEORY OF IDEAS. An Essay which obtained the Hare Prize, 1903. By R. K. GAYE, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

London: Cambridge University Press Warehouse, Ave Maria Lane. C. F. CLAY, Manager.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

SIEPMANN'S PRIMARY FRENCH COURSE (FIRST PART). 2s. 6d. Second Part in the press. First Term, 1s. 6d.

PERRY AND REUM'S NEW FRENCH COURSE FOR SCHOOLS. Part. I. 1s. 6d.

NEW WORKS ON GEOMETRY TO MEET THE NEW REQUIREMENTS.

LESSONS IN EXPERIMENTAL AND PRACTICAL GEOMETRY. By H. S. HALL, M.A., and F. H. STEVENS, M.A. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d. [Shortly.]

A SCHOOL GEOMETRY. By H. S. HALL, M.A., and F. H. STEVENS, M.A. Crown 8vo.

This work is based upon the recommendations of the Mathematical Association, and will be found to satisfy the requirements of University, Local, London Matriculation, Army, Navy, and other Examinations. In particular, the suggestions recently proposed by the Cambridge Syndicate have been carefully considered.

PARTS I.-VI. Containing Plane and Solid Geometry, treated both theoretically and Graphically. 4s. 6d.

PARTS I. and II.—PART I. Lines and Angles, Rectilinear Figures. PART II. Areas of Rectilinear Figures (containing the Substance of Euclid, Book I.). 1s. 6d.

PART III.—Circles (containing the Substance of Euclid, Book III., 1-34, and Part of Book IV.). 1s. 6d.

PARTS I., II., and III. 2s. 6d.

* This volume exactly suits the requirements of the New Syllabus for the King's Scholarship Examination.

PART IV.—Squares and Rectangles, Geometrical Equivalents of Certain Algebraical Formulæ (containing the substance of Euclid, Book II. and Book III., Props. 35-37). Sewed, 6d.

A NEW GEOMETRY FOR SCHOOLS. By S. BARNARD, M.A., Assistant Master at Rugby School, and J. M. CHILD, B.A. Cantab., Lecturer in Mathematics, Technical College, Derby (containing the Substance of Euclid, Books I.-VI.). Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

A NEW GEOMETRY FOR JUNIOR FORMS. By S. BARNARD, M.A., and J. M. CHILD, B.A. Cantab. (Containing the Substance of Euclid, Books I., III., 1-31, the easy parts of Book IV., and a description of the forms of the simpler solids.) Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

This volume contains all the Practical and Theoretical Geometry required for a pass by Junior Candidates in the University Locals.

A NEW GEOMETRY FOR SENIOR FORMS. By S. BARNARD, M.A., and J. M. CHILD, B.A. (Containing the Substance of Euclid, Books II., VI., XI., together with the Mensuration of Solids.) Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THEORETICAL GEOMETRY FOR BEGINNERS. By C. H. ALCOCK, Senior Mathematical Master at Eton. Part I. (containing the Substance of Euclid, Book I.); Part II. (containing the Substance of Euclid, Book III., Props. 1-34, and Book IV., Props. 1-9); Part III. (containing the Substance of Euclid, Book II., Props. 1-14, Book III., Props. 35-37, and Book IV., Props. 10-16); and Part IV. (this Part treats of Ratio and Proportion, and their application to Geometrical Theorems and Problems). Globe 8vo, 1s. 6d. each.

PRACTICAL GEOMETRY FOR BEGINNERS. By V. LE NEVE FOSTER and F. W. DOBBS, Assistant Masters at Eton College. Crown 4to, 2s. 6d.

PRACTICAL EXERCISES IN GEOMETRY. By W. D. EGGAR, M.A., Assistant Master at Eton College. Revised Edition, with Answers. Globe 8vo, 2s. 6d.

AN ELEMENTARY TREATISE ON GRAPHS. By GEO. A. GIBSON, M.A., F.R.S.E., Professor of Mathematics in the Glasgow and West of Scotland Technical College. Globe 8vo, 3s. 6d.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE CALCULUS. Based on Graphical Methods. By GEORGE A. GIBSON, M.A., F.R.S.E., Professor of Mathematics in the Glasgow and West of Scotland Technical College. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

A SHORT INTRODUCTION TO GRAPHICAL ALGEBRA. By H. S. HALL, M.A. Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Globe 8vo, 1s. KEY, 3s. 6d.

ELEMENTARY ALGEBRA FOR SCHOOLS. By H. S. HALL, M.A., and S. R. KNIGHT, B.A. Eighth Edition, Revised, with a Chapter on Graphs. Globe 8vo, 3s. 6d. With Answers, 4s. 6d. Answers, 1s. KEY, containing full Solutions, with Diagrams of the Graphical Examples, 8s. 6d.

CAMBRIDGE LOCAL EXAMINATIONS, 1905.

Acts of the Apostles—Authorised Version. T. E. PAGE and A. S. WALPOLE. (Junior and Senior)	2 6
The Greek Text. With Notes. T. E. PAGE. (Junior and Senior)	3 6
Milton's Samson Agonistes. H. M. PERCIVAL. (Senior)	2 6
Scott's Lay of the Last Minstrel. G. H. STUART and E. H. ELLIOT. (Junior)	2 0
Cantos I. to III. 1s. 3d. Sewed, 1s. (Preliminary)	2 6
Ivanhoe. With Notes. (Junior and Senior)	1 9
Shakespeare's Macbeth. K. DEIGHTON. (Senior)	1 9
Twelfth Night. K. DEIGHTON. (Junior and Senior)	0 9
Ransome's Short Studies of Shakespeare's Plays—Macbeth. Sewed. (Senior)	3 6
Tennyson's Princess. P. M. WALLACE. (Senior)	1 6
Caesar's de Bello Gallico. Book I. A. S. WALPOLE. (Junior)	2 6
Cicero's Pro Murena. J. H. FREESE. (Senior)	2 6

Horace's Odes. Book I. T. E. PAGE. (Senior)	1 6
Livy. Book V. M. ALFORD. (Senior)	1 6
Virgil's Aeneid. Book II. T. E. PAGE. (Junior and Senior)	1 6
Xenophon's Anabasis. Book IV. E. D. STONE. (Junior)	1 6
Euripides' Medea. M. A. BAYFIELD. (Junior and Senior)	2 6
Medea. A. W. VERRALL. (Junior and Senior)	2 6
Plato's Euthyphro, Apology, Crito, and Phaedo. Translated by F. J. CHURCH. (Senior)	2
Demosthenes' Philippic I., Olynthiacs I.-III. J. E. SANDYS. (Senior)	5 0
Homer's Iliad. Book XXIX. W. LEAF and M. A. BAYFIELD. (Senior)	1 6
Mérimée's Colomba. G. E. FARNACHT. (Junior and Senior)	2 0
Hauff's das Wirtshaus im Spessart. G. E. FARNACHT. (Junior)	3 0
Goethe's Iphigenie auf Tauris. H. B. COTTERILL. (Senior)	3 0
Iphigenie auf Tauris. C. A. EGGERT. (Senior)	3 6

COLLEGE OF PRECEPTORS EXAMINATIONS, 1905.

Welch and Duffield's Exercises in Unseen Translation in Latin	1 6
Alford's Latin Passages for Translation	3 0
Caesar's Helvetian War. W. WELCH and O. G. DUFFIELD. (Third Class)	1 6
Gallie War. Book I. A. S. WALPOLE. (Second Class)	1 6
Gallie War. Book IV. OLEMET BRYANS. (First and Second Class)	1 6
Gallie War. Book V. O. COLBECK. (First Class)	1 6
Eutropius. Books I. and II. W. WELCH and O. G. DUFFIELD. (Third Class)	1 6
Horace's Odes. Book III. T. E. PAGE. 1s. 6d. Edited by the same. (First Class)	2 0
Virgil's Aeneid. Book II. T. E. PAGE. (First and Second Class)	1 6
Aeneid. Book III. T. E. PAGE. (First and Second Class)	1 6
Xenophon's Anabasis. Book I. A. S. WALPOLE. (First and Second Class)	1 6
Anabasis. Book I. E. A. WELLS. (First and Second Class)	1 6
Anabasis. Book IV. E. D. STONE. (First and Second Class)	1 6
Euripides' Hecuba. J. BOND and A. S. WALPOLE. (First Class)	1 6
Medea. M. A. BAYFIELD. (First Class)	1 6
Medea. A. W. VERRALL. (First Class)	2 6
Peacock and Bell's Passages for Greek Translation	1 6
The Acts of the Apostles—Authorised Version. With Notes by T. E. PAGE, M.A., and Rev. A. S. WALPOLE, M.A.	2 6
The Greek Text. With Notes. T. E. PAGE, M.A.	3 6

Macaulay's Horatius. W. T. WEBB. (Preliminary). Sewed	0 6
Poems of England. B. GEORGE and A. SIDGWICK. (Third Class and Preliminary)	2 6
Scott's Lay of the Last Minstrel. F. T. PALGRAVE	1 0
Lay of the Last Minstrel. G. H. STUART and E. H. ELLIOT. 2s. OAN POB I.-III. (Second and Third Class)	1 3
Shakespeare's Julius Caesar. K. DEIGHTON. With Appendix. (First and Second Class)	1 9
Twelfth Night. K. DEIGHTON. (First and Second Class)	1 9
Saintsbury's Short History of English Literature	8 6
Neefield's Outline of English Grammar. (Second and Third Class)	1 6
KEY. 2s. 6d. net.	1 6
Oral Exercises in English Composition (Third Class)	1 6
Junior Course of English Composition. (Second and Third Class)	1 6
Senior Course of English Composition. (First Class)	3 6
KEY. 1s. net.	2 6
Manual of English Grammar and Composition. (First Class)	2 6
KEY. 2s. 6d. net.	2 0
Mérimée's Colomba. G. E. FARNACHT. (First Class)	2 0
Hauff's Das Wirtshaus im Spessart. G. E. FARNACHT. (First Class)	3 0

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., ST. MARTIN'S STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Education Supplement

Education and Determinism

To the consistent advocate of free-will—if such there were—the word education would perhaps simply convey the every-day, vulgar, purblind meaning. Or he might include physical as well as intellectual education; and to these might add that form of intellectual—not moral—education which consists in teaching what is right and wrong in given circumstances, it being assumed, with Tennyson, that we “needs must love the highest when we see it.” But the libertarian, who denies that the will is caused, cannot consistently see any reason to hope that education may influence character and therefore action.

The determinist, however—and, of course, we are all determinists in practice—will have a larger hope of education. From biology, to begin with, he will borrow a term which gives him what I venture to regard as the best definition of education—the provision of an environment. The boy's heredity is unalterable; but his environment can be modified—he can be educated. And the least important part of his education is the intellectual, of course: in accordance with the law of verbal degradation, the word education being commonly used and understood in its lowest meaning. But the determinist, who knows that the will is caused, and that man's character is his destiny, will attach supreme importance to moral education, and not least to the development of the sense of responsibility.

Here, you will say, is a glaring absurdity. Is it not the advocate of free-will who swears by the sense of responsibility? Is it not the determinist who, by denying the freedom of the will, denies that we are responsible? A recent correspondent of THE ACADEMY has forestalled me in this matter, thinking that I accepted the arguments which I had advanced as those of the other side. Yet in the face of those arguments I dare maintain that the determinist will devote his most earnest educational efforts to the development of that sense of responsibility which he is told that his creed repudiates.

And assuredly one of the forces which he will bring to bear—at the risk of being called inconsistent—is punishment. Perhaps, if we call punishment by a slightly different name, consequence, the charge of inconsistency will be withdrawn. If I sin against a law of Nature, I suffer; and that is natural consequence. If I sin against a law of society, I suffer; and that—society, like its components, being a natural product—is also natural consequence. My action is thus restrained, modified, determined, by public opinion or, to use Schopenhauer's phrase, in his famous analysis of conscience, by fear of men. The Church, which had to invent free-will to square with its naïve theory of things, has yielded to none in recognition of the fact that the will is not free but determined; and its invention of hell is a palpable instance of the use of the fear of consequence as a means of affecting human volition: nor am I prepared to say that this device “to haul the wretch in order” has been without use in time past. The law that threatens penal servitude for this mortal life and the Church that threatens penal misery for eternal life, both recognise and utilise the fact of determinism.

The doctrine that “the voice of conscience is the voice of God” involves the blasphemy that the voice of God may command matricide on one side of a mountain-range and forbid it on the other. It was possible for Kant to admire “the starry heavens above and the moral law within” because the moral law within himself was admirable; but the dictates of one man's conscience may be an abomination to another. We have therefore to regard conscience, or the moral character which determines volition, as a product of the action of environment upon a given inheritance: whether the conscience be displayed in a man or a dog matters not. On first hearing Schopenhauer's analysis of conscience as consisting, in equal parts, of superstition, fear of man, vanity, custom and prejudice, one may bewail or deride it; but it withstands some criticism. You are probably not much moved by sheer selfishness directed by orthodox teaching as to the hereafter, even if you accept such teaching, for men are usually much better than their creeds. This possible motive aside, for vanity read self-respect, make fear of man include love of approbation, and ask yourself whether respect for public opinion (which may include the opinion of those you love), self-respect and custom are not the main factors of your volition in matters of morals. They certainly are of mine.

If we accept this, we are on the way to formulating the principles of moral education on determinist lines. We shall seek to bring a healthy public opinion to bear on the subject of our efforts: the public opinion of the home circle, of the school, of the market-place. When public opinion ranks collective theft, “all uncharitableness,” and malicious gossip beside incest and burglary, the young generation will be receiving a better education than hitherto. Vanity, “proper pride,” if Schopenhauer be right, will be recognised as closely allied to self-respect; and we shall regard it as a great part of education to teach a child to have a “guid conceit of himself,” not of his head but of his heart. And as to custom, what free-will theologian but corroborates Schopenhauer by insistence on the importance of forming good habits and avoiding the formation of bad ones?

And when we have spoken of self-respect, public respect and custom, have we not analysed the “sense of responsibility,” and shown that the determinist believes in and prizes it, even though he regards it as no halting and contradictory Vox Dei, but as a natural product of life as we live it?

C. W. SALEEBY.

Reviews

MISCELLANEOUS ESSAYS AND ADDRESSES

By H. Sidgwick. (Macmillan, 10s. net.)

To readers unfamiliar with Sidgwick's work no better introduction to it than the present volume could be imagined, as a good half of it bases the discussion on matter either easily accessible to the reader—Shakespeare's plays, Clough's poems, Arnold's essays—or on ideas intelligible by their mere enunciation. We hasten to add that this was not, of course, the intention of the editors: their object was simply to collect into a single volume certain of the essays that otherwise would have to be sought for in reviews and magazines. Still, this fact does not detract from the value of the essays as initiatory studies.

The author's best known book, “The Methods of Ethics,” is, because of its fame, likely to induce the beginner to take it up first—an unfortunate thing, seeing that it presupposes knowledge of the various ethical standpoints. The young student is apt to be discouraged by a detailed criticism of several systems: he wants a partial view presenting strongly. He is discouraged by qualifying phrases, and he loses the sense of movement when detained to examine all the important objections to an argument. Sidgwick could keep so many balls up in the air at once that the unpractised watcher of his skill becomes dazed and retires dispirited. Sir Leslie Stephen's style comes nearest to Sidgwick's, but it is more rugged, more staccatoesque—defects fully atoned for by his humour. Both writers are alike in their hatred of exaggeration, of over-emphasis, of rhetoric and in their fondness for whittling down a generalisation to such insignificant dimensions that its original formulator would not recognise it. Neither writer will ever be widely read; they are too critical, too ready to see reason in the opponent's case to catch the ear of the partisan, the propagandist or the crank; but each writer has his "easy" books, and this volume is assuredly one of them.

In the essay on "Political Prophecy and Sociology" a subject is discussed that every young man caring for intellectual things must often think about. The problem is: Can we by study of past ages find a parallel to our own, so nearly parallel indeed that we can forecast the years? Sidgwick, after refuting some arguments of Mr. Kidd's in his "Social Evolution" and Pearson's in his "National Life and Character," concludes dismally, "Scientific prevision of this kind will perhaps be ultimately attained, as the slow fruit of long years of labour yet to come—but even that is one of the things it would be rash confidently to predict." We say this conclusion is dismal because the part inspiration of history and the whole inspiration of sociology are due to the conviction that if we can only once learn the real causes of the French Revolution or the American War of Independence, say, we ought to be able to use this key to unlock the future. Remove that inspiration and we shall have to be content with the kind of prognostication offered us by the so-called practical politicians and content ourselves with very short views indeed. Consequently historians, sociologists and statisticians, buoyed up by the hope of ultimate success, will go on investigating until they have wrung this, the greatest of all secrets, from life. If, however, Sidgwick is not inspiring, he is useful for revealing the weaknesses of a formula, and in this respect his work may be said to be constructive. There can be no synthesis without analysis. The analytical philosopher is our friend, though we may not thank him at the time for pricking our bubble. The point of this review is to urge the young sociologist to read Sidgwick. Such a volume as this can do him no harm, and it must, in enabling him to learn the art of criticism, do him much good.

Another essay of great interest is the "Lecture against Lecturing," in which the academic lecture is held up to ridicule, because it wastes time to compel students to take down a lecture imperfectly that they might read up in a class-book easily and at their leisure or from printed notes supplied them by the lecturer. If the lecturer devoted the time thus saved to explaining difficulties or in criticising textbooks, the reproach, that the only place where the invention of printing has brought no gain is the university, would be removed. We await impatiently the next volume to be edited by Professor James Ward which will deal, amongst other subjects, pretty fully with the philosophy of Kant.

F. KETTLE.

TRAGIC DRAMA IN ÆSCHYLUS, SOPHOCLES AND SHAKESPEARE

By Professor Lewis Campbell. (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net.)

THE real purpose of this book is to demonstrate that the great tragedies, Athenian and Elizabethan, step to the same music and adopt the same forms. Aristotle's definition is as well illustrated by "Hamlet" as by the "Antigone," and yet Aristotle could have had no pre-science of Shakespeare's art. It may be that Shakespeare is nearer to Sophocles than to us; both dramatists agree in taking their characters from high life almost exclusively; both differ far more from Ibsen than from each other. And Shakespeare is pagan to the core. Professor Campbell says mildly that "his conception of the supernatural is tinged with scepticism." Tinged! when throughout the tragedies the only viaticum administered to the dying is nescience.

In characterisation there is difference; in thought they are worlds away—art never repeats itself. The hands may be the same, but the voices bewray them. Alike architectonically; in "embroidery and ornament" the resemblance is not obvious. To what purpose, it may be asked, is the comparison? If art, like science, grew from more to more there would be meaning in the method; but art, after bringing to an idea all the technical skill of the age, dies, and the next art period has to begin afresh. Early Christian art is childishly clumsy when compared with the best that preceded it. The justification for comparing one period with another simply comes to this: that art is life's counterfeit, and though the conventions be changed, the ground-plan, so to speak, of all arts is the same in all ages. How close it is possible for dramatists to be, separated from each other by centuries in time and in ideal, Professor Campbell elaborates in this essay—an elaboration only possible to one equally familiar with the best work of each age.

The early chapters treat of the fable, tragic action, environment, sources. One point raised early in the discussion is the artist's evaluation or criticism of life. The dramatist is not an explicit moralist; but the residual feeling after witnessing a play, "the tongue shriller than all the music" that pierces to our intelligence long after the curtain has fallen, what is this if not the artist's interpretation of life as revealed to him by experience, observation and reflection? The question arises: Is all tragedy pessimistic? The author replies: "There is disillusionment, if you will, 'the sober colouring of an eye that hath kept watch over man's mortality'; but the spirit which animates the whole is not to be confused with pessimism." Our own view is that the dramatist's pessimism is of no moment, provided that the play does not depress us too much in witnessing it, because of our power of recovery, due to the consciousness that the characters, as in plays like Tolstoi's "Power of Darkness," are outside our sphere. From Shakespeare and the Athenian dramatists recovery is very rapid because their life is so far removed from ours. "Don Quixote" contains a deeper draught of pessimism than "Lear" or than either "Oedipus."

In an interesting analysis of "Hamlet" the author quotes only to differ from Coleridge's estimate of Hamlet as one who "loses the power of action in the energy of resolve." It seems rather late in the day to take notice of this criticism. Surely if there is one thing about Hamlet more characteristic than another, it is his power to act; but the man's intelligence is so great, he sees so many ways out of a difficulty, that he prefers to make experiments before committing himself to action. Read Coleridge backward and he is nearer the truth. Had Hamlet been subtle enough to see the way, the tragic situation might have been still more poignant, but we doubt whether Hamlet would have gained in the "power of action."

History

ROMAN SOCIETY FROM NERO TO MARCUS AURELIUS

By Samuel Dill. (Macmillan, 15s. net.) The century which Professor Dill has chosen for his subject constitutes one of the most interesting paradoxes of history. It was the age which witnessed a phenomenal exaltation of both the flesh and the spirit; it was the age of ugly lives and artistic deaths, where stoicism flourished side by side with Neronism and the elegant Epicureanism of the dilettanti was accompanied by the diseased mysticism of the Neo-Platonists. Rome was fast approaching its climacteric and becoming more and more susceptible to those sexual and religious upheavals which were the characteristics of its condition. Out of the decay rose Christianity. Our complaint with Professor Dill in his treatment of the period is that, to borrow the terminology of Dr. Emil Reich, he is more of an "arm-chair" than a "psychological" historian; that he is too much concerned with facts themselves to take heed of the causes which produced them. Of his erudition, indeed, there can be no question. He has mastered with praiseworthy assiduity every authority on his subject, old and new. Each page has its three or four references at the bottom, while the innumerable quotations frequently break into the text. Yet, though this material is ample, the author makes no attempt to co-ordinate it in such a way as to give the reader a picture of the age as a whole, and of the great psychological laws which governed its development. Failing to realise—as, indeed, does nearly every English historian—that "psychology is to history what dynamics are to astronomy," Professor Dill lacks almost completely the sociological method. Yet, as a storehouse of facts, the book is of incontestable value. In particular, the chapters on "The Society of the Freedmen," on "Municipal Life" and "The Colleges and Plebeian Life" are interesting, and adequate accounts of those movements which were responsible for some of the most important changes of the new society. The author, however, is at his best when dealing with the moral and spiritual life of the period, and in describing the "practical effort of philosophy to give support and guidance to moral life and to refashion the old paganism so as to make it a real spiritual force." The third book, which shows how philosophy from essaying to solve the riddle of the world was transformed into a guide to life and became more and more tinged with religious emotion, shows how rapidly the Roman mind was approaching such a condition as to make some emotional faith a practical necessity. Of almost equal value is the book which deals with the religious beliefs of the age, and the worships of such Eastern deities as Cybele and Mithra, Isis and Serapis. But Professor Dill's interest in the spiritual and philosophic side of life tends to weaken his judgment on its more secular aspects. As is evidenced by the following passage he has gone hopelessly astray in his estimate of Juvenal: "He has come to glorify pity and tenderness for suffering as the best gift of God, the gift that separates him most widely from the brute creation. He preaches sympathy and mutual help in an age torn by selfish individualist passions. He denounces the lust for revenge almost in the tones of a Christian preacher." Yet in reality Juvenal was but a splendid pornographer, a man of great abilities who, soured by his early failure, turned for refuge and consolation to the foul and obscene side of life.

A SHORT HISTORY OF ENGLAND

By E. P. Cheyney. (Ginn, 6s. 6d.) The discussion as to the best way of teaching history is not closed or likely to be for some time. Meanwhile we welcome this book; it has many good points, one of which is that Professor Cheyney has very definite ideas of what a school-book should include. He thinks, for instance, that "allusions the significance of which could not be explained in the book" should be omitted. Although there is little harm in an occasional allusion, yet

BLACKIE & SON'S LIST

Catalogues in all subjects Post Free on application.

Little French Classics

"The idea is an excellent one, and admirably carried out."—Prof. SAINTSBURY.

"A considerable boon to teachers and taught."—SPECTATOR.

"These little books supply a great want."—Dr. W. H. ROUSE.

This New Series, which is produced under the most competent editorship, embraces all classes of French Literature—Travels, Stories of Adventure, Scenes of Domestic Life, Essays, Letters, Poetry, and Drama—so graduated in difficulty and so varied in matter as to be suitable for readers of all stages of advancement. Many authors hitherto unobtainable in a suitable form for class reading are represented, as, for example, Bossuet, Balzac, Stendhal, Rousseau, and Pascal.

Price 4d. each Book. Complete Lists on application.

Little German Classics

Price 6d. each Book.

This New Series is uniform in aim and general appearance with the well known Series of "Little French Classics," which received so instant a welcome from teachers and pupils.

Prospectus on application.

Goethe—Hermann and Dorothea.
German Songs with Music.
Kotzebue—Der gerade Weg der best.

Schiller—Select Ballads.
Heine—Die Harzreise.

Heine—Select Ballads.
The Nibelungenlied. Parts I. and II.
Korner—Select Songs.
Poems for Recitation.
Goethe—The Road to Italy.

Little English Classics

Price (with a few exceptions) 2d; cloth, 3d. each.

BLACKIE'S LITTLE ENGLISH CLASSICS contains some of the best-known and most representative Selections from Standard Authors. Each volume is carefully edited by teachers of ripe experience, and is provided with a short Biographical Sketch, and brief, concise Explanatory Notes. Among the Poets represented the following are included:—

Aytoun.
Browning.
Burns.
Byron.
Campbell.

Coleridge.
Cowper.
Emerson.
Goldsmith.
Gray.

Hogg.
Johnson.
Keats.
Longfellow.
Macaulay.

Milton.
Moore.
Scott.
Shakespeare.

Shelley.
Southey.
Tennyson.
Wordsworth.

Warwick Shakespeare

Edited by Prof. HERFORD, Litt.D. The best and most widely used edition of Shakespeare for School purposes. Prices, 1s. and 1s. 6d.

The Series is in use in the following leading Schools, among very many others:—

Eton College.	The Charterhouse.	Wellington College.
Harrow School.	Newnham College.	Liverpool College.
St. Paul's School.	Girton College.	Dulwich College.
Rugby School.	Marlborough College.	Stonyhurst College.
King's College.	Rossall School.	Halleybury College.
Clifton College.	Malvern College.	Reading School.
Mereham Taylors'.	Winchester College.	Repton School.
City of London School.	Shrewsbury School.	Bradford Grammar School.

New English Texts

Edited by W. H. D. ROUSE, D.Litt.

Messrs. BLACKIE & SON have commenced to issue, under the above title, a New Series of leading English Texts. The Series will include specimens of all the acknowledged masters of English, each number being complete in itself, of a convenient size well printed in clear type on good paper, and issued at a low price. Each book will have a brief Introduction, but no Notes. Price 8d. each.

Defoe's Plague Year.
Irving's Columbus.
Hawkins's Voyages.
Dickens—Christmas Carol.
Erasmus's Essays.
Essays from De Quincey.
Lamb's Essays.
Macaulay's First Chapter.
Tales from the Decameron.

Napier's Peninsular War.
North's Plutarch: Alexander.
Captain J. Smith's Virginia.
Macaulay's Second Chapter.
Gibbon's Fifty-first Chapter.
Cook's Voyages.
Perry's Voyage to the East Indies.
Raleigh's Discovery of Gullana.
Tales from Arabian Nights.

Shilling Dictionary

A marvel of cheapness. A marvel of worth. 448 pages.

Strong in Technical and Scientific Terms, to which special Appendices are devoted. Many Illustrations of Mechanical Subjects. Illustrated Prospectus post free on application.

THE SCHOOLMASTER SAYS: "A marvel of cheapness. Fancy a book of this type, consisting of four hundred and forty-eight pages, for a shilling! Why, the forty pages of appendices are worth it."

the rigorous retention of the rule just quoted compels the author to write simply and brightly. The context is self-contained, and so the child finds himself in untroubled possession of the past and discovers that history is quite easy and interesting. That end is worth gaining even at the expense of truth; but the author, in his selection of facts, does not choose the fact for its conspicuousness, but for its significance. Nor is this all. No text-book should form the whole historical environment of the learner. The text-book needs supplementing by the teacher and by collateral reading. Hence, at the conclusion of each chapter, references are given to books for further reading, to contemporary documents, to historical novels and to poems descriptive of some interesting event. Geography, too, is not neglected, and the illustrations attain in some cases to a very high degree of beauty. A few more such books will do much to revolutionise the history lesson and to make it possible, by experimenting with them, to win to a clearer idea of the function of history.

THE STUDENT'S HISTORY OF SCOTLAND

By D. W. Rannie. (Methuen, 3s. 6d.) The average English schoolboy knows three things about Scots history: that Queen Mary was very beautiful and fascinating, that "Old Mortality" tells the story of the Covenanters, and that the Stuarts were always welcomed in Scotland. The average student knows a little more than this; the best informed may possibly be aware that the Lowlanders never wore kilts and never spoke Gaelic. Mr. Rannie impeaches the historians for devoting a disproportionate space to Queen Mary and the Reformation. This volume protests against this view. Students will certainly learn from it much that will give an added significance to our relations with Scotland and will enable them to answer many questions that they must otherwise have dismissed unanswered. For instance, why did Scotland so rapidly change from Catholicism and friendship with France to Calvinism and to union with England? The book is illustrated with maps and nearly succeeds in making the history interesting throughout, although Scotland seems to have more historical dead points than most countries.

HISTORY OF ROME

Vol. I. By Professor A. H. J. Greenidge. (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net.) Professor Greenidge is an historian born; his style is fluid and interesting and never degenerates into mere recording. The time covered by this first volume of his History of Rome is only twenty-nine years (133 B.C.—104 B.C.), but it is so crowded with life that the difficulty must have been in determining what to reject rather than to incorporate. And it is full enough for all but specialists. It is not an inspiring age, and the single relief to the record of cruelty and greed are the deeds and thoughts of the Gracchi. In the emphasis given to the Gracchan ideals and in the account of their partial realisation, as also in the admirable introduction dealing with the social and economic conditions and tendencies, Professor Greenidge shows how well he could have written a special history appealing alike to the economist, novelist and student of manners. General history, however, is tyrannous, and demands that the Infernos as well as the Paradises shall be surveyed—possibly that our emotions may be purified thereby, and hopes engendered of a good time when wars shall cease. Speaking of Caius Gracchus' oratory, Professor Greenidge writes: "This type of objective oratory, with its simple and vivid pictures, its brilliant but never laboured wit, its capacity for producing the illusion that the man is revealed in the utterance, its suggestion of something deeper than that which the mere words convey—a suggestion which all feel but only the learned understand—is equally pleasing to the trained and the unlettered mind." This passage, short as it is, may serve to indicate the readableness of the book—an excellent thing in histories—though it leaves the reader ignorant of the way in which the pages are sparked by epigram and reflection. It is intended to carry the history up to the accession of Vespasian—that means five more volumes. The accomplishment of such a task will entitle the author to rank with the best of English historians.

EARLY HISTORY OF INDIA

By V. A. Smith. (Clarendon Press, 14s. net.) Mr. Vincent Smith's History of India will be welcomed for its very able research into Alexander's India campaign. McCrindle, whom we had thought to have said the last word on this subject, is corrected in so important a matter as the place where Alexander's army crossed the Hydaspes. The difficulty in determining the exact path of the Macedonian army arises partly from the fact that the rivers of the Punjab have shifted their beds, and also from the topographical vagueness of the ancient writers. To reconcile these authorities and also to fix the course of the rivers in ancient times has been the author's self-assigned task, and we very much question whether any one will for some time to come attempt a reinvestigation of the problem to which the author has devoted so much care and thought. The second half of the book is less interesting than the first half; at least we find ourselves quite confused by the swift chronicle of events; the sensation produced is something like that begotten by trying to read names of stations through which we are passing at express speed. This criticism does not apply, however, to his account of the Emperor Asoka. Here the author, whether because of greater fulness in his authorities we know not, permits the reader to take his way leisurely, with the result that Asoka is better known to us than St. Louis or Henry III.—("of the simple life")—his poor counterfeits in European history. How interesting, for instance, to note the many anticipations of Christ's ethical code recorded on the Rocks, and still more to gather the conviction that in one respect dharma (Sanskrit, "dharma") or the law of piety excelled Christ's teaching in inculcating reverence for animal life. The story of Gadara would have been abhorrent to Asoka in his least zealous period. The volume is illustrated by good maps, and a chapter deals with the sources of the history.

FROM THE MONARCHY TO THE REPUBLIC IN FRANCE

By Sophia H. MacLehose. (MacLehose, 6s. net.) A brightly written account of the twelve years beginning in 1780 is as sure of its market as poultry at Christmas, for all the wonder of that time still possesses the imagination. Most readers like rapid bird's-eye views, thumb-nail sketches, extracts from memoirs and letters, anything, in short, that shows the outside life and movement. She has done her work well, and her book therefore may inspire the reader to go to Carlyle's great work and even to Tocqueville's "Ancien Régime" for causes of the upheaval and for philosophic reflections. Illustrations, good print and convenient size should lure many to give this old true story a trial.

DURUY'S GENERAL HISTORY

Translated and Revised by E. A. Grosvenor. (Dean & Son, 8s. 6d. net.)

MACAULAY'S ENGLAND IN 1685

Edited by H. C. Notcutt. (Blackie, 2s.)

LITTLE ARTHUR'S ENGLAND

By Lady Callcott. (Murray, 1s. 6d.)

BRITISH HISTORY IN REVIEW

By M. MacArthur. (Blackie, 1s. 6d.)

M. Duruy's book is useful for reference. Professor Grosvenor has added much matter of his own, carrying forward the history up to the present time.

It was a good idea of Professor Notcutt's to detach this interesting chapter from Macaulay's England and edit it with notes and introduction.

Lady Callcott has thoroughly revised her well-known little book, a review of which is unnecessary.

Mr. MacArthur's History is frankly a cram book, and will no doubt be found useful by students preparing for an examination.

HARVARD LECTURES ON GREEK SUBJECTS

By Prof. S. H. Butcher. (Macmillan, 7s. net.) In these Lectures Prof. Butcher's one object has been to answer the question "In what does the originality of the Greeks consist?" Matthew Arnold and others have revealed some of the secrets of their power; Prof. Butcher reveals many more, and still there is room for the humblest student to put out a claim. In the chapter on "Greek Love of Knowledge" the author writes that the word Kairos has no precise equivalent in any other language, yet to know what that word signified to the Greek mind is to be in possession of at least one secret. "Kairos is that immediate present which is what we make it; Time charged with opportunity; our own possession to be seized and vitalised by human energy; momentous, effectual, decisive; Time, the inert, transformed into purposeful activity." That is finely said. A people to whom such an idea was familiar had alert minds, always seeking by speculation and inquiry to extend the bounds of the known. They made geometry an abstract science; they took astronomy from the East and sought for an explanation of the curious movements of the planets; their theory of epicycles remained an undisputed hypothesis for centuries. They loved knowledge primarily because it gave them material for reason to work upon; the merely learned man or polymath was held in no repute. Knowledge was not knowledge until it had been stated in terms of thought, or, as Prof. Butler expresses it, "First, the facts must be assimilated and interpreted; the formative power of thought must work upon the material of knowledge." In short, the fascination of the Greeks is due to their passion for dialectic (interpreted broadly) or, in plain English, for discussion and criticism. Nothing was too sacred to speculate upon. Aristotle begins his treatise on the Soul with a tranquillity of spirit and a love of abstract thought only possible to one conscious that his reasoning would be understood and enjoyed. These lectures are not only full of thought, they are also written, it is superfluous to say, in admirable English.

Languages

FLORILEGIUM TIRONIS GRÆCUM

By Professors Burrows and Walters. (Macmillan, 4s. 6d.) This is a collection of "Unseens" so arranged and selected that the student will, in working through them, not only acquire facility in reading, but will also make acquaintance with passages of great literary merit. Each author chosen is represented by passages sufficient in number to form a preliminary study of his work as a whole. The idea is not to supplant the detailed and continuous study of a play or prose-piece, but to use unseens to give a kind of impressionist view of the whole field of literary art.

HORACE, ODES, EPODES AND CARMEN SÆCULARE

Vol. I. Edited by Dr. E. C. Wickham. (Oxford Press, 6s.) A scholar's edition with very full commentary. Ode 1, Book 1, for instance, has thirty-six lines, the notes to which fill six pages in small type. The principal variants of text are printed at the foot of each page of text.

LATIN HYMNS

By Professor W. A. Merrill. (Sanborn.) An interesting collection of hymns with brief biographical and philological notes and a short introduction.

THE EPISTLES TO THE THESSALONIANS

Edited by G. G. Findl. (Cambridge, 3s.) To the ten pages of text the editor supplies 220 pages of notes and an introduction of sixty pages. Professor Findlay's hope that "the train of thought in the original text is tracked out as closely as possible" is obviously, in view of the immense labour expended, founded on reason.

NEW FRENCH COURSE FOR SCHOOLS

Part I. By C. C. Perry and Dr. A. Reum. (Macmillan, 1s. 6d.) An excellent elementary course of lessons, comprising conversation, grammar, questions and illustrations.

LONGMANS' LATIN COURSE

Part III. By W. H. Spragge. (Longmans, 3s.) Intended to introduce the student to the difficulties of continuous Latin prose writing. The method adopted is to discuss some syntactical rule, to give a short passage for memorising and translation, and English sentences for translation requiring knowledge of rules just explained.

EXERCISE IN LATIN PROSE WITH VOCABULARY

Parts I. and II. By Professor G. G. Ramsay. (Clarendon Press, 1s. 6d. each.) School edition of the author's "Latin Prose Composition," Vol. I.

COMMERCIAL PRACTICE CONNECTED WITH THE EXPORT AND IMPORT TRADE—SPANISH, GERMAN, FRENCH

By J. Graham and A. S. Oliver. (Macmillan, 2s. 6d. each.) These three books are meant to instruct the student of commercial correspondence in the correct forms of expression and to supply him with specimens of business letters. Second and third parts of the books give translations of letters and questions on them.

SELECT TALES OF HANS ANDERSEN

Edited by Rev. H. J. Chaytor. (Blackie, 2s.) This little German Reader is made up of seven tales, notes, illustrations and vocabularies, with exercises for retranslation into German.

GERMAN READER FOR TECHNICAL SCHOOLS

By E. F. Seckler. (Blackwood, 2s.) Short readings in science, with an occasional reading on a non-technical subject; vocabulary and illustrations.

CHOIX DE LECTURES FRANCAISES

By R. Kaiser. (Blackie, 1s. 6d.) Readings, notes, vocabulary.

MURRAY'S SMALL CLASSICAL ATLAS

Edited by G. B. Grundy. (Murray, 6s.) This Atlas fulfils all the requirements of the young student in classics. It contains fifteen maps, in some of which are contour lines; the index is very full. As the number and name of each map cannot be known until the map is opened, many will wish that some device had been adopted whereby reference to a particular map might be less cumbrous.

English

AGE OF CHIVALRY: AGE OF FABLE: LEGENDS OF CHARLEMAGNE

By Thomas Bulfinch. (Dean, 2s. 6d. each net.) Each reader has a short introduction giving the sources of the material and also reasons why such books are needed. It is certain that the child who reads them will find the allusiveness of general literature less troublesome. In one book the compiler says, "In the intercourse of polished society a young person will more frequently need an acquaintance with the creations of fancy than with the discoveries of science or the speculations of philosophy." As we do not know anything about polished society, we cannot refute this statement; but we wonder why the author went out of his way to seek for a high reason out of reach of most when a low one within reach of all would have served his purpose. Children love to read stories, and that is enough.

BYRON—SELECTED POETRY

By Professor J. W. Duff. (Blackwood, 3s. 6d.) The introduction to this volume is so well done that it is a pity it cannot have an existence apart from the poems here selected. Nothing has been done perfunctorily; Professor Duff is himself interested in Byron, and passes on to his reader, in consequence, some of the emotion he himself has felt. The young student cannot begin with a poet more adapted to youth. Swinburne thought Byron no poet at all, and gave as one reason among many that his poems read better in translation than in the original. Ruskin, on the other hand, gave him a high place, ranking him as a master of expression. Estimates, however, of this kind are of little use to the reader; they imply an acquaintance with the whole field of literature. Such criticism does not feed the student, it simply inflates him and tends to make him think more of the things said about a poet than to encourage him to independent reading. In editing a "selection of poems" the editor should suppress allusiveness, should rigorously subject all his opinions to the test of his particular selection. It is idle to talk of Byron shocking the ears of the dull Early Victorian if the student cannot himself check the statement from the material supplied to him. The biographical portions of an introduction must necessarily be accepted by the reader as told; but the absolute treatment of a poet's work should precede the relative. Unhappily our editors have never grasped this fact. For instance, Professor Duff says, referring to "The Prisoner of Chillon," that "Wordsworth's influence acts on both expression and thought." How is the reader to check this? He is probably ignorant of Wordsworth, and has therefore no idea whatever of the difference between pure Byron and Byron fused with Wordsworth. To the reader familiar with both poets the criticism is interesting because it challenges him to test its accuracy. Still, for all this saying, let it not be thought for a moment that we have anything but praise for the skill and the discrimination Professor Duff has brought to his task.

SELECTED POEMS OF ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING

Edited by Elizabeth Lee. (Ginn, 1s. 6d.) The objection just raised against the giving of relative criticism scarcely applies to the introduction to this interesting and representative selection, as the editor devotes only a few pages to criticism. Even here, though, such a statement as the following must be wholly unintelligible not only to school children, but to others: "In the Sonnets from the Portuguese Mrs. Browning has achieved one of the great lyrics of the world. It fulfils all the necessary conditions of pure poetry..." This is criticism based on a knowledge of the world's greatest lyrics, and we ask for whom is it intended? The notes are sufficient and necessary.

ETYMOLOGICAL AND PRONOUNCING DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE

By the Rev. James Stormonth; the pronunciation carefully revised by the Rev. P. M. Phelp. A new edition edited by William Bayne. (Blackwood, 5s. net.) A good etymological and pronouncing Dictionary in a compact form at a reasonable price is a great boon, and we welcome warmly the new edition of the above work. Five years were spent over the task of revision, and the result has on the whole amply repaid the expenditure of labour. The volume in its new form extends to over a thousand pages, yet owing to the thinness of the paper is quite portable; and the type, though small, stands out perfectly clear. Owing to the excellent system of grouping together words derived from or connected with the same leading or key word, derived and related words are presented simultaneously to the eye. The two new features of the etymological part of the book are that in words of Teutonic origin various cognate words have been added to the Anglo-Saxon root-word, and that the quantities of root-words have been marked throughout. The Dictionary is, with a few exceptions, adequate, though it fails to justify the claim made in the preface—"to give a wide reflex of the terms of familiar slang." We are also surprised to find that no mention is made either of "the lancers" or of "bridge," though we observe that, with a charming naïveté, poker is described as "a game of cards originally played for money." There are four excellent appendices containing dictionaries of prefixes and postfixes, abbreviations, scriptural and classical proper names, and Latin and French quotations. The only fault we can find with the latter is that, if anything, it is too exhaustive, giving many quotations which are but rarely used. But why is so splendid and immortal a quotation as "Sub specie aeternitatis" omitted?

Mathematics and Science

PRACTICAL GEOMETRY FOR BEGINNERS

By V. Foster and F. W. Dobbs. (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.)

THEORETICAL GEOMETRY FOR BEGINNERS

Parts I., II., III. and IV. By C. H. Allcock. (Macmillan, 1s. 6d. each part.)

ELEMENTARY COURSE OF MATHEMATICS

By H. S. Hall and F. H. Stevens. (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.)

PRACTICAL EXERCISES IN GEOMETRY

By W. D. Eggar. (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.)

A NEW GEOMETRY FOR SCHOOLS

By S. Barnard and J. M. Child. (Macmillan, 4s. 6d.)

WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS'

NEW EDUCATIONAL WORKS.

A NEW SERIES OF READERS

The Story of the World

IN FIVE BOOKS.

By M. B. SYNGE, Author of "Stories from European History," &c., &c. Coloured Frontispiece, numerous Illustrations and Maps. BOOK I., On the Shores of the Great Sea, 1s. 4d. BOOK II., The Discovery of New Worlds, 1s. 6d. BOOK III., The Awakening of Europe, 1s. 6d. BOOK IV., The Struggle for Sea Power, 1s. 9d. BOOK V., Growth of the British Empire, 2s. (PRIZE EDITION, complete in two volumes, 3s. 6d. net each.)

Uniform with the above,

The World's Childhood

IN TWO BOOKS.

Book I. ready immediately. 128 pages, with 40 Illustrations. Price 10d. Book II. in the press. 128 pages, with numerous Illustrations.

BLACKWOODS' LITERATURE READERS

Edited by JOHN ADAMS, M.A., B.Sc., F.C.P., Professor of Education in the University of London.

Book I., pp. 228, price 1s. Book II., pp. 275, price 1s. 4d.

Book III., pp. 303, price 1s. 6d. Book IV., pp. 381, price 1s. 6d.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Byron—Selections. By Professor WIGHT-DUFF, M.A.

A History of English Literature. By J. LOGIE ROBERTSON, M.A. 3s.

Outlines of English Literature. By the same. 1s. 6d.

Paraphrasing, Analysis, and Correction of Sentences By D. M. J. JAMES, M.A., Gordon Schools, Huntly. 1s. Also in Two Parts, 6d. each.

The School Anthology (Chaucer to the Present Day). By J. H. LOBBAN, M.A. In Two Parts, 2s. each. One Volume, 4s. Prize Edition, 5s.

Stormonth's English Dictionary. Pronouncing, Etymological, and Explanatory. An entirely new edition. Re-edited and Re-set. I. School and College Edition. Crown 8vo, 1,100 pp., 5s. net. II. Handy School Edition, 16mo, 1s.

Educational News.—"Possesses, in copious selection of words, and keenness as well as clearness of definition, high worth—as a concise, accurate, and full treasury of the most useful vocabularies in the English language."

A First Latin Reader. With Notes, Exercises, and Vocabulary. By K. P. WILSON, M.A., Fettes College. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d.

First Latin Sentences and Prose (with Vocabulary). By K. P. WILSON, M.A. 2s. 6d. Also in Two Parts, 1s. 6d. each.

Lower Latin Prose. By K. P. WILSON, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Higher Latin Prose. By H. W. AUDEN, M.A. 2s. 6d.

Higher Latin Unseen. By the same. 2s. 6d.

Lower Latin Unseen. Selected, with Introduction, by W. LOBBAN, M.A., Classical Master, Girls' High School, Glasgow. 2s.

BLACKWOODS' ILLUSTRATED CLASSICAL TEXTS.

Cæsar—Gallic War, Books I.—III. 1s. 6d. Cæsar—Gallic War, Books IV., V. 1s. 6d. Cæsar—Gallic War, Books VI., VII. 1s. 6d. With or without vocabulary.

Xenophon—Anabasis, Books I., II. 1s. 6d. Horace—Odes. Books III., IV. 1s. 6d. Livy—Book XXVIII. 1s. 6d.

Greek Accidence. For Use in Preparation and Public School. By T. O. WEATHERHEAD, M.A., Trinity College, Cambridge; formerly B. University Scholar. 1s. 6d.

The Messenian Wars. An Elementary Greek Reader. By H. W. AUDEN, M.A. 1s. 6d.

All French Verbs in Twelve Hours. By A. J. WYATT, M.A. 1s.

A First Book of "Free Composition" in French. By J. EDMOND MANSION, B.Sc., L., Royal Academical Institution, Belfast. 1s.

The Children's Guide to the French Language. By ANNIE G. FERRIER. 1s.

Spartanerjünglinge. A Story of Life in a Cadet College. By PAUL VON SZEPANSKI. Edited with Vocabulary and Notes by J. MORRISON, M.A., Aberdeen Grammar School. 2s.

JUST PUBLISHED.

A German Reader for Technical Schools. By E. F. SEUKLER.

Forty Elementary Lessons in Chemistry. By W. L. SARGANT, M.A., Head Master, Oakham School. Illustrated. 1s. 6d.

Inorganic Tables, with Notes and Equations. By H. M. TIMPANY, B.Sc., Science Master, Borough Technical School, Shrewsbury. Crown 8vo. 1s.

Full Educational Catalogue sent post free on application to

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS,

45 George Street, Edinburgh; & 37 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

A NEW GEOMETRY FOR JUNIOR FORMS

By S. Barnard and J. M. Child. (2s. 6d.)

LONGMANS' SENIOR ARITHMETIC

By T. F. G. Dexter and A. H. Garlick. (Longmans, 4s. 6d.)

TREATISE ON GRAPHS

By G. A. Gibson. (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.)

INTRODUCTION TO THE CALCULUS

By G. A. Gibson. (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.)

1. Provides practical exercises in geometry in preparation for the study of formal proofs. The authors believe that by practical work the students will discover some of "those truths which are the groundwork of geometrical theory." References are given at the end of the book to Mr. Allcock's "Theoretical Geometry for Beginners." We do not see why the authors should express their faith in the possibility of children discovering truths for themselves and then reveal their unbelief by references to formal proofs to be committed, presumably, to memory. Again, the authors evidently fail to realise that all proofs are relative and that, therefore, between the highest proofs and the first conceptions of lineal and spatial relation there is a series of proofs satisfactory or unsatisfactory according to the axioms assumed. Have the authors ever considered that on the assumption that space is finite Euclid's proposition that the three angles of a triangle are equal to two right angles falls to the ground? Mr. Allcock in his book states that this particular proposition cannot be demonstrated by the rotation of a pencil because it breaks down in the case of spherical triangles, forgetting that the assumption in that proof is that the figure is plane.

2. Mr. Allcock's theoretical geometry is best when Euclid is no longer able to guide him, that is, in Part IV.

3. Messrs. Hall and Stevens' idea of a course on Elementary Mathematics is to bind three distinct books into one.

4. Mr. Eggar gives a well-thought-out series of exercises, differing toto caelo from the books speciously adopting the new method whilst rigorously preserving some of the most serious defects of the old.

5. and 6. Both books carefully elaborated. Proofs are always given in full, however, where frequently a hint is all that is required to put the child on the track of a proof.

7. So long as arithmetic is taught separately and is a subject of examination such books as this will be in demand. When arithmetic is no longer a subject of examination and is taught concurrently with or fused into other branches of elementary mathematics, it may be possible to get hold of intelligently constructed text-books.

8. and 9. Professor Gibson's Graphs is the most complete treatment of elementary graphs known to us, and his Calculus, although it has many rivals, is in parts original in treatment. Both books abound in exercises.

THE ELEMENTS OF TRIGONOMETRY

By S. H. Loney, M.A. (Cambridge University Press, 3s. 6d.) In this text-book Professor Loney has shown great mathematical eminence—not necessarily a bar to giving a concise and lucid exposition of the mere alphabet of a science. The book is intended rather as an initiation than a treatise. As in his "Elements of Hydrostatics" and his "Elements of Statics and Dynamics," the writer has been careful to consider the class of students for whom it is destined. Anxious, for instance, to avoid terrifying the reader with the more elaborate and difficult sections of the work, he keeps back such subjects as the Circular Measure of Angles and the Trigonometrical Functions of Angles greater than two Right Angles till the end of the book. Altogether an admirable piece of work, and we can pay it no higher compliment than to say that it is well on the level of those other text-books for which Professor Loney is so well known.

TEXT-BOOK OF PHYSICS—HEAT

By J. H. Poynting and J. J. Thomson. (Griffin.) Although treating the subject in the main experimentally, there is sufficient theory for all but advanced students.

EconomicsPOVERTY

By Robert Hunter. (Macmillan, 6s. 6d. net.) This is a study in the effects of unemployment, long hours of work, and under-paid employment in the towns of the United States. It is an awful panorama of misery that the writer unfolds. Unless economists in the United States find speedily a remedy for this social evil conditions of life there must become intolerable, and legislation will prove powerless to avert a great economic war. Mr. Hunter writes from wide experience, and he believes that the "ruin and degradation of working people who are on the verge of poverty" may be prevented by wise legislation.

THE DISTRIBUTION OF WEALTH

By Professor T. N. Carver. (Macmillan, 6s. 6d. net.) Professor Carver's warning to his readers at the outset, that economics is not a branch of polite literature, is quite superfluous, for the reader has only to study a few pages before the earnestness with which the subjects are expounded infects him. The exposition is clear, and occasionally graphic representations are given to make it impossible for the student to escape comprehension. Professor Carver is lecturer at Harvard, and is no doubt familiar with the fact of an undergraduate's power of facile reading unaccompanied by an equal facility either in understanding the argument or in distinguishing theory from knowledge. At the end of each chapter references are given to books for collateral reading.

PedagogyTHE PRINCIPLES OF EDUCATION

By T. Raymont. (Longmans, 4s. 6d.) Professor Raymont has achieved a notable success in writing a book on School Management at once readable and suggestive. It is one of the evils of the present system of training teachers that they are lectured on what they might be left to find out for themselves. If discussion and practice were substituted for the lecture, teachers would look back to their training as one of the brightest periods of their life. Strange, is it not, that in an age when self-activity, individual research and self-expression are the watchwords for teachers the teachers themselves are treated to lectures just as they might have been a thousand years ago. If we believe in Froebel, in Herbart, in Spencer, why are lectures still the staple of the college course? Surely the way to interest a young teacher in his work is to let him experience in himself the joy of discovery and of self-expression. Lectures no doubt have an emotional value; but how few professors of education are artists. Once permit experiment in the class-room and discussion, preceded by the reading of suggested chapters, to take the place of the formal lecture, the teacher will not need to be told that his occupation is one of the highest possible, he will know it by actual experience. Professor Raymont's book will supply material for good discussion; if the teacher is encouraged to cross-examine its evidence and to detect flaws in its arguments, so much the better. Before concluding this short notice it ought to be said that there is a tendency to-day to assume that environment—passive and active—is all and that heredity is nothing. Such a belief is likely to improve teaching, but it is well to remember the fact that every child is the product of the ages, the last term of a series reaching back to infinity, and that, therefore, all education theories are incomplete that do not include inquiry into the economic aspects of marriage.

NOTES ON GERMAN SCHOOLS

By W. H. Winch. (Longmans, 6s.) Some years ago Mr. Winch's "Problems in Education" was reviewed in THE ACADEMY. A defect of that book, it was pointed out, was a lack of intelligibility, and a few sentences were quoted that seemed to have no meaning whatever. Now this defect cannot be urged against the present volume. It is eminently lucid; but was it worth writing? If the specimens here given are genuinely representative of teaching in German schools it is beyond cavil that England has nothing to learn from Germany. Imagine a history lesson conducted in this style. The school is in Frankfort, the children are ten years old, the lesson is on the Thirty Years' War.

When did the war begin?

When did it end?

Whom was it between?

What kind of a war was it?

What religion was the Kaiser's?

In what countries was the fighting?

Who had the larger army?

Who were beaten?

What religion were the people compelled to follow?

Could stupidity farther go? And Mr. Winch really thinks that this kind of stuff is worth repeating. To regard the notes as forming the basis of a comparative study in popular education is to reveal a nescience tantamount to that of the Emperor's who, in proof of his having conquered Britain, displayed a few stones gathered from its shore.

AN UNWRITTEN CHAPTER IN THE HISTORY OF EDUCATION

By Dr. H. Kingsmill Moore. (Macmillan, 7s. 6d. net.) This volume tells very fully and carefully the life-history of the Kildare Place Society, in Dublin (1811-1831). The buildings formerly occupied by this Society are now used as a Training College, of which Dr. Moore is principal. "The Kildare Place of 1811-1831 became," writes Dr. Moore, "to all intents and purposes as completely buried as any Roman city before the spade of the explorer restored it to light." How Dr. Moore has been enabled to tell the story of this Society and by what accident the documents were discovered all interested in Irish educational history may now know.

THE SCHOOLMASTERS' YEAR-BOOK AND DIRECTORY 1905

(Sonnenschein, 5s. net.) As this Directory is now three years old, it is not necessary to do more than give it a welcome and to congratulate the editors on the care they have bestowed on the education of their child. We should like to urge once more the claims of schoolmistresses to consideration and to suggest that the title be changed to "The Teachers' Year-book," Part I. of which to resemble the present volume and Part II. to include names of girls' schools and their staffs, with such other information as may seem advisable.

TWENTY REASONS WHY WE SHOULD BUY THE TATLER

- | | |
|----------------------------|---|
| I. Its Paper | XIII. Its Pretty Girl Competition |
| II. Its Printing | XIV. Its Pretty Children Competition. |
| III. Its Short Story | XV. Its Who and Why Competition |
| IV. Its Society | XVI. Its Musical Pages |
| V. Its Sport | XVII. Its Golf Article |
| VI. Its Theatre | XVIII. Its Motor Article |
| VII. Its Bran Pie | XIX. Its Furniture Article |
| VIII. Its Mixed Bag | XX. Because it is a Bright Smart Paper, seen by Bright and Smart People |
| IX. Its Acrostics | |
| X. Its Humorous Pages | |
| XI. Its Chestnut Tree | |
| XII. Its Kodak Competition | |

Monthly Literature

THE high monthly periodicals stand on the debatable ground that lies between literature and journalism. It is true, no doubt, that they have the prestige of literature, that their contributors would experience a just and reasonable indignation if they were called journalists; but, in point of fact, few of the articles in the monthlies survive the period of their circulation any more than do the ephemeral productions of the daily press. Yet, with a few exceptions, the contents of the higher class of monthlies stand on an extremely high level. The contributors are in most cases men of repute, writing on their own special subjects with all the authority of experts. We would suggest that the most efficient method of rescuing from oblivion much which is worthy to endure is not merely to reprint en bloc the articles of the same contributor, but rather to reprint the articles of different contributors on the same subject on the principle suggested by Mr. H. G. Wells in "Anticipations." How interesting, for instance, would be a collection of all the best articles that have appeared on M. Maeterlinck, with the view of M. Max Nordau lying cheek by jowl with that of Comte Alfred de Soissons. The reader would thus be able to see almost simultaneously the two sides of the question, each putting the other into a more vivid relief.

Apart, however, from the question of quality, it is interesting to examine the character of the subject-matter. To judge from an inspection of the contents of four representative periodicals, the main staple of the present "monthly" is foreign affairs. Of course, the delicate condition of international politics is to a great extent responsible for this; yet, even so, the figures are startling.

Of the fifty-four articles no less than sixteen, or about 35 per cent., deal with foreign politics, five with domestic problems, three with theology and four with literature (excluding two which merely contain reviews). On the whole, "The Fortnightly Review" impresses us as holding the balance the best and as exhibiting the widest and most cosmopolitan outlook. Of its sixteen articles four deal with foreign, one with English and one with Irish politics; two are devoted to literature; two to music, one to history. It is interesting also to notice that "The Independent Review" contains a short story, and "The Monthly Review" a poem in addition to its serial. The comparatively small space, however, given to literature surprises us but little. In the first place, there are now no burning questions which agitate the literary world. Decadence is played out. Aestheticism is but an interesting reminiscence of a bygone generation. The wars between the various cults and schools have subsided with the exception of an occasional skirmish. Of the four literary articles, moreover, it is instructive to observe that two are concerned with the private lives rather than the literary merits of their subjects. Of course, it is impossible to generalise with confidence from such small figures, yet one is reminded of the theory which ascribed to the Harriet episode the popularity of Shelley among the more aspiring of lower-grade intellects. Finally, even at our best we are not, and never have been, an artistic nation. Compared with that of the French, our standard in art, criticism and literature is ludicrously low. We refuse, on the whole, to attach the requisite seriousness to what is for the majority but a pastime and an amusement. It is significant that we have not a single great Review devoted exclusively to matters of literary and artistic interest.

THE INTERNATIONAL BOOK CIRCULAR,
No. 139,

Containing a special article, entitled:
"SOME CONTEMPORARY FOREIGN CHEMISTS."

By Dr. M. O. FORSTER, together with an exact bibliography of their publications and a double
plate of their portraits.—Specimen copies gratis.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, Book Importers,
14 Henrietta st, Covent Garden, W.C.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,

100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C.,
AND 4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both
Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale
Commissions executed.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately
done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens
and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

AUTHORS' MSS., Sermons, Plays, Envelopes,
&c., carefully typed at home (Remington),
9d. per 1,000 words. Orders promptly executed.
—M. M. L., 7 Vernon Road, Clapham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING.—All kinds. Novels, 9d.
1,000. Translations. — Miss HANDLY,
Berkhamsted.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS., 10d. per 1,000, all descriptions; neat, prompt,
accurate; duplicating a speciality, Shorthand.
Testimonials.—Mrs. MICHEL, 23 Quarrendon
Street, Fulham, S.W.

PROPRIETORS of BOOK PUBLISHING,
Newspaper, or kindred concerns requiring
Active PARTNERS, INVESTORS, or to SELL
—Publishers' Readers, Editors, Managers, &c.,
seeking PARTNERSHIPS, Sound INVEST-
MENTS, or to PURCHASE, write MANAGER,
20A Yukon Road, Balham (Estd. 1902.)

INFORMATION TO LIBRARIANS AND COLLECTORS.

TO SELL (privately) the fine Collection of the late Mr. Guffroy on the French Revolution:
French Books, Revolutionary Papers,
Placards, Pamphlets on Louis XVI., Marie
Antoinette, Robespierre, Napoleon, &c., &c.; all genuine and scarce; the finest opportunity at a very moderate charge.—Write to M. A. H.,
9 Connaught Street, Hyde Park.

*Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volumes of THE ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher,
9 East Harding Street, E.C.*

ADVERTISEMENTS (Select Trade) for the COVER PAGES of the ACADEMY should be sent not later than Noon on Thursday to 9 East Harding Street, E.C. Terms, &c., on application.

PHOTOGRAPHS. — Amateurs and others owning Photographs of Literary, Musical, Artistic, or Dramatic interest are requested to communicate with the Editor of this Journal, 9 East Harding St.,
E.C.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW

No. 411. JANUARY, 1905. 8vo, 6s.

1. THE REFORMATION IN ENGLAND.
2. AUBREY DE VERE, POET.
3. THE COLOUR QUESTION IN THE UNITED STATES.
4. THE FALL OF THE DIRECTORY.
5. BISHOP CREIGHTON.
6. SWEDEN.
7. SPENSER IN IRELAND.
8. HOMER AND HIS COMMENTATORS: A REVIEW OF MODERN RESEARCHES IN THE PREHISTORIC MEDITERRANEAN.
9. TYPHOONS AND CYCLONES.
10. BURNE-JONES.
11. THE "GREAT CONSULT."

LONGMANS, GREEN & Co.,
39 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

THE ENGLISH HISTORICAL REVIEW

Edited by REGINALD L. POOLE, M.A., Ph.D.,

Fellow of Magdalen College and Lecturer in Diplomatic in the University of Oxford.

JANUARY, 1905. Price 5s.

Articles.

THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE TWELVE
TABLES. By A. H. J. Greenidge, D.Litt.

BONCHESVALLES. By the Right Hon. Sir Edward Fry, D.C.L.

THE NORTHERN QUESTION IN 1717. By
J. F. Chance, Part I.

Notes and Documents.

THE BATTLEFIELD OF HASTINGS. By F.
Baring.

THE IRISH ABRIDGMENT OF THE "EX-PUGNATIO HIBERNICA." By Whitley
Stokes, C.S.I., D.C.L.

JAMES VI AND ROME. By G. F. Warner, D.Litt.
And others.

Reviews of Books. Notices of Periodical Publications.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO., 39 Paternoster Row, E.C.

HOMELY HINTS

ON FOOD AND COOKING, DIGESTION AND INDIGESTION, With Over 140 Simple, Practical, and Economical Receipts.

Handsomely bound in cloth, 1s.

"'HOMELY HINTS,' a shilling publication which has been recently issued, an exceedingly useful and instructive little book, is bound to find its way into quarters where the more bulky tomes could never possibly penetrate. The book is divided into three parts. Chapter I. deals with the values of the various kinds of food; Chapter II. treats of digestion, how to prevent and how to cure indigestion; Chapter III. comprises a most complete selection of recipes of popular French, English and American dishes, with minute details as to their preparation. It is neatly bound, and is sure to be in great demand by all classes of the community."

PUBLISHED BY ALF. COOKE, Ltd., CROWN PRINTING WORKS, LEEDS.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIUMSEVERY DAY

IS

PUBLISHERS' DAY

IN THE

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

Special literary issue
on Saturdays.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S.
appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR
PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN
AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current
Literature, and without doubt the best
Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.
Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON ST., HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

NEWCASTLE DAILY JOURNAL

Established 1832.

The Conservative Newspaper for the Counties of Northumberland, Durham,
Cumberland, and Berwickshire.

SPECIAL REVIEW DAY—
SATURDAYS.

London Office (special wire), 169 Fleet Street, E.C.

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN

Established 1821.

Published Daily. Price One Penny.

Has a circulation peculiar to itself among the more cultivated classes of Great Britain in every district, and claims, with justice, to be one of the leading papers in the country.

Contains special columns devoted to literary matters.

Applications for above spaces should be made to Messrs. Crossley & Co.,
57a Coleman Street, London, E.C.
Special Rates for a Series will be quoted.

NOTICE.

As a New Volume began with the issue for January 7th, this is a suitable time to subscribe to "THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE," which is POSTED FREE (52 issues at 3d.) to every ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying 13/-. FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a PREPAYMENT of 17/6 will secure it being sent Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy. Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or Newsvendor, or direct to the Publisher, 9 East Harding Street, E.C.

By John Oliver Hobbes.

IN THE PRESS.

THE FLUTE OF PAN. 6s.

The story of Mrs. Craigie's new novel is above all things a love story. The scenes are laid in Venice, in Florence, and in the Princess Margaret's own kingdom of Siguria, which may be taken as one of those kingdoms in Europe that keep more of the old romantic Court life, with its intrigues, its dramatic surprises, its dangers and its pleasures, than is possible in any of the capitals of the greater European nations.

"It needs no great imagination to realise Mrs. Craigie's heroine. You can see this daughter of a long line of kings, proud, impulsive, and capricious, sensitive, with her wistful humour and her hungry heart—'a woman first, and a Princess—oh, a long way afterwards.' She is like the girl in Christina Rossetti's poem:—

'I, a Princess, king-descended, decked with jewels, gilded, drest,
Would rather be a peasant, with her baby at her breast,
For all I shine so like the sun, and am purple like the west.'

Her cryle is among the eagles, the little lonely Queen. The Emperor calls her cousin; her stern old Prime Minister, and the solemn Lords of the Council, bewilder her with their protocols, their ordinances, their treaties; the fierce clansmen of the mountains are in arms because of some dues, or taxes, or tribal rights—what does she know about it all? She understands nothing of it, except that she loves her people, and wants to see them happy. She likes the show and the glitter, the crown jewels, the gallant gentlemen who come clanking in with sword and spur to kiss her hand. But reigning Princess as she is, she feels that she needs an arm to lean upon, a masterful tongue to tell her what to do. She is a creature of delicate shades and half-tones: impetuous, kindly, gracious, rather timid and shrinking, if it were not for her training and traditions, above all tender and loving."—Mr. SIDNEY LOW in THE STANDARD.

New Popular Editions.

Bound in cloth, 1/- net each.

LOVE AND THE SOUL HUNTERS.
SOME EMOTIONS AND A MORAL,
and
THE SINNER'S COMEDY.
A STUDY IN TEMPTATIONS, and A BUNDLE OF LIFE.

Price 6/- each.

THE VINEYARD.
THE SCHOOL FOR SAINTS.
ROBERT ORANGE.
THE HERB-MOON.
LOVE AND THE SOUL HUNTERS.
THE TALES OF JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.
THE GODS, SOME MORTALS, and LORD WICKENHAM.

TALES ABOUT TEMPERAMENTS.

Crown 8vo, 2/6 net.

T. FISHER UNWIN, London.

THE TALKING MASTER

An Irresponsibility.

BY

W. TEIGNMOUTH SHORE.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH:

"A fresh and altogether delightful little book is... 'The Talking Master.' It is so entirely unlike anything the reader is led to anticipate from the title, that the story develops in what we may term a tissue and succession of pleasant surprises. The central idea will be pronounced whimsical by some critics; but the originality of the conception, the quiet humour, genial drollery, and reaggish satire with which the whole is worked out, more than balance the trifling strain of an improbable plot. . . . Nothing can be better than the mock-serious lectures on 'talking.' . . . they are the drollest things imaginable. . . . As attractive and delightful a story as the most exigent reader could desire."

THE BIRMINGHAM POST:

"Positively coruscating dialogue."

TRUTH:

"An excellent farce."

THE PUBLISHERS' CIRCULAR:

"One of the gayest and wittiest novels that has come our way a long time."

DAILY EXPRESS:

"A clever, witty tale."

MORNING POST:

"Vivacity and lightheartedness throughout the story."

DAILY CHRONICLE:

"Irresistibly funny."

Price 6/-

London: ISBISTER & CO.,
15 & 16 Tavistock Street, W.C.

A Book about Books for Bookmen.

EGOMET

BY

E. G. O.

Crown 8vo.

3/6 net.

THE STAR:

"These delightful papers. . . . These essays are riddled with the frank enthusiasms of a booklover."

THE LITERARY WORLD:

"E. G. O. is a genial soul, and his pages exhale a delicious odour of books."

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE:

"There is charm."

THE SCOTSMAN:

"All booklovers will follow with interest the author's opinions."

THE GLASGOW HERALD:

"Booklovers will enjoy his irresponsible deliveries and quaint conceits."

THE EASY CHAIR:

"The charm of this book lies in the way in which the true artist gives expression to the emotions of a lover of books."

The Artist's Life

BY

JOHN OLIVER HOBBS

A COLLECTION OF BRILLIANT ESSAYS ON

DANTE, GOYA, BALZAC,
TURNER, AND BRAHMS.

Crown 8vo, with Frontispiece and Designed Cover, 2s. 6d. net.

The Artist's Life

"The Literary World" says:

"... With much sympathy, insight, and humour she gives a vivid sketch of the spiritual discipline through which the genius of each man had to pass. In the cold print of the book the sparkle and wit are still there."

The Artist's Life

"The Queen" says:

"John Oliver Hobbes blends the anecdote and the essay very happily. Her judgments are often as pregnant as they are epigrammatical."

The Artist's Life

"The Bookman" says:

"There is much good sense and broad thought in this interesting blend of biography and criticism."

The Artist's Life

"The Globe" says:

"The conclusions of Mrs. Craigie are based on just premisses, and they are expressed in a controlled and lucid phrase that it is pleasant to read."

The Artist's Life

"The Morning Post" says:

"They are clear, unprejudiced, and appreciative sketches. They are worthy of the attention of all who are seriously concerned with the higher manifestations of art in poetry, fiction, music, and painting."

The Artist's Life

"The Scotsman" says:

"Thoughtful, suggestive, and interesting essays. Should prove welcome to cultured readers."

The Artist's Life

"Review of Reviews":

"If you care for terse, clear-cut style, for vigorous English and original thought, you will enjoy the essays included in 'The Artist's Life'."

T. WERNER LAURIE,

CLIFFORD'S INN, FLEET ST., LONDON.

The Academy and Literature

No. 1707. Established 1869.

London: 21 January 1905.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17s. 6d. a year.]

Notes

THE spring of the present year promises to be interesting to all Shakespeareans. Not only is Mr. Beerbohm Tree to give a special series of Shakespeare performances at His Majesty's Theatre, the proceeds from which will be devoted to the Shakespeare Memorial, but the London Shakespeare League have, as last year, chosen that time for their annual commemoration of the poet. The programme will include a public dinner, a Shakespeare play, a conversazione, an excursion round Shakespeare's London, a visit to Stratford-on-Avon in the early part of the summer and, possibly, a children's Elizabethan festival. A new and welcome feature, however, in the Society will be an address to the Shakespeare public at large, to be given by a Shakespeare student elected annually by vote of the Council. The play will, as before, be produced by the Elizabethan Stage Society under the management of Mr. William Poel. I am pleased, moreover, to learn that the League is working hand-and-glove with the Shakespeare Memorial Committee and that eight members of the League are on the Provisional Memorial Committee. The London Shakespeare League are in great hopes of increasing their membership. I certainly think that they have struck the psychological moment and I wish them all success.

A FRESH impetus will be given to the Whistler controversy by the Memorial Exhibition of the painter's works by the International Society of Sculptors, Painters and Gravers, which will be held at the New Gallery at the conclusion of the fifth exhibition now open in Regent Street. The exhibition should be of a representative character, as all the State, Municipal and local galleries which possess examples of Mr. Whistler's art are lending the works that they possess. Amongst other contributors are His Majesty the King, the French Government and the Chicago Institute of the Fine Arts.

"WHAT'S become of Waring?" This question, originally asked by Browning upwards of half a century ago, is answered in an interesting article by Mr. William Hall Griffin, in "The Contemporary," on "Robert Browning and Alfred Domett," where a detailed account is given of the life of Domett in New Zealand and of the warm affection between the poet and his friend, which subsisted without a break up to the death of the poet's wife. Here a pause ensued owing to Browning's shyness in replying to Domett's letter of sympathy. On the latter's return to England, however, the bonds of friendship were knit as close as ever before. It is instructive to read Domett's verdict on "Sordello," a copy of which Browning sent him in New Zealand. He believed, apparently, in the poet's intentional obscurity, and insinuates that Browning was "difficult on system." The following extract from his diary is of peculiar interest:—

"Browning, I saw, had not lost the good-humoured patience with which he could listen to friendly criticism on any of his works. I have proof of this in a copy of the original edition of 'Sordello,' which he sent me when it first appeared. The poem is undoubtedly somewhat obscure, though curiously enough much more so in the more 'objective' (so to speak) incidents of the story than in its subjective phases—that is, in the narrative of the hero's varying moods of mind or the philosophical reflections of the poet. Accordingly, I had scribbled in pencil on the book two or three impatient remarks, such as 'Who says this?' 'What does this mean?' &c. Some time after Browning asked me to let him see my copy of the poem, which I lent him. He returned it with two or three pencil notes of his own, answering my questions. But I was amused many years afterwards, in New Zealand, on the appearance of a second edition of 'Sordello' [in 1863], to find he had altered, I think, all the passages I had hinted objections to or questioned the meaning of. One instance is curious. Speaking of a picture by Guidone at Siena ['Sordello,' Book I., 577-583], in the first edition, the poet says:—

A painful birth must be Matured ere San Eufemio's [sic] sacristy
Or transept gather fruits of one great gaze
At the noon-sun: look you! An orange haze—
The same blue stripe round that—and, i' the midst,
Thy spectral whiteness, mother-maid, who didst
Pursue the dizzy painter!

I had written carelessly in pencil on the margin 'Rather the moon, from the description'; and also, 'Why cut off the "n"?' against the next line. In the edition of 1863 the passage stands:—

Gather fruits of one great gaze—
At the moon: look you! The same orange haze,
The same blue stripe round that—and, in the midst,
Thy spectral whiteness, Mother-maid."

YET the theory held by Domett and, I fear, by the majority of readers, that Browning was cryptic of malice preposse is almost as far from the truth as Mr. Chesterton's paradox that the poem was a subtle compliment to the intelligence of the reader. In reality "Sordello" should rather be regarded as the poetic outlet for the pent-up forces of Browning's adolescence. He felt such a mass of ideas fermenting within him that in his struggles to give birth to them he had small time for minor and subsidiary details. So much had he to say and so hectic and hysterical a desire to say it that he was rendered inarticulate by the very intensity of his passion.

THOSE who were generous enough to respond to the appeal made last year for help in rebuilding the parish church of Lower Brixham, Devon, in memory of its first vicar, who was the author of the hymn "Abide with Me," will be interested to hear that £1,300 was raised out of £2,500 necessary for its completion. £1,200 however is still needed in order to avoid the cessation of work, and the removal of the scaffolding before the tower is finished, which would involve heavy extra expense and much delay. Any gifts, however small, toward this deficit will be gratefully received and acknowledged by the Reverend Stewart Sim, the Vicarage, Lower Brixham, Devon.

THERE is an interesting interview with Mr. John Lane in the current number of "The Book Monthly" on "The 'Slump' in Verse." According to one who is perhaps the greatest specialist on the subject that we have, the public's neglect of the Muse is due to the following causes: "The ill influence, as I hold it, which arises from the exclusive recognition of a few poets—the magnifying of them so that other genuine singers are overlooked," the revulsion against poetry and æstheticism generally which ensued after the Oscar Wilde débâcle, the competition of the khaki poetry of Kipling, Henley, and Newbolt, and the virtual defection of Mr. Stephen Phillips and Mr. John Davidson, who relinquished "writing poetry for the study" for "writing verse for the stage." In regard to Mr. Lane's theory of the poet-hero, I am inclined to regard the neglect of poets other than the best known as the effect not the cause of "The 'Slump' in Verse." The man in the street, who, according to Mr. Lane, "is not above or below being interested in poetry," will probably read his Tennyson rather as a useful addition to his intellectual equipment than because of any genuine poetic feeling. Did this feeling really exist he would soon go further afield. With regard to the other causes, the prospective publication of Wilde's posthumous book tends to show that the prejudice is gradually dissipating, while there is evident already a marked reaction against the "Kipling-Henley-Newbolt school of verse—the poetry of action" in whose "lap landed the reaction from poetry pure and simple." But surely the real cause of the languishing of the Muse lies deeper. The majority of the great English poets of the earlier nineteenth century were all identified with some great movement, preached some definite creed, possessed a striking and compelling individuality. But nowadays we have scant time for great literary movements, and but a fraction even of the better of our minor poets strike the true personal note or impress us as being gifted with much more than a mere technical excellence.

I HAVE just received "The Wimbledon and Merton Annual," edited by Henry V. D. B. Copeland. Few outside their inhabitants, and probably only a portion even of them, realise the historic associations with which the London suburbs abound. Yet was not Wimbledon one of the old homes of the Cecils? Was it not at Wimbledon that Sir Thomas Cecil built in the very year of the approach of the Great Armada what Fuller, the chronicler, has so quaintly called "his daring structure at Wimbledon"? Was it not at Wimbledon that Pitt fought with Tierney his reckless and absurd fiasco of a duel? At Merton, also, once stood Merton Priory, one of the most important of the mediæval monasteries. It was at Merton also that in 1881 "William Morris, poet and artist, became the occupant of the several acres of best meadows, bounded and intersected by the Wandle's windings, with their rambling quaint buildings of tarred weather-board and red tile scattered promiscuously among the willows," and devoted himself to the production of his tapestry and stained glass.

At the end of an interesting article in the current "Monthly Review" on Umbrian Art, which shows how painting in Umbria was "really provincial in the true sense of the word, the handmaid of the Church, touching life only very rarely, intent for the most part on the service of the sanctuary, having indeed no life at all, no possible life apart from religion," there is the following eloquent description of Raphael, the greatest of all the Umbrians:—

"Without the great nervous strength of so profound, so subtle a personality as Leonardo, or the immense physical virtue of Michelangelo, he died at thirty-seven years of age. And he is like a relic from the classical age, some perfect serene god, blithe and beautiful, discovered, as it were, by some happy fortune, in a time so in love with pagan culture as the sixteenth century. And even as his work has something of the indestructible perfection of the antique, its precise virtue, its ideality, so in his own body he was beautiful and delicate. His nature was so transparent that everything that was really life-giving shone through it as the sun. The disorder, the tragic rebellion of Michelangelo, was impossible for him. He could never have been sufficiently lawless in his imagination or passions to violate the instinct of reverence. And so we find in him a kind of impotence that, after all, overwhelms at last even a nature so strong and so impetuous as Michelangelo.

"Of all that imperious and splendid age, glittering with many cruelties, gleaming with subtleties that in the end made art impossible, Raphael is the saviour. The presence of his nature is like a fair soft light over everything, or like a perfect flower in the midst of a battle-field. Rather than any saint or soldier, or man of genius, or philosopher, he serves as the type of the Renaissance at its highest; and his impotence, if we may so call it, is nothing more than the failure of all art to express, to do more than shadow forth, that perfect state which Plato has seen lying in the heavens, which St. Paul has assured us is eternal there."

APPARENTLY Mr. Hall Caine is not to have the monopoly among our novelists of foreign translations, as "Rita's" Cornish novel, "The Jesters," will be published in Swedish very shortly.

Bibliographical

IN an interesting communication to "Notes and Queries" that distinguished bibliographer Colonel W. F. Prideaux quotes a reference (1836-37) to "Thwackaway's 'Mountain Sylph,'" and goes on to mention this opera as a work the existence of which appears to have been ignored by all writers on Thackeray. It has been ignored for the very reason that it was not the work of Thackeray but of some one else of the same name. The opera of "The Mountain Sylph" (Lyceum Theatre, or English Opera-house, August 1834) was written by John Barnett to a libretto supplied by T. J. Thackeray, who is said to have been a cousin of the novelist. In one contemporary criticism the name of the librettist was consistently given as "Thackwray," but he was compensated for this by being told that his lyrics were "infinitely superior to the general run of those in modern operas." "The Mountain Sylph," by the way, has the distinction of being known as the first important English opera.

It is announced that Mr. E. Kay Robinson's contributions to a daily newspaper, under the title of "The Country Day by Day," are to be published immediately in book form. It may be worth recalling that we already have "The Country Month by Month"—a work which was first published, under the editorship of J. A. Owen and Professor G. S. Boulger, in a dozen parts in 1894-1895, and a new edition of which, with notes by the late Lord Lilford, was issued as recently as the end of 1901.

Some weeks ago (September 17), when commenting on the approaching tercentenary celebration of the publication of "Don Quixote," I mentioned the various English editions in which the immortal story has appeared. The celebration is giving us several reprints and other works—among the former a reissue of "Don Quixote" with Doré's illustrations, and among the latter a new biography of Cervantes. There are already three or four "live" volumes on Cervantes and his works; but judging by the activity of the past quarter-century, there is an increasing interest in the great Spanish novelist. The first English biography was "translated from the Spanish manuscript (of Gregorio Mayans y Siscar) by Mr. Ozell" (1738); then came a century's gap, followed by "The Life and Writings of Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra," by Thomas Roscoe (1839, and again in 1848). Some years ago an undated small octavo reprint of this was frequently to be met with at the secondhand book-sellers. The latest books have been "Cervantes," by Mrs. Oliphant, in "Blackwood's Foreign Classics for English Readers" (1880); "Life of Miguel de Cervantes," in the "Great Writers Series," by H. E. Watts (1891); "The Life of Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra," with a tentative bibliography from 1585 to 1892, by J. Fitzmaurice Kelly (1892); and the larger "Life of Miguel de Cervantes," by H. E. Watts (1895). The forthcoming Life of Cervantes is the work of Mr. Albert F. Calvert.

In reviewing Dr. A. H. Japp's new volume, "Robert Louis Stevenson: a Record, an Estimate, a Memorial," a writer in "The Glasgow Evening News" refers to it as the tenth book to be published dealing with Stevenson and his achievements. Dr. Japp's is at least the sixteenth. Here is the list: "Robert Louis Stevenson, a Study," by A. B. (Boston, 1895); "Robert Louis Stevenson," by Walter Raleigh (1895); "In Stevenson's Samoa," by Maria Fraser (1895); "The Home Country of R. L. Stevenson," by J. Geddie (1898); "Robert Louis Stevenson," by M. M. Black, in the "Famous Scots Series" (1898); "Robert Louis Stevenson's Edinburgh Days," by Eva B. Simpson (1898); "R. L. Stevenson," by L. Cope Cornford, in "Modern English Writers" (1899); "Robert Louis Stevenson: a Life Study in Criticism," by H. B. Baildon (1901); "The Life of Robert Louis Stevenson," by Graham Balfour (1901); "Robert Louis Stevenson," by G. K. Chesterton—one of "The Bookman Booklets" (1902); "Stevensoniana," edited by J. A. Hammerton (1903); "The Faith of Robert Louis Stevenson," by J. Kelman (1903); "Robert Louis Stevenson, the Dramatist," by A. W. Pinero—a lecture (1903); "Robert Louis Stevenson," by Sir Leslie Stephen—an essay (1903); "Stevenson's Shrine, the Record of a Pilgrimage," by Laura Stubbs (1903).

Mr. Edward H. Cooper, in "The Nineteenth Century and After," refers to dramatisations of "Alice in Wonderland" and "Alice Through the Looking-Glass" (he thus misnames the books several times), saying: "The English fashion of keeping certain ancient literary idols locked up in cupboards, never seeing, touching or noticing them, but fiercely resenting any criticism of their now glaring demerits, is a very pretty one, but has been extremely costly to various publishers and theatrical managers in the past." This applied to Lewis Carroll's books is, to put it bluntly, ridiculous. "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland," first issued at the close of 1865, reached its eighty-sixth thousand in 1897, while "Through the Looking-Glass," first published in 1871, reached its sixty-first thousand in 1897. Since the last-named year "Alice" has been reissued in at least seven, and "Through the Looking-Glass" in at least five cheaper forms.

Frontispiece to "The Mill on the Floss" (Blackie)

WALTER JERROLD.

Reviews

THE MYTHOLOGY OF THE BRITISH ISLANDS

By Charles Squire. (Blackie, 12s. 6d. net.)

MR. SQUIRE limits his inquiry to Celtic myth, legend, poetry and romance, and he must know that this limitation prevents his book from being equal to its title. Indeed, the title is too ambitious all round. Mr. Squire has read and studied much. His work is distinctly good. But he is not quite equipped for his task of setting forth the main facts concerning the mythology of the British Islands. He studies it from a distance, as it were, and not in connection with the people to whom it belonged. In his book it is welded in between two chapters on "The Religion of the Ancient Britons and Druidism" and "Survivals of the Celtic Paganism into Modern Times," and this arrangement of his book is a good indication of Mr. Squire's attitude towards Celtic mythology. As a matter of fact, Celtic mythology belongs both to the religions of the ancient Britons and to the survivals of that religion in modern times; and it is because of this detachment from its true place that we feel Mr. Squire's study is not equal to the occasion. Beltane fires are to Mr. Squire all that writers on myth have hitherto stated them to be; Stonehenge is still a temple. Had Mr. Squire pursued his studies further he would have known that grave doubts have been advanced by the latest authorities on both these propositions, and this new view of the older beliefs materially affects the ideas we must in future take of British mythology. Also, it is curious to see that he perceives the analogy of the civilisation of the Celts to that of the Homeric Greeks, but does not seem to have studied Professor Ridgeway's remarkable treatise on this subject.

But do not let us be grumbling at Mr. Squire throughout. He has followed the best authorities—Professor Rhys, Dr. Whitley Stokes, De Jubainville and others—for his special points, and he gives, from the point of view he assumes to be correct, a very good summary of the evidence. It is most useful to have such a summary. We are not able, all of us, to read through the labyrinths of Celtic myth even in the brilliant treatises which Celtic scholars—English, German and French—have written; and to have, therefore, a carefully written and well ordered volume such as Mr. Squire presents is no small gain.

Students of mythology who belong to the school favoured by Mr. Squire have not lately been making much headway. Interpretation of myth is no longer considered as ended when Celtic gods and heroes are shown to be identical with the gods and heroes of other Aryan-speaking peoples, and in particular, as one reads once more the Irish traditions, it does not seem absolutely necessary to turn to Jupiter and the gods for explanation of their origin. The Celts, like the Greeks, were prone to exaggerate their fighting powers, to talk of great battles where simple tribal fights occurred, to speak of heroic deeds of enormous proportions when the bravery of one man overcame the cowardice of many; to look upon mountains and rivers and strong places as the work of other than human hands because in their own experience they knew only of peasant huts and rude protecting walls. But this subject must be dealt with by other hands than Mr. Squire's. He sees myth where he cannot see modern reason or fact; but his opinions are always sane and moderate from his point of view. He does not advocate a Celtic civilisation of great advancement to fit in with a Celtic mythology of great imagination. He does not argue for palaces and kings and princes, and is content to compare actual remains of ancient fastnesses and homesteads for his facts in this respect. This is all to the good, and we can promise every reader of this book ample pleasure in the manner in which the study is put before him.

Altogether, then, Mr. Squire may be congratulated on a partial success. His research does not penetrate into German authorities: he is not fully alive to the anthropological side of the argument; his archæology is not complete. But he knows and loves his subject within the boundaries presented by these limitations, and he has the peculiar charm of carrying his readers along with him in an attitude of love for the subject.

LAURENCE GOMME.

WESTERN EUROPE IN THE EIGHTH CENTURY AND ONWARD: AN AFTERMATH

By the late E. A. Freeman. (Macmillan, 10s. net.)

IN a recent number of THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE we pointed out the characteristics of the volume of "Historical Studies in the Fifth Century," by the late Professor Freeman, now edited and given to the world by Mr. T. Scott Holmes. Some of the remarks are, of course, applicable to the volume now under review, for the Professor's work always bore the imprint of his own strong personality. Yet there is a difference between the two volumes, and that difference is, on the whole, to the advantage of the one dealing with the earlier period. There Freeman dealt with questions relating to the origins of the English people and those of the nations of Western Europe; and the hope of illustrating anew his favourite contention that Englishmen were Englishmen and not half-Romanised Celts, sent him on the quest in full war-paint. Here there is no such stimulus; and the personal note which there sounded forth now and again with all the old charm is here but faintly heard. Unfortunately, too, five of the nineteen chapters now published for the first time are mere fragments; and we miss the story of the Battle of Tours, the most momentous event of the period. The progress of modern research has also tended to modify some of the statements that were penned a decade ago. Nevertheless, Mr. Scott Holmes has conferred a benefit on historical research by giving to the world this "aftermath" of the rich harvest of the Regius Professor's work.

The lectures, as here published, begin with the rise of the Karlings to positions of power and the gradual decline of the Merwing kings in Gaul. The reasons for the change of dynasty are thus aptly summarised:

"They [the Franks] had . . . gone far beyond any rule of choosing the king from the kingly house, far beyond any rule of hereditary succession which gives the kingship of the people, irrespective of their choice, to some particular member of the kingly house. They had accepted the doctrine that every member of the kingly house was by birth a king and entitled to some share in the exercise of kingly power. The outcome of all this had been the division of the kingdom, the degradation of the kings beyond the example of any other people; and, while the kingly house was sinking into nothingness, while the kings—kings only by virtue of their birth—were falling lower and lower in each generation, a new house had arisen by their side, a house of leaders of men, called to rule because they were worthy to rule; who, without bearing the name of kings, had for seventy years done all that kings were meant to do."

The story of the relations of the new Frankish dynasty to the Papacy is traced with great care, and the question of Pippin's promises and territorial gifts to Pope Stephen is handled in great detail in a spacious appendix. The Professor believes that the problem can never be solved; but he proves, as against the foremost champions of papal claims, that the popes at that time clearly recognised their subordination to the emperors in all temporal affairs. The decline and fall of Teutonic sovereignty at Laon is the subject of the later lectures. The influence of the settlements of the Northmen on the Lower Seine in deciding the balance in favour of Paris and against the city whose hill towers above the flats of Western Champagne is briefly, but suggestively, indicated.

J. HOLLAND ROSE.

YORK: THE STORY OF ITS WALLS AND CASTLES

By T. P. Cooper. (Elliot Stock, 10s. 6d. net.)

THE ANCIENT CASTLES OF IRELAND

By C. L. Adams. (Elliot Stock, 10s. 6d. net.)

THE story of the castles and fortifications of the ancient city of York, long the very heart of the defences of the North of England and still the centre of an important military district, will ever exercise a great fascination over the imaginations of those who are interested in the archæology and history of their native land. Mr. Cooper, in the course of many years of arduous research, has made the subject entirely his own, and every page of his scholarly work bears witness to patient investigation and close powers of reasoning, combined with the even rarer faculty of presenting their results in an attractive and readable form. No available source of information has been overlooked by him; the documents on which his narrative is founded, such as the Patent and Close Rolls and other State Papers preserved in the Record Office and the Archives of York Corporation, have been most carefully weighed and sifted, and there appears to be some justification for his claim that he is the first to have subjected them to a thorough and systematic search. He admits, however, that he is, after all, but a pioneer, for he says the whole of the history of the City of York will inevitably have to be rewritten, so that his book is only a preliminary and specialised study, paving the way for future gleaners in the same rich field.

Mr. Cooper divides his subject into two parts, dealing in the first with the gradual evolution of the walls and earthworks of York from those of early Celtic settlements on the site of the Roman Eboracum to the restoration of the ancient defences in 1889, supplementing his actual descriptions with a summary of the history of each period so far as it was connected with the City of York. The second portion of what is truly a remarkable book, deals with the castle of the old Baile, the four gates or bars of York that are still so dignified and impressive a feature of the town—to each of which a chapter is devoted—and the less important but deeply interesting postern gates and towers. Copies of some of the original MSS. consulted and an illustrated essay on masons' marks, a long list of authorities and numerous plans and illustrations give completeness to what will certainly rank as a standard work, even if it be ere long supplemented by other books founded on it.

To piece together with the aid of the scattered ruins, with which the length and breadth of Ireland is strewn, a history of the castles those ruins represent must indeed have been a difficult task; but that it has been successfully performed by Mr. Adams no one will deny.

His book is far more than a mere account of each castle of which relics remain; it is a reflection of the chequered fortunes of the Emerald Isle from the first landing of the Normans on its shores in 1169 to the tragic death, in 1642, of Owen Roe O'Neill, the one man who might have done something to save his native land from the vengeance of Cromwell that finally dispelled the long cherished illusion of the value of the strongholds on which the people set such store.

The castles Mr. Adams describes range, he says, "in dimensions from the few blocks of protruding masonry on the green sward, which mark the foundations of a ruined peel tower or small keep, or the scarcely traceable line of wall which was once a fortified bawn or inclosure with mud or stone walls, to the majestic ruins of castles like Adare, with its three distinct and separate fortifications, one within the other, or to Royal Trim, deemed strong enough to be the prison of English princes." Locally next to nothing is known of the origin of these remains, though inquiries are met with much apocryphal information in which King John and Cromwell generally play their part; but Mr. Adams has, for all that, succeeded, with the aid of the owners of still existing castles and the documents in the Record Office, Dublin libraries and elsewhere, in tracing the life-story of over seventy strongholds, of many of which he gives excellent illustrations, adding at the end of each article a list of the authorities consulted. Unfortunately, however, he has neglected to add an index to his book, the want of which detracts greatly from its value to the student; but this is an omission that can easily be remedied when a new edition of his valuable work is called for.

NANCY BELL.

NAPOLEON AND ENGLAND, 1803-1813

A Study from unprinted documents by P. Coquelle, translated from the French by Gordon D. Knox, Balliol College, Oxford, with an Introduction by J. Holland Rose, Litt.D. (Bell. 5s. net.)

THIS book, of but moderate size, is of great value to those students of the Napoleonic period whose minds are not already made up one way or the other beyond reach of fresh evidence. M. Coquelle has tried to settle a number of questions of great historical interest by the original documents of the principals in negotiation, as contained in the French and British archives. In giving his judgment on the matters at issue between historians and diplomatists, he has not feared to run counter to the general opinion of French writers, with the name of M. Albert Sorel at their head.

The work deals with the negotiations between the British and French Governments from the Treaty of Amiens down to 1813; it discusses the responsibility for the rupture of the peace, the various attempts to negotiate or mediate a truce from both sides, and the famous and futile discussion of the exchange of prisoners. Nearly all of these transactions have been used by French historians for imputing bad faith to "perfidious Albion"; in nearly all of them M. Coquelle feels bound to pronounce Napoleon more in the wrong. This conclusion is dramatically the more probable, for while the British ministers and envoys were men widely differing in policy and capacity at different times, the negotiations for peace broke down in much the same way on each occasion. Surely the cause of this invariable failure must have been the one permanent element in the discussions—the policy and temper of Napoleon.

With regard to the rupture of the Peace of Amiens, M. Coquelle points out—what other historians have overlooked—that the really important matter in dispute was the continued French occupation of Holland, then known as the "Batavian Republic." The evacuation of Holland had been promised in the Treaty of Lunéville, which made peace between Austria and France; it was to take place as soon as England and France ended their war. Yet the First Consul, while calling on Great Britain to evacuate Malta in accordance with the Treaty of Amiens, evaded the obligation to release Holland, which not only threatened the English coast, but commanded the road to India by the possession of the Cape. The annexation of Piedmont, the interference in Switzerland, even the publication of Sébastiani's report, were minor considerations. In this, as in all the later negotiations, it was Napoleon's aim to obtain concessions without binding himself to make the corresponding concessions on his side. The British Governments often made mistakes in matters of form, but seem all to have been sincerely desirous of peace; and if Fox could not come to terms in 1806, in spite of his warm admiration for France and Napoleon, the fault in the main must have lain with Napoleon.

The translation by Mr. Knox is good, and on the whole reads smoothly. In one or two places the rendering is obscure. On page 11 Andréossy is made to remark of a Royalist emissary, "He declaimed with violence, and honoured me so far as to treat me as the usurper of the rights of a well-known family, to contribute to the glory of carrying through some useful work, a glory which he certainly does not possess." What does this rigmarole mean? On page 230 Napoleon meets Ouvrard at Anvers—why not Antwerp here, as elsewhere? On page 244 the translator speaks of "the English Parliamentary vessel" on which Mackenzie came to France to negotiate for an exchange of prisoners. This is an obvious blunder; parlementaire has here its ordinary military meaning of "under a flag of truce."

ARTHUR R. ROPES.

PORTRAITS OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY, HISTORIC AND LITERARY

By C. A. Sainte-Beuve. Translated by Katharine P. Wormeley. (Putnam, 2 vols., 21s. net.)

"Si réimprimant un jour les critiques et portraits on les rangeait par l'ordre chronologique des sujets que j'y traite, on ferait un contre-sens: le véritable est celui dans lequel je les ai écrits selon mon émotion et ma caprice et toujours dans la nuance particulière où j'étais moi-même dans le moment." The extent of these emotions, caprices, and particular nuances is well known to all acquainted with Ste-Beuve's critical development. Before he realised himself in his "Causeries" he had to pass through a long apprenticeship, feeling his way carefully among the various schools of thought, experimenting with most of them, though he abandoned himself to none. It is no wonder then that, sensitive of his early inconsistencies, he gave expression to the above apprehension, an apprehension that the publication of these two volumes has to a great extent verified. The twenty-nine essays before us, of which some have been reprinted from the "Causeries de Lundi," some from the "Portraits de Femmes" and the "Portraits Littéraires," constitute a fine gallery of the French historic and literary celebrities of the seventeenth century. The first volume is chiefly concerned with the great social and political personages of the period, containing portraits, amongst others, of Richelieu, Mazarin, Retz, Louis XIV., de La Rochefoucauld, Mme. de Longueville, Mme. de Lafayette and Ninon de l'Enclos. The second, which strikes us on the whole as by far the more interesting, deals with practically all the literary giants of the golden and classic age of French literature; with Pascal, Corneille, Racine, Mme. de Sévigné, Molière, Lafontaine, Bossuet, Boileau and many others. Yet in spite of the external unity of their subject, this series of monographs represents the most varied stages of the critic's development, while the confusion is intensified by the neglect of the translator to give the date and review in which each article appeared. In the essays, for instance, on Richelieu, Mme. de Longueville and Pascal, Ste-Beuve writes of religious emotion with all the sincerity of an intense personal sympathy. In the article on de La Rochefoucauld, on the other hand, which, to use the words of Ste-Beuve himself, "indique une date et un temps, un retour décisif dans ma vie intellectuelle," he definitely starts that period of healthy disillusionment and contented epicureanism which lasted throughout the rest of his life. In the celebrated essay on Racine again, so far from being the impartial aesthete of the "Causeries," he shows that spirit of polemical fervour which caused him to be known in his younger days as the Boileau of romanticism. We read between every line of his criticism of the great classic dramatist, the implied apotheosis of Hugo and Hugoism. Yet, even if some of the essays in this series show any inequality, it is merely that which separates that which is good in criticism from that which is the best. Interesting, however, as they are intrinsically, these volumes afford no opportunity of seeing that cosmopolitan spirit which made Ste-Beuve equally at home amongst the most diverse authors of the most diverse countries. It was this faculty of psychological insight which, together with his application of the sociological method, constituted his greatness. In contradistinction, however, to Taine, with whom the individual was but a piece of evidence for the elucidation of the age, Ste-Beuve treats the age as a frame necessary for the complete realisation of the portrait of the individual which he sets within it. We find, moreover, in Ste-Beuve, in spite, or rather because, of his narrower view, that touch of humanity, that air of personal sympathy and appreciation which, but for a few exceptions, is lacking in the later critic. Our enjoyment in reading these two volumes, which are handsomely bound and possess thirty excellent illustrations, has been greatly marred by the lamentable inefficiency of the translation. Miss Wormeley has fallen a victim to the fetish of an exaggerated literalness with the most distressing result. Her structure is frequently not English; at times it is even ungrammatical. Such expressions as "a soul feminine in its every recess," and "had won to the crown," are characteristic examples of her servile adherence to the original.

HORACE B. SAMUEL.

A GARDENER'S YEAR

By H. Rider Haggard. (Longmans, 12s. 6d. net.)

HAVING thrilled us in our youth with his romances, Mr. Rider Haggard is, despite a relapse into adventure appearing in the pages of a popular monthly, now more generally applying himself to the gentler task of comforting us by our firesides with recitals of the delights of a country life, and in the volume under notice he details his joys and sorrows as a gardener in a manner which is well-nigh certain to prove very acceptable to the vast army of garden lovers. Setting aside the author's achievements in other paths of literature, it is interesting to endeavour to assign him a place amongst the writers of garden books, and a careful study of "A Gardener's Year" reveals the fact that his place is a very high one. Mr. Haggard displays a considerable knowledge and grasp of his subject, and his travels have given him the advantage of actually seeing for himself what are the conditions under which many of our imported plants thrive. This is very valuable knowledge for a gardener. In his dedication Mr. Haggard expresses the modest hope that his book may be found "not uninformative." Most assuredly it will not be, for while "A Gardener's Year" is sufficiently discursive to interest those of its readers who know but little of gardens or of gardening, Mr. Haggard does not confine himself to the abstract, but describes in some detail many of the actual operations of the gardening year in his two East Anglian gardens. "A Gardener's Year" would form an acceptable present to any intelligent professional gardener. This is high praise, as many garden books which have gained fame amongst amateurs would be laughed at by the professional; much, for example, as we cherish the works of "Elizabeth," she is an author who would not find any favour in the bothy.

Orchid-growers and the owners of lawns will, in particular, find much which is likely to be of real service to them. Mr. Haggard's particular fancy is for orchids, and his many admirers as an author will read of his successes in their cultivation and their showing with much pleasure. So great, indeed, have been these successes that upon page 149 Mr. Haggard gently chides his wealthy neighbours for their lack of spirit in ceasing to compete with him. The account of the author's successful endeavours to preserve his property at Kessingland, near Lowestoft, from the inroads of the sea by the planting of Marum Grass (Psamma Arenaria), which has wonderful properties as a sand collector, is particularly interesting, and his methods certainly deserve trial upon a more extensive scale elsewhere.

The book is illustrated by a plan of the garden at Ditchingham and by twenty-five reproductions from photographs. These, which vary considerably in merit, are nearly all views of various portions of the author's gardens or of individual plants grown in them. Some other writers have preferred not to reveal so ruthlessly the garden shrines of which they write, but Mr. Haggard takes the better course of plainly showing that there is "no deception." He sometimes goes astray upon matters of detail; for example, he transfers the patronage of a beautiful race of anemones from St. Brigid to St. Bridget, and wrongly describes Garrya elliptica as a creeper; also his plant names occasionally will scandalise devout botanists, but undoubtedly the publication of "A Gardener's Year" stamps Mr. Haggard as a gardener and a garden author of pronounced merit.

MUSA VERTICORDIA

By Francis Coutts. (Lane, 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. FRANCIS COUTTS stands out head and shoulders from the generality of our modern minor poets in that in addition to its technical excellence his verse strikes a strongly individual note. This individuality consists in a virile and militant pessimism. Conceiving that in dealing with the lesser things of life he would fail in loyalty to his Muse, he refuses point blank

"to sing the facile lie:

The old familiar fancies, women, wine,
Pale moonlight and moonshine."

It is rather the lacrimæ rerum which inspire him most potently and draw from him his finest and most impressive verse. It is characteristic that even the love poetry is deeply tinged with pessimism. Mr. Coutts' eyes are nearly always fixed upon the death that crowns all things; he sees perpetually "the skull that grins beneath the kiss." Yet his melancholy is far from being that of a mere whiner. The world is evil, according to Mr. Coutts, but the only thing left is to struggle.

"And the one triumph not quite vain
The soul's stern striving to attain."

In a volume where every poem is on so high a level it is difficult to pick out what is the best; the two pieces, however, which have impressed us the most deeply are the Musa Verticordia with which the volume opens and "There shall be weeping," just one place removed from the end. The first, which is a dignified apology of the poet's attitude, reminds us of Milton by the sustained majesty of both its thought and its rhythm. The latter is a wonderful description of "the river of tears" and one of the best short lyrics that we have seen in recent years. In "Musa Verticordia" Mr. Coutts has more than maintained his previously high standard; in this, as in his other poetry, he not only titillates our æsthetic sense, he also moves us.

THE SONNETS OF SHAKESPEARE

With an Introduction and Notes by H. C. Beeching. (Ginn, 3s.)

EDITIONS of Shakespeare's Sonnets have of late years been numerous, ranging from large and handsome volumes like Mr. Tyler's, Mr. Wyndham's and Mr. Samuel Butler's, where the object has not been so much to provide the student with a text as with a commentary or a disquisition in support of the editorial view, to elegant little pocket editions like Mrs. Stopes', devoid, or nearly devoid, of commentary, but fitted for daily and nightly companionship. More practically serviceable than either are what we may term the intermediate editions, triply constituted of a front of introduction, a body of text and a train of commentary. It is only to be desired in the student's interest that the editor should remember that the text is, after all, the principal concern, and should refrain from overshadowing it either by a pretentious introduction or voluminous annotation. The admirable good sense displayed in all Canon Beeching's publications is a guarantee against his falling into either error; and, in fact, we should be at a loss to point out another edition of the Sonnets where text, introduction and commentary are more nicely adjusted to each other. It is only to be apprehended that the modest guise of Canon Beeching's edition and the moderation of his claims may conceal the actual importance of his labour. One valuable feature, peculiar to him so far as we are aware, is his investigation of the text of the first edition of the Sonnets, where the frequent misprints demonstrate that Shakespeare can have had no hand in their publication. Another point is his able and to us convincing argument to prove that the Sonnets, with a few exceptions, cannot have been written earlier than 1597, which, if admitted, destroys the pretensions of Southampton, then deeply in love, and absent on an expedition to the Azores. To the Pembroke theory he is more favourable, declaring himself, however, "not convinced." Neither are we! But we think that Pembroke's claim might have been stated more forcibly, founding our opinion more particularly upon Sonnet 107, undoubtedly written upon the death of Elizabeth. It seems to us incontestable that this poem is addressed to some person of high rank who had suffered from Elizabeth's displeasure; and if, as we believe, Southampton is out of the question, who can this be but Pembroke? Canon Beeching's treatment of these vexed questions is as conclusive of his sanity of judgment as his simple yet ample commentary is of his lucidity and pregnant brevity as an annotator. Others may have done more in poetical illustration and psychological analysis; but none have produced a more satisfactory compendium of all that is really necessary to be known about the Sonnets, or afforded a more serviceable key to their numerous difficulties.

GUILDFORD IN THE OLDEN TIME

Sidelights on the History of a Quaint Old Town. By Geo. C. Williamson. (Bell, 5s. net.)

ALTHOUGH Dr. Williamson modestly disclaims for his book any pretension to being a history of Guildford or a perfect guide to the town, yet within the compass of its pages there is a wealth of antiquarian, archæological, and topographical information which goes far to bring before the eyes of the reader a fascinating picture of the Guildford of the past. Strictly speaking the author has strung together a series of essays on subjects concerning the town; but his store of knowledge being fully as great as his love of the subject he has been able to imbue these more or less detached papers with an interest and a vitality possible only to one who knows and loves what he is writing about. That Guildford is a peculiarly interesting old town is a well-known fact, but even to those who tramp its High Street daily the immense store of historical interest locked up in the Castle, the Town Hall, the Friary, the "Upper Lower and Middle" churches, the hospital, the caverns and the crypts will only be revealed by a careful reading of this interesting book. Dr. Williamson has done his work con amore, and one may be permitted to hope that this is only the forerunner of that complete history of Guildford which in his preface he admits to be "long-projected"—but not yet written. It is interesting to learn that one of the claims to notoriety of the Guildford Grammar School consists in the fact that the earliest mention of cricket occurs in connection with the evidence of certain scholars from the Free School of Guildford in the fortieth year of Elizabeth. In 1598 John Derrick, gentleman, "one of the Queen's Majestie's Coroners" for Surrey, aged fifty-nine, gave evidence in a certain long-continued law suit about a garden plot, that he had known the land for fifty years or more, and that when he was a scholar he and several of his fellows "did runne and play there at crickets and other plaies." This would date the game back to 1548 or earlier.

THE LAW OF COPYRIGHT IN WORKS OF LITERATURE AND ART

Including that of the Drama, Music, Engraving, Sculpture, Painting, Photography and Design, together with International and Foreign Copyright, with the Statutes relating thereto, by Walter Arthur Copinger, F.S.A. &c. Fourth Edition, by J. M. Easton, Barrister-at-Law. (Stevens & Haynes, 36s.)

TWELVE years have elapsed since the publication of the third edition of "Copinger on Copyright," and the appearance of the fourth edition will be welcomed by all lawyers and laymen who are engaged in the hopeless task of guessing the innumerable conundrums the law presents. "Copinger" has been a classic ever since it first appeared thirty-four years ago. None of its many successors have attempted anything like so full an exposition of the subject in all its bearings. The wealth—it might almost be styled the redundancy—of material, which is given, for the most part in extenso, is, on the whole, a gain. The law of copyright does not lend itself to condensation, and the most erudite deductions and distinctions from a decision or a statute or a treaty are not nearly so helpful as the heads or text itself, even if they amount to little else than a Chinese puzzle. Mr. Easton has done his work well. Those who are from constant use familiar with the treatise will be grateful to him for adhering so closely to the original form. The case law, upon which literary jurisprudence so largely rests, has been brought well up-to-date with, in most instances, a careful commentary. The much-discussed decision of the House of Lords on the law of encyclopædias in "Aflalo (not "Affalo") and Lawrence" &c. is, for instance, so lucidly discussed that any contributor can decide the course to adopt. The failure of the Musical (Summary Proceedings) Act, 1902, is usefully demonstrated. It may, however, be noticed that the remedies against street hawkers or others vending "books"—a term which includes a sheet of letterpress or music—that do not bear the name and address of the printer under the Newspapers &c. Act, 1869, appear to have escaped observation in this and, so far as we are aware, all other works on the subject. That Act, re-enacting as it did 2 and 3 Vict. c. 12 s. 2-4, gives full power to the Attorney-General &c. to proceed against all offenders in a manner which should be almost effectual. If this be so, the defeat of the Act amending 2 Edw. VII. c. 15 is of lesser importance than its interesting opponents' desire. This is the only English Copyright Statute enacted for the last fifteen years. Mr. Easton only mentions Lord Monkswell's Bill and wisely refrains from discussing the details of a measure which is still in nubibus. The greater part of the new matter in the work is concerned with international and foreign copyright. The fulness of this section has always been a valuable feature of "Copinger," and it promises now to be more valuable than ever. The many changes which have taken place in nearly all countries are adequately noted, a new and most valuable feature being a short summary of the "rights of foreigners" given under each country. The most recent changes in Germany are given, but the adhesion of Sweden to the Berne Convention is simply mentioned without the results being worked out. The exposition of the Canadian tangle and its partial disentanglement by the Act of 1900 is the most admirable extant. The chapters on copyright in the United States may safely be commended to the study of the considerable number of authors and others who are interested in that burning subject. The issue of addenda in a form capable of being inserted in the work may be commended to the publishers.

W. MORRIS COLLES.

Fiction

THE HOUND FROM THE NORTH

By Ridgwell Callum. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.) The opening portions of this story are by far the best part of the book. The account of the benighted traveller in the region to the extreme north of the Rocky Mountains, walking on and on, hoping to strike the trail before night closes in, getting more and more exhausted every minute, is vivid enough to attract attention. Here and there, however, the author adopts a jerky, formless habit of writing, which is by no means effective. "The earth white; snow to the thickness of many feet on all. Life none: not a beast of the earth, nor a fowl of the air, nor the hum of an insect. Solitude. Cold—grey; pitiless cold. Night is approaching." Happily the author does not continue in this strain for long, or it would become too irritating. The story is somewhat confused and treats of two gold robberies, several murders, illegal traffic in opium by means of a disused churchyard, and a forest fire. Hervey Mallings is not a very convincing or powerful villain; Prudence, his sister, is more carefully and sympathetically drawn. We cannot quite understand what the writer means by this utterance: "Darkness hid the angry flush which had spread over his face. The girl knew he was angry. His tone was raised and there was no mistaking Leslie Grey's anger. He was very nearly a gentleman, but not quite." It somehow seems to convey a vague yet awful indictment. The author is much more successful with his descriptive passages than with the handling of the story and its characters.

THE YOUTH OF WASHINGTON

By S. Weir Mitchell. (Unwin, 6s.) Either Washington has been unfortunate in the writers who have attempted to portray him or those writers are unlucky in having essayed such a character as Washington's. In the pages of fiction the gallant gentleman and very human man who suffered at Valley Forge, swore "like an archangel" at Lee's cowardice and shed tears over Arnold's treason, is always an irredeemable prig, or at best a marble statue of the "Father of his Country." Dr. Weir Mitchell has added another to the melancholy examples of Washingtonian dullness, though we might almost have expected him to escape the inevitable and achieve the impossible when we remember how in his tragedy of "Francis Drake" he caught the heart-beat of Elizabethan England and gave us an historic and human document which was also pure poetry. There is no poetry in "The Youth of Washington" and not much humanity. The record carries us only through twenty-six years of that eventful life ending just after Braddock's defeat and death, but as it is supposed to be written shortly before Washington's death, in his final leisure and retirement, it has no pulse of youth. It is sedate, detailed, conscientious and very dull. It may be very much what Washington would have written; in which case we can only say that Washington had no genius of self-portrayal. This well-behaved and rather thick-witted young gentleman gives no hint of latent fire and greatness; this is not the man for whom in later years his soldiers were ready to "storm hell." On one occasion he does knock down a negro without just cause, but that is his only deviation from the paths of rectitude; for the rest, "George is always a good boy," as his mother so unkindly remarked of him. Yet Dr. Weir Mitchell can present vital personalities; even in this book we have a delightful glimpse of the eccentric Lord Fairfax, seen through the eyes of his prosaic young friend, much bewildered by the combination of poet and cynic. But Washington has been too much for Dr. Weir Mitchell—as he was for George III.

THE EDGE OF CIRCUMSTANCE

By Edward Noble. (Blackwood, 6s.) The land-going lubber who does not sail on deep waters or go on hazardous expeditions to strange lands may yet know the geography of ships and be easily conversant with their construction. Signalling at sea will present no difficulty to him; he will know all about the high-pressure cylinder and the patent thrust; the signs of a coming storm he will recognise at once—thanks to the cult of the sea story. Amongst many other writers, Mr. Conrad and Mr. Jack London have laid bare the secrets of the sea; now Mr. Edward Noble should be hailed as another exponent—and no mean one either. "The Edge of Circumstance" is a striking book, one to be read. Mr. Noble attracts immediate attention yet does not shout; he gives us exciting situations yet leaves something to the imagination. The scene in which José, the dago, driven mad by cowardice and hate, kills the engineer and the mate amid the horrors of a storm at sea, is a fine piece of writing, yet it does not reek with unpleasant details or loathsome description. Mr. Noble is too much of an artist to overload his picture. A sentence here, a phrase there, conveys the picture. McGrabbut, the engineer of the "Titan," whose fate it is to battle incessantly with worthless patent fittings and unseaworthy machinery, is a striking piece of character-drawing. His caustic tongue, dry humour and infinite resource are well conceived. Mr. Noble has dispensed with the conventional love interest, and the reader does not lose anything by it. A book to be reckoned with.

THE AMBASSADOR'S GLOVE

By Robert Machray. (Long, 6s.) Such chapter headings as "Daring Diamond Robbery," "An Appalling Danger," "Faithful unto Death," "A Buried Secret," give more than a hint of the character of the story. We do not expect a novel of intense psychological interest, or anything that it is not. As a rather improbable yet excitingly sensational story it answers its purpose well. The reader's interest is never for one moment allowed to flag, nor is the mystery entirely cleared up until the last chapter. No less a personage than the British Ambassador at Rome is murdered in a well-known London hotel by a society of anarchists, in order to safeguard secrets that a traitor has divulged. But in killing the Ambassador they only achieve half their purpose, being unable to discover any memoranda or papers relating to the conspiracy that they have reason to believe exists. This necessitates the murder of a second man and the kidnapping of the Ambassador's daughter. Where the memoranda were really hidden, and how the Ambassador's daughter is saved by her lover, Mr. Robert Machray must tell. Such personages as the Foreign Secretary and the Prime Minister figure largely in these pages, although we are a little doubtful if such great men act in the manner described by the author. However, if "The Ambassador's Glove" is taken with several grains of salt an exciting hour or two may be spent.

OLIVE KINSELLA

By Curtis Yorke. (Long, 6s.) A very readable and interesting story, containing all the elements that make for popular success. There is a mystery concerning a secret room, a sudden disappearance, and an equally sudden return. There is a villain claiming a fortune that does not belong to him. There are at least two charmingly written love affairs, and a third merely sketched in, and all three cleverly and daintily treated. Some of the side issues of the author's story are, strangely enough, almost more interesting than the main theme itself. For instance, the Hartopp family are excellently drawn; Barbara, especially, stands out most vividly considering how lightly she is touched in. The heroine herself is rather irritating, although she wins our sympathy to a certain extent. There is something about this book suggesting irresistibly that the author could do better work. Not that "Olive Kinsella" is not good of its class, but the class itself is not on the highest plane, and we strongly recommend Curtis Yorke to return to her higher level. With imagination, a vivid sense of character, a power of writing passionate love scenes without in the least degree overstepping the bounds of good taste, and the gift of weaving a coherent story, there should be a future of success before this writer out of the beaten track of mere conventional story-telling.

THE MASK

By William Le Queux. (Long, 6s.) Mr. Le Queux is so full of invention and resource, he presents his mysteries with so much apparent reality and rushes events along so rapidly that he captures the imagination and to a certain extent disarms criticism. People who enjoy novels of this class will read "The Mask" with their usual satisfaction and never pause to question either the probability or the possibility of the adventures the author is so fertile in inventing. They will not ponder on the unlikelihood of many of Rupert Munro's actions, or on the very questionable manner in which he compounds felonies and takes the law into his own hands. It will probably never strike them, when they are following the hero in his search for the abducted heroine, to wonder why, when he does find her, he does not at once call in the assistance of the police instead of forcing his way into the house and carrying her off with the assistance of a very knight errant of a cabman. The secret which surrounds Maisie's past with mystery is well kept, but surely it was scarcely worth quite all the trouble expended in keeping it. She might at least have confided in that trustful and valiant Rupert—but then there would have been no story.

Short Notices

MY KEY OF LIFE

By Helen Keller. (Isbister, 2s. 6d.) The chief interest of this essay on optimism lies in the curious circumstances in which it was written—circumstances which, to the casual observer, seem more likely to breed rank pessimism than glad optimism. The author of the book, who recently wrote "The Story of My Life," is a deaf mute. Yet, although she cannot see the beauties of the outside world, she finds that within her that proclaims life good. "When I learned from Berkeley," she says, "that your eyes receive an inverted image of things which your brain unconsciously corrects, I began to suspect that the eye is not a very reliable instrument after all, and I felt as one who had been restored to equality with others." She disclaims that her optimism is the result of that lack of knowledge that one might imagine a woman so afflicted must necessarily have. No, she owns to dark days and the touch of evil, but now her happiness "is so deep that it is a faith so thoughtful that it becomes a philosophy of life." Speaking of Tolstoi's remark that America, "once the hope of the world, was in bondage to mammon," she denies it emphatically, and gladly calls herself an American citizen. She demands the forbearance of its judges until America has accomplished its almost superhuman task—that of assimilating all the different nations of the earth that flee to its shores. "New York," she says, "counts nearly one million five hundred thousand foreigners among its three and a half million citizens. . . . Every third person in our American metropolis is an alien." Striking statistics, certainly. Speaking of literature, she finds Shakespeare the prince of optimists, and contends that Swift has never been read as much as his genius should command, because he was a pessimist. She does not deny the popularity of Omar Khayyam, but is certain that "the man of letters whose voice is to prevail must be an optimist."

SERVICE OF THE SYNAGOGUE

Edited by Herbert M. Adler; prose translation by Herbert M. Adler and Arthur Davis; verse translation by Mrs. Redcliffe Salaman, Elsie Davis and Israel Zangwill. Day of Atonement. Part I. Evening Service. (Routledge, 3s. 6d. net.) This volume, which is the first of a series of six, should greatly assist in filling the gap caused by the absence of any modern and really efficient prayer-book of the Jewish festivals. The recension of the text which has been placed in the capable hands of Mr. Herbert M. Adler, who is well known as a Hebrew scholar, has been based upon the Heidenheim edition and upon manuscripts of the thirteenth to the sixteenth century, and is a decided improvement on that of other prayer-books, which are in many places corrupt. The prose translation is excellent, striking the happy mean between too servile a literalness and too free a paraphrase. It compares favourably with current versions, which show a tendency to be occasionally too stiff and heavy, too much bound by the original Hebrew. The verse translation of Hebrew hymns, which is one of the features of the new edition, is also on an extremely high level. In the prayers "Oh! let our prayer ascend from eventime" and "Forgive, I beseech Thee" Mrs. Redcliffe Salaman preserves not only something of the Hebrew metre, but what is infinitely harder, the actual spirit of the original. The well-known hymn beginning "For, behold, as the clay in the hand of the potter" has been excellently rendered by Miss Elsie Davis, in a style extraordinarily reminiscent of Omar Khayyam, though fearing, apparently, the profane associations of the Persian poet, the translator has chosen the metre of the heroic couplet. Mr. Zangwill is less scrupulous, and in the series of quatrains beginning "Thee I will seek, to Thee unveil my breast" has produced one of the best translations of an exceptionally fine series. If the remaining volumes are up to the standard of the first, there can be no doubt as to the success of the series.

A LIST OF NORMAN TYMPANA AND LINTELS WITH FIGURE OR SYMBOLICAL SCULPTURE STILL OR TILL RECENTLY EXISTING IN THE CHURCHES OF GREAT BRITAIN

By Charles E. Keyser. (Elliot Stock, 21s. net.) This list, with its learned introduction, makes a valuable addition to our works on architecture. Mr. Keyser's list is not only useful in itself, but provides ample excuse for the lengthy and very interesting introductory matter. There is something quite fascinating to the student of architecture in all remains of Norman work, even the rudest. We can scarcely agree with Mr. Keyser's opinion that all the sculptures with which he deals are "intended to bear a religious interpretation," though doubtless in most cases this is so; equally so, doubtless, many of the interpretations suggested are accurate, but very rightly Mr. Keyser is not dogmatic and is willing to hear and weigh all opinions. A highly valuable book, one of a character too seldom met with.

COOK'S HANDBOOK FOR EGYPT AND THE SOUDAN

By E. A. Wallis Budge. (10s.) This is by far the most exhaustive handbook to Egypt which we have yet seen. Excluding the introduction which gives all the needful information to a traveller previously unacquainted with the country, the volume is divided into four parts. The first gives a concise account of the history of the country from the time of the first dynasty down to the English administration. Particularly interesting are the chapters on the Religion of the Ancient Egyptians, the Learning of the Ancient Egyptians, and the Egyptian Gods. The celebrated hymn to Rā is also given in the original hieroglyphics from the papyrus of Ani, accompanied by an English translation. The remainder of the book is devoted to descriptions of the principal places of interest throughout the whole length of Egypt, starting with Alexandria and the Nile delta and gradually working its way through Cairo, Thebes, Luxor and Aswān to Khartūm and the Great Lakes. At the end of the volume is an excellent sketch of the elements of Arabic, together with a vocabulary of useful words. The book contains no less than nine maps and a hundred and fifty illustrations, and should prove invaluable to all tourists in the country.

Reprints and New Editions

THE TEMPEST constitutes the second volume of the Red Letter Shakespeare, which is being edited by Mr. E. K. Chambers for Messrs. Blackie. The aim of this series is to be "at once scholarly, dainty, and popular." It is certainly the two former, and deserves to be the latter. I like immensely its arrangement and the red and black type employed. It is quite exceptionally clear and easy to read, which all Shakespeares are not. The price of each volume is one shilling net in cloth, eightpence in leather. It is interesting to note that Mr. Chambers writes in his introduction to "The Tempest," "It is, in fact, to be classed as dramatic spectacle rather than as drama proper, and the elaboration with which it has been put upon the stage by modern managers may be regarded as not, in this case, wholly out of keeping with the intention of the dramatist."—John Stuart Mill's ON LIBERTY is now for the first time published with an index (The New Universal Library, Routledge, 1s. net). In glancing over its pages again I was struck, in the light of recent events, by what Mill says of the nations of the East: ". . . they have become stationary—have remained so for thousands of years; and if they are ever to be farther improved it must be by foreigners. They have succeeded beyond all hope in what English philanthropists are so industriously working at—in making a people all alike, all governing their thoughts and conduct by the same maxims and rules; and these are the fruits." A cheap and satisfactory reprint.—An artistic little reprint is to be found in a selection from SENECA, by H. C. Sidley (Bell, 1s. net). The translation used is that by Mr. Aubrey Stewart, published in Bohn's Classical Library, except in an occasional paragraph where the translator's name is given.—Two new volumes are now added to Blackie's Library of Great Novelists—THE MILL ON THE FLOSS and TOM BURKE OF OURS (2s. 6d. each). The last-named, it will be remembered, was dedicated by Charles Lever to Miss Edgeworth. The dedication more than anything else makes one inclined to forgive Lever for his burlesque of Irish manners and customs. In it he says, "Had the scene of this, like that of my former books, been laid chiefly in Ireland, I should have felt too sensibly my own inferiority to venture on the presumption of such a step. As it is, I never was more conscious of the demerits of my volume than when inscribing it to you; but I cannot resist the temptation of being ever thus associated with a name, the first in my country's literature." This, I take it, was not so much a reference to the author of "The Prussian Vase" as to that very fine piece of writing, "Castle Rackrent," which shamed Lever's handiwork.—Wilkie Collins' NO NAME and Reade's THE CLOISTER AND THE HEARTH (Collins' Handy Illustrated Pocket Novels, 1s. and 2s. each net) are two very pleasant volumes, most convenient to handle and looking well upon our bookshelves. They are profusely illustrated—a great feature of the series for those who like fiction illustrated. My ideas of such characters as Gerard and Denys so seldom tally with those of the illustrator that personally I prefer my "Cloister and the Hearth" without pictures. With "No Name" it is a different matter, probably even the author had no particular idea of his heroine's personal appearance.—Can THE SWISS FAMILY ROBINSON (Blackie, 2s.) for a moment be compared with "Robinson Crusoe"? After reading the latter could any one enjoy the former? I will confess that I never succeeded in getting more than half way through, while "Robinson Crusoe" was worn, as it were, to a shadow of his original self by my constant handling.—I have received no less than eighteen volumes of the Muses' Library (Routledge, 1s. each net). Apart from their contents the binding is so tasteful and the printing is so good that I marvel how they can possibly be sold at such a low price. Then when I open them and look at their contents the bargain seems greater than ever. Certainly they are exceptionally good value. Amongst the most interesting are WILLIAM BROWNE, VAUGHAN, GAY, WILLIAM DRUMMOND, CAREW, MARVELL, WALLER and DONNE. How easy it is nowadays compared with what it was a few years ago to collect a really handsome library of the poets at a small cost. Our only difficulty seems to be an embarrassment of choice.

F. T.-S.

New Books Received

Theological and Biblical

- Bevan, the Ven. W. L., Notes on the Church in Wales (S.P.C.K.), 0/6.
 Bishop of Hull, The Christian in Home Life (S.P.C.K.), 0/1.
 Chadwick, W. E., A Call for Efficiency: an Address to Sunday School Teachers (S.P.C.K.), 0/1.
 The Royal Standard of God's United Kingdom (Greening), 3/6.

Poetry, Criticism, Drama, and Belles-Lettres

- Sainte-Beuve, C. A., Portraits of the Seventeenth Century, Historic and Literary, 2 vols. (translated by K. P. Wormeley) (Putnam), 21/0 net.
 Ivanoff, Ian, Love and Eternity (Gay & Bird), 1/0 net.
 Harrison, C., The Sound of a Voice that is Still (selected and arranged for daily use by A. G.) (Sonnenschein), 1/6 net.
 Thorley, W. O., Poems (Heacham-on-Sea: The Author), 1/0.
 Gosse, Edmund, French Profiles (Heinemann), 7/6.

History and Biography

- Hunter, Capt. C., The Adventures of a Naval Officer (edited by Sir Spenser St. John) (Digby, Long), 6/0.
 Jane, L. C., The Coming of Parliament: England from 1350 to 1660 (Unwin), 5/0.
 Tchertkoff, V., and Holah, F., A Short Biography of William Lloyd Garrison, with Introduction by Leo Tolstoy (Free Age Press), 2/6 net.
 Macdonald, the Rev. A. (of Killesnoan), and Macdonald, the Rev. A. (of Kiltarlity), The Clan Donald, Vol. III. (Inverness: Northern Counties Publishing Co.).

Travel and Topography

- Adams, C. L., The Ancient Castles of Ireland (Stoek), 10/6 net.
 Candler, E., The Unveiling of Lhasa (Arnold), 15/0 net.
 Cooper, T. P., York: the Story of its Walls and Castles (Stoek), 10/6 net.
 Millington, P., To Lhasa at Last (Smith, Elder), 3/6 net.
 Landor, A. H. Savage, Tibet and Nepal (Black), 20/0 net.

Science

- Weismann, Dr. A., The Evolution Theory, 2 vols. (translated by J. A. and M. R. Thomson) (Arnold), 32/0 net.
 Engle, J. S., Analytic Interest Psychology and Synthetic Philosophy (Baltimore: King Brothers).

Educational

- Arnett, B., The Elements of Geometry, Theoretical and Practical, Books I., II., and III. (Simpkin, Marshall), 2/0 each.
 Hall and Stevens, Lessons in Experimental and Practical Geometry (Macmillan), 1/6.

Miscellaneous

- The Wimbledon and Merton Annual (Trim), 2/6 net.
 Payne, E. J., Colonies and Colonial Federations (Macmillan), 3/6.
 Curnock, W. E. M., How a Steam Engine Works (Dawbarn & Ward), 0/6 net.
 Harvey, C. H., The Biology of British Politics (Sonnenschein), 2/6.
 The Zoological Record, Vol. XL. (Zoological Society), 30/0.

- Haggard, H. Rider, A Gardener's Year (Longmans), 12/6 net.
 Devine, E. T., The Principles of Relief (Macmillan), 8/6 net.
 Longland, W., How to Read a Workshop Drawing (Dawbarn & Ward), 0/6 net.
 The Geographical Journal, Vol. XXIV. (Stanford).
 Keyser, C. E., A List of Norman Tympana and Lintels, with Figure or Symbolical Sculpture still or till recently existing in the Churches of Great Britain (Stoek), 21/0 net.
 Kermode, P. M. C., and Herdman, W. A., Illustrated Notes on Manks Antiquities (Liverpool: The University).
 Hazell's Annual for 1906 (Hazell, Watson & Viney), 3/6 net.
 A Thousand of the Best Novels (Newark, N.J.: Free Public Library).
 Archaeology: Progress Report of the Archaeological Survey of Western India (Bombay: Government Office), 0/11.
 Report of the Minister of Finance to H.M. the Emperor on the Budget of the Empire (St. Petersburg: Imperial Academy of Science).
 Vinogradoff, Dr. P., The Growth of the Manor (Sonnenschein), 10/6.
 Porter, Mrs. H., The Secret of a Great Influence (Macmillan), 3/0 net.
 Lawrie, Sir A. C., Early Scottish Charters prior to A.D. 1153 (MacLehose), 10/0 net.
 Willis, Mary A. (compiled by), The R. J. Campbell Birthday Book (Christian Commonwealth Co.), 2/6 net.

Reprints and New Editions

- Mill, J. S., On Liberty (Routledge), 1/0 net.
 Reade, C., The Cloister and the Hearth (Collins), 1/0 net.
 Collins, W., No Name (Collins), 1/0 and 2/0 net.
 Trevelyan, Sir G. O., The American Revolution, 3 vols. (Longmans), 5/0 net per vol.
 Halifax, S., The Heart of a Heretic (Brimley Johnson), 2/6 net.
 Phillimore, W. P. W., Herald's College and Coats-of-Arms (Phillimore), 1/0 net.
 Shakespeare, Twelfth Night and Julius Cæsar (Waistcoat Pocket Edition) (Treherne), 1/0 net each.
 Ranger-Gull, C., The Hypocrite (Greening), 0/6.
 Shakespeare, Julius Cæsar and King Richard III. (Methuen), 1/0 net each.
 Lassar-Cohn, Dr., Chemistry in Daily Life (Grevel).
 Dickinson, Emily, Poems (Methuen), 4/6 net.
 Fletcher, Professor Banister, A History of Architecture on the Comparative Method (Batsford), 21/0 net.

Fiction

- Phillipotts, Eden, "The Secret Woman" (Methuen), 6/0; Meredith, E., "Heart of My Heart" (Methuen), 6/0; Gowing, Mrs. Aylmer, "Lord of Himself" (Long), 6/0; Yorke, Curtis, "Olive Kinsella" (Long), 6/0; Forbes, Lady Helen, "The Provincials" (Long), 6/0; Forster, R. H., "Strained Allegiance" (Long), 6/0; Warden, Florence, "The Face in the Flashlight" (Long), 6/0; Barrett, Frank, "The Night of Reckoning" (Long), 6/0; Barbour, A. M., "At the Time Appointed" (Lippincott), 6/0; Mitchell, S. W., "New Samaria" (Lippincott), 3/6; Tytler, Sarah, "Favours from France" (Digby, Long), 6/0; Appleton, G. W., "The Luck of Bella Barton" (Digby, Long), 6/0; Sergeant, Adeline, "Celina's Fortune" (Digby, Long), 6/0; Hume, Fergus, "The Mandarin's Fan" (Digby, Long), 6/0; Foster, J. M., "The Furnace of Fortune" (Henderson), 0/3; Orczy, Baroness (Mrs. Montague Barstow), "The Scarlet Pimpernel" (Greening), 6/0; Brown, Katharine H., "Diane" (Heinemann), 6/0; Cotterell, Constance, "The Virgin and the Scales" (Methuen), 6/0; Lovat, A. F., "Mouncey and Others" (Glasgow: Bryoe), 2/6 net; Roberts, Morley, "Lady Penelope" (White), 6/0; Young, F. E., "The War of the Sexes" (Long), 6/0; Preston-Maddock, J. E., "From the Clutch of the Sea" (Long), 6/0; Forestier-Walker, C., "The Doll's Dance" (Digby, Long), 6/0; Black, Maye H., "Stories from Balladland" (Digby, Long), 3/6.

Periodicals, &c.

- "Saint George," "Scottish Historical Review," "The Forum," "International Journal of Ethics," "Indian Magazine," "The Ancestor," "South Place Magazine," "Journal of Philology," "Lippincott's," "The London," "Mind," "Art," "Baconiana," "Review of Reviews," "The Cosmopolitan," "North American Review," "Pictorial Comedy," "New Africa," "Book News," "Edinburgh Review," "Church Quarterly Review," "English Historical Review."

Booksellers' Catalogues

- Mr. Bertram Dobell (Seventeenth and Eighteenth Century English), 77 Charing Cross Road, W.C.; Mr. Thomas Thorp (General), 100 St. Martin's Lane, W.C., and at Reading; Mr. Francis Edwards (Dramatic Literature), 83 High Street, Marylebone, W.

Foreign

New Edition

- Piranesi, G., Le Case degli Alighieri (Firenze: Francesco Lumachi).

Fiction

- Ἑλλάς, Ζωὴ καὶ Ἀγάπη σὺν μοῦσῃ (Paris: H. Welter), 10f.

Periodicals, &c.

- "Anales de la Universidad" (Santiago de Chile: Imprenta Cervantes), "L'Occident," "Mercure de France," "Revue Germanique."

Forthcoming Books, &c.

Mr. T. Sturge Moore's volume on "Albert Dürer," which Messrs. Duckworth will publish this month, aims at putting the man and his work before us in relation to general ideas. It is not an historical abstract or a record of research and discovery, but rather an examination of standards, ideals, and influences. By the kindness of the Dürer Society there will be included among the illustrations four of their copperplates.—Mr. Heinemann will publish on the 25th of this month "A Belle of the Fifties," being the Memoirs of Mrs. Clay, of Alabama.—Love and courtship in a quiet cathedral town form the theme of Mr. E. F. Benson's new novel, "An Act in a Backwater," which Mr. Heinemann announces for the same date.

My Book of Memory

BOOKMEN as a rule are fond of pictures as well as of books, but I do not know that an affection for music is common among them. Pictures find a place in almost every bookish home I have the pleasure to know, and for myself if ever I have the money spare, upon a collection of paintings and engravings of London past and present shall it be expended. As I turn over the pages of my book of memory, my mental diary, I find that next in number to the entries concerning books come those concerning music, which has ever been a solace and delight to me. For detailed consolation and joy I have looked to my books. But there are moods in which I do not ask for any set and formal conversation, in which I crave for something akin to the message of the wind, the rain, the skies, the sea, a message inarticulate but clear, songs without words. Such messages, it seems to me, does music convey. There are hours of sorrow when the words and sympathy of even the dearest must jar upon me: at such times I can listen to a great music and be soothed and helped. Then also there are moments when everything in the world appears to me to be hard and wrong, when it is necessary for my refreshment that I should be lifted out of this world, and by what art can this be better done than by that of music? I may not know the mood of the composer when he wrote the strains that so deeply appeal to me and help me, I may not even have any understanding of the thing he has striven to say, I may find in his melodies that which he never put there, the very music that soothes me may exhilarate you, but what need I reckon of all this? I know this music does come home to my bosom, does lighten my burden for me; that is all I ask of it.

I suppose I am growing old-fashioned, for to me much of modern music is mere noise or pedantry. There are composers—living and dead—who I am told are great, but they touch me not; they seem to me to speak with effort, or often to talk when they have nothing to say; they appear to me complex, insincere, uninspired: it is as if it were impossible to them to set forth sublime music, they mistake complexity for sublimity, fury for greatness. Similar is the case with many writers of books and painters of pictures. He that hath a message to deliver can best deliver it in a language understood of all people; Carlyle, Meredith, Browning, Wagner, Strauss—surely they are all the less great in that always in some cases, often in others, they speak a language which has to be studied if not interpreted. This complexity is confined almost entirely to the moderns; the old masters achieved their splendid results by simpler methods. Then I suppose I am wrong in thirsting for melody, melodies shapely and complete, such as appeal not to our younger school of composers: to them a melody is a tune and therefore abomination. Not one of them, an he could, would condescend to write another unfinished symphony such as Schubert's. Yet all the deathless music we have, the music that lives to-day and was born many a yesterday ago, glows with melody: and though it is foolish to indulge in prediction, I do believe that the centuries to come will echo with the music of Wagner that is melodious, as most of it is, not hearing anything of that which he has given us—confused and—if I may apply the word to music—verbose. Heresy! Heresy! Yes, maybe it is so, according to those who do not agree with me; and they may be altogether right in their opinions, but I endeavour to set down no false entry in my mental diary, and these opinions I hold and have held always.

With a friend of mine I have listened to much music, always with common enjoyment, for we have only heard together that which we both admire. He, however, is a stern partisan, a modern of moderns, and laughs at me for my comprehensive love. I in turn laugh at him, for surely mine is the better part; I do not think that there is any admittedly great composer for much of whose music I have not an admiration. Bach, Corelli, Handel, Gluck, Weber, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Berlioz, Wagner, Nicolai, Liszt, Grieg, Elgar—all and others have their splendours for me, but for him some of them are dogs unfortunately not dumb. There is no moral question at stake, not one even of artistic morality, so in the end I am the happier of the two in that more and more varied pleasures are mine. Then, too, I know those to whom opera is delightful, but for whom there are no charms in orchestral or chamber music; again, all appeal to me, with varied strength at varied times. One day my brain or my heart may be sick, then opera or chamber music would not fulfil my craving; I seek out to hear a majestic symphony by Beethoven or a song by Schubert, and my thirst is quenched. At other times I desire to lose myself in a world of stimulating sound, of the pageantry of music; then for me "Die Meistersinger" above all operas—or music dramas—or Charpentier's "Louise," or —, or —. Such music intoxicates me, making me mentally drunk. How keenly I recall one summer night some years ago; the labour of the day had been harassing; but what cared I, knowing that the evening was to be spent with the Mastersingers of Nuremberg? The theatre was hushed, the world forgotten, as the strains of that glorious introduction began to stream forth, everything forgotten before this magic music. The hours flew by, in the goodly company of Hans Sachs, David, Walter, Pogner—in the goodly company of magnificent melodies; at last the curtain fell and I went out into the night, heeding not the jostling, shouting crowd, out and along the empty streets—for it was midnight—and so home beneath the moon, my head awl with music and my heart stirred to its depths. I sat for an hour or more by the open window of my chamber, too stirred to think of slumber, realising how much music means to those who love it.

As for songs, who shall say what power they wield? Songs merry, songs martial, songs sorrowful; songs sung in church or other meeting place by a thousand voices, bringing tears to the eyes of some and high beating blood to the cheeks of others: Christmas carols, with their echo of simple beliefs long since made complex; the song of the troops marching to fight; the song sung by a woman's voice in the twilight—ah me, no pen can quite describe that, we have all felt it.

Yes, yes, next to my books my music and my pictures: faith, if I be not a happy man then indeed must I be one cantankerous, at whom fate will throw up her hands as at an ingrate.

E. G. O.

The Repertoire Theatre

AT last, after Heaven knows how much of scribbling and chattering, interlarded with a few earnest attempts such as those of the Stage Society and of Mr. Vedrenne at the Court, a project for a Repertoire Theatre in London has actually been launched. The scheme which has long been under consideration was made public a few days since by its originator, Mr. J. T. Grein, who, out of his practical knowledge and experience, has evolved a plan which holds forth excellent promise, firstly of putting the whole matter seriously to the test, and secondly of founding a permanent theatre should the test prove successful.

There are five chief points to be considered: (1) public support, (2) the theatre, (3) the actors, (4) the repertoire, (5) finances.

1. Will the public, in sufficient numbers to render it a paying concern, attend an artistically conducted Repertoire Theatre? I think they will, and for these reasons: that the Stage Society with its admirable performances has flourished, so also have the plays so well produced by Mr. Vedrenne at the Court Theatre during the last autumn; then there is so little competition in London, where musical comedy rules the roast. Mr. Otho Stuart at the Adelphi Theatre has shown that there is a public that cares for poetic drama and for Shakespeare—"The Taming of the Shrew"—finely acted in bold Elizabethan style and not overweighted with gorgeous scenery and costumes; lastly, the German Theatre, appealing only to a very small number of people, has taken firm root. I believe that there is a very considerable body of playgoers ready to support, from the first, an adequate Repertoire Theatre, and that the very existence of such a theatre will gradually win the favour of the public at large.

2. When it has been proved that a Repertoire Theatre is not only demanded but will pay its way, a home for it can and should be built or bought; meanwhile, for the experimental stage, a theatre can be hired; one not too big, or too sumptuous, or too costly, but comfortable, large enough to hold a sufficient audience and with stage accommodation adequate for the production of the plays chosen.

3. There are many capable and some first-rate actors and actresses who, through no fault of their own, but owing to the exigencies of the commercial theatre, are frequently, if not entirely, unemployed. The actor's profession is indeed hazardous to-day, when engagements are usually made only for the run of a piece which may not hit the public fancy or for a tour of the provinces which may end abruptly and disastrously, and when in London there is not a single stock company. From these a first-rate all-round company of players could be selected, "stars" being rigorously avoided, no player being paid a salary of more than, say, £20 per week, engagements being made for a year with the option of continuance, and every actor and actress being bound to play any character offered by the director of the theatre.

4. The repertoire will consist of good plays of old and of recent days and of new plays. At first it would be difficult to tackle Shakespeare, but there are many old comedies—Congreve's, Wycherley's, Steele's, Farquhar's, Goldsmith's, Sheridan's—which could easily be mounted and acted for a week or three nights at a time. As to recent writers surely they and the managers who hold the rights of their plays will not grudge to the Repertoire Theatre the use of some of their earlier successes? In fact, in this way the Repertoire Theatre should prove a godsend to the theatrical manager, stimulating public interest in a dramatist's latest by the reproduction of some of his earlier works. As for new plays, they will be carefully selected, carefully mounted, carefully played, and—no longer run than six consecutive days or several weeks of three days being permitted—many new plays and new dramatists, if such there be, will face the footlights during the year.

5. But the well-being of the whole depends upon management and finance. Mr. Grein is not merely a dramatic critic of repute, but has, with the German Theatre and elsewhere, gained invaluable practical knowledge of the working and successful maintenance of a Repertoire Theatre. As director he will associate with himself a trustee, who will represent the interests of the guarantors, who will be asked to provide the necessary funds to enable the theatre to tide over the first and most dangerous days and to ensure the undertaking of a start. Three years would be by no means too long an experimental stage, and would require a guarantee fund of some £25,000; but failing the promise of that amount, the minimum useful experiment of one year can surely be carried out with a guarantee fund of, say, £8,000 to £10,000. Half of the guarantee should be cash to meet immediate expenses and the expenditure necessary before the curtain can rise on the opening night.

When thousands and thousands are being expended on luxuries of every sort, when every other art—painting, music, literature—is being encouraged by public support, is it not but little to ask the guarantee of a few thousands, so that a fair trial may be made to establish a Repertoire Theatre in London? Not only is the plan fully matured, but the organisation as regards its chief officers is in working order. The day that sufficient support is received work can begin. Space only permitted dealing with the outlines of the scheme, but I hope to return to the matter next week. It is to be hoped that many readers of THE ACADEMY will be willing to come forward as guarantors—of any sum, however small or however big, £10 to £1,000. Full details of the scheme will be sent on application to the Secretary, the Repertoire Theatre, Trafalgar Buildings, Northumberland Avenue, London, S.W.

Lamb's Enfield Residences

WRITING to his friend Hood in the autumn of 1827 Lamb tells him that he and Mary had finally torn themselves from Colebrooke Row and were about to domiciliate for good in Enfield. Their first home in that village was what is now called "The Poplars," but in its present state so enlarged and altered as to bear no resemblance to its appearance in Lamb's time. In this house they remained for two years, and then removed next door to lodge with an honest couple—the Westwoods. In connection with the latter house a writer, about two years ago, called attention to "an interesting point which seems to have escaped the attention of biographers and commentators," the "interesting point" being that Lamb, so the writer stated, had in one of his letters described the house as situated "forty-two inches nearer town"; whereas the "Westwood Cottage" would be forty-two inches further from town." Having made the latter discovery, he asked: "Was this the house of the Westwoods or was Lamb's description of the location of their new lodgings an example of his extravagant humour, meant to confuse his friends?" and ended as follows: "Attempts have been made to solve this seeming riddle, but so far without success."

The supposed statement of Lamb's that his house was "forty-two inches nearer town" appears to have been accepted on the authority of the late Canon Ainger in his "Life of Charles Lamb" and that of Mr. B. E. Martin in his book "In the Footprints of Charles Lamb." If the writer had only referred to the letter he would himself have been enabled to solve the "seeming riddle" without much trouble. What Lamb wrote is just the reverse of what he is credited with having written. Here are his own words in a letter to William Ayrton dated March 14, 1830: "We have an asylum at the very next door (only twenty-four inches further from town, which is not material in a country expedition)."

It may seem rather late in the day to call attention to the matter now, but as there still appears to be considerable confusion in regard to the Lambs' two Enfield residences, as will be seen from the following, it may not be altogether out of place to do so.

In "The Pall Mall Gazette" for December 29 last a correspondent who with an American friend on the anniversary of Lamb's death visited most of Lamb's London and suburban haunts, is quoted in a literary article ("The Book World") as follows: "So we betook ourselves by way of Liverpool Street to Enfield, there to find that the habitation of the superannuated Elia is yawning for want of tenants. It was there that Westwood, the Cheapside haberdasher, retired upon 'forty pounds a year and one anecdote,' and there also that he took Charles and Mary Lamb to live with him. The house has no outside attraction, being merely a stucco and commonplace affair, with a dozen staring windows and a portico of the forbidding type most prevalent in Pimlico." This house with the "stucco" front and "portico of forbidding type" is not the one in which the Westwoods lived, as was pointed out by the Cheapside haberdasher's son in "Notes and Queries" for November 23, 1872. It appears that S. C. Hall, in his article on Lamb in "The Art Journal" for 1865, had given a view of the house which he claimed to be the "odd-looking, gambogish-coloured house"—the Lambs' first Enfield residence—but which Westwood declared to be the one in which he himself was born and in which the Lambs took up their abode when they gave up housekeeping—"ridded ourselves of the cares of dirty acres," as Elia described it. Thomas Westwood's little article is so truly delightful that I may perhaps be pardoned if I quote an extract from it:

"The sketch in question represents (faithfully enough) the house of Lamb's next-door neighbour, in which he spent several years, and in a little back parlour of which (be it venerated henceforth!) looking out through a cluster of apple trees towards the New River and Epping Hills, some portion of his "Last Essays of Elia" were written. In that house I was born; in that back parlour, at Lamb's elbow, much of my youthful leisure was spent. I see the room now; the brisk fire in the grate, the lighted card-table some paces off, Charles and Mary Lamb and Emma Isola (the 'Isola Bella whom the poets love') seated around it, playing whist; the old books thronging the old bookshelves; the Titian and Da Vinci engravings on the walls and in the spaces between Emma Isola's pretty copies in Indian ink of the prints in Bagster's edition of the "Compleat Angler." That was its usual evening aspect; but at times there were great receptions—friends of the poets—never-to-be-forgotten gatherings. Oh! then—for I was a book-loving, poet-worshipping lad—my heart gladdened and greatened; then I drank in, with insatiate ear, the inspired talk of Christopher North, and Wordsworth, of Procter, Hunt, Hood and many more. . . . I see that room once more, dismantled, disenchanted, the familiar presences vanished for ever, the hearth cold. In my last Enfield vision of Lamb, he is walking by the side of an open cart, laden with his books, his face set towards London."

S. BUTTERWORTH.

The Future of the Sun

MODERN astronomy has taught us that the sun is the central portion of a great nebula which has been shrinking for many hundreds of millions of years. The shrinkage is due to the force of gravitation, the centre of the sun being the centre of gravity of the original nebula and of the present solar system. The sun, of course, is not burning as a fire burns: that is to say, no oxidation is occurring within him, his temperature being indeed much too high to permit of the occurrence of any chemical combination. As far as we know, the sun's heat, to which all life on the earth is due, is derived solely from the energy released in virtue of his gravitational shrinkage. A diminution in the sun's diameter of about sixteen inches per annum would account for all the energy emitted by him. At present we are without evidence that radium is present in the sun, though the occurrence in his atmosphere of helium, which is known to be derived from radium in terrestrial laboratories, makes it appear not improbable, despite the lack of any evidence from the spectroscope, that there may be radium in the sun. However, as far as we at present know, it is the force of gravitation that supplies the sun with his power and therefore the earth with its life. The energy utilised in your reading of this article is, in the long run, gravitational energy.

Now if there be any cosmic force that is uniform and constant in its action, it is gravitation; and if there be any source of power that is commonly thought of as constant and trustworthy, it is the sun. It may be true that he belongs to the category of yellow stars, supposed to be falling in temperature, and destined, within an appreciable time, to become red-hot and finally black; but, at any rate, nothing calamitous is going to happen in our time—the sun may fairly be counted upon.

But it appears that this is only partially true. In the first place, there are the sun-spots, discovered by Galileo nearly three centuries ago. Though astronomers cannot tell us their nature, yet it is positively known that they cause variations in the electric state of our atmosphere and always affect the magnetic needle. In so far, then, the sun cannot be regarded as a constant or invariable source of energy. Further, we know that there are numerous bright sun-spots, besides the dark ones to which the name usually refers; and these also are variable.

But quite recently Professor S. P. Langley, one of the foremost of American astronomers, has adduced evidence which points to a striking, if not an ominous, conclusion. He is the inventor of an instrument called the bolometer, which is an almost incredibly sensitive thermometer or heat measurer, and is said to be able to indicate the heat radiated from a human face distant one-third of a mile. Nevertheless, the possession of so sensitive an instrument does not suffice to record any possible variations in the heat we receive from the sun until numerous sources of fallacy, due to atmospheric variation, are eliminated. This, however, Professor Langley has succeeded in doing; and here are his results.

He believes that at the end of March 1903, contemporaneously with a marked increase in sun-spots, something happened in the sun that caused a rapid fall in the solar radiation, which subsequently has continued to be about ten per cent. less than before! What the cause of this fall may have been we cannot conjecture; but it is interesting to inquire what consequences it had for the earth. According to Professor Langley, such a change in the sun would reduce the temperature of the earth's surface by something less than 7.5° Centigrade. Now when attention is directed to the exact observations made at eighty-nine stations in the North Temperate Zone, and when these are compared with the results of many previous years, it is found that a definite fall of more than two degrees did actually occur; nor is it possible to conceive "what influence, not solar, could have produced this rapid and simultaneous reduction of temperatures over the whole North Temperate Zone, and continued operative for so long a period."

Whilst we remain ignorant of the cause of this solar change we cannot make any predictions as to its persistence or possible accentuation. All we can conclude is that our tenure of this "lukewarm bullet" is perhaps not so certain as some of us have thought.

But my real purpose in writing this article has been to draw attention to the extreme interest and importance of contemporary work in astronomy. Only the other day I was asked whether astronomy had not practically exhausted itself, little more being left to do than the gaining of greater precision as to the weights and distances of the heavenly bodies. Never was greater delusion. The telescope, perhaps, has already won its greatest triumphs; but the spectroscope is only beginning to realise its possibilities. (I need hardly say that the spectroscope was indispensable for Professor Langley's observations.) This instrument has not only told us that which Comte declared we should never know—the chemical composition of the heavenly bodies—but it is enabling us to write a few scattered chapters of cosmic history. By its means the student is learning to classify the stars, to state whether they are in climax or decline, and to indicate their motion in the line of sight, when the telescope can tell us nothing.

We may yet expect from the new astronomy a detailed prediction as to the future of the sun; a determination of the question whether or not our stellar universe is finite; an explanation of its arrangement in a plane (the plane of the Milky Way), and of many other great questions. Lastly, let me note a recent observation, which bears on the future of the sun and his family. It has been shown that the "proper motion" of the solar system is not at any one of the infinite number of possible angles to the plane of the Galaxy, but is in that plane. If it should be found, as seems probable, that all the stars move, or are coming to move, in this plane we must conceive of our Universe as a flat disc bounded by the great circle of the Milky Way. It remains to be wondered whether it is rotating, and whether it is moving as a whole through infinite space. C. W. SALEEBY.

The Impressionists

IT was my intention to write further upon the Internationals this week, and upon the genius of the French sculptor Rodin in particular; but I have been among the French Impressionists all day, and they have taken possession of my pen. There are some men's masterpieces that, seen for the first time, almost overwhelm one with astonishment, with a strange wonder, at the greatness of the achievement; and surely he who stands before Manet's superb nude where she lies upon her white bed in his celebrated "Olympia" at the Luxembourg in Paris must realise that the French nation possesses one of the greatest masterpieces of the nineteenth century. The splendid technique, the largeness of the conception, the intense beauty of the colouring, the exquisite modelling, the power of the thing, affect one as the greatness of the Greek statue, "The Venus of Milo," at the Louvre affects one, with that strange wonder that is felt before the creative power that lies in man's hand. To say that such a masterpiece may be seen amongst Manet's works exhibited in London to-day would be childish; but there are two canvases by this very great man, two gloriously representative works, which ought to belong to the English nation—the "Afternoon Music in the Tuileries Gardens, 1860" and at least the small study of fish called "Still Life," if the portrait of "Miss Eva Gonzalés," as is very likely, is beyond purchase. As examples of mastery of craftsmanship and beauty of colour the English student should have the advantage of seeing such pieces constantly. The impressionist landscape-painter Monet is represented by a picture of dead "Pheasants," which should be secured by the nation at all costs—it is an unforgettable thing. It would be well to have in addition one of his two fine pictures of Rouen Cathedral in snow to increase the nation's riches, with, let us say, the "Environs of Argenteuil" as specimens of this master's vibrant artistry, which should have a healthy and invigorating effect on English students. But the "Pheasants" alone, with its marvellous qualities of colour, even to the painting of the white cloth on which the dead birds lie, would add incalculable treasure to the national collection of art. Of Pissarro's work, the nation should acquire without fail the "View of Sydenham," a masterly piece of painting as well as of colour, and the powerful "The Pont Neuf—Afternoon Sun," a veritable masterpiece. Sisley could be worse known to the coming generations of English students than by his Corot-esque and beautiful "The Seine at Bougival." Whilst Degas, a most unequal artist (for all the exaggerative praise and abuse he has lived through), though he cannot be represented in the national collections by his immortal "Absinthe," should be known to us by his "Carriage at the Races," by the vivid and dramatic "At the Theatre—While the Curtain Falls," which is a glorious pastel in his best manner, and by "The Ironer." Boudin's landscapes, so fragrant of the land that lies on the water's edge, could be worse represented than by his delightful "Bathing-time at Trouville." If these pictures could be secured for England our art would gain enormously thereby; and these masters, the makers of a vivid and vital advance in technical achievement, would be known at something like their real value, instead of being known, as is much more likely to be the case, by their more tentative or more exaggerative efforts—a thing that is of incalculable harm to the student. Needless to say, most of the critics are talking, and will talk, much ridiculous over-praise of the work by the French Impressionists on view in London to-day, to make up for the stupid neglect of the past. But the work of these Frenchmen at their best it would be difficult to overrate. The great beauty which men like Manet and Monet, Degas and Pissarro

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS

OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti,
Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from FREDK. HOLLYER, 8 Pembroke Square, London, W.
Illustrated Catalogue 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

and Sisley could get out of a flat coat of green or grey, the atmosphere they could win from the bravura of their vivid craft, the harmonies they could weave from the right use of greys and greens and black, the colour and life they could get out of the use of the variants of white alone, are lessons that every Englishman would do well to appreciate and to cultivate. Their mastery of pattern, of arrangement, and of the vitalities that lie in colour, will keep their names immortal and their art fresh and vivid. There will probably never be such a chance of securing so fine a group of works by the great impressionist school of France; and it will be a thousand pities if it be lost. England to-day has a great opportunity.

HALDANE MACFALL.

Monthly Prize Competition AWARD

JAPAN

By Lafcadio Hearn. (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. net.)

To approach so intricate, so deeply involved and so many-sided a subject as the interpretation of Japanese ethical development in any spirit save one of earnest and humble inquiry would be nothing short of gross arrogance on the part of the casual reader. Ten years ago such a volume as that now before us would have had an audience fit, but few indeed. To-day, thanks to recent events in the East and the deep national interest taken in their progress, there are few, ranking themselves among educated and broad-minded persons, whose reading has not led them into latitudes bearing on the subject.

In the popular view the picturesque has long been the dominant feature in the Japanese landscape. Mr. Hearn, than whom few men are better qualified to do so, has boldly lifted the veil, and, looking beneath the picturesque, with the clear sight and calm judgment of the discerning sociologist, has laid his finger on the keynote of the national characteristics of Japan of to-day, the wondrous antique fabric of the Shinto cult.

His first ten chapters are mainly devoted to a study—concise, practical and always interesting—of evolution, of primitive ancestor-worship in Japan, which is compared with the early stages of the Greek and Roman mythology.

To this source Mr. Hearn traces the growth of the splendid loyalty and proved patriotism of the modern Japanese; traces also their extraordinary lack of individualism, their slavish subjection to customs and conventions, the heavy yoke of an ancient rule of the dead.

The very politeness, the urbane orderliness of the people, the very absence of violence and crime, he shows to be the outcome of centuries, tens of centuries, of rigid discipline and control, of utter absence of individual freedom of thought or speech or deed. As Mr. Hearn points out, the Japan of to-day is not a world of the twentieth century after Christ, but a world of many centuries before Christ; yet this fact remains unrecognised by many people to this day.

This is Mr. Hearn's chief point in emphasising the absolute impossibility of sympathy between the mind of the Occident and that of the Far East. In point of view we stand as far apart as pole from pole. The Japanese idea is the outcome of a human experience evolutionally thousands of years younger than our own. Further, it stands in an entirely different trend of evolution from any through which our Aryan state ever passed.

To this fact is attributed the failure, the seeming hopelessness, of implanting in such a people the seeds of Western Christianity. The very activity of their intelligence makes their religious conservatism more formidable than in less fanatic, more barbarous nations. The introduction of Christianity means an uprooting of all that the nation holds sacred, all the religious cult of the dead, all the antique structure on which rests the Empire of the Heavenly Ones—an uprooting inseparable from a proper conception of Western Christianity.

The chances for a Christianity adapted to fit in and be assimilated, as were the general principles of Buddhism, with the harmless and revered forms of Shinto, Mr. Hearn considers to have been demolished by the disastrous effects and evil influence of the Jesuit Mission of the sixteenth century. To quote one of the author's pithy sentences:

"The real and avowed object of missions is defeated by persistent indifference to sociological truths, and the martyrdoms and sacrifices are utilised by Christian nations for ends essentially opposed to the spirit of Christianity."

Late in the story of the world Japan has gone to school; in a spirit of juvenility she is learning in a few years the lessons acquired with the pains of centuries by her Western allies, learning them with a quick intelligence of slow maturity.

On the foundations of strict suppression of individual entity, on a creed of supreme unselfishness, on the religion of unflinching duty, Japan stands to-day with the key to the West in her hand. Will she turn it and take her place among the peoples of the Occident?

The perusal of this "Attempt at Interpretation" leads us to answer in the affirmative.

MADGE S. SMITH.

REGULATIONS.

We shall give, until further notice, a monthly prize, value £1 ls., for the best criticism of a specified book. The prize will take the form of a £1 ls. subscription to Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son's Circulating Library. In the case of any prize-winner living too far from the nearest branch of this library, or for any other good reason not desiring to subscribe to it, the subscription will be transferred to another library, to be chosen by the prize-winner. If already a subscriber to a library, the guinea will run from end of present subscription or be added to it at once. The prize-winner will be sent an order on the library selected, a cheque for £1 ls. being forwarded with proper notification to the proprietors. The winning criticism will be printed, with the writer's name, in THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE. Style and independence of view will be chiefly taken into account in awarding the prize. We need not remind competitors that they are not called upon to buy the selected books, but can obtain them from a library.

RULES.

1. The criticism must not exceed eight hundred words or be less than five hundred.
2. All communications must be addressed to "The Competition Editor, THE ACADEMY, 9 East Harding Street, London, E.C."
3. The Editor's judgment in awarding the prize must be considered final.
4. The MS. must be clearly written by hand, or typewritten, on one side only of the paper.
5. No competitor can win the prize more than once in three months. In case a previous prize-winner sends in the best criticism, his (or her) paper will be printed, the prize going, however, to the next best sent in by a non-prize-winner.
6. The competition coupon must be filled in and sent with the MS. (See page 2 of Cover.)

SUBJECT FOR FOURTH COMPETITION

VIVIAN GREY. By Lord Beaconsfield.

Competitors' MSS. must reach the office not later than February 13.

Never Pay Another To Do What You Can Do Cheaper Yourself

Anybody who desires to have his MS., accounts, or specifications typewritten can do it best and most cheaply himself. You can now buy a new and up-to-date WILLIAMS MODEL 2 ("Academy" Model) TYPEWRITER, or a MODEL 3 (The Brief Size Machine) at a discount of 40%. If you are a professional or business man, architect, author, clergyman, lecturer, builder, schoolmaster, anybody in fact who desires to use a typewriter, you will quickly save the price of the machine by doing your own work, and then—that done—will have your MS. typewritten for nothing.

Full details will be sent you if you will write for them to "The Academy" Typewriter Department, 9 East Harding Street, London, E.C., or will be given to you if you will call at the Williams Typewriter Office: London, 57 Holborn Viaduct; Aberdeen, 115 Union St.; Belfast, 71 Ann St.; Birmingham, 28 High St.; Burnley, 9 Grimshaw St.; Cardiff, 8 St. John's Square; Dublin, 5 Upper Ormonde Quay; Edinburgh, 19 Shandwick Place; Exeter, 31 Queen St.; Glasgow, 69 Bothwell St.; Leeds, 3 Park Lane; Leicester, 60-64 Halford St.; Leigh, 64 Bond St.; Liverpool, 16 Union St., Exchange; Manchester, 267 Deansgate; Middlesbrough, Royal Exchange; Newcastle, 21 Collingwood St.; Nottingham, Prudential Buildings; Portsmouth, 154 Queen St.; Southampton, 12 Portland St.; Sheffield, 72 Queen St.

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 9 East Harding Street, London, E.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper, which must bear the sender's full name and address, not necessarily for publication. The Editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archaeology, Folk-lore, Art, Music and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published.

Questions must NOT be such as can be answered from the ordinary works of reference.

COMPETITION.

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5/- each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to "Academy" Questions and Answers.

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The names and addresses of prize-winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk. Each prize will consist of 5/- worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5/-. No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

One of the four weekly prizes will be awarded, whenever possible, to a Shakespearean Question or Answer.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" carries disqualification.

NOTE.

THE LEGEND OF PERSEPHONE.—It does not seem quite certain that Persephone was gathering daffodils when Pluto carried her off. Ovid says: "Ipse crocos tenues, liliacque alba legit" ("Fasti," iv. 442). This differs from the version in the Homeric Hymns (Hymn to Demeter). Here it is stated that Zeus, in order to help Pluto, caused a wonderful daffodil, or narcissus, with a hundred blossoms, to spring from the earth. Persephone was so attracted by the flowers that she was easily carried away. There is no reason to suppose that Persephone fell asleep and was then carried off. The following details are given by Ovid:

Carpenti studio paulatim longius itur
Et dominam casu nulla secuta comes.
Hanc videt et visam patruus velociter aufert, &c.
("Fasti," iv. 443-445.)—Percy Selver.

Questions SHAKESPEARE.

MONEY IN SHAKESPEARE'S DAY.—In estimating the value of money in Shakespeare's day compared with its relative value in our own time I find considerable difficulty in coming to a conclusion as to the proportion that should be rightly assigned to each. Mr. Sidney Lee puts the average income of Shakespeare before 1599 at £130, which he says is "equal to £1,040 of to-day"—that is, eight times more. Other critics do not put the increase so high, and if we consider that the prices for admission in the public theatres such as the Globe ranged from 2d. to 2s. 6d. we must be surprised at the wealth of the ordinary spectators, who could afford to pay from 1s. 4d. to 20s. of our money to see a play. If any of your readers could throw light on this question it would be a favour.—D. R. Clark (Glasgow).

SHAKESPEARE AND EPICETUS.—Epictetus, the Stoic philosopher, in one of his discourses said (according to translation): "Remember that thou art an actor in a play of such a part as it may please the director to assign thee; of a short part if he choose a short part, of a long one if he choose a long one." Can it be that the familiar quotation from Shakespeare, "All the world's a stage," originated from Epictetus?—Hastings Shaddick (Barnstable).

THE LADY OF STRACHY.—Who is the lady of the Strachy mentioned by Malvolio in "Twelfth Night," II. v.?—H.J.M.

LITERATURE.

"JOWNED."—R. L. Stevenson concludes one of his letters thus: "I am, Sir, yours, and be jowned to you, R. L. S." If R. L. S. did not coin this word by whom was it previously used and what does it mean?—I.B. (Gateshead).

STELLA'S BIBLICAL KNOWLEDGE.—In his "Journal to Stella," Letter XXVII., Swift writes: "Dingley has heard of Nimrod, but not Stella, for it is in the Bible." In Letter XXXII. he asks: "Is Stella well enough to go to church, pray?" There is, apparently, no reason why Stella should have been without Biblical knowledge. Her eyes were weak, but that is hardly an excuse. Can anyone give an explanation?—H.J.M.

"ARCADES AMBO."—How has this Vergilian phrase come to be used as an equivalent for simpletons or knaves, and which is the prior significance?—Robert B. Boswell.

SATAN AS GOD'S APE.—Tertullian is stated to be the authority for giving to Satan the name of "God's ape"; but I cannot verify the reference, and doubt whether this is so. Can any reader assist me in the matter?—Robert B. Boswell.

LES MAGES.—What are the chief characteristics of this school of modern French poets (mentioned in Tolstoy's "What is Art")?—E.D.J. (Barnmouth).

TRUTH.—Could any reader say who it was who defined "truth" as "that which the world will neither believe nor accept"?—Charles H. M. Pennycook (Brighton).

AUTHOR WANTED.—

The river is deep, it runneth slow,
You cannot tell what it saith;
It keepeth its secrets down below,
And so doth death.

From a faint recollection of the poem, read long ago in a magazine, to which this verse is the burden, the river runs "on the skirts of Cambridge town," but whether the poem was English or American—whether the Cam or the Charles is meant—I cannot say.—A.H. (Sheffield).

GENERAL.

APPLAUSE.—What is the origin of clapping the hands to express approval or satisfaction?—David White.

"SWINGING A CAT ROUND."—What is the origin of the expression "There isn't sufficient room to swing a cat round"? And why a cat?—W.S. (Leves).

KING ALFRED AND THE CAKES.—I have lately visited Arundel Castle, and was there shown a room where tradition says Alfred "burnt the cakes." Can you tell me whether this is really the true place of this deed? So many places claim to have been the scene of this tale.—M. Howlett (Bury).

"TIB'S EVE."—In "Roget's Thesaurus," &c., I recently came across the term "Tib's Eve," meaning never. Can any one tell me how the term originated and the name of the originator? Shakespeare uses the term "tib," but not in connection with time.—John Everard.

* THE DEVIL LOOKING OVER LINCOLN.—In Scott's "Kenilworth," on page 16 of the large-type Border Edition of his works, I have come across the following words: "Here be a set of good fellows willing to be merry; do not scowl on them like the devil looking over Lincoln." To what legend does Scott refer when alluding to the "devil looking over Lincoln"?—R.H.B. (Blackburn).

Answers

SHAKESPEARE.

"SIR" FOR "REVEREND."—Dominus or Sir was the title given to priests who had not obtained the University degree of Magister. Many of the Romish clergy who had passed through the Universities but had not graduated became priests, and these received as "Pope's Knights" the title of "Sir." This was the case before the Reformation, and "Sir Hugh," "Sir Oliver," and "Sir Topas" were characters whom Shakespeare drew from those who must have been quite common in his day.—D. R. Clark.

"SIR" FOR "REVEREND."—"Sir" in this connection means a University graduate, which every parson was presumed to be; just as at the present time a physician is popularly called a doctor. The word in this sense is, I believe, still in use at Queen's College, Oxford, where, for certain official purposes, it is prefixed to the surnames of resident bachelors of arts. Thus "Sir Smith" is "Mr. Smith, B.A."—William Cuthbert Childs.
[Replies also received from Hilda M. Wood; M.S.; and K.C.B. (Chelsea).]

WAS SHAKESPEARE A SCHOOLMASTER?—"The only external testimony worth anything—and its value is not slight—is the tradition that he was for some time an assistant in a school" (Garnett and Gosse's "English Literature: an Illustrated Record," ii. 145).—F.C.T.B.

DUCCAME.—Further replies from L.L.; H. Kingston; Hilda M. Wood; and M.A.C. (Cambridge).

LITERATURE.

* "ROBINSON CRUSOE."—The following occurs in Sir H. Ellis's "Letters of Eminent Literary Men" (published 1843), being a quotation from a memorandum in the handwriting of Thomas Warton, Poet Laureate: "July 10th, 1774.—In the year 1759 I was told by the Reverend Mr. Hollaway, rector of Middleton Stoney, in Oxfordshire, then about seventy years old, and in the early part of his life chaplain to Lord Sunderland, that he had often heard Lord Sunderland say that Lord Oxford, whilst prisoner in the Tower of London, wrote the first volume of the 'History of Robinson Crusoe' merely as an amusement under confinement, and gave it to Daniel Defoe, who frequently visited Lord Oxford in the Tower and was one of his pamphlet-writers: that De Foe, by Lord Oxford's permission, printed it as his own, and, encouraged by its extraordinary success, added himself the second volume, the inferiority of which is generally acknowledged. . . . Mr. Hollaway was a grave, conscientious clergyman, not vain of telling anecdotes, very learned, particularly a good Orientalist, author of some theological tracts, . . . &c."—W. L. Harle (Falsfield).

AUTHORS FOUND.—The lines "If you loved only what were worth your love," &c., are found in R. Browning's "Dramatis Personae," James Lee, vii. "Among the Rocks."—Edward T. Quinn (Ballybrack).

THE TREES BEGAN TO WHISPER.—Kingsley's "Two Years Ago." Further replies received from Lilac; C.R.W.; M.A.C. (Cambridge); F.C.T.B. (Lyne Regis); and L.L.

"There is sweet music here. . . ." The well-known quotation attached to Burne-Jones's "Green Summer" is the first two lines of the Choric Song in Tennison's "Lotus Eaters."—Wm. Ranby (Coventry).
[Replies also from H. B. Foyster (Hastings); and L.L.B. (Richmond).]

GENERAL.

* "A BRICK."—This phrase is of very ancient origin. Plutarch, in his "Life of Agesilaus, King of Sparta," tells this story. On one occasion an Ambassador on a visit was shown over the principal towns of Sparta, and remarked that he found no walls reared for defence. The King replied that if he would go with him on the following morning he would show him the walls of Sparta. Accordingly the next morning he led his guest out on to the plain, where his army was drawn up in full array, and pointing proudly to the serried hosts he said, "There thou beholdest the walls of Sparta, ten thousand men, and every man a brick."—Hilda M. Wood (Manchester).

"A BRICK."—I take the following from an old scrapbook, dated 1861: "When you say, in a phrase which is now quite common, such and such a man is a 'brick,' do you think of or do you know the origin of it? It is this: An Eastern Prince, on being asked 'Where are the fortifications of your city?' replied, pointing to his soldiers, 'Every man you see is a brick.'—Charles H. M. Pennycook (Brighton).

"A BRICK."—According to the Century Dictionary, the origin of the expression "You are a brick" is uncertain. One explanation is that it arose in the English Universities as a humorous translation of Aristotle's εσπερπαγματος ἀνρίπ, a perfect (lit. square or rectangular) man.—M.A.C. (Cambridge).

"ORDER REIGNS IN WARSAW."—The insurrection which broke out at Warsaw on November 29, 1830, was finally suppressed on September 8, 1831. Eight days later General Sebastiani made the announcement to the Chamber of Deputies in the following words: "Des lettres que je reçois de Pologne m'annoncent que la tranquillité règne à Varsovie."—Eduard M. Borrajo (Guildhall).

[Replies also from E. T. Quinn; R.S. (Sunderland); C.R.W.; and W.M. (Aberdeen).]

PORT ARTHUR.—Further replies received from W. L. Harle; A.K.M. (Coatbridge); C.R.W.; K.C.; and K.S. (Bristol).

"TELL THAT TO THE MARINES."—Replies have been received from Hilda M. Wood; Lilac; M.A.C. (Cambridge); H.L.L. (Liverpool); and K.S. (Bristol).

BOHEMIAN.—Replies also received from K.W. (Stockholm); Lilac; Hilda M. Wood; G.H.S. (Brentford); and K.S. (Bristol).

PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain, on application at the following booksellers, Five Shillings' worth of books. Notices have been dispatched to the several winners and to the following booksellers:

Messrs. Jones & Evans, 77 Queen Street, Chancery Lane, E.C.
Messrs. R. Denham & Co., 31 King William Street, Blackburn.
Messrs. George's Sons, Top Corner Park Street, Bristol.
Messrs. Clarkson & Griffith, 162 Deansgate, Manchester.

THE INTERNATIONAL BOOK CIRCULAR, No. 139,

Containing a special article, entitled :
"SOME CONTEMPORARY FOREIGN CHEMISTS."

By Dr. M. O. FORSTER, together with an exact bibliography of their publications and a double
plate of their portraits.—Specimen copies gratis.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, Book Importers,
14 Henrietta st, Covent Garden, W.C.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 St. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C.,
AND 4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both
Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale
Commissions executed.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately
done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens
and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

AUTHORS' MSS., Sermons, Plays, Envelopes,
&c., carefully typed at home (Remington),
9d. per 1,000 words. Orders promptly executed.
—M. M. L., 7 Vernon Road, Clapham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING.—All kinds. Novels, 9d.
1,000. Translations. — Miss HANDLY,
Berkhamsted.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS., 10d. per 1,000, all descriptions; neat, prompt,
accurate; duplicating a speciality, Shorthand.
Testimonials. — Mrs. MICHEL, 23 Quarrendon
Street, Fulham, S.W.

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING. Authors' MSS.
from 10d. per 1,000 words; carbon duplicates half-price; fully qualified as proof reader.
Highest references. — Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

PROPRIETORS of BOOK PUBLISHING,
Newspaper, or kindred concerns requiring
Active PARTNERS, INVESTORS, or to SELL
—Publishers' Readers, Editors, Managers, &c.,
seeking PARTNERSHIPS, Sound INVEST-
MENTS, or to PURCHASE, write MANAGER,
20A Yukon Road, Balham. (Estd. 1902.)

INFORMATION TO LIBRARIANS AND COLLECTORS.

TO SELL (privately) the fine Collection of the late Mr. Guffroy on the French Revolution: French Books, Revolutionary Papers,
Placards, Pamphlets on Louis XVI., Marie
Antoinette, Robespierre, Napoleon, &c., &c.; all genuine and scarce; the finest opportunity at a very moderate charge.—Write to M. A. H.,
9 Connaught Street, Hyde Park.

NOTICE.—*The Advertisement and Publishing Offices of "The Academy and Literature" will remain at 9 East
Harding Street until the new offices in Tavistock Street are completed at the end of February.*

All Editorial Communications should, meantime, be addressed to 5 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

THE JOURNAL DE LUXE OF SCOTTISH COUNTRY LIFE.

The FEBRUARY Number of

THE SCOTTISH FIELD

IS NOW ON SALE.

CONTENTS.

1. Portrait of Hon. J. C. Burns.
2. By River and Loch :
Special Angling Articles. (Illustrated.)
3. Sport on Moor and Forest.
4. Natural Science in the Poets.
5. Mountaineering.
6. Early Glasgow Swimming Clubs.
(Part II.)
7. The Road to Loch Awe. (Illustrated.)
8. Sport in the Army.
9. Wildfowling.
10. Farm and Garden Notes.
11. Yachting. (Illustrated.)
12. Motoring, Golf, Bowling.
13. Billiards.
14. Fashions for Ladies and Gentlemen, &c. &c.

Single Copies from Head Office, 7½d. post free. Annual Subscription from Head Office only, 7s. 6d. post free.

THE SCOTTISH FIELD,
11 Bothwell Street, Glasgow.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY.

SUBSCRIPTIONS opened at any date for THREE, SIX and TWELVE Months. Town Subscriptions, 21s. Yearly. Books of past
Seasons, 10s. 6d. Yearly.

Terms for Country, Suburbs, and Parcoe' Post, sent on application to MUDIE & CO., 30-34 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIUMS

EVERY DAY

IS

PUBLISHERS' DAY

IN THE

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

Special literary issue
on Saturdays.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S.
appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR
PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN
AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current
Literature, and without doubt the best
Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.
Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON ST., HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE IRISH TIMES

DUBLIN.

The largest and most influential circulation in Ireland.

Special page of book reviews every Friday.

London Editorial Offices: 153 FLEET STREET.

Advertisement Offices: 61 FLEET STREET.

THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN

Established 1821.

Published Daily. Price One Penny.

Has a circulation peculiar to itself among the more cultivated classes of Great Britain in every district, and claims, with justice, to be one of the leading papers in the country.

Contains special columns devoted to literary matters.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS

The Morning Newspaper for Aberdeen

AND THE

Northern Half of Scotland.

Reviews of books appear on Mondays and

Thursdays, and on other days as required.

Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.

NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.

LONDON OFFICE: 149 FLEET STREET, E.C.

NOTICE.

As a New Volume began with the issue for January 7th, this is a suitable time to subscribe to "THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE," which is POSTED FREE (52 issues at 3d.) to every ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying 13/-. FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a PREPAYMENT of 17/6 will secure it being sent Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform
1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy.
Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or Newsvendor, or direct to the Publisher,
9 East Harding Street, E.C.

From Mr. Andrew Melrose's List

THIRD EDITION OF MR. SMELLIE'S GREAT WORK ON THE COVENANTERS.

Men of the Covenant.

By ALEXANDER SMELLIE, M.A., Author of "In the Hour of Silence," &c. With Portraits and 37 Illustrations. Medium 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, rough edges, 480 pp. Price 7s. 6d. net.

Dr. D. HAY FLEMING, in The Bookman.—"Mr. Smellie's new work will greatly widen the circle of his admirers. Those who enjoy a book of high-toned religious thought will find much to their taste in 'Men of the Covenant,' as will also those who delight in biographical sketches well told. . . . As he is endowed with a well-balanced mind, and the power of expressing himself in clear, nervous English, and, above all, is in true sympathy with the aspirations of the men who endured so much, and fought so well, the outcome is a singularly interesting volume. It is sure to be popular, and it deserves to live."

Sons o' Men. By G. B.

LANCASTER. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

Mr. W. L. COURTNEY, in The Daily Telegraph.—"Sons o' Men' breaks new ground, for it gives one a picture of an almost unknown land. . . . It is extraordinarily vivid and actual, and has that particular charm—which appeals so strongly to some minds—of presenting us with new human types. . . . Chapters from the life story of strong, hard pieces of masculinity, very crude, very direct, and as far removed from the men who belong to the Western Continent as the country they inhabit is distant, let us say, from London or New York. . . . 'Sons o' Men' is a powerful book, full of actuality."

Peaceable Fruit. By CRANSTON METCALFE, Author of "Splendid Mourning."

BIRMINGHAM GAZETTE.—"In Mr. Metcalfe we have a new, a more refined, more spiritual Thomas Hardy. This is a bold saying, but it is true. . . . There is real insight into human nature, a loving and unerring touch in the portrayal of individuals, and fine descriptive work in dealing with the natural charms of the delightful corner of Dorsetshire wherein the scene is laid. . . . One unhesitatingly affirms that 'Peaceable Fruit' is the work of a master hand."

ON THE RISE OF JAPAN.

The Revelation of the East.

By A. MORRIS STEWART, M.A. 6d. net.

The Week's Survey.—"It is a book that appeals powerfully to the imagination by its masterly grouping of undeniable facts, and by the illuminating beams it throws upon their meaning. . . . We are discharging an obvious duty in urging upon all who are anxious to understand the drift of current events to read and ponder it."

England's Sea Story.

From the Earliest Times to the Present Day. By ALBERT LEE. With numerous illustrations. Cloth boards, 6s.

Navy League Journal.—"Mr. Lee covers the whole of the period of England's sea history in his interesting volume, and the whole book is fascinating and instructive."

NEW THEOLOGICAL WORKS.

Twice Born. And other

Sermons. By Principal D. W. SIMON, D.D. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

Methodist Recorder.—"There is always room for such strong and telling teaching as is found in this book. . . . Dr. Simon's style is clear and logical; the language is restrained, but the fire glows through it. . . . The book will appeal to thoughtful readers as stimulating to thought and helpful to faith."

SECOND EDITION AT PRESS.

The Silent Christ. Studies

in the Silences of Christ. By the Rev. W. W. SIDNEY. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

Guardian.—"The fruitfulness of Gospel study is conspicuously illustrated by this excellent book. . . . Very thoughtful and admirable."

A First Primer of Apologetics.

By Prof. ROBERT MACKINTOSH, D.D. New Edition. Price 2s.

Presbyterian.—"This volume consists of twelve terse, well-reasoned chapters, each of them full of evidence of ripe learning and vigorous thinking, and containing as a whole a candid discussion of the main questions of modern apologetics."

London: Andrew Melrose, 16 Pilgrim St., E.O.

FEBRUARY NUMBERS NOW READY.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE

Price 1s. Annual Subscription, 12s.

CONTENTS FOR FEBRUARY—

The Toll of the Bush. By WILLIAM SATCHELL. Chapters XI.-XIV.

From Tangier to Morocco.

More Judges? By FREDERICK PAYLER.

The Study of Colonial History at Oxford. By Rev. WILLIAM GRESWELL.

The Two Griseldas.

The Modern Trade of Politics. By DR. AUBREY.

Art and the Athlete. By MARTIN HARDIE.

Sainte-Beuve. By H. C. MACDOWALL.

TEMPLE BAR

Price 1s. Annual Subscription, 12s.

CONTENTS FOR FEBRUARY—

Lone Marie. By W. E. NORRIS. Chapters IV.-VI.

Wordsworth in Somerset. By ESTHER HALLAM MOORHOUSE.

By Divers Portions and in Divers Manners. By MARY E. BELLARS.

Some Russian Types and Scenes. By ROBERT BOWMAN.

The Treasure of the King. By J. W. QUICK.

The Grey Hat. By SIDNEY PHELPS.

The Pleasures of Ignorance. By ELLEN GOSSE.

Winter Sunshine. By S. CORNISH WATKINS.

In the Valley of the Bees. By DANIELE B. VARÉ.

The Basket of Fate. By SIDNEY PICKERING. Chapters III.-V.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., London.

Elliot Stock's NEW BOOKS

Tastefully printed with broad margins, in large 4to size, with over 150 Photographic Illustrations, handsomely bound, with gilt top, price 21s. net.

NORMAN TYMPANA and

LINTELS, with Figures or Symbolical Sculpture, still, or till recently, existing in the Churches of Great Britain, with an extended Introduction and Description and 150 Phototype Illustrations. By CHARLES EDWARD KEYSER, M.A., F.S.A.

In crown 4to, cloth, fully illustrated with Portraits, &c., price 21s. net.

THE GARRICK CLUB.

By PERCY FITZGERALD, F.S.A., Author of "The Life of Garrick," "Lives of the Kembles," &c.

"Full of good stories, well illustrated, and especially rich in reminiscences of Thackeray."—Weekly Times.

"A volume full of delightful chat about notable people, while the numerous illustrations have a historical value."—The Graphic.

A NEW WORK ON THE CASTLES OF IRELAND.

In handsome demy 8vo, printed in tasteful manner, suitably bound and fully illustrated, price 10s. 6d. net.

The ANCIENT CASTLES OF IRELAND.

By O. L. ADAMS.

"To piece together with the aid of the scattered ruins with which the length and breadth of Ireland is strewn, a history of the castles those ruins represent, must indeed have been a difficult task; but that it has been successfully performed by Mr. Adams no one will deny."—The Academy.

"In all cases the descriptive sketch is clear and succinct, and the salient historical events are carefully set forth. A very interesting and informative book."—Northern Whig, Belfast.

In demy 8vo, appropriately bound, price 10s. 6d. net.

THE CITY OF YORK:

The Story of its Walls, Bars, and Castles, being a Complete History and Pictorial Record of the Defences of the City, from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. By T. P. COOPER, Author of "The Old Inns and Signs of York."

"Mr. T. P. Cooper, who is known in Yorkshire as the author of a careful book on the city inns and signs, has discovered a good deal of new and entertaining matter; his work is sure to be appreciated."—Saturday Review.

"It deals more exhaustively with the subject than any work yet published. It is written in an interesting style, and contains many excellent illustrations."—York Diocesan Magazine.

In crown 8vo, tastefully bound, price 5s.

THE LOVE LETTERS OF

A LADY OF QUALITY OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY. With two facsimile portraits from miniature.

"Full of romantic interest."—Newcastle Daily Chronicle.

"A refined and artistic piece of work."—Aberdeen Free Press.

NEW NOVELS.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

THE SCHOOL OF LIFE.

A Study in the Discipline of Circumstance. By SYBIL M. ILES.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 6s.

LIFE'S PHASES. A Domestic Story.

By MARY ADAMS COLLINGS.

"It is drawn from real life, and would seem to be a faithful record, for it presents a picture which is, alas! only too often to be seen in outline in newspaper reports."—The Record.

ELLIOT STOCK,

62 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

The Academy

and Literature

No. 1708. Established 1869.

London: 28 January 1905.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17s. 6d. a year.]

Notes

THE Editorial Chair of this Journal after this present issue will be occupied by another, to whom I desire to offer all good wishes. Also I desire to take this opportunity of thanking my readers for their kind support, which I trust will be given as freely to my successor as it has been to myself. All Editorial communications must in future be addressed to The Editor, THE ACADEMY, 5 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

THE vexed question of American Copyright, which has quite recently been ventilated from different points of view in the columns of "The Standard," receives further publicity in a quaint and characteristic article by Mark Twain in the current number of "The North American Review." With obvious sincerity and typical naïveté the veteran humourist puts the case in the form of a dialogue between himself and an anonymous protagonist, who has (naturally) much the worst of the argument. According to Mark Twain, five or six thousand books are copyrighted annually in the United States; of these ten a year, at the outside, survive the forty-two year copyright limit. "Each year ten venerable copyrights fall in, and the bread of ten persons is taken from them by the Government. This microscopic petty larceny is all that is accomplished. . . . a distinct reversal of the law of the survival of the fittest. It is the assassination of the fittest."

THIS is very pretty pleading, and allowing for the necessary Transatlantic inflation of the eternal verities, it sufficiently accentuates the unfairness of the situation. But Mark Twain has a remedy. It is this: "That, during the forty-second year of the copyright limit, the owner of the copyright shall be obliged to issue an edition of the book at these following rates, to wit: twenty-five cents for each hundred thousand words, or less, of its contents, and keep said edition on sale always thereafter, year after year, indefinitely. And if in any year he shall fail to keep such edition on sale during a space of three months, the copyright shall then perish"—which is very optimistic and Utopian and desirable and impossible and altogether very Mark Twainish. The argument put forth is sufficiently specious to lure the unwary into belief; but it seems, on careful consideration, to lack a solid business, commercial, financial basis, and it seems scarcely feasible in its present presentment.

A SOMEWHAT remarkable article in this month's "Independent Review" is that of Mr. Thorold's, on "The Ideas of Anatole France." In our chauvinistic insularity we are wont to pay little or no attention to the literary achievements of our cross-Channel neighbours, and to put it brusquely, the average reading Briton does not think much of a Frenchman until he is dead—and not always then. Nevertheless, there is now and then a spasmodic interest, awakened no one knows exactly how or why, in a contemporary writer who, whether or not "crowned by the Academy," happens to excite the interest of something more than a couple of dozen subscribers to Mudie's. Such an one is M. Anatole France, who (with profoundest apologies to several British novelists with "the biggest circulation") is quite an important author—and an artist, go to! with everything handsome about him. Mr. Thorold leads off his article with a typical quotation: "The longer I contemplate human life, the more I believe that we must give it, for witnesses and judges, Irony and Pity, even as the Egyptians evoked over their dead the Goddesses Isis and Nephtis. Irony and Pity are two good counsellors. The one smiles and makes life amiable; the other weeps and makes it sacred. The irony which I invoke is not cruel. It mocks neither love nor beauty. It is gentle and kind. Its laugh calms anger; and it teaches us to smile at wicked men and fools whom, without it, we might have the weakness to hate."

THESE are the words of a wise man, a good man, an historian, a poet and a philosopher. M. France is all these—and more. He is of the line of great sceptics, the salt of whose questionings has never been wanting to freshen the stream of human speculation. The book to which Mr. Thorold particularly refers is "La Rôtisserie de la Reine Pédauque"; but his just and appreciative criticism applies equally to "L'Etui de Nacre," "Le Jardin d'Epicure," "Jocaste et le Chat maigre," "Le Lys Rouge" and, most of all, to the sequel to the first mentioned work, "Les Opinions de M. Jérôme Coignard." "It is in 'La Rôtisserie de la Reine Pédauque' and its sequel, 'Les Opinions de M. Jérôme Coignard,' that he has succeeded in expressing himself supremely. In these books, his fantasy and (an enemy would say) his sophistry are suffused with so rich a glow of kindly humanity as to be quite irresistible. We may disapprove of the Abbé Coignard: it is our right as law-abiding citizens and respectable churchmen to do so; but it is impossible even to think of him without secret joy." Such discerning and understanding appreciation of a master, albeit a foreign one, is rare and delightful. It is a thousand pities that on our side we are so little appreciative of what is really fine and great in literature, because it happens to be writ in a tongue which is barely twenty-two miles distant from our own.

THE insularity at which I have tentatively hinted in a foregoing paragraph is accentuated by the publication this month of the first number of "La Revue Germanique" (Paris: Félix Alcan, Editeur, 108 Boulevard St. Germain). This periodical is to appear five times a year—in January, March, May, July and November. It is published under the auspices of the Universities of Lille, Lyons and Nancy, and has a list of contributors which is impressive in its comprehensiveness and cosmopolitanism. Although written in French, the review deals with Germanic literature generally. There is an article by Ernest Lichtenberger on Goethe's "Faust," from an entirely new point of view. André Chevrillon writes on "La Jeunesse de Ruskin," and Albert Schweitzer on "Le Symbolisme de Bach." There are notes on Novalis, Hebbel, Beaumont and Fletcher, Mr. Sidney Lee's Elizabethan Sonnets, Macdonald's and Bertram Dobell's "Charles Lamb" and the "Bibliography" of Coleridge.

SUCH a publication is impossible with us. Not that we are entirely illiterate or unobservant of the happenings in the foreign press, but our inveterate insularity, our narrow purview of everything un-British, limits our literary horizon to that which occurs immediately under our own noses. It is sad and characteristic and inevitable. A Latin Review answering to this "Revue Germanique" would be an impossibility with us. Our publishers would fight shy of it; our writers would develop impossible and ridiculous fads; our advertisers would decline to assist, and our circulation would begin and end with exchange copies with foreign periodicals. We live on a small island and our literary periphery is in proportion thereto. Which is a pity.

THE Oriental section of the library of the late Arthur Strong, Professor of Arabic and lecturer in University College, London, and librarian to the House of Lords, has been presented by Mrs. Strong to the College and accepted by the Council. The books will form part of the Oriental Library of the College, and will be known as the "Arthur Strong Oriental Library."

At the Royal Historical Society, on January 19, Sir Frederick Pollock in the Chair, the following were elected Fellows: C. M. Agur, S. J. G. Hoare, and the Reverend W. T. Whitley. A communication was made by Mr. H. E. Malden, the Hon. Secretary, dealing with the position of the later "Bond men" in Surrey as contrasted with the status of the mediæval villeins. A paper was read by Miss E. M. Leonard on "The Inclosing Movement in England during the Seventeenth Century," with the object of showing that the extent and characteristics of the movement during the period in question have been hitherto inadequately described. The paper was illustrated by references to Chancery suits and other records in which the progress of the movement must be chiefly traced. A discussion followed, in which the Chairman, Mr. I. S. Leadam and Miss Skeel took part.

AN authorised biography of the late Canon Ainger, embodying a selection of his correspondence, has been in the course of active preparation for some months past. Friends of Canon Ainger who may be willing to assist in the collection of materials by the loan of private correspondence are invited to send any letters suitable for the purpose to the publishers, Messrs. A. Constable & Co., 16 James Street, Haymarket, by whom such letters will be copied and returned to their owners with all possible care and despatch.

Bibliographical

THE death of Emily Gerard (Mme. de Laszowska) removes the elder of two distinguished sisters, both of whom are widely known as writers of fiction, and both of whom married Austrian officers. The earlier stories which they wrote together were signed "E. D. Gerard." Emily Gerard's published works were: "Reata, What's in a Name?"—in collaboration with Dorothea Gerard—(1880); "Beggar My Neighbour"—with Dorothea Gerard—(1882); "The Waters of Hercules"—with Dorothea Gerard—(1885); "The Land Beyond the Forest: Facts, Figures and Fancies from Transylvania" (1888); "Bis"—four tales—(1890); "A Secret Mission" (1891); "A Sensitive Plant"—with Dorothea Gerard—(1891); "The Voice of a Flower" (1893); "A Foreigner: an Anglo-German Study" (1896); "An Electric Shock and Other Stories" (1897); "The Tragedy of a Nose (a Brief Delirium)" (1898); "The Extermination of Love: a Fragmentary Study in Erotics" (1901); "The Heron's Tower: a Romance" (1904). In 1893 she wrote a preface for an English edition of Kneipp's "My Water Cure."

"Morice Gerard," it may perhaps be worth pointing out here, is the pen-name adopted by the Reverend J. Jessop Teague, whose first story followed, I fancy, close after the publication of the first novel by "E. D. Gerard"—a curious instance of immediately contemporary use of the same name in the same field by those who owned it as a patronymic and one who had chosen it as a pseudonym.

It has been remarked before that the novelists have divided the country into districts for special exploitation in fiction. The title of Mr. C. F. Keary's new story, "Bloomsbury," suggests that they are about to do the same for the metropolis. It is many years since Laurence Oliphant may be said to have started the fashion with "Piccadilly," but in the last few years Mr. Percy White has given us "The West End" and then, descending from the general to the particular, he wrote "Park Lane," and Miss Winifred Graham—still keeping to the domain of fashion—recently published "Mayfair." "The City" and a few other districts remain—to say nothing of the comprehensive "London"—for those still on the look-out for titles.

A writer in "Notes and Queries" suggests that, in view of the approaching centenary of the Battle of Trafalgar, it would be interesting if a complete list of tales dealing with Nelson could be furnished, and goes on to cite the following three stories: the late G. A. Henty's "By Conduct and Courage," Dr. W. H. Fitchett's "The Commander of 'The Hirondelle'" and Mr. F. Harrison's "England Expects." Such a list, to be at all complete, would need slow and careful building up, and this will no doubt be done by the correspondents of "Notes and Queries." In Mr. Nield's "Guide to Historical Fiction" four stories are put down against Nelson—A. Sagon's "When George the Third was King," Mr. Horace G. Hutchinson's "A Friend of Nelson," R. D. Blackmore's "Springhaven" and Señor B. Perez Galdes' "Trafalgar," of which an English translation was published about twenty years ago. Three further stories which might be added to the list are: "Twas in Trafalgar's Bay," by Besant and Rice, Henty's "At Aboukir and Acre" and Mr. Douglas Sladen's "The Admiral."

The recent publication in a contemporary of a fairly familiar poem of Winthrop Mackworth Praed's as "anonymous" has set me inquiring as to the extent to which the work of that facile and entertaining poet of the "lyra elegantiarum" has been republished during recent years. Excluding his "Every-Day Characters," which were issued, with illustrations by Mr. Cecil Aldin, in 1896, it is nearly twenty years since Praed's poems or any representative selection have been published. In 1885 the selection from Praed's works, made by Sir G. Young in 1865 for Moxon's "Miniature Poets," was reissued: and in the same year we had Sir G. Young's edition of "The Political and Occasional Poems of W. M. Praed" (a second and cheaper issue of which was made in 1888). In 1885, too, a New York firm issued in two volumes a revised and complete edition of Praed, with Derwent Coleridge's memoir of him (1864). In 1886 a selection from Praed, edited by Mr. Frederick Cooper, was added to "The Canterbury Poets." In 1887 a volume of Praed's Essays was added to Morley's Universal Library. There is, it may be added, a representative selection from his work—edited by Mr. Austin Dobson—in "Poets and Poetry of the Century," of which a popular re-issue is now being made by Messrs. Routledge. There should be room now for a new volume giving the best of his poetry, for, as Mr. Austin Dobson has put it, as a writer of society verse in its exacter sense, Praed is justly acknowledged to be supreme; perhaps he is yet to be represented in "The Golden Treasury" or "Muses Library Series."

WALTER JERROLD.

Forthcoming Books, &c.

An interesting work is about to be issued by Messrs. Jack. It is a History of Accounting and Accountants. For the purposes of this work reports have been obtained from almost every part of the civilised world, and an amount of information has been collected which certainly has never before been brought together and published. The volume will give, not only the past history of the profession and all pertaining to it, but the present position of accountants and the methods of accounting and auditing followed wherever international commerce exists; and will thus, besides being of direct interest to accountants, be found a useful book of reference for all engaged in the world's business. The volume will be illustrated by examples in facsimile of old accounts and account books, portraits of eminent accountants, and other interesting subjects. The author is Mr. Richard Brown.—Under title of "The Land of the Blessed Virgin" Mr. Somerset Maugham gives his impressions of a leisurely journey through Andalusia in a volume which Mr. Heinemann is publishing.—Mr. Heinemann also announces a new edition, revised and brought up to date, of "The Complete Indian Housekeeper and Cook," by Mrs. F. A. Steel and Mrs. G. Gardiner.—Messrs. Gay & Bird are bringing out a new edition of McLan's "The Costumes of the Clans." The work will be completed in twenty parts, at 2s. each, the size of the work being the same as the original.—On February 14 a new paper for boys, and especially for those of our elementary schools, will be published by the Religious Tract Society, with a view of counteracting the effects of the literary garbage still so largely circulated amongst lads. It will be conducted by Mr. G. A. Hutchison, who projected and has edited from the first—now over twenty-six years ago—the well-known "Boy's Own Paper," will cost only 1d. per number, and will bear the name of "Every Boy's Monthly."—A new novel by Mr. Percy White, entitled "The System," is published by Messrs. Methuen, and Miss K. Fitzpatrick's book, "The Weans at Rowallan," will be published immediately, illustrated by Mr. A. H. Buckland.—A new and cheaper edition of Mr. Collingwood's well-known "Life of Ruskin" is announced. It will be included in the Half-Crown Library, and will contain several portraits.

THE RATHHAUS, COLOGNE

[Illustration from "History of Architecture" (Batsford)]

CAIRO OF TO-DAY

A practical Guide to Cairo and the Nile. By E. A. Reynolds-Ball. (Black, 2s. 6d.) This volume is slightly different from the ordinary type of guide-book. It is no mere catalogue of "sights," but rather a concise survey of those aspects of Cairo and its surroundings which are of interest to the modern visitor. The author, in fact, gives us not only the "stock" descriptions of the "stock" places of interest in Cairo, but contributes some admirable chapters on such subjects as Cairo as a Health Resort, Social Cairo. Hotels and Hotel Life, Sporting Trips, The Regeneration of Egypt and Recent Archæological Research. The volume is divided into four parts dealing respectively with Cairo, Excursions, the Nile and its Monuments, and matters of political and antiquarian interest.

In future all Editorial Communications and Books for Review must be addressed to The Editor, The Academy, 5 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

Reviews

FRENCH PROFILES

By Edmund Gosse. (Heinemann. 7s. 6d.)

THE title "profiles" well expresses the character of these easy and graceful literary portraits, which give, and are intended to give, the man, but not the whole man. The method and the subject suit Mr. Gosse's happy talent for the aperçu. Biography and criticism are deftly blended into an intermediate something, and the last thing the reader need apprehend is to be bored. At the same time he will carry away with him a vivid idea of the personage under consideration, and one destined to but slight modification from fuller acquaintance or the perusal of critical disquisitions with more affectation of science or profundity. This lightness of touch may in part be due to the circumstance that these essays are chiefly reprints from reviews, or even newspapers. The chief exception is the highly interesting address on the influence of France upon English poetry delivered before the Société des Conférences in February of last year. Mr. Gosse justly observes that the great French poets have found much readier acceptance with their countrymen than the English, who have always had to fight against their public's lack of æsthetic sense. But it may fairly be asked whether the reason may not partly consist in the inferiority of the French poetical standard, whether much does not pass for poetry in France which here would be accepted only as rhetoric or esprit. We note one trifling oversight, there was no vernacular Tuscan poetry in the eleventh century.

Mr. Gosse's other essays are principally occupied with contemporary or nearly contemporary authors, the chief exception being Alfred de Vigny, interesting to Englishmen, not merely from his high merit, but as the modern French writer who has owed most to English literature. The others are mostly great artists rather than great writers, although Zola's daring attempt to rival the Comédie Humaine showed that grandeur of conception at least was not extinct under the Third Republic; while it would be a painful reflection were we compelled to believe that the imitator's inferiority to his original correctly measures the gulf between the literature of his age and that of Louis Philippe. This would be too severe a judgment, but Hugo, Balzac, Sand, Dumas, De Musset, De Vigny, Lamartine, incontestably gave the age of Louis Philippe an air of greatness which is as incontestably lacking to the present epoch. Anatole France and Pierre Loti are exquisite artists, and perhaps impart more real pleasure than their great predecessors, but compared to them they are as gem-engravers to sculptors. Mr. Gosse brings out their beauties with a sure and delicate touch; and he makes us acquainted in Albert Samain with a little-known poet in whom French literature would appear to have had a considerable loss. The present ecclesiastical crisis should revive interest in the novels of Ferdinand Fabre; and Paul Bourget and René Bazin, if less interesting individually, are worth noting as average examples of French novelists of the better class. The more considerable figure of Daudet is sympathetically treated by Mr. Gosse; and in dealing with Zola he does not overlook the charm of the innocent pastorals which it was his true vocation to write.

It is Mr. Gosse's misfortune that his canvas is not always large enough for his picture. We hear enough, for example, about that singular personage Barbey d'Aurevilly to make us wish ourselves better acquainted with man and author, of whom we have failed to receive a definite impression. This is sufficiently accounted for by the contracted space necessarily allotted to Mr. Gosse's essays in the periodicals where they originally appeared, but some might have been extended with advantage. The essay on the Letters of the Portuguese Nun, in particular, would have profited by comparison with the recent edition by Mr. Edgar Prestage, who agrees with Mr. Gosse in maintaining the genuineness of the letters, and powerfully reinforces his arguments.

RICHARD GARNETT.

THE COMING OF PARLIAMENT

England from 1350 to 1660. By L. Cecil Jane. "Story of the Nations" Series. (Fisher Unwin, 5s.)

IN this admirable work Mr. Jane does not keep quite so closely to his theme as Mr. Low does in "The Governance of England." That arises from the nature of things. Parliament, as it engages the attention of Mr. Low, had not become much of a reality even by the time at which Mr. Jane closes his survey. Indeed, practically all Mr. Jane is called upon to tell about the beginning of Parliament is stated by himself in a few sentences.

"Under Edward III. and Richard II. the reign of feudalism came to an end; in the Wars of the Roses the Baronage perished, and its revival was prevented by the 'New Monarchy.' By the Reformation the dangerous power of the Church was curtailed and another obstacle to liberty thus removed. Meanwhile the Tudors, by their foreign policy and their care for local government, had fostered the rise of a new opposition; and, finally, the last fight for absolutism was made by the Stuarts. Their failure secured the limited monarchy. . . . The history of the next century and a half is the record of the steps by which the popular control of the government was organised and the manner in which it should be exercised decided."

All these events are amply narrated and explained; but what Mr. Jane has really written is the English history of a period. An excellent history it is, too. Recalling newspaper and magazine articles bearing Mr. Jane's signature, we were prepared to find this work scrupulous as to facts; but, while its accuracy is notable, it has other merits which are astonishing. The events of the period, particularly towards the close, were many and complex and stirring; yet, although this book is almost as compact as an encyclopædia, it is so fluent and fascinating that one reads it with the delight which is given by great romance. Mr. Jane, it is true, is not without predilections. His imagination is attracted by the Navy. The Navy, it seems, is the real Mother of Parliament. In the time of Edward III.

"the crews of the ships were drawn from the peasantry; the admirals even were very rarely of higher rank than knights; and, since the lesser barons had coalesced with the burgesses, the Commons acquired a new weight. They were chiefly connected with the Navy, for the towns supplied the ships and the shires the officers, and, when invasion from France could only be avoided by the maintenance of an efficient fleet, the support of the class which provided and manned the ships was of vital importance to the government. Consequently the Navy had a great, though indirect, share in the promotion of constitutional progress. It is not merely accidental that the growth of the Commons coincides with increased maritime activity, and in this side of the national life the Baronage had no share."

To the Navy, indeed, we owe our very Protestantism. Did not our Elizabethan ancestors adopt that "ism" in order that "their religion might be an excuse for an attack on Spanish America and not a hindrance"? One likes Mr. Jane's admiration for the Navy. It is whole-hearted.

In all other respects, though invariably he arrests attention, he is coldly judicial. As becomes an historian, he has no respect for parties; and, though never violent, he does not mince his words. In England, he says, the Reformation "was carried out by essentially worldly men. There can be no admiration for the private characters of Henry VIII.—Cromwell, Cranmer, Somerset or Northumberland: one and all, they acted from motives of political expediency, and their doctrines were conformed to the exigencies of the moment." Countless reams have been written about Charles I.; but this, after all, is perhaps the final word: "He appears to have accepted the dangerous theory that there are two codes of morality—one for private individuals, one for monarchs; and he was, in short, the best man and the worst king who has ever sat upon the throne of England." Mr. Jane's summing-up of Archbishop Laud is equally neat and persuasive: "He would have made an exemplary master at a small private school; he would have shone on a local board; but his passion for detail and his devotion to discipline on uniformity unfitted him altogether for the post of archbishop at a time when sympathy and tact were most needful." One would like to make other citations to justify one's praise of Mr. Jane; but the allotted space is filled. Suffice it to say that, besides being exceptionally well-informed, our historian brought to his task a fresh, independent and penetrating intellect.

W. EARL HODGSON.

THOMAS MOORE

By Stephen Gwynn. (Macmillan, 2s. net.)

By some it will be questioned whether Moore has a just title to a place among the English Men of Letters, but surely by no one will it be denied that Mr. Gwynn's volume is a worthy addition to this series. Moore lives on in Ireland in the heart of the people; in England, when he is anything more than a name, he is simply recalled as the writer of some pretty ballads. Yet we hold the protest true we once heard made by Mr. Lecky, that Moore was a poet of no mean gifts.

His life is excellently set forth in this volume, the author having evidently put before him as the object of his task the painting of a faithful portrait. It is easy to account for the undue measure of fame which was Moore's during his lifetime; he exercised a potent personal charm, he was entertaining in high degree, a delightful conversationalist and a charming singer. But these light gifts would not alone have gained him access to so many distinguished homes or have won him so many lasting friends. His nature was deeper than the froth on the surface gave promise; he was a staunch stickler for his honour, never deviating by a hair's breadth from the path which he believed he should follow in money or business affairs; he was honest in everything. Miss Berry rightly said of him, "That's as good a creature as ever lived." Mr. Gwynn has well told in one short volume that which by Lord John Russell was ill told in eight—the story of the life of a good man and a good comrade, of his fortunes and his misfortunes, of his gaieties and of his work, but, above all, of as perfect a married life as this world is ever likely to see. Those who honour Thomas Moore must never forget Bessy, his wife.

Of Moore the man of letters less honourable epithets must be used. Of the vast quantity of prose that he wrote in his later years all that yet has a spark of life in it is "The Life of Lord Edward Fitzgerald," in many ways a fine piece of biographical writing. We take it that a biographer has achieved his end if he has presented to the reader a living image of the subject of the memoir, and this, in the case of Lord Edward, Moore has accomplished. Since he wrote, much has been added to our knowledge of the events amid which Lord Edward's life came to untimely wreck, but nothing has been added to our intimate knowledge of the man. Of Moore's poetry all that remains are some of the Irish Melodies, verses grave and gay and often of perfect lyrical quality. Mr. Gwynn does well to remind us that "the best verse is not that which sings best," a fact too often forgotten, and one that accounts for the splendid melodies which have been inspired by commonplace verse. So long as the words express an emotion and trot along neatly the desires of the composer are satisfied. Moore wrote after the event, fitting his words to existing music, which hampered him in the writing of pure lyrics judged from the literary standpoint; but even though so handicapped he has written some verses which should keep green his name as a great minor poet. The lyrics commencing

"At the mid hour of night, when the stars are weeping, I fly,"

and

"O breathe not his name, let it sleep in the shade,"

and

"She is far from the land where her young hero sleeps," are of very high quality, as in a different vein are such as

"Then awake! the heavens look bright, my dear,

'Tis never too late for delight, my dear,

And the best of all ways—

To lengthen our days—

Is to steal a few hours from the night, my dear."

His gift was not that of insight into the grave problems of life; he sang simple emotions, often exquisitely expressed.

Mr. Gwynn has added considerably to his already very considerable repute by this capital little book, in which he does justice to his subject and to himself.

W. TEIGNMOUTH SHORE.

DUTCH POTTERY AND PORCELAIN

By W. Pitcairn Knowles.

OLD ENGLISH FURNITURE

By Frederick Fenn and B. Wyllie.

(Newnes' Library of the Applied Arts, 7s. 6d. each net.)

"In arranging this volume I have endeavoured to keep always in view the difficulties I myself had to contend with as a collector, and I have attempted to supply such information as regards the history of Dutch porcelain and pottery, and the quality and character of the produce, as may be a guide to the collector and student in attributing specimens to the correct maker and factory and period. I have, in fact, made an effort to supply what I felt the need of, but could not obtain, when I began collecting."

This extract from the preface to "Dutch Pottery and Porcelain" very clearly indicates the nature of the task undertaken by the author. By the force of circumstance he was obliged to become a self-made authority. But when a man has courageously ploughed his way through many difficulties and finally achieved success in any enterprise, it does not necessarily follow that he is what he ought to be—an ideal guide for those who desire to follow in his footsteps. Here, however, we have an enthusiast with whom the means of attainment have not been obscured by the end attained. Banishing the knowledge of the Dutch pottery and porcelain language that we already possess, we start afresh with our author for teacher.

In simple words he tells us the alphabet from which pottery and the different makes of porcelain are constructed. Then, by the aid of a few historical facts, he creates a Dutch atmosphere. When we are sufficiently acclimatised he traces the development of the industry from the time when the potter baker accepted the assistance of the seller of clay and went into partnership with the potter-turner, till he finally collaborated with the potter-painter, and the porcelain factory came into existence. The influence of the imported ceramic ware of China and Japan on the Delft industry is clearly explained, and the devolution of the latter ware from art to trade is no less perspicuously traced than is the evolution of the art from the necessitous demands of every-day life.

The appendix, in which is given a facsimile of each of the most famous potters' marks, and of those of the celebrated factories, will be much appreciated by the amateur collector who is so handicapped as a student at museums by the stern injunction "Hands off!"

When we reclaim our previous knowledge of Dutch pottery and porcelain, which was temporarily put aside, we find that our author is a reliable, as well as an entertaining, guide.

The volume on "Old English Furniture" in this same excellent series is equally trustworthy, but it leaves us with a somewhat unpleasant feeling of having been "taken in hand." When Mrs. Wyllie's share in the preparation of this book has been dismissed with a compliment to her intuitive knowledge and an acknowledgment of her assistance, Mr. Fenn becomes distinctly assertive—it is difficult to find a page without an "I" on it. And yet it is possible to sympathise with this personal mood, for there is not a shadow of a doubt that Mr. Fenn is an expert on the subject dealt with; indeed, only a very able expert could compress so much valuable information into such a small amount of space.

The text and numerous illustrations combine to give a comprehensive idea of the "admirable taste and fitness the great masters showed, in the different periods, in constructing furniture which was at once beautiful and perfectly adapted to people's requirements, and to show the collector of moderate means what is worth buying." This being the avowed object of the book, why do we qualify our praise? One quotation from the second page will explain: "It is not every one who has instinctive feeling for what is beautiful in design and correct in form—not every one who is born with a sensitiveness which is outraged when a beautiful piece of furniture is insulted by being placed in unsympathetic surroundings."

Unfortunately, a man is educated out of what he is born with into what he is born to before he has time to realise that he is born at all. An ideal teacher should not draw attention to his own good taste and culture, but should tactfully lead his pupil into a path where he may possibly discover that which he himself was born with.

EDITH A. BROWNE.

HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES

By James Ford Rhodes, LL.D., Litt.D. Vol. V., 1864-1866. (Macmillan, 12s.)

DR. RHODES' history has already attained a formidable bulk, and his present volume devotes over six hundred pages of text and a copious index to the events of two years. His industry in collecting his materials and his fairness in pronouncing judgment on disputed questions are worthy of all praise, and are greatly needed in dealing with the stormy period of the collapse of the Confederacy and the reorganisation that followed. The part of the work dealing with the last year of the Civil War is perhaps the weakest: it is evident that Dr.

Rhodes has no particular taste for military matters, and while he has conscientiously studied the voluminous records of the war, his narrative of its strategy is comparatively meagre and uninforming. Doubtless, in the abundance of military histories of the Civil War, he felt that it was unnecessary for him to devote much time and trouble to a subject for which he has probably no especial taste, and to give his space and work chiefly to political and economic matters. Where he goes into detail over the war is generally in the discussion of some controverted matter such as the foraging and looting by Sherman's troops, or the treatment of prisoners by both sides. His merely military judgments will hardly commend themselves to experts. Grant, for instance, was not "a great general," and most military critics would place Sherman above him. The commander who invited disaster by his reckless neglect of precaution at Shiloh, and who flung his army into the hopeless butchery of Cold Harbor, cannot be called great. In both cases Grant acted in gross and wanton defiance of the ordinary rules of war.

But it would be unfair to regard Dr. Rhodes' slips in military matters as impairing the value of his work. The present volume is a perfect storehouse of valuable facts and records. If anything, it is too full of material and not sufficiently ordered. It is the right of the historian who has made an exhaustive study of his authorities to generalise, and it is also his duty. Without summing up his conclusions and ordering his facts under a few great heads, without disengaging from the tangle of conflicting statements the main laws of historical development, an historian cannot be sure of his accuracy; every event can be plausibly described and interpreted in several different ways, and the only satisfactory test of truth is that the view taken of disputed matters should be consistent with uncontroverted facts.

It is interesting to British readers to note how closely some of the disputes as to foraging, house-burning, the treatment of prisoners and of non-combatants resemble those raised during the Boer War, and it is satisfactory to note that Dr. Rhodes acquits both sides in the main of deliberate cruelty and wanton destruction. This is the more rational as well as the more kindly view. War is horrible, but seldom deliberately ruthless.

It would be impossible to follow Dr. Rhodes into the details of the political history of the two crowded years he has covered in his present volume. In future we may perhaps ask him to give us "less matter with more art," and group his facts more closely. It can be of no use now to recall the late G. A. Sala's articles on American official corruption, or the remarks of American and European newspapers on matters as to which they could have no trustworthy information. Dr. Rhodes might also avoid the unconscious narrowness that is the defect of too many British as well as American historians, who write as if the United States belonged to another planet. Often one parallel drawn between analogous events and movements in different countries will explain the essential nature of their history better than a wilderness of facts and a Sahara of documents. A. R. ROPES.

OTIA: POEMS, ESSAYS, AND REVIEWS

By Armine Thomas Kent. Edited by Harold Hodge, with an Introduction by A. Baumann. (Lane, 5s. net.)

THE publication of this book affords a striking illustration of the impetus given by death to a literary career. Had Mr. Kent lived, it is safe to conjecture that this volume, which, with the exception of the verses and of two striking articles on Della Crusca and Leigh Hunt, consists exclusively of reviews reprinted from "The Saturday Review," would never have been produced. If we leave them out of account, the spurious halo which encircles all posthumous work and the pious desire of the writer's friends to celebrate his memory, the volume has small excuse for existence, not that we would impeach for a moment the abilities or the personal interest of the author. Judging, indeed, both from the appreciative and efficient memoir which prefaces the book, and from the actual contents itself, he was raised several degrees above the average level of journalists. A writer to whom literature was a love rather than a profession, he remained throughout his life what he has himself called "a man of letters and of leisure." Yet the interest of reviews is of necessity ephemeral, and to read through a long series of such articles cannot but prove tedious.

It is true that the reviews selected touch as far as possible on subjects of enduring interest, but the smallness of the space gives the writer insufficient room for digression; and the reader who treats the book reviewed as the mere peg on which the author hangs his essay is perforce disappointed. The two articles, however, on "Della Crusca and Anna Matilda" and on "Leigh Hunt as a Poet" are admirable. Wisely avoiding the conventional sneer at the artificial extravagance of the Della Cruscans, having first given a detailed account of the foundation of the school by the Anglo-Italian Robert Merry, he assigns to them their true place in the history of English literature.

We quote the following passage: "We may perhaps give the Della Cruscans, with their desperate strainings after poetic fire and poetic diction, the credit of having done something to shake the supremacy of versified prose, of having forwarded, however feebly, the poetic emancipation which Wordsworth and Coleridge were to consummate. The false extravagance of Della Crusca may have cleared the way for the truthful extravagance of Keats." With the writer's estimate of Leigh Hunt we confess we are less in agreement. To call Leigh Hunt "the greatest master since the days of Dryden of the heroic couplet" is a heresy based on a radical misconception of the nature of the heroic couplet. Leigh Hunt may no doubt have been a great master of the picturesque, but that helps little in the case of a metre whose true function is to be the medium of social and satiric verse. With some other judgments we venture also to differ. We refuse to believe that "in the end Trollope will be found as imperishable as Jane Austen" or that Catullus' passion for Lesbia was "mere philandering."

The verse which is sandwiched between the various articles is pleasingly different from the customary type of minor poetry. Tinged largely with the spirit of the classics, it yet in many cases betrays genuine feeling.

To judge the character of the author from his book, he was a man who would have felt himself most at home in the latter half of the eighteenth century. He impresses us, in fact, as paying too much attention to the subsidiary points of technique. The book intrinsically strikes us as a failure; yet we are glad to have made the acquaintance of an interesting personality, and cannot but regret that the author has left us nothing more worthy of him.

COLLECTED ESSAYS AND REVIEWS OF THOMAS GRAVES LAW

Edited with a Memoir by P. Hume Brown, LL.D. (Edinburgh: University Press.)

DR. LAW, some of whose essays are the contents of the present volume, was the son of an Anglican clergyman who became a Roman Catholic in the fifties. After hesitating between the Army and the Church, Law the younger chose the latter, and for some years he was a priest of the Congregation of St. Philip Neri at Brompton Oratory. A monument of the work which he did at that time is found in the history of the Cause of the Beatification of the English Martyrs under the Tudors and the first Stuart, for he was a member of the Commission appointed ad hoc. In the present volume we are glad to see reprinted the essay on the authenticity of the Vulgate version of the Holy Scriptures; a masterly explanation of the attitude of the Council of Trent and the Church of Rome towards that version, and a valuable defence of it as a more or less independent authority. This belongs to the same phase.

The rest of the contents belongs to a later period of Law's life, when he had cast off the Roman collar and had let his beard grow. As librarian and secretary of the Scottish History Society he found a congenial field of labour; and the essays on "Biblical Studies in the Middle Ages," on "John Major the Scholastic," on "Some Curious Translations of Mediæval Latin," on "Sham Imprints in Elizabethan English," are among the contents of this book in which his spirit of meticulous and critical research found a congenial exercise. In many of these essays he is in direct conflict with representative apologists of the Church, and even with his quondam brethren of the Oratory, particularly Dr. Knox. The essays on Cardinal Allen, English Jesuits and Scottish Intrigues, or the Spanish Blanks and Catholic Earls, are some of these; and it is pleasant to be able to remark of this highly exceptional apostate (he would not have shirked the name) that in these and other papers treating of like subjects the note of acerbity is rarely heard if it is not wholly absent. The most damaging of the essays in this field—because in them he tears to tatters a legend which we suppose to be rather typical—are the two dealing with Archangel (a Christian name) Leslie. This being, who has gone near to being raised to the altars of the Church, is shown to have been an hysterical boaster whom his serious contemporaries held lightly enough.

Finally, in "International Morality" we have an example of work in a lighter vein, which serves to round off the portrait of an interesting mind. Apart from this, the material has been chosen with a view to giving the impression of something like an organic work in which the theme of the relations of the Catholic Church to the world should be coherently dealt with by a mind of typical modern growth, to which belonged what must be recognised as a singular advantage, that of passing from the intimacy of one to the intimacy of the other.

THE LETTERS TO THE SEVEN CHURCHES OF ASIA AND THEIR PLACE IN THE PLAN OF THE APOCALYPSE

By W. M. Ramsay, D.C.L. (Hodder & Stoughton, 12s.)

THE Book of the Revelation of John the Divine is an amalgam of two literary forms. The apocalyptic element is traditionally Hebrew. But already in the days when the beloved disciple was toiling as a convict in Patmos the Christian tradition of the open letter had come into being as the most proper medium for advice, for rebuke, and for exhortation. And in the covering letter by which the Apocalypse itself is introduced, a concession is made to the new fashion. Further, the writer himself, at a certain point, shows himself conscious that his chosen medium is inadequate; and here he breaks off into the epistolary form as more immediately appealing to the souls of those to whom he was writing. Nay, these seven little letters may have been, in order of composition, a postscript, embodied by an afterthought in the place they now occupy.

Professor Ramsay's principal object is to show how much of the perplexity in which commentators have involved themselves has come of neglecting the Greek element with which it is interwoven. His book he describes as an essay towards the synthesis of East and West which is the new stage towards which current events, at a thousand points, are bearing Christianity; for this stage was already, in the first ages, to a certain extent anticipated in the cities of Asia Minor. His critical point is that the symbolic language is not to be explained, as it is generally attempted to explain it, from Jewish models alone. It is possible here to do no more than to give an example of the kind of illuminative parallel that the author adduces in profusion.

We have on page 63 an illustration of a relief from Koloe in Lydia, representing in a double zone a sacrifice on earth and in the heavens. In the lower zone may be seen the earthly priest and his assistants making the oblation on the altar of the deity; on the upper is shown the God himself performing the archetypal rite (being regarded as his own first priest). Here is the key to the mystic enumeration of "the seven stars which are the angels of the seven churches" and of "the seven lamps which are the seven churches." As the star is to its pale image, so is the angel of the church to the church itself. We have the same fundamental idea of a higher and a lower plane of existence in mutual correspondence. Even more striking are the coincidences to be discerned, by one who has made the Græco-Asiatic cities a subject of special study, between the apocalyptic prophecies and the natural features or the political history or the economic condition of the cities themselves. Thus, to take a single example, the promise to Smyrna: "I will give thee a crown of life," comes naturally home with renewed point when we learn that the metaphor is no arbitrary invention of the seer, but is suggested by that greatest of the city's natural ornaments, the garland of splendid buildings which encircled with a street of gold the rounded hill Pagos—"the crown of Smyrna."

It is not the least part of the service which in this book Professor Ramsay has rendered to students of the Bible that he seems (but this is a larger aspect of the work upon which it is impossible at this time to enter in full) to open a vista through which it is possible to catch a glimpse of the way that was travelled by the writer of the Revelation upwards to the heights scaled by the author of the Fourth Gospel.

THE WONDERS OF LIFE

By Professor Ernst Haeckel. (Watts, 6s. net.)

THE sub-title of this book, "A Popular Study of Biological Philosophy," more accurately expresses its nature. The volume is really supplementary to the "Welt-Räthsel," and deals abundantly in polemical matter only remotely associated with biology.

The more we read of Professor Haeckel the more he amazes us. The present volume is essentially Spencerian, save in so far as the author denies the phenomenal nature of our knowledge and regards modern science as acquainted with the nature of reality. But he is under the extraordinary delusion that he is an originator. In one place he seems to claim for himself the first attempt to construct a philosophy on the principle of evolution, though his first writings on the subject date several years after the publication of the initial volume of the Synthetic Philosophy! This statement is quite the most amazing thing in the book. Though Spencerian ideas and even whole phrases are freely utilised the name of Spencer is actually absent alike from the index and the text; and Haeckel claims priority for his notion of the plastidule, though this and numerous variants with other names are notoriously none other than the "physiological unit" of Spencer, which preceded them all.

Haeckel's "law of substance" upon which his philosophy is founded, is a combination of the two doctrines of the conservation of energy and the conservation of matter. But no physicist now believes in the conservation of matter; the facts of radio-activity have entirely disposed of it. So much the worse for the law of substance, but it is interesting to note that the older dogma of the "persistence of force" under which Spencer subsumed the ideas that the realities underlying both what we commonly call energy and what we commonly call matter are one and eternal, is now the accepted dogma of physics. Haeckel, however, expressly declines to give up the doctrine of the conservation of matter; indeed, he cannot afford to do otherwise, if his law of substance is to stand.

But Haeckel's acquaintance with contemporary work, even in his own department, is not as adequate as it might be. Doubtless, however, it is not his fault that the distinguished name of de Vries, who has lately rediscovered the work of the Abbé Mendel, and thrown a brilliant light upon some of the problems of heredity, is persistently printed de Bries.

Similarly in psychology, which Professor Haeckel is never afraid to tackle, we look in vain in the index for the name of its greatest living exponent, Wilhelm Wundt. But the author's psychology grows stranger every day; a serious matter, since only by the aid of psychology can we establish an epistemology or theory of knowledge; and until we have inquired into the nature and validity and possible limitations of human knowledge we are without title to dogmatise on any subject whatever. The choicest piece of psychology in the volume is, perhaps, the assertion that the newborn child is devoid of consciousness. This is not carelessly made, but repeated and insisted upon. We have lately had abundant opportunities of observing the newborn child and we can assure Professor Haeckel that it does not sleep all the time, and that the difference between its waking or conscious state and the other is not a thing to argue about, but a fact to make the best of.

The chapters on "Forms of Life," "Monera," and "Nutrition" are written by a master in these fields and tend to compensate for the enormous mass of paralogisms and unproved assertions that constitute perhaps the greater part of the remaining chapters.

C. W. SALEEBY.

A POPULAR GUIDE TO THE HEAVENS

By Sir Robert Ball. (George Philip, 15s. net.)

THE difference between M. Camille Flammarion, the populariser of astronomy in France, and our own Sir Robert Ball is that the Irishman is trustworthy, whereas the Frenchman is not. Sir Robert has fully earned his reputation, for his work is never slipshod or perfunctory; and there stands against his name nothing that at all resembles the "Astronomy for Everybody," recently written by the most distinguished of his American contemporaries.

This present volume mainly consists of plates such as no possessor of a telescope, no amateur student of astronomy, can afford to be without. They are most carefully chosen, admirably reproduced and explained as Sir Robert is in the habit of explaining.

Of course, the volume contains the customary diagrams of the solar system, eclipses, the seasons and so forth. It provides star maps for all seasons of the year, tables that enable one to name an unknown planet—very à propos now that Jupiter and Venus are of almost equal brightness—and, indeed, all that may reasonably be expected in such a guide. But the book is perhaps chiefly worth possessing by reason of the superb photographs which it contains. The late Dr. Isaac Roberts, probably the most distinguished of the many brilliant amateurs who have served astronomy in this country, has raised the standard of celestial photography to a plane of real distinction, and some of his achievements are reproduced here. The photographs of nebulae are really beautiful, and those of comets run them close. Worthy to be named beside these is the photograph of a great sun-spot, taken at Greenwich, whilst the Lick Observatory, which has just repeated its discovery of a new moon of Jupiter in 1892, is well represented. Throughout, the purpose of the volume has not been forgotten. The features of the moon's surface have been fully recorded in drawings, with keys, which will add value to the possession of even a good field-glass. The night sky is so splendid at this very time that there is no excuse for neglecting it. Jupiter is more favourably situated for observation than he will be for another decade and more, whilst the incomparable nebula in Orion—the middle “star” of the celestial huntsman's dagger—will reveal some measure of its magnificence to a good pair of binoculars. Never was better time for prosecuting the study of the oldest and most sublime of all the sciences, and this is the book with which the amateur should equip himself. Fortunately this is not Holy Russia, where the censor lately expunged certain remarks concerning sun-spots, because they were calculated to “subvert traditional beliefs.”

Fiction

THE SECRET WOMAN

By Eden Phillpotts. (Methuen, 6s.) Once again Mr. Phillpotts has given us a moving tragedy of human passions, with the stern frowning face of Dartmoor as its background. With such skill has the author suggested the atmosphere of the story that the reader almost feels that the events described could never have happened anywhere else. The tragedy gains greatly in force and impressiveness by its background of breezy moorland and undulating country. The central character in the book is Ann Redvers, a high-minded, devoted wife and mother, built in a somewhat severe mould. She has no understanding of, or pity for, weakness in any form. Her husband is not made of such strong material; he is good-natured and affectionate, ready to lean on Ann and to do her bidding. Ann, who contemptuously thinks she knows her husband thoroughly, finds that he is deceiving her, that he has sought elsewhere the caresses that she denied. In a blind fit of passion she murders him. Directly the deed is done remorse seizes her and she begs her sons to denounce her as a murderess. They refuse to do so, and remorse slowly eats away her strength and beauty until she becomes a wreck. In the end, when the chain of circumstances is complete and her eldest son, Jesse, has committed suicide because he learns that the girl he has long loved and wished to make his wife was his father's “secret woman,” Ann Redvers gives herself up to justice. It is a remarkable novel, a living, breathing piece of work. It would have been better had the last chapters of the book been omitted. They are not necessary, and only make a tame ending to a stirring tale. The picture of Ann Redvers is one that will remain in the reader's mind long after the book is put down.

TALES OF THE FIVE TOWNS

By Arnold Bennett. (Chatto & Windus, 6s.) This collection of tales by no means does Mr. Arnold Bennett justice.

Once again he takes us to the Staffordshire pottery district, with its hard commercialism and lack of beauty; but his “Tales of the Five Towns” have all the faults and very little of the merit to be found in “Anna of the Five Towns” and “Leonora.” Instead of a finished picture we are asked to accept mere snapshots, as it were—some almost startling in their vagueness and limitation, others badly developed and finished off. They are more like the photographic attempts of an amateur than of such an experienced and clever worker as Mr. Bennett. The author does not show to advantage in the short story; his methods are too leisurely, too much dependent on detail. Sometimes in these stories he gives us much detail and very little story, as in “The Elixir of Youth,” dramatic though the ending of that episode be; while in “His Worship the Goosedriver” we miss the light illuminating touches which the author can so well supply. In short, Mr. Bennett has not the feeling for the short story; he seems to have no sense of its delicate and nicely balanced proportions—few writers have. A perusal of the first half-dozen or so leaves the reader with an irritating feeling of emptiness and no desire to progress deeper into the volume. Is it possible that Mr. Bennett has written these too hastily? A trifle that passes well enough in a magazine will seldom bear reprinting and the author is ill advised to permit it. Yet one of the qualifications for writing good short stories Mr. Bennett does possess—a light bright style and an amusingly sarcastic turn of thought. A paragraph here and there is Mr. Bennett at his best, but one expects more in a book from him than a few good paragraphs.

CONFESSIONS OF A YOUNG LADY

By Richard Marsh. (Long, 6s.) Mr. Richard Marsh again presents his offerings to the omnivorous reader. This time he dwells on what almost amounts to “A Bad Girl's Diary.” Not that Miss Boyes has a past, for it must be understood that her operations are distinctly confined to the present, and in some way she suggests affinity to that remarkable American creation “Buster Brown,” with this important difference, however, that no maternal chastisement follows the confessions. Molly Boyes makes her first appearance at the confessional as a Wonderful Girl. She is nearly twelve, and runs away from school, taking with her a small portion of German sausage, and will throw in her lot and no small talent, in addition to the rations mentioned, with an impecunious travelling theatrical caravan. Her next reprimand is received for mixing herself hopelessly, injudiciously, and most stupidly in the love affairs of her French master. And next she comes to grief at her mother's funeral. And so on: a progression of blunders, always amusing, disconnected, but invariably well told. The girl herself is not unsympathetic; on the other hand, she is rather a foolish little baggage, reflecting small credit on her sex. But she achieves her destiny, and the reader leaves her not quite but almost perfectly happy. And, after all, that is something in a novel. Then follow a series of short stories, fluently written, light, cheerful reading, such as will while away the hours and rest the brain.

HE THAT EATETH BREAD WITH ME

By H. A. Mitchell Keays. (Methuen, 6s.) The sentiment of “He that Eateth Bread with Me” is so exaggerated and mawkish, and the plot so impossible, that one finds little, if anything, to say for it. The author seems to have attempted more than he can manage. Katherine, Mackemer's first wife, is no doubt meant to be a study of a delicate-minded, single-hearted woman, whose qualities adversity only serves to intensify and enhance. But to the reader she very soon becomes tiresomely meek-spirited and impossibly angelic. Should we admire a woman who, after being shamefully deserted by her husband for a showier, handsomer woman, goes out of her way soon after the divorce is made absolute to call upon Mrs. Mackemer number two in order to say, “You have done me the greatest wrong that one woman can ever do another, but I have come to tell you that I wish to forgive you, to think of you without bitterness”? Is it surprising that Isabel Mackemer fails to appreciate the Christian spirit of her rival. Katherine entirely fails to convince the reader; she is never a flesh-and-blood woman, only a mere abstraction. The reason for Mackemer's desertion seems too apparent. Mackemer, too, in whom there was "a strain of righteousness . . . a childlike longing to be good," is not altogether a successful creation. The whole is undoubtedly a protest against the divorce laws of America. The author, in the person of Katherine, rebels against the facility with which marriages are made and unmade, and the quiescent attitude of the Church in the matter. It is a pity that the book is so ineffective and unconvincing.

Short Notices

IRELAND UNDER ELIZABETH

Being a portion of the History of Catholic Ireland, by Dom Philip O'Sullivan Bear. Translated from the original Latin by Matthew J. Byrne. (Dublin: Sealy, Bryers and Walker.) The author of the work of which this is a translation was an exile from Ireland in the reign of Elizabeth. His account of the troubles of his native land, in which thirteen of his brothers perished, is addressed to Don Philip of Austria, "ever a barrier to the pestilence of hellish heresy." Mr. Byrne, the most perplexing of editors and the most conscientious (if not always the most successful) of translators, begins his task at Book IV. of Tome II.; and forthwith we are plunged into the harrowing details of the struggle between a faithful and patriotic country and a cruel and thickheaded persecutor. It were not to be expected the O'Sullivan should write in an impartial spirit, or that his outlook should be the outlook of an historian. His is the voice of an exile and of a bigot, but of a bigot who had suffered from bigotry and brutality to the point at which the bigot is transmuted into the martyr, unless his is the happy lot to become, with the turn of the tide, a persecutor. O'Sullivan's book reads like a mere nightmare; so full is it of cruelty and treachery and despair and credulity and all unreason. It possesses no literary merit; it can hardly have been convincing even in its author's own days; and we doubt whether Mr. Byrne's labour, if it be his hope to interest a public to whom the original is a sealed book, be not labour wasted.

CHRISTUS IN ECCLESIA: SERMONS ON THE CHURCH AND ITS INSTITUTIONS

By Hastings Rashdall, D.Litt. (T. & T. Clark, 4s. 6d. net.) Though Dr. Rashdall prefaces this collection of sermons, preached by him in the chapel of Lincoln's Inn, with the assurance that their purport is mainly practical, they are in fact largely controversial in their scope. His outlook is historical; and against the high theory of apostolic succession, and all that follows from it, of virtue ex opere operato in the sacraments he depends upon the evidence, partly negative and at best fragmentary, of the earliest age of the Christian era. A Roman Catholic would object that he treats too lightly, or ignores, the promise of divine guidance by the Holy Spirit indwelling the body of the Church; Anglicans of another school than his own that he neglects the testimony of the Fathers. But these discourses serve at any rate for a temperate and eminently clear expression of what many educated but not professional readers will recognise as an intelligible common-sense view on points of current controversy.

COLONIAL MEMORIES

By Lady Broome. (Smith, Elder, 6s. net.) Lady Broome is a downright egoist. She is best so. The "personal note" is the charm of the book for the reason that the "note" is simply personal, egoistical, not as George Eliot deprecated—egotistical. In the second chapter—on New Zealand—where the author writes from hearsay only, we have a mere bit of ordinary journalism. The magic touch is wanting. But whether our gifted story-teller is dealing with a snowstorm in New Zealand, with her impressions of Natal, with the charming girls of Perth, or with Bill, the bushranger of Western Australia, her vivid pen is most welcome to the reader. The range of experience covers all four continents and extends through a long and very active life, in all of which the atmosphere is well caught and the glimpses of life and custom very graphic and informing. Lady Broome's references to some of the birds in her colonial surroundings will be keenly relished by many stay-at-homes. In Western Australia she found a delightful pet in the "Break-of-day" boys, the native magpie—a bird similar in shape to the English namesake, only a little larger. "At earliest dawn only do you hear the sweet clear whistle which is their native note" (p. 283). In the same country the "Jokolokals" are beautiful cockatoos—not talkers, but with a plumage "a soft creamy white, and with a crest and wing-lining of an indescribable flame-tint" (p. 281). In Trinidad Lady Broome was seized by an irresistible desire to possess a fire-beetle—large hard-backed creatures with eyes like gig lamps, with a third light beneath which only shows when they fly. "It is a wonderful sight, driving home in the short gloaming, for every blade of grass holds many tiny sparkles, winking in and out with a bewildering effect" (p. 173). It has been very delightful to follow the author's track in the Antipodes, to live over again scenes so well described, and to enjoy her recollections of lands not personally visited.

IN PURSUIT OF DULCINEA

By Henry Bernard. (Allen, 6s. net.) Why does Mr. Bernard adopt such a forced and involved style? It is possible to be original without being obscure, to be clear without being commonplace, but he seems to think otherwise. The pity of it is that here is a book on a subject which should interest most readers, a book for which there is a place waiting on most bookshelves. Who is there uninterested in that part of Spain which Cervantes chose as the scene of the famous adventure of "Don Quixote"? Who would not like to be better acquainted with the country of the inimitable Sancho Panza? Mr. Bernard writes of this world-famous spot as one who knows and who has seen, but for some strange reason he chooses to wrap his knowledge in a vague mantle of words and to make us see what he has seen through a mist. It is cleverly done, but we do not want to learn and see in that way—not when we are curious and interested. We want to see clearly; and here and there that indefinite mantle of words is rent and, falling away from the subject, allows us glimpses of word-drawing as clear and definite as a well-executed silver point, just to let us see what the author could do as he would. We wish we could say a good word for the illustrations, but they are very inadequate.

THE THACKERAY COUNTRY

By Lewis Melville. (Black, 6s.) Other volumes in this series are so good and there is so pleasant a book on the Thackeray Country to be written, that we turned to this with great hope of pleasure, only to be sadly disappointed. The author has not tackled his task in the right spirit or performed it in the right way; all that he has given us is a rather disconnected short life of Thackeray. On one page he deliberately states that he will not deal with a most interesting portion of his subject; and, for instance, the Denis Duval country is not touched on. Indeed, we gather that the writer is unacquainted with many of the places with which he deals. Further, there are many distinct mistakes: the Charterhouse is not now little changed since its original foundation; Thackeray did not parody Tennyson in "Timbuctoo"; Cambridge did not give Thackeray his social status; Disraeli did not make the statement credited to him concerning the Bar (p. 61); the Horticultural Society's gardens at South Kensington were not, we fancy, nursery gardens. Sir Francis Burnard and Donerial we know not, though these are doubtless misprints, of which we noted several. There are too many banalities, such as "the great painter, J. W. M. Turner"; "Mr. Herbert Beerbohm Tree, the famous actor"; and a good old story ill told concerning Oxford lawns. A large portion of the book has not anything to do with its supposed subject. We regret to have to speak thus, but it is a poor production. The illustrations are excellent and very interesting.

Reprints and New Editions

Messrs. Dent have earned the gratitude of many Elizabethan students by their very welcome reprint of Thomas Dekker's THE GULS HORN-BOOKE AND THE BEL-MAN OF LONDON (the Temple Classics, 1s. 6d. net). It is pleasant to dip into these quaint and interesting pages again. I know of none that gives a more graphic picture of the manners and appearance of London in Elizabeth's day, though of course account must be taken of Dekker's prejudices. In those days playwrights were not so considerably treated as in London of to-day. Even though the gallery should "boo" at the end of a performance that is not to their liking, how much they have progressed in manners since Dekker's age! I wonder how any man dared venture to write a play then. This is what Dekker says: "Now, sir, if the writer be a fellow that hath epigrammed you, and hath a flirt at your mistress, or hath brought either your feather or your red beard or your little legs, &c., on the stage, you shall disgrace him worse than by tossing him in a blanket or giving him the bastinado in a tavern if, in the middle of his play (bee it pastoral or comedy, morall or tragedie), you rise with a screwd and discontented face from your stoole to be gone . . . and, being on your feet, sneake not away like a coward, but salute all your gentle acquaintance that are spread either on the rushes or on stooles about you." He goes on to say that if it is not convenient to leave the theatre in such an impressive manner, "turne plain Ape, take up a rush and tickle the earnest ears of your fellow gallants to make other foolles fall alaughing, mewe at passionate pieces, blare at merrie, finde fault with the musicke, whew at the children's Action, whistle at the songs." Truly this presents a curious picture of the stage in Shakespeare's day. I need hardly say that the reprint is excellent—it comes from Mr. Dent.—Next in interest this week to "The Guls Horn-booke" comes THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, now first printed in England from the full and authentic text (Dent, 3s. 6d. net). This autobiography had a very interesting history, as the editor, Mr. William Macdonald, reminds us in his preface, though we read of its many journeys and its strange fortunes more fully in Mr. Bigelow's "Life of Franklin." Written in 1771 by Franklin while on a holiday to amuse and gratify his relations and without any thought of publication, it was returned to him some twelve years later, after the troublous times of the American Revolution, by a Pennsylvanian Quaker into whose hands it had fallen, with a request that it might be continued. Franklin added what he could in the intervals allowed him by his arduous public life, and after many years fraught with strange happenings it was ultimately published. Few books have gone through such vicissitudes as Franklin's autobiography. Now it may repose peacefully on our shelves.—Of less value, it need hardly be said, is Samuel Smiles' LIVES OF THE ENGINEERS: SMEATON AND RENNIE (Murray, 3s. 6d.). It is very well got up, however, both in binding and letterpress.—Two books intended primarily for school use are THE STORY OF THE ILIAD and THE STORY OF THE ODYSSEY (Seeley, 1s. each). Professor Church's delightful stories are so well known that no doubt many will avail themselves of these neat and serviceable reprints.—To the Cambridge English Classics (University Press, 4s. 6d. net) has been added an admirable reprint of Butler's HUDIBRAS, the text edited by Mr. A. R. Waller. This series is really very good. F. T.-S.

New Books Received

Theological and Biblical

- Macphail, A., Essays in Puritanism (Unwin), 6/0.
 Mortimer, the Rev. A. G., D.D., The Last Discourses of Our Lord (Skeffington), 5/0 net.
 Porritt, Norman, Religion and Health: their Mutual Relationship and Influence (Skeffington), 2/6.
 Hes, Sybil M., The School of Life (Stock), 6/0.

Poetry, Criticism, Drama, and Melles-Lettres

- Gwynn, S., Thomas Moore (Macmillan), 2/0 net.
 Alma Tadema, Lawrence, Four Plays ("The Green Sheaf").
 Kelly, J. Kelso, Robert Burns (Hay), 0/6 net.
 Ha Rollo, A Legend of the Twilight (Barleigh), 1/0 net.
 Kent, C., Epic and Legend of Empire: St. George, Alfred, Harold, Victoria (Drane), 2/6.

- Ward, Wm. C., The Nibelung's Ring (Theosophical Publishing Society), 1/0 net.
 Whibley, Leonard (edited), A Companion to Greek Studies (Cambridge Press), 18/0 net.
 Witherby, G. H., Lyra Amoris (Astolat Press), 2/6 net.
 Brett, O., The Reckoning: a Dramatic Poem (Humphreys), 2/6 net.
 Street, G. S., Books and Things (Duckworth), 6/0.
 K. C., Thumbnail Essays (Brown, Langham), 3/6 net.
 Allen, W. Bird, Forty Fables for Fireside Reflection (Brown, Langham), 2/6.

History and Biography

- Lee, Captain Robert E., Recollections and Letters of General Robert E. Lee (Constable), 12/6 net.
 Cambridge Modern History, Vol. III.: The Wars of Religion (Cambridge Press), 16/0 net.
 Maybrick, Florence E., My Fifteen Lost Years (Funk & Wagnalls), 6/0.
 Grant, Frederick J., Auto-Biography (Baillière, Tindall), 3/6 net.
 Davis, Rebecca H., Bits of Gossip (Constable), 5/0 net.
 Calvert, A. F., The Life of Cervantes (Lane), 3/6 net.
 Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, Vol. XVIII. (The Society).

Travel and Topography

- Stoddard, C. D., The Island of Tranquil Delights (Chatto & Windus), 6/0 net.
 Melville, Lewis, The Thackeray Country (Black), 6/0.

Science and Philosophy

- Davis, J. R. Ainsworth, The Natural History of Animals, Half-vol. VIII. (Gresham Publishing Company), 7/0 net.
 Sociological Papers, by F. Galton, E. Westermarck, P. Geddes, E. Durkheim, H. H. Mann, and V. V. Branford (Macmillan), 10/6.
 Royce, J., The Conception of Immortality (Constable), 2/6.

Educational

- Church, the Rev. A. J., The Story of the Odyssey and The Story of the Iliad (Seeley), 1/0 each.
 Hampson, Dr., Radium Explained (Jack), 1/0 net.
 Daudet, A., Contes Historiques (Nutt), 0/6.
 Speight, E. E., The New Temple Reader (Horace Marshall), 1/6 net.
 Thomson, C. L., A Book of Ballads (Horace Marshall), 1/6.
 The Jack Readers, No. 4 (Jack), 1/4.
 Learning to Read, Step Four (Jack), 0/6.

Miscellaneous

- Robinson, E. Kay, The Country Day by Day (Heinemann), 6/0.
 Richmond, I. L., Flowers and Fruit for the Home (Morton), 5/0 net.
 Greener, Wm., A Secret Agent in Port Arthur (Constable), 6/0.
 Old, W. G. (translated by), The Shu King, or the Chinese Historical Classics (Theosophical Publishing Society), 3/6 net.
 Spooner, H. J., Motors and Motoring (Jack), 1/0 net.
 Bacon, Gertrude, Balloons, Airships, and Flying Machines (Jack), 1/0 net.
 "One and All" Gardening, 1905 (Agricultural and Horticultural Association), 0/2.
 Annual Report, Aberdeen Public Library.
 Beldam, G. W., and Vaile, P. A., Great Lawn Tennis Players (Macmillan), 12/6 net.
 Dendy, F. W., An Account of Jesmond (Newcastle-on-Tyne: Robinson & Co.).
 Alden, P., The Unemployed: a National Question (P. S. King), 1/6 net.
 Heaton, Harriet A., The Brooches of Many Nations (Nottingham: Murray's Nottingham Book Company).
 Annual Report of the Smithsonian Institution, 1903 (Washington: Government Printing Office).
 Annual Progress Report, Part I., of the Archaeological Survey Circle, United Provinces and Punjab; and Photographs and Drawings (Naini Tal: Public Works Department).

Reprints and New Editions

- Innes, A. T., John Knox (Oliphant, Anderson), 1/0 net.
 Cervantes, The History of Don Quixote (illustrated by Gustave Doré), Part I. (Cassell), 0/6 net.
 Liddell, Mrs. E., George Frederick Watts (Astolat Press), 0/4 net.
 Smiles, Samuel, Lives of the Engineers, Smeaton and Rennie (Murray), 3/6.
 Larousse, P., Dictionnaire Complet Illustré de la Langue Française (Dent), 2/6 net.
 Smollett, T., The Expedition of Humphry Clinker (Hutchinson), 1/6 net.
 Butler, S., Hudibras (edited by A. R. Waller) (Cambridge Press), 4/6 net.
 Dekker, Thomas, The Guls Horn-Booke and The Bel-Man of London (Dent), 1/6 net.
 The Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin (edited by Wm. Macdonald) (Dent), 3/6 net.

Fiction

- Campbell, A. G., "Fleur-de-Camp, or A Daughter of France" (Chatto & Windus), 6/0; Thurston, E. Temple, "The Apple of Eden" (Chapman & Hall), 6/0; Bourget, Paul, "Divorce" (Nutt), 6/0; Orcutt, W. D., "Robert Cavalier" (Heinemann), 6/0; Ystridde, G., "Three Dukes" (Unwin), 6/0; Fenwick, Elizabeth, "Victor the Chorister" (Skeffington), 2/6; Wood, M., "The Saint and the Outlaw" (Theosophical Publishing Society), 3/6 net; White, Percy, "The System" (Methuen), 6/0; Fitzpatrick, Kathleen, "The Weans at Rowallan" (Methuen), 6/0; Benson, E. F., "An Act in a Backwater" (Heinemann), 6/0; Griffiths, Major Arthur, "Winnifred's Way" (White), 6/0; Jackson, W. S., "Helen of Troy, N.J." (Lane), 6/0; Michaelis, Karin, "The Child: Andrea" (Duckworth), 3/6; Diehl, Alice M., "The Temptation of Anthony" (Long), 6/0; Whishaw, Fred, "The Informer" (Long), 6/0; Winter, John Strange, "Love and Twenty" (Long), 6/0; Stevenson, Burton E., "The Marathon Mystery" (Harper), 6/0; Eastman, Charles A. (Ohlyesa), "Red Hunters and the Animal People" (Harper), 5/0.

Periodicals, &c.

- "Pall Mall Magazine," "Quarterly Review," "The Lamp," "The Annals of Psychological Science," "Woman at Home," "American Journal of Archaeology," "The Popular Magazine," "Essex Review," "Edinburgh Medical Journal," "Our Hospitals and Charities," "Jewish Quarterly Review," "The Royal," "The Library World," "Good Health," "The University Record," "Longman's Magazine," "The Imperial Review," "New Shakespeareana," "The Papyrus," "American Journal of Mathematics," "The Bible Society 'Gleanings,'" "The Bible in the World," "The Leisure Hour," "Sunday at Home," "Friendly Greetings," "Girl's Own Paper," "Boy's Own Paper," "Girl's Realm," "Sunday Magazine," "Scribner's Magazine."

Foreign

Theological

- Sabatier, P., Examen de Quelques Travaux Récents sur les Opuscules de Saint François (Paris: Librairie Fischbacher).

Miscellaneous

- Universidad Central de España: Memoria del Curso de 1902 á 1903, y Anuario del de 1903 á 1904 (Madrid: Imprenta Colonial).

My Book of Memory

THE hope of having a repertory theatre here in London gives me great pleasure, for I love the drama and to see it acted. As I read Lamb and some others of the old-time followers of the play, I often envy them the opportunity granted to them of seeing so many fine actors in so many fine plays. Seldom do I go to the theatre nowadays, for musical comedies and suchlike make no appeal to me. Modern drama is distinguished chiefly by its being utterly out of touch with life, and comedies of character—and character is the essence of comedy—are few and far between, and seldom of high merit. As for Shakespeare, he apparently has become helpless in the hands of the painter of scenes and the maker of dresses. Therefore I would welcome and support to the limit of my purse a well-conducted repertory theatre, where I should find good fare well put before me. Meanwhile, I have to content myself with my dream theatre, where I am, with playbook in hand, the solitary spectator, and where the scenery and the actors are but make-believes of my mind's eye.

I have heard and read it argued that Shakespeare is for the closet and not for the playhouse; I hold this view to be heretical. Presumably Shakespeare knew better in this matter than do any of his critics or admirers. He acted in his own plays; he wrote them to be performed in his own theatre; he was a practical playwright through and through. He was a successful writer of plays because he was an actor and because he could draw human character to the life, not because he was a poet. The poetry was an added grace, but not an essential of success in his plays as pieces to be acted. So I hold that to gain a true view of Shakespeare's dramatic greatness we should see his plays performed, then after that read and study them as closely as we care to do. But away with all superfluous happenings, as away also with all attempts to play the pieces as they were played in Shakespeare's day; to achieve this last is impossible, for we cannot provide an Elizabethan audience. To see the plays costumed after the fashion of their own day did not appear strange to the Elizabethan playgoers, but for us to watch Hamlet fretting his hours upon the stage in either sixteenth or twentieth century dress is not only distracting, but borders upon the ludicrous. No, what I desire to see and what I have occasionally witnessed, is Shakespeare played in what I call seemly fashion; with enough of scenery and of dresses, and of accuracy in both, to stimulate the imagination without distracting the attention from the progress of the play.

In another matter I take it I shall be told that I am heretical. I do not go to the theatre to listen to Shakespeare's plays as great poetry, but as masterpieces of stagecraft and wondrous expositions of human frailties, virtues and comicalities. Therefore let our players see to it that they take care first of the characters entrusted to them, acting them vividly, simply, broadly, allowing the verse to look after itself, remembering that verse upon the stage must be spoken with due emphasis, so as to bring out its meaning, for we know that with verse such as Shakespeare's if we bring out the meaning we bring out the beauty. Shakespeare was an actor, and would not have hampered his players by asking them to sacrifice character to the form of his words. His poetry satisfied Coleridge's definition, "the best words in the best order"; therefore, if our actors will but study and show forth the meaning of their speeches they will find that at the same time and of necessity they are bringing forth the full beauties of the poetry. Also must our actors remember that Shakespeare, as an actor and a practical playwright, would never forget that a successful plot or a successful character must be simple and straightforward; the emotions must not be complex but simple; the audience must not be asked to consider and solve problems when their attention should be fixed firm upon the working of character upon character and upon the steady march of the dramatic story. It is because actors and critics do forget all this that there has been so much bother about poor, melancholy Hamlet. I hope I shall not be decried as a villain if I boldly say that if Hamlet is the complex psychological character that our critics will have him to be, then the tragedy would, for the practical purposes of the playhouse, be bad. But we know that it is not bad but very good, and why is it so? Because we are all more or less ordinary human beings and love to see a good fight between the powers of good and of evil, between the hero and the villain, and Shakespeare knowing humanity, and humanity to-day being precisely the same as it was in his day, has given us in "Hamlet" just such a "set to" as we delight to see; Hamlet with his second Horatio against Claudius and his second Laertes. So it is with all his comedies and tragedies—the play's the thing, which is made a living thing, not by the art of poetry but by the art of a skilful plot and of skilful drawing of character. Shakespeare found in "Hamlet" an already popular piece; he refashioned it, he touched it up here and there, he gave life to the characters; all this he did being a practical playwright, and being a poet he expressed himself in gorgeous verse. But, as I have ever held, Shakespeare was a human being and therefore sometimes careless, and it is this carelessness of his, his being content to do just enough work to knock "Hamlet" into the shape of a more successful and more popular play than it was before—enough work and no more that has given us moderns so much trouble. Those who saw the play in his own day welcomed it as a fine, stirring melodrama—as we should call it—with plenty of good fighting and a splendid ghost, they overlooked the ragged ends, such as the curious part played in the plot by Ophelia; we, usually approaching Shakespeare in the wrong way, reading him first as a difficult "classic" and later on, if at all, seeing him acted, have bothered our heads about points concerning which Shakespeare was careless and Elizabethan playgoers unconscious.

I have found for my own part that the plays which I have seen acted—even badly acted—are to me far more "whole" and far more real than those which I have only read. I do not believe that I have any true understanding of "Titus Andronicus" or of "Timon of Athens," which I have never seen performed; I realise that I do not and cannot know what Shakespeare the practical playwright meant them to be or how he hoped they would impress spectators, while I have merely read them. Shakespeare wrote for the stage and by the stage must his works be tested.

And now I must say "God be with you" to those who have so kindly read these my talks about myself.

E. G. O.

Helpless Infancy

THERE be who still believe that morality is essentially an artificial and unnatural thing, no inevitable product of evolution, but a thing dependent upon men's acceptance of certain dogmas. Destroy—we are told—the belief in free-will, moral responsibility, and future retribution, and man will straightway wallow unrestrained in that sink of iniquity so pleasing to his "desperately wicked" heart.

Those, however, whose eyes are opened to the light of modern knowledge are apt to resent this view as the most outrageous of all impertinences, a colossal libel, a blasphemy but thinly disguised. According to them, morality is a cosmic product, naturally evolved, with roots now buried in geological strata of vast antiquity. The readers of THE ACADEMY are already familiar with the Spencerian revelation of the genesis of morality. They know the immense significance of the zoological term Mammalia, finding in the breast of the mammalian mother the fount whence love has flowed: and I have traced for them the strange sequence with which the young of successively higher orders of animal are found each to be more and more helpless at their birth. But it is only within the last week or two that I have myself realised, in anything like adequate measure, the wonder of this biological truth.

It was John Fiske, the admirable writer who did so much to popularise the synthetic philosophy in America, that first pointed out a fact which affords striking confirmation of Spencer's theory of the origin of morality. Fiske observed that the prolongation of the infantile period, so notable in human kind, must have been a most important factor in the development of our altruistic sense. The tigress robbed of her whelps is obviously not without altruism—though a learned and distinguished Jesuit friend of mine insists that it is only "unconscious altruism"—but the young of the lower animals do not long need parental care. The tiger cub and the fledgling of the bird are soon able to shift for themselves. In no preceding case, as Fiske observed, is the period of dependence so prolonged as in that of the human infant.

Indeed, the helplessness of infancy is not fully to be appreciated until one lives with it: nor is its significance to be measured until one appreciates its contrast with what is to be. Consider a baby. Unable to stand—much less to wander in search of food—very nearly deaf, all but blind, well-nigh indiscriminating as to the nature of what is presented to its mouth, utterly unable to keep itself clean, yet highly susceptible to the effects of dirt, able to indicate its needs only by alternately turning its head, open-mouthed, from side to side and then crying, possessed of an almost ludicrously hypersensitive interior, unable to fast for more than two or three hours, yet having the most precise and complicated dietetic requirements, needing the most carefully maintained warmth, easily injured by draughts, the prey of bacteria (which take up a permanent abode in its alimentary canal by the eleventh day)—where is to be found a more complete picture of helpless dependence? Can we wonder that one in seven, even in this wealthy and civilised land, dies before the first anniversary of its birthday?

Yet this is the creature which has spread over the earth so that he numbers some fifteen hundred millions to-day. He is the "lord of creation," master of creatures bigger, stronger, fleet, longer-lived than himself. The earth is his and the fulness thereof. Yet without love not one single specimen of him has a chance of reaching maturity, or even surviving for a week. Verily love is the greatest thing in the world.

The infant's requirements, if I interpret them aright, afford an explanation of at least one adult feature which has often puzzled me. For sleep it is desirable to exclude light and sound: but whilst we have eyelids, no apparatus for closing the ears is known save, I believe, in certain animals which inhabit the sea, and whose ears are of small auditory importance. In these days, when barrel organs assail us with the "Ave Maria," playing Bach's accompaniment in G and Gounod's air in somewhat more than G, and when the motor car makes night hideous, one sighs for earlids. And I have even wondered why natural selection has not so endowed us; for it might seem an advantage to be able at will to protect one's nervous system from sound as from light. But it occurred to me that I had not appreciated the significance of the "infant crying in the night, and with no language but a cry"—crying, however, not for the light but for its food. It would be a sorry business if a child had to rely for its nocturnal refreshment upon the willingness and ability of its mother to keep awake, or to waken spontaneously when wanted. This, perhaps, may partially explain our deprivation of earlids.

It would seem, then, that the gospel of force, the Nietzschean doctrine which is supposed to be a deduction from the law of the survival of the fittest, is based upon a gross misapprehension of the facts of biology. These facts teach us, without any aid from rhetoric or sentiment, but with entire impartiality, that altruism has been an invaluable factor, not merely in the ennobling of human life, but in its actual production. They further teach us that morality is no artificial and artificially-to-be-fostered product, but an inalienable possession of humanity, older than all the Churches, much older than human thought. Thus, though "Nature red in tooth and claw" may appear indifferent to good and evil, her sun shining alike on the just and the unjust, yet every new baby teaches us that love is a cosmic product of which humanity itself is not the author but the fruit; and that, therefore, Emerson was nevertheless justified when he said that "the universe is moral."

C. W. SALEEBY.

"Henry V." and "Much Ado About Nothing"

THOUGH we may differ in opinion as to the merits or demerits of the representations of Shakespeare's works which now occupy the boards of no less than three of the principal theatres in London, we must all be agreed that it is pleasant to be able to witness an apparent revival of interest both on the part of the managers and of the public in the works of our greatest dramatist. On the whole, the most artistic revival is that of "The Taming of the Shrew," in which scenery and pageantry are not permitted to overshadow the action of the play and in which the acting goes far toward a perfect ensemble. Mr. Lewis Waller has before now charmed the town with the sonorous heroics and brave patriotisms—if a word may be coined—of "Henry V.," a play which reads better than it acts as ever must be the case with dramas dealing with affairs of war. It yet remains for a dramatist to bring the scent of blood and iron over the footlights; probably no attempt at realism in this matter will ever be quite successful and the playwright must have recourse to suggestion, as did Thackeray so wonderfully in a famous chapter of "Vanity Fair." The ragged, toil-worn heroes of Henry V. do not strike home to our hearts, we do not feel the tragedy of their situation or the reality of their triumph at Agincourt. As for the acting, it would be difficult to better Mr. Waller as Henry: he is frankly declamatory in the hortatory speeches, unflinchingly insular in his patriotic outbursts, but not monotonous, for he delivers quite beautifully the prayer at dawn on the day of battle. But his love-making is a trifle too facile, too graceful: the love scene with Katharine falls somewhat flat. Of the others for excellence may be named Mr. A. E. George as Fluellen, a character that tempts the actor to burlesque but which in this case is admirably performed, and Mr. John Beauchamp as the infantile Charles VI. But we do not like the Nym, Bardolph, and Pistol: treated as they are in this revival they cease to be human beings, becoming gross caricatures such as Shakespeare never drew; the actors should reform themselves altogether, restraining their exuberance in voice, gesture and "make-up." The result of this exaggeration was the complete ruin of what is really a touching scene—the announcement of the death of Falstaff. These ragged vagabonds in their way loved the fat knight, but these actors in their way turn the scene to ridicule.

As for Mr. Beerbohm Tree's production of "Much Ado About Nothing" it must be pointed out that while there was some justification for his treatment of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and of "The Tempest," there is none for that of the delightful comedy he is now showing us. "Much Ado" has been overlaid with scenery and with pageantry, and, what is even worse, comedy has been made subsidiary to drama. Hero and Claudio are the leading characters now in place of Beatrice and Benedick and the result is disastrous. The essence of comedy acting is that the speeches of the players should bear the stamp of spontaneity, but Mr. Tree as Benedick never thinks, only speaks that which is set down for him. On the other hand, Miss Winifred Emery has thoroughly grasped the soul of Beatrice; she does think before she speaks and while she speaks, and when she has—to use a loose phrase—"shaken down," her performance will be quite admirable, so much so that we fear that it will be difficult to believe in her mating with so unworthy an antagonist in the lists of love and wit as the present Benedick; but perhaps the latter will brighten in the progress of time. For the rest the acting was very good. Mr. Basil Gill and Miss Miriam Clements fully realised Claudio and Hero; Mr. Laurence Irving was rightly a bold, bad, villainous Don John; and Mr. Henry Neville presented a pathetic and living picture of Leonato. Lads on the stage are usually distressing, but Master Thomas Sampson was a sheer delight as Balthasar and his singing a musical treat of rare excellence.

As a whole, the performance dragged lamentably; the joyousness, which is the keynote of the comedy, was overwhelmed by the gorgeousness of the frame, the setting, instead of displaying, smothered the jewel; scene painters, costumiers, dancers, subordinates, came first—the actors second, which is to be greatly deplored. Mr. Beerbohm Tree has done so much good work in the past that we hope he will quickly realise the error of his ways in the present.

The Ultimate Significance of Art

MR. NORMAN BENNETT'S "tilt" with me, as I gather, is concerned only with his "irrefragable truth" that Art is Beauty. The weak spot of his "irrefragability" (ye gods! what langwidge!) is this: that it is wholly fragable. Like a monkey on a barrel-organ, dressed as Napoleon, sheer magnificence is unconvincing. The loudest bow-wow but proves that the biggest dogs can bark. But first, to clear the air, and get firm feet on firmer ground. I always understood that the Greeks were pagans. Still, if they were not, they were not. I apologise. I don't know what they were, if not; but at least not that. So be it. They tell me that Bacon wrote Shakespeare—that Shakespeare was a Papist. Indeed it's bewildering foggy weather in these days. But, cries Mr. Bennett, why this pother? Why, indeed? Then, again, why not? And, if not, why not?

But, to be wholly serious, all these quarrels of the schools and "movements" are quarrels of craftsmanship—not of art at all. Art, for instance, does not rise and decay—Art is eternal. What does decay and rise and decay is craftsmanship, the skill to produce Art, the power of beautifully uttering Art. It is this craftsmanship that is so often confused with Art—a misunderstanding that leads to all the sad confusion and casuistry to which Mr. Bennett, whether wittingly or unwittingly, is the victim. I will try to put it clearly.

The most vastly interesting thing to man is Life. Whence it comes, whither it goes—these are a part of the eternal mystery. But we can and ought to know all of life 'twixt its coming and its going. We can only know of life by personal experience, or at second hand by the communicated experience of our fellows. Now our personal adventures in life, even though we bestride the world like a Napoleon, can at best be a small and parochial affair, when all is said, set beside the multitudinous experience of all our generation. But we may know of life through the experience of our fellows, by the communication of their sensations to us, that is to say by Art; for, just as our thoughts are communicated to our fellows through Speech, so may we communicate our Emotions to our fellows by transferring those Emotions through the senses, whether by sound, as in music, or the poetry of verse or prose, or oratory, or by the sight, as by colour in painting, or by form, as in sculpture or architecture, or by the drama, and the like. Art is the Emotional statement of Life. Speech is the intelligent utterance of Thought; Art is the intelligent utterance of the Emotions. Craftsmanship is the grammar of Art.

Now, it is not enough to have uttered a Thought to account it Speech; it is vital that the Thought shall be so uttered as to arouse the like thought in the hearer, otherwise are we but in a jibbering Babel of Strange Sounds. It is not enough to have uttered Emotion to account it Art: it is vital that the Emotion shall be so uttered as to

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS

OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti,
Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from FREDK. HOLLYER, 8 Pembroke Square, London, W. Illustrated Catalogue 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

arouse the like emotion in the onlooker ; otherwise are we but in the tangled Whirl of Confusion. And just as Thought is the more perfectly understood as it is deftly expressed, so is Emotion the more powerfully transmitted as it is most perfectly uttered. In other words Art depends for its strength on the perfection of its craftsmanship. Craftsmanship is the perfection or beauty of statement by and through which Art is uttered. A poker may be a beautiful thing ; it is not art. A photograph may be beautiful—it is not art. A woman may be very beautiful—she is not art. Art must create—it must transfer Sensation from the creator to us, whether by colour or sound or form, or the rhythmic effects produced by the emotion-arousing use of words such as oratory or the poetry of verse or prose. Now, the Greek genius set up Beauty as the ultimate goal of Art. The Greeks did really mean that Beauty of Craftsmanship alone was not enough, that Art must create Beauty. This absolute aim to achieve Beauty was the cause of the triumph of Greece in Art—a greatly over-rated triumph and one of which the schoolmasters tell us much ; it was also the cause of her limitations and of her eventual failure to achieve the supreme mastery in Art, of which we hear little. For, splendid as was the mighty achievement of Greece in Art, she never reached to the majesty and grandeur of that masterpiece that stands upon the edge of Africa, head and shoulders above her genius, in the wondrous thing that is called the Sphinx. The genius of Egypt spent itself upon the majesty and the mystery of life ; and it moved thereby to a higher achievement than that of all Greece. When a school arose that had for its battle-cry Art for Art's sake, it really meant Art was for Craft's sake—that the aim of Art lay solely in the Beauty of its Craftsmanship. To show the depths of their confusion, what they said, therefore, was this, that if a Whistler painted a wall white, he by his trick of thumb created a work of Art ! When Whistler said that Art was the science of Beauty, he reminded one of the wiseacre's definition of a crab, that it was "a scarlet insect that walked backwards" ; the which was not an unworthy definition except that the crab is not an insect, is not scarlet, and does not walk backwards. Art concerns itself with tears and pathos and tragedy and ugliness and greyness and the agonies of life as much as with laughter and comedy and beauty. How much did Shakespeare concern himself with Beauty ? Is jealousy beautiful ? Yet "Othello" is great art. Is man's ineffectual struggle against destiny beautiful ? Yet "Hamlet" is accounted the masterpiece of the ages. What did Isaiah concern himself with Beauty ? Are killing and suffering and judgment beautiful ? Mr. Bennett says that the killing of a hog is beautiful. I utterly deny it. It is wholly unbeautiful. Had Millet made it beautiful he had uttered the stupidest of lies. Nevertheless the statement of it may be Art. Indeed, Millet's aim in Art, a large part of his significance in Art, is a protest against the pettiness of mere beauty. He took the earth, this great soul'd man, and he wrought with a master's statement the pathos and the tragedy and the might and the majesty of the earth and of them that toil upon the earth. The "Man with the Hoe" is far more than beautiful, it holds the vast emotions of man's destiny to labour and of man's acceptance of that destiny ; it utters the ugliness as loudly as it states the beauty of the earth and of toil ; and it most rightly utters these things, so that they take equal rank, and thereby add to our experience of life through the masterly power and the beauty of craftsmanship whereby he so solemnly uttered the truth.

HALDANE MACFALL.

Correspondence

The Human Will

SIR,—I have read with much interest C. W. Saleeby's letters on "The Human Will." I think with him that by free-will is meant freedom of choice to be followed by an action. Consciousness is a very doubtful testimony, as most persons will allow. His concluding words are, "And to assert determinism is merely to assert that the human will is caused." Who would dispute this ? The question remains "Is the human will caused by choice or not ?" I do not presume to decide a question which has been in dispute for hundreds of years, but it is always a matter of surprise to me that writers on the subject should think it necessary to assert one or the other principle as governing every action. Practically men accept both. It is admitted that our actions to a very great extent are due to heredity and environment, and in practice it is at any rate assumed that the individual has freedom of choice. Exactly where one principle counteracts the other who can say in any given case ; it is just that difficulty that causes such hesitation in condemning or approving the actions of our fellow-men. An animal tethered in a field has a limited choice of range ; and may not we also be tethered by heredity and environment with a very limited freedom of choice ?—Yours, &c. H. D. B.

The Bhagavad Gita

SIR,—The pleasure with which I read my ACADEMY was for a moment qualified by reading in a recent number the strange statement that the translation of the Bhagavad Gita in Max Müller's "Sacred Classics" is the only one in English by a competent person. This is hardly just to the admirable translation in Trübner's "Oriental Series," by that learned Sanscrit scholar, John Davies. There is also a sixpenny one by Mrs. Besant and a Hindoo pandit. Also one by Pramada Dasa Mitra, and easily obtainable in London, for 1s. Another very good one by Harrychund Chintamon, with a very useful commentary. Moreover, there are several printed and published in India. Finally, one might mention the beautiful poetical version by Sir Edwin Arnold, and entitled "The Song Celestial." For all that, I agree with your reviewer in giving a hearty welcome to the new edition of this treasure.—Yours, &c. WILLIAM J. CORYN.

Dickens as a Novelist

SIR,—I suppose that "D. F. H.," despite the manifest contempt he has displayed for Dickens, would scarcely wish to maintain his comparison of Dickens' work to a Punch and Judy. Surely he merely harms his cause by stating propositions which seem to the average person both extravagant and untrue. Let us Dickens-lovers, by all means, acknowledge that our master has his faults. But, after all, it is by his best that criticism should judge a man. And it seems to me at least, that by his best Dickens did more than please, he taught. Take only one example. Did he not show us, in the "Old Curiosity Shop," that the poor are far more often truly Christian than the rich—a lesson which many of us sorely need ? Surely the picture he has given us of humble family life is a great piece of work—even considered from the entirely artistic standpoint. But I must not enlarge ; E. G. O. puts my point for me ; truly we may "sit at the feet of Dickens and learn our Christmas lessons once again."—Yours, &c. D. DAVIES.

Winchester.

Notes on German Schools

SIR,—May I trespass upon your space to protest against the highly inadequate review of Mr. Winch's book which appeared in your issue of the 14th inst. With reference to "Notes on German Schools," your reviewer asks if it was worth writing, states that England has nothing to learn from Germany in the matter of education, and quotes some questions on the main features of the Thirty Years' War asked of children aged ten, which he characterises as "utter stupidity." His last sentence, put into plain English and deprived of its simile, calls Mr. Winch utterly ignorant for imagining that these notes are of any value in studying popular education. None of these statements are true, and, if they were, such dogmatic assertion would only injure your reviewer's cause. The "Frankfurter Zeitung" devoted three articles to Mr. Winch's book, and reviews of a careful and more or less exhaustive nature have appeared in English papers. In view of the important nature of the subject dealt with by Mr. Winch and his own claims as an expert student of educational methods, I regret that this note on his book should have been admitted to the columns of THE ACADEMY.—Yours, &c.

PERCY L. BABINGTON.

Free-Will and Determinism

SIR,—One gathers from Dr. Saleeby's intensely interesting article, "Education and Determinism," that he holds the view that determinism does not necessarily deethicise human conduct. In spite, however, of the beneficent results, in the physical sphere, which may be expected to flow from the general acceptance of this doctrine, it cannot be gainsaid that it reduces us to the level of automata, and it is impossible, as Dr. Saleeby will admit, to ascribe any ethical significance to mere mechanical actions and reactions.

The truth is that the ethical concept involves a curious paradox. If it is obvious, as it undoubtedly is, that unless our wills are free our acts can have no moral value, it is no less obvious that unless our wills are determined they can have no moral value either. In order to have any moral value it is as necessary that our volitions should be dictated by a moral motive as it is that we should be free to follow that motive or not to follow it. In following it the will is no doubt determined by it as absolutely as the fall of a stone to the earth is determined by the attraction of gravity.

Now, that man is a moral being, responsible for his acts, has been our great affirmation through all the ages—the affirmation in virtue of which he has raised himself out of the brute to a level "a little lower than the angels." What, then, should our conclusion be? Plainly, if we are to believe that evolution is in any sense good, that life is in any sense beautiful, we must consider, with Kant, that both of these contradictory propositions are true; that the will is both free and not free—is determined in a physical sense, is unfettered in some transcendental sense. Or, if you prefer to put it so, we must conclude that the problem is, for us, insoluble. To affirm this is but to affirm the limitations of the human intellect; while to deny it is to assert that the incomprehensible cannot be true. We cannot carve out all things with the knife of the Delphic cutler.

If we accept this conclusion we leave ourselves at liberty to believe in some ultimate synthesis, beyond our present grasp, where these contradictories are reconciled; it may be that for us, too, somehow, somewhere, these things shall one day be made plain.

Let us, then, still continue to "faintly trust the larger hope," believing that "now we see through a glass, darkly, but then face to face."—Yours, &c.

J. C. GRAHAM.

Omar al Khayyami

SIR,—Permit me to say a few words in reference to Mr. Meakin's letter regarding the title of my book, "The Life of Omar al Khayyami," which appeared in your issue of the 14th inst.

In the first place I have to correct the mistake in the heading published above Mr. Meakin's letter. I notice that instead of spelling the preposition "al" in "Omar al Khayyam" with an "a" it is spelt with an "e," making it "el" instead of "al." The letter "allif," both in Persian and Arabic, is equivalent to the English letter "a"; of course varying in its pronunciation in certain given cases—in the present instance the "allif" is pronounced in "al," as the English "a" in "at," and not as in "ate"; therefore "al" must be spelt in English with an "a," and not with an "e," as spelt in this case. Further Mr. Meakin spells Omar as 'Omar lacking the English equivalent of the Persian consonant "ayin"; even in that case Mr. Meakin would be making a mistake if he spelt Omar as proposed by him, because the English correct equivalent of the Persian consonant "ayin" would be "U" and not "O," therefore, if we want to transcribe Omar into English as it is written, one would have to write "Umar" and not "Omar."

So much for the first and second words of Mr. Meakin's title. Regarding the use of the third and remaining word I beg again to disagree.

"Omar el Khayyam," as Mr. Meakin calls Omar, does not fall in with my view, because if it did then I would have necessarily to accept the theory that Omar himself was a tentmaker. "Omar al Khayyam" translated into literal English means "Omar the tentmaker"; which is incorrect. If we had to shorten the name—that is, instead of calling him "Omar al Khayyami," as his biographers and myself have done, then it would be far more correct to call him plain "Omar Khayyam" instead of "Omar al Khayyam"; because if we call Omar plain "Omar Khayyam" that in Persian does not convey to one the idea that he had anything to do with tentmaking; but, on the contrary, if we call him "Omar al Khayyam," we positively acknowledge the fact that he was a tentmaker. I will illustrate it in English: It is a different thing to say "John Smith" from "John the Smith." In the first instance we cannot assert that John was a smith, while in the second instance we positively assert that John was a smith; such analogous difference has "Omar Khayyam" from "Omar al Khayyam." We do not meet with the latter in any authentic Persian MSS., while we do in the case of the former. Therefore if Mr. Meakin adheres to his title of "Omar el Khayyam," without an "i" at the end, he is contradicting himself. I have spelt Omar's name as he has been known and as he should be known, having in view that "it is never too late" to correct an error. His full name, "Omar al Khayyami," in itself contradicts all other proofs as to Omar's profession or craft. Al Khayyami, as I have explained in my book, is a generic name, and not a family one. Omar or his father could not have possibly got this name from their family, but from the sect or tribe they belonged to. Careful research and investigations have resulted in the fact that the name "Al Khayyami" is not known in Persia as a patronymic, hence my reasonable conclusion that neither Omar nor his parents had anything to do with tentmaking, nor he could be possibly called otherwise than "Omar al Khayyami"; by calling him so we only do justice to him and to his biographers—such men as Ibn al Kifti, Zakaria Kazwini and others, who unanimously speak of him as "Omar al Khayyami." I may also add that Omar is known in Persia both among educated and ignorant classes as either "Omar Khayyam" or "Omar al Khayyami."—Yours, &c.

J. K. M. SHIRAZI.

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 9 East Harding Street, London, E.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper, which must bear the sender's full name and address, not necessarily for publication. The Editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archaeology, Folk-lore, Art, Music and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published.

Questions must not be such as can be answered from the ordinary works of reference.

COMPETITION.

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5/- each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to "Academy" Questions and Answers.

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The names and addresses of prize-winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk. Each prize will consist of 5/- worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5/-. No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

One of the four weekly prizes will be awarded, whenever possible, to a Shakespearean Question or Answer.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" carries disqualification.

NOTES.

"GREEK LOVE OF KNOWLEDGE."—I do not see that the ancients had any greater love of knowledge than moderns, taking the populations in the

Do YOU Live

In LONDON, if so go to 57 Holborn Viaduct,
In Aberdeen, if so go to 115 Union Street,
In Belfast, if so go to 71 Ann Street,
In Birmingham, if so go to 28 High Street,
In Burnley, if so go to 9 Grimshaw Street,
In Cardiff, if so go to 8 St. John's Square,
In Dublin, if so go to 5 Upper Ormonde Quay,
In Edinburgh, if so go to 19 Shandwick Place,
In Exeter, if so go to 31 Queen Street,
In Glasgow, if so go to 69 Bothwell Street,
In Leeds, if so go to 3 Park Lane,
In Leicester, if so go to 60-64 Halford Street,
In Leigh, if so go to 64 Bond Street,
In Liverpool, if so go to 16 Union Street, Exchange,
In Manchester, if so go to 267 Deansgate,
In Middlesbrough, if so go to Royal Exchange,
In Newcastle, if so go to 21 Collingwood Street,
In Nottingham, if so go to Prudential Buildings,
In Portsmouth, if so go to 154 Queen Street,
In Southampton, if so go to 12 Portland Street,
In Sheffield, if so go to 72 Queen Street, and you will learn how to buy a new

WILLIAMS

(ACADEMY MODEL)

typewriter at a discount of

40 %

aggregate. But they had this advantage in being more fully in communication with still more ancient media, which, now lost to us, have the mystery of being "unknown"; and, when we penetrate the obscurity, as with hieroglyphs and cuneiforms, we yet remain ignorant of their merely colloquial acquirements. Taking, then, the word kaipo (unaccented) we find it equivalent to our word "opportune," with all the potentialities involved as effective, seasonable, a good opening; with details sufficient to supply a column of quotations to our "N.E.D."; and having also the merely technical use as a "web," in weaving. It is the Latin "quasero."—A. HALL.

Questions

SHAKESPEARE.

SIR WM. DAVENANT.—What were the original grounds for the story that Sir William Davenant, the Caroline dramatist, was really the son of William Shakespeare?—E. J. Thompson.

SHAKESPEARE AND SCOTLAND.—Did Shakespeare ever visit Scotland? We have no real evidence that he did so, yet one frequently meets with passages in the tragedy of "Macbeth" which seem to refer to that country. For instance, the description of Macbeth's residence represents exactly the character of the spot in Inverness where it is ascertained that Macbeth's castle stood. It is also remarkable that Act I. Scene iv. is laid in Ferres. Other instances are also to be found in this tragedy which point in favour of an affirmative answer to this question.—M. Howlett (Bury).

A SOUL.—

I count myself in nothing else so happy
As in a soul remembering my good friends."

("Richard II." II. iii.)

This motto is printed on the flyleaf of my copy of the presentation edition—bound in white vellum—of "The Merchant of Venice," in celebration of its one hundredth performance in 1880 at the Lyceum, and above the lines Sir (then Mr.) Henry Irving wrote his signature, with a kind inscription to the lucky recipients. Now the meaning of the words in italics had always been, and still is, to me an enigma. Does "a soul" mean another person? This would make nonsense. If it mean "remembering in spirit," then a second "in" is needed. I wonder how Sir Henry interprets it. What is the explanation of your readers?—Immerito.

LITERATURE.

* LIONS' SKINS.—What is the allusion in the following passage, from Sir Thomas Browne's "Christian Morals," Section I.: "We sleep in lions' skins in our progress unto virtue, and we slide not, but climb unto it?"—C. Fox Smith (Bolton, Lancashire).

"THE MUSIC MASTER."—What is the subject of, and where can I find, a poem called "The Music Master," highly praised, I think, by Coventry Patmore? Is it by William Allingham?—K.K. (Belfast).

WHITER'S "ETYMOLOGIUM MAGNUM."—I have a copy of the "Etymologium Magnum," by Whiter, a quarto published at Cambridge in 1800, with "Part First" on title-page. Did any other volumes or "parts" appear? I want to get them, but am away from libraries and reference books, so can find out nothing.—K.M.

LAVERGRO.—What was "the sin against the Holy Ghost" committed by Peter, the Welsh preacher? Was it simply a statement of His non-existence?—A.N. (Netherfield).

BRASILIA.—To what story does the following allusion (Browne's "Christian Morals," Section XXXIII.) refer? "To tread a mile after . . . the heavy measures of the lady of Brasilia were a most tiring penance."—C. Fox Smith (Bolton-le-Moors).

"THE COSSACK OF THE DON."—During my school days in England I have a dim recollection of reading a poem called "The Cossack of the Don." Can any of your readers tell me by whom it was written and where it can be found?—F. Darlow (Los Angeles, California, U.S.A.).

NATURE SIMILES.—Are there many instances in English poetry of taking ordinary manufactured articles as nature similes, such as Slow-dropping veils of thinnest lawn?—K.M.

"THE LEARNED HEATHEN."—John Wesley, in his "Sermon on the Reward of the Righteous," writes: "If the learned heathen acknowledged the sublimity of the account which Moses gives of the creation, what would he have said if he had heard this account of the Son of Man coming in His glory?" Who is the "learned heathen" referred to above?—E. J. Thompson.

THE RELAXED BOW.—Who was the originator of the comparison of a bow, which gains strength by being relaxed, with the mind? The figure occurs in Roger Ascham, Bacon, Jeremy Taylor, and other writers. What is the source from which they derived it?—C. Fox Smith (Bolton-le-Moors).

"KALEWALA."—In a novel of Marcel Prévost one of the characters is a Finnish artist working at a triptych. The first panel represents Aino gathering sticks in a wood, and turning to listen to the footstep of Walma-nainen. In the second she sits naked on a rock gazing at the sea. In the third she is jumping into the water to escape her pursuer. The subject is taken from the Finnish epic "Kalewala." Can any reader give the story of Aino, or mention any English translation, or collection of Finnish tales, which gives in popular form the subject and scope of the "Kalewala"? There are, I believe, French and German versions, but I cannot come across these.—K.K. (Belfast).

* WALTON AND CHALKHILL.—S. W. Singer, the editor of an edition in 1820 of "Thealma and Clearchus," by J. Chalkhill, suggested that, as nothing is known of the reputed author, Chalkhill may be a pseudonym for Izaak Walton, who first published the poem in 1683. A writer in the "Retrospective Review" (Vol. IV., 1821) upheld this view. Has anything since come to light which disproves this theory? The tomb, mentioned by Walton's editor Hawkins, in Winchester Cathedral of a J. Chalkhill, who died in 1679, aged eighty, can scarcely be that of the author of "Thealma," who is described by Walton as "an acquaintance and friend of Edmund Spenser."—H.A.W. (Putney).

ST. BRANDAN.—Was the "Voyage of S. Brandan," to which Dante is supposed to refer in the "Inferno" (Canto III., "that catiff choir of the angels who were not rebellious, nor were faithful to God"), known in medieval England? Where did it originate?—E.M.W.B. (Hove).

BROWNING AND DARWIN.—Browning, in "Paracelsus," to some extent forestalls Darwin in the field of evolution. Has it ever been ascertained if Darwin had read "Paracelsus"? Or does Darwin anywhere refer to Browning or acknowledge any debt whatsoever to him?—E. J. Thompson.

GENERAL.

EARLIEST BRASS.—Can any reader say which is the earliest known brass in memory of a lady?—Charles H. M. Pennycook (Brighton).

WELSH AS MOTHER TONGUE.—The first effort at speaking of all children hears the sound of the Welsh word for mother—viz. "mam"; this is true of all children in all climes. The Welsh claim this as a proof that their language is the mother tongue. Can any reasons be given for this belief?—D.R. (Manchester).

A SNIP.—In the Preface to a book printed in 1687 the editor says: "I go no snip with the stationer, but I am willing to venture my reputation," &c., meaning, it is to be supposed, that he did not share in the profits. Was this a common expression at the time, and can any other example be given?—K.K. (Belfast).

ONE HOUR OLD.—In a small countryside Roman Catholic cemetery in Sussex I noticed a small wooden cross, with the following on it:

James Hobbs.
Died 7th July, 1888.
Aged One Hour.

Has any reader ever seen a cross erected to any one younger, and where?—Charles H. M. Pennycook (Brighton).

"BRAUT" AND "BRÄUTIGAM."—Are there any words in the English language corresponding to the German "Braut" and "Bräutigam"? Bride and bridegroom have, of course, a different signification, and "betrothed" cannot be considered as satisfactory, as it cannot be used with the indefinite article.—A.J. (Leeds).

Answers

SHAKESPEARE.

MONEY IN SHAKESPEARE'S DAY.—The prices of most commodities rose much in Shakespeare's lifetime. An income of £130 at the time of his birth ought to be multiplied by at least eight to get its modern equivalent; but the same income at the time of his death would not have to be multiplied by more than six.—Pedagogue (Nottingham).

"THE LADY OF STRACHY."—Cowden Clarke offers one of the best suggestions: Stracci, rags and tatters. He thinks that Malvolio regards it as an Italian family name. Other suggestions include astrakhan, duchy, sophy, satrapy, stratiaco, strategia, a province. A Greek word in use in Latin would answer to the sense of the passage, but "Strachy" is most probably the corrupt form of some place-name. (From John Lee's Notes on "Twelfth Night.")—C.B.

LITERATURE.

DE MUSSET AND DEL SARTO.—"André del Sarto, Drame en deux actes," is the first play in the first volume of Alfred de Musset's "Comédies et Proverbes," published by Charpentier, Paris. There is, however, barely any mention of his paintings. It is the story of his wife's infidelity (Lucrece del Fede). On discovering that her lover is his pupil and friend, Cordiani, del Sarto poisons himself.—E.C.E. (Irrington, New York).

AUTHOR FOUND.—The lines commencing "The river is deep, it runneth slow," &c., are to be found in the late F. W. Faber's poem, "King's Bridge," written when at Oxford before he joined the Church of Rome.—Thomas Bloom (Salisbury).

COMMANDER OF THIRTY LEGIONS.—The philosopher was Favorinus, a friend of Plutarch, a favourite of Hadrian. According to Montaigne (Essays, Book III. Essay vii., towards the end), Hadrian and he had a dispute one day about the meaning of a word. Favorinus owned himself beaten, and when his friends complained of his complaisance, answered, "What! do you pretend he does not know more than I do—one who commands thirty legions?" Montaigne probably got the story from Favorinus' friend Plutarch, of whose works he says (Essays, Book II. Essay iv., near the beginning), "C'est notre bréviaire."—T.F.J.

LES MAGES.—The use of this obsolete term to describe a school of poets probably is intended to recall its original meaning, "magician-like," as well as its more obvious one of chief (extant in Fr. equivalent for chief justice). Hence its application to the writers of a particular school may be taken to indicate the (a) artistic standpoint of the poet, often expressed in Art for Art's sake, and (b) the creative and technical skill which presents an aspect or condition apart from ethical purpose, and only as an artistic study.—S.C.

* "JOWNED."—R.L.S. is evidently quoting from Hardy's "The Return of the Native." In Book I. Section iii., Grandfather Cantle says: "Well, then I spoke to her in my well-known merry way, and she said, 'O that what's shamed so venerable should talk like a fool.' That's what she said to me. I don't care for her, be jowned if I do, and so I told her. 'Be jowned if I care for 'ee,' I said." The word "jowned" is not given in the "English Dialect Dictionary." Regarding it as an expletive, the advantage of "j" as an initial letter is obvious, however meaningless the word as a whole may be.—S. King Alcock (Burslem).

GENERAL.

* "ST. TIB'S EVE."—The name of the originator of this phrase is lost in the mists of antiquity. There is no such saint as Tib in the calendar, hence the use of the phrase "on St. Tib's Eve" to imply "never." It is exactly parallel to another one, given by Grose—viz. "on St. Geoffrey's Day." Other expressions, not framed on quite the same model, but amounting to the same thing, are: "In the reign of Queen Dick," "When three Thursdays meet," "At later Lammas," &c. The French say "Dans une semaine de trois jeudis." The ancients similarly employed such expressions as "On the Greek Kalends," or "In the consulship of Planus."—Marianne.

ST. TIB'S EVE.—The origin of Tib's Eve for never is supposed to be as follows: St. Tib is a corruption of St. Ubes, itself a Christianised version of Setuval. There is thus no saint St. Ubes in the calendar; hence the eve of the saint's day falls never. As in the case of other popular corruptions of words, the "originator" cannot be known.—S.C. (Hove).

BLUE BEANS are bullets or shot—lead being blue. "Many a valiant Gaul had no breakfast that morning, but what the Germans call 'blue beans'—i.e., bullets" (W. Maccall, "My School Days," 1885). "Three blue beans in a blue bladder," "A rattle for children."

F. Harkl does it rattle?

S. Yes, like three blue beans in a blue bladder.

"Old Fortunatus" (Ancient Dramas), iii. p. 128.
—M. Maclean Dobrte.

"THERE IS SWEET MUSIC HERE."—Further replies received from E. J. Thompson; Hilda Wood; and M. Graman.

PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain, on application at the following booksellers, Five Shillings' worth of books. Notices have been dispatched to the several winners and to the following booksellers:

Mr. G. Winterburn, 65 Deansgate, Bolton, Lancs.
Messrs. Farmer & Sons, 179 Kensington High Street, W.
Mr. W. Savage, Market Place, Burslem.
Mr. J. Ludwig Jelpke, 103 High Road, Kilburn, W.

THE INTERNATIONAL BOOK CIRCULAR.
No. 139.

Containing a special article, entitled:
"SOME CONTEMPORARY FOREIGN CHEMISTS."

By Dr. M. O. FORSTER, together with an exact bibliography of their publications and a double
plate of their portraits. — Specimen copies gratis.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, Book Importers,
14 Henrietta St, Covent Garden, W.C.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C.,
AND 4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both
Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale
Commissions executed.

INFORMATION TO LIBRARIANS
AND COLLECTORS.

TO SELL (privately) the fine Collection of the late Mr. Guffroy on the French Revolution:
French Books, Revolutionary Papers,
Placards, Pamphlets on Louis XVI., Marie
Antoinette, Robespierre, Napoleon, &c. &c.; all genuine and scarce; the finest opportunity at a very moderate charge. — Write to M. A. H.,
9 Connaught Street, Hyde Park.

AUTHORS' MSS., Sermons, Plays, Envelopes,
&c., carefully typed at home (Remington),
9d. per 1,000 words. Orders promptly executed.
— M. M. L., 7 Vernon Road, Clapham, S.W.

TYPEWRITING. — All kinds, Novels, 9d.
1,000. Translations. — Miss HANDLY,
Berkhamsted.

AUTHORS' MSS., Sermons, &c., done privately, neatly, accurately, and quickly despatched;
10d. 1,000 inclusive. Particulars, testimonials, on application. — C. P., Ashton Lodge, Teign-mouth, S. Devon.

TYPEWRITING. — The WEST KENSINGTON
OFFICES. — Authors' MSS., Translations,
&c., Legal and General Copying, Circulars, &c., duplicated; usual terms; references; established 12 years. — SIKES & SIKES, 229 Hammer-smith Road, W. (Private Address, 13 Wolverton Gardens, Hammersmith.)

TYPEWRITING. — Authors' MSS., 10d. per 1,000, all descriptions; neat, prompt,
accurate; duplicating a speciality. Shorthand,
Testimonials. — Mrs. MICHEL, 23 Quarrendon
Street, Fulham, S.W.

LONDON LIBRARY,
ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

Patron—HIS MAJESTY THE KING. President—Rt. Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P.
Vice-Presidents—Rt. Hon. VISCOUNT GOSCHEN; FREDERIC HARRISON, Esq.;
GEORGE MEREDITH, Esq.; ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, Esq., F.R.S.
Trustees—EARL OF ROSEBURY, K.G.; Right Hon. LORD AVEBURY, F.R.S.; Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, G.C.S.I.

Committee—Sir Rowland Blennerhassett, Bart., LL.D., Dr. J. H. Bridges, Horace
T. Brown, Esq., F.R.S., Prof. Ingram Bywater, Prof. Lewis Campbell, LL.D., Austin
Dobson, Esq., LL.D., Sydney Gedge, Esq., Sir A. Geikie, F.R.S., Sir R. Giffen, K.C.B.,
F.R.S., Edmund Gosse, Esq., LL.D., Mrs. J. R. Green, Rev. W. Hunt, M.A., Litt.D.,
Sir C. P. Lillie, K.C.S.I., Sir C. M. Kennedy, K.C.M.G., C.B., Sidney Lee, Esq., Litt.D.,
W. S. Lilly, Esq., Sidney J. Low, Esq., Sir Frank T. Marzials, C.B., Sir F. Pollock,
Bart., Rev. J. H. Rigg, D.D., H. R. Tedder, Esq., Rev. H. Wace, D.D., Sir Spencer
Walpole, K.C.B., A. W. Ward, Esq., Litt.D., LL.D.

The Library contains about 220,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in various Languages. Subscription, £3. 3s. a year, with an entrance fee of £1. 1s.; Life Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading-room open from Ten to Half-past Six.
The NEW CATALOGUE (1,626 pp. 4to, 1903) is now ready, price £2. 2s.; to members, 25s.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D., Secretary and Librarian.

Surplus LIBRARY BOOKS & NEW REMAINDERS
OFFERED AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

The FEBRUARY LIST, NOW READY, contains Popular Works on Sport,
Travel, Biography, and Fiction.

Sent POST FREE on application to

MUDIE'S LIBRARY,
30-34 New Oxford Street, London.

NOTICE.—"THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE"
is POSTED FREE (52 issues at 3d.) to every ANNUAL SUB-SCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying 13/-. FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a prepayment of 17/6 will secure it being sent regularly and Post Free to any address throughout the World. Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or News vendor, or direct to the Publisher, 9 East Harding Street, E.C.

GREENING'S POPULAR BOOKS.

At all Libraries, Bookshops, and Railway Bookstalls.

THE SCARLET PIMPERNEL

A Romance of the French Revolution and the Time of King
George the Third. By the Baroness ORCZY. 6s.

THE SCARLET PIMPERNEL

Daily Telegraph says: "It is something distinctly out of the common, well conceived, vividly told, and stirring from start to finish."

Daily Mail says: "An excellent historical novel of adventure."

Morning Leader says: "The novel is a thoroughly exciting one, and what is more, a careful and sincere piece of work. . . . Altogether, this is a book to be read with interest. It will drive at least one reviewer to see the play."

6/- THE SCARLET PIMPERNEL 6/-

Second Edition now in the Press.

The successful play founded on this exciting and dramatic story is now being presented at the NEW THEATRE by MISS JULIA NEILSON and Mr. FRED TERRY.

ASK AT YOUR LIBRARY FOR THE FOLLOWING
NOVELS. YOU WILL BE WELL PLEASED.

THE PILGRIMS.	By E. BELASYSE.	6s.
SHARKS.	By GUY THORNE and LEO CUNSTANCE.	6s.
WHEN IT WAS DARK.	By GUY THORNE.	6s.
FOR SATAN'S SAKE.	By ELLIOTT O'DONNELL.	6s.
AT SUNRISE.	By HERBERT SPURRELL.	6s.
IN DEEP ABYSS.	By GEORGE OHNET.	6s.
HIS SHARE OF THE WORLD.	By AMY GRIFFIN.	3s. 6d.
WASTED FIRES.	By HUME NISBET.	6s.

A VAGABOND IN ASIA. The Record of a Beaten Track. By EDMUND CANDLER, Author of "The Unveiling of Lhasa." With Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

THE ROYAL STANDARD of God's Kingdom. A Theological Work of decided originality by an anonymous author. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE PRIVILEGE OF MOTHER-HOOD. A Popular Treatise. By LUCIE SIMPSON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

Spectator says: "This little book is full of good sense."
Daily Telegraph.—"It is a book which should be put into the hands of all thoughtful girls."

Complete Catalogue post free on application.

London: GREENING & CO., 18 & 20 Cecil Court, Charing Cross Road.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIUMSTHE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.
THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN
AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current
Literature, and without doubt the best
Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.
Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON ST., HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

NEWCASTLE DAILY JOURNAL

Established 1832.

The Conservative Newspaper for the Counties of Northumberland, Durham,
Cumberland, and Berwickshire.

SPECIAL REVIEW DAY—
SATURDAYS.

London Office (special wire), 169 Fleet Street, E.C.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S
appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR
PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

EVERY DAY

IS

PUBLISHERS' DAY

IN THE

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

Special literary issue
on Saturdays.

The Best, Brightest, and most interesting Paper

THE DAILY CHRONICLE

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes.
Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art,
and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art specially dealt with.
Fullest Reports of All Current Events and Special
Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

Applications for above spaces should be made to Messrs. Crossley & Co.,
57a Coleman Street, London, E.C.
Special Rates for a Series will be quoted.

CASSELL & COMPANY'S Announcements.

THIRD IMPRESSION ready next week, 12s. net.

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE LANTERN.

By Sir FREDERICK TREVES,
Bart., K.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D.

With Photogravure Frontispiece, and 39
Full-Page Plates from Photographs
by the author.

"Sir Frederick Treves has achieved in his new book a triumph . . . all the colour of the Orient is here, all the compelling beauty; all the quaintness. Sir Frederick Treves has opened the street door and revealed to us the life within. His book has colour, atmosphere, imagination, and a charm of language as rare in books as Sir Frederick's own genius is rare in medicine."—DAILY MAIL.

"As a descriptive story of travel this book is delightful. It is full of shrewd observation, of broad human kindness, of graphic scene painting. . . . Its author always sees the salient thing; he always tells us the salient thing in . . . this charming and valuable book."

STANDARD.

Three New Novels.

THE ONE WHO SAW.

By HEADON HILL,
Author of "The Duke Decides," &c.
6s. (Ready Feb. 17)

THE ADVENTURES OF AN EQUERRY.

From the Memoirs of Mr. Francis Lesterne, Equerry to his Grace the Great Duke of Marlboro'.
Set forth by

MORICE GERARD,
Author of "A Lieutenant of the King," &c.
6s. (Ready March 3)

THE GOLDEN POOL:

The Story of a Forgotten Mine. By RICHARD AUSTIN FREEMAN.
6s. (Ready March 17)

"One of the most extraordinary publications in connection with the Don Quixote Tercentenary is this popular edition of 'THE DONÉ DON QUIXOTE.' The first part is an astonishing six-pennyworth, and is one of the best things of its kind that has ever appeared."—DAILY NEWS.

A New Fine Art Edition of DON QUIXOTE.

Superbly Illustrated by GUSTAVE DORÉ.

MAJOR MARTIN HUME writes: "No artist ever succeeded as well as Gustave Doré did in reproducing the more romantic aspect of Spanish life, with the suggestion of weird mystery necessary for the thorough enjoyment of Don Quixote. I trust the fine re-issue will be as popular as ever." (Published fortnightly)

CASSELL & CO., Ltd., London, and all Booksellers.

SEE

"Blackwood's Magazine"

For FEBRUARY for NELSON'S YEAR,

A New Poem

by ALFRED NOYES.

Also

THE RENASCENCE OF SYCOPHANCY.

THE WAR IN THE FAR EAST.

By O.

I. Of an Officer's Patrol.

II. The Naval Sub-Lieutenant's Story.

III. Port Arthur.

A STUDY OF THE RUSSO-JAPANESE WAR.

By CHASSEUR.

The Land Campaign to the Passage of the Yalu.

THE MYSTICS.

By the Author of "John Chilcote, M.P."

THE MARRIAGE BOND,

THE CRISIS IN THE FRENCH CHAMBER.

By IAN MALCOLM, M.P.

MUSINGS WITHOUT METHOD.

Mrs. John Hunter, the Surgeon's Wife.

TWO SINGERS.

THE RAWHIDE. By STEWART EDWARD WHITE.

RICHARD HARTLEY, PROSPECTOR.

By DOUGLAS BLACKBURN.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS,
Edinburgh and London.

Nineteenth Century

AND AFTER

FOR FEBRUARY.

RUSSIA'S VIEWS OF HER MISSION. By O. HAGBERG
WRIGHT.

MORAL TEACHING IN JAPAN. By Baron SUYEMATSU.

JAPAN'S DEBT TO CHINA. By HERBERT A. GILES
(Professor of Chinese at Cambridge).

THE AWAKENING OF THE TARTARS. By Professor
A. VAMBERY.

THE BALANCE OF NAVAL POWER. By ARCHIBALD
S. HURD.

TRAINING THE YOUTH OF ENGLAND. By General
LORD METHUEN.

COMPULSORY GREEK AS A NATIONAL QUESTION.
By Professor J. WENTLAK, K.O.

A WANING GLORY OF ENGLAND: THE MADRIGAL.
By J. A. FULLER MAITLAND.

THE BISHOPS AND THE REFORMATION SETTLE-MENT. By Sir GEORGE ARTHUR, Bart.

THE CHURCH ARMY AND THE RECLAMATION OF CRIMINALS. By the Rev. WILSON CARLILE (Founder of the Church Army).

THE ECONOMIC SIDE OF ALIEN IMMIGRATION.
By Major W. EVANS GORDON, M.P.

FROM THE TOLL-BAR OF THE GALATA BRIDGE.
By the Lady CURRIE.

PARISH SCHOOL DINNERS AND MUSEUMS. By JONATHAN HUTCHINSON, F.R.O.S.

HENRY PARRY LIDDON. By D. O. LATHBURY.

LAST MONTH: (1) By Sir WYNTYS RRID.
(2) By WALTER FREWEN LORD.

London: SPOTTISWOODE & CO., LIMITED, 5 New Street Square, and 54 Gracechurch Street, E.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

VOL. III. READY THIS DAY.

DIARY AND LETTERS OF MADAME D'ARBLAY

(1778-1840). As edited by her Niece, CHARLOTTE
BARRRETT. With Preface and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON.
With Photogravure Portraits and other Sketches. In 6 Vols. Vol. I., 1778 to June, 1781. Vol. II., 1781-86.
Vol. III., August, 1786, to June, 1788. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Shakespearean Tragedy.

Lectures on HAMLET, OTHELLO, KING LEAR, and MACBETH. By Prof. A. C. BRADLEY, LL.D.,
Litt.D. 8vo, 10s. net.

Spectator.—"We have no hesitation in putting Professor Bradley's book far above any modern Shakespearean criticism that we know, worthy to rank very near the immortal work of Lamb and Coleridge. It is, indeed, difficult to praise it in language which shall do it justice, and yet seem free from exaggeration. For it is more than a study of Shakespeare: it is a unique piece of constructive criticism, which from its freshness of method and distinction of form deserves to rank as the most important exercise in the craft since Matthew Arnold's 'Essays in Criticism.'"

POPULAR EDITION NOW READY.

The Golden Treasury.

Selected from the Best Songs and Lyrical Poems in the English Language and Arranged with Notes by FRANCIS T. PALGRAVE. Revised and Enlarged, Pott
8vo, 1s. net.

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS.—New Series.
Crown 8vo, gilt tops, flat backs, 2s. net each.

Sydney Smith. By GEORGE
W. E. RUSSELL.

Thomas Moore. By STEPHEN
GWYNN.

Academy and Literature.—"Mr. Gwynn has added considerably to his already very considerable reputation by this capital little book, in which he does justice to his subject and to himself."

GERTRUDE ATHERTON'S NEW NOVEL.

The Bell in the Fog, and other Stories. Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s.

THE ENGLISH CITIZEN SERIES.
Colonies and Colonial Federations. By E. J. PAYNE. With Map. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

A BOOK OF WIT AND HUMOUR.

THE WORKS OF ARTHUR CLEMENT HILTON

(Of Marlborough and Cambridge). Author of "The Light Green." With 2 Illustrations, together with his Life and Letters, by Sir ROBERT EDGUMBE.
Fcap. 8vo, 6s. net; vellum, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net.

Athenaeum.—"This record of a bright, short life was well worth making, and Sir Robert Edgumbe has told us with modesty and grace just what we wanted to know. A parodist, classic at his best, and long since promoted to that rank by the dignity of frequent misquotation."

Speaker.—"Will be welcome."

Spectator.—"We have always had a special affection for the irresistible audacity of 'The May Exam.' . . .
We have nothing but congratulations to offer Sir Robert Edgumbe on his pious act of homage to the memory of his friend and contemporary, A. C. Hilton.
To a collection of Hilton's Cambridge brilliant jeux d'esprit he has added a number of other pieces."

Scotsman.—"Sunny collection."

Daily Chronicle.—"The champagne of parody. . . .
A born humourist."
Pall Mall Gazette.—"Wit on the wings of metre.
Highly remarkable. Sir Robert Edgumbe's memoir is a model of affect onate and tributary sympathy.
There are parodies brilliant enough to persuade one almost that the same hand wrote the parent and the parody. There are things in this delightful little book that will live among the best examples of English wit."

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, 16s.

The February Number contains:—

DEATH, THE ANGEL FRIEND. In Memoriam—
G. F. WATTS, R.A. By H. D. RAWNSLEY.

IMPRESSIONS OF THE GERMAN EMPEROR. By ANDREW D. WHITE. With Portraits.

SANDY. A Story. By ALICE HEGAN RICE, Author of "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch." III. Illustrated.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

MACMILLAN & CO., LIMITED, London.

The Academy and Literature

No. 1709. Established 1869.

London: 4 February 1905.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17s. 6d. a year.]

Notes

THE news of Maxim Gorky is reassuring. Whether or no General Trepoff said that he should be hanged, it seems probable, according to the latest reports, that he will be released shortly. Meanwhile the world of letters all over Europe has risen in his defence. The movement started, it seems, in Berlin and New York; Paris and London are following suit; and the petitions and agitation in his favour are a new and leading instance of the way in which modern literature and modern men and women of letters are identified with modern life. Maxim Gorky has nothing of the "literary artist" about him. In his thirty-six years there has been no learned seclusion, no academic selfishness. He has been a painter of ikons, a pedlar, a scullery-boy, a gardener, a watchman, a barber's apprentice; he has worked in a lawyer's office and sung in a travelling opera company. Life, not letters, turned him author; and when he wrote, he wrote brutal, hideous things, that few men of letters can read. What chance would such a man have had in the old days, when literature was the amusement of the few? His very name, Maxim the Bitter, is the antithesis of the pet qualities of the man of letters. And yet it is first and foremost the men of letters who have come forward as his champions.

THE publication in "The Times" of the "unique" unfinished novel by Lord Beaconsfield should suffice to burst the Disraeli bubble. It was the work of an old and ailing man; but an old and ailing man who had ever possessed a genuine literary gift could never have produced such chapters as these. Disraeli (there is no concealing the fact) was a vulgar writer. His vulgarity is too clever to be gross, his social experience too great to leave it unvarnished; but it peeps out not only in his general attitude towards the aristocracy, but in the very form and diction of his sentences. Some faint interest may be roused by the question who Joseph Toplady Falconet was meant for. The name contains the same number of letters as William Ewart Gladstone, and Gladstone, shortly before Disraeli's death, had put "Rock of Ages" into Latin verse: on the other hand, Macaulay, too, came from Clapham Common and had belonged to the Clapham sect. We should prefer to believe that Macaulay was the man, for the publication of these unfinished chapters would be less welcome than ever if they proved Disraeli to have been making "copy" of that kind out of a still living political opponent.

WHAT, we wonder, did Disraeli think of the work himself? And what would he think of its admirers?

Browning's opinion of the Browning Society has been guessed at by the late J. K. S. in the lines on the "Mr. Society down in Cambridge," and by Mr. Max Beerbohm in one of the cartoons he exhibited at the Carfax Gallery last year. The artist might turn his attention to the Dickens Fellowship, which is preparing a meeting in the Memorial Hall, Farringdon Street, on Wednesday next, to celebrate the ninety-third anniversary of Charles Dickens' birth. "This huge organisation" has nearly 7,000 members, and thirty-one branches situated in all parts of the world, and they will all commemorate the anniversary simultaneously. No doubt they will all enjoy a pleasant evening. There will be presidential and vice-presidential addresses; there will be (it appears) personal reminiscences of the novelist; there will be songs and dramatic representations. There should be, or half the fun will be gone, resolutions, minutes, reports of proceedings, and the rest of it. And meanwhile there will be one or two, outside the 7,000, who will read Dickens.

By the death of Arnold Glover, at the early age of thirty-nine, students of English literature have suffered a real loss. In him were combined the characteristic qualities of his two Universities; it was obvious at St. Andrews a year ago, when he paid a visit to his old haunts after many years of absence, that he was by nature akin, in many ways, to the spirit of the place; and he had all that dread of over-statement, all that "painful" desire to be accurate and sure in the laying of foundations, so eminently a mark of Cambridge. A few articles in the Encyclopædia Britannica, an edition of Boswell's "Johnson" and of the "Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides," a review or two and (in collaboration with A. R. Waller) the Collected Edition of the writings of Hazlitt—these constitute his published work. Only ten days before his death, during a walk round the Great Court of Trinity, he talked of work for many years to come; he was keenly absorbed in the edition of the complete text of Beaumont and Fletcher, on which he was at work for the Cambridge University Press; his stores of knowledge concerning all that belonged to Scots literature had hardly been touched, but he was going to draw upon them; and the minute care he had bestowed upon the politics and literature of the end of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth century in the matter of Hazlitt was to be applied in other directions. Dis aliter visum.

NEWS comes from Dublin of a new Juliet, Miss Violet Mervyn, who has a fresh reading of the psychology of Juliet's emotions. A Juliet with ideas would be a welcome novelty, but the most interesting statement in connection with Miss Mervyn is that she has roused Professor Dowden to enthusiasm. The Juliet who can do that should be worth seeing, and we are glad to hear that the young actress may shortly be seen in London.

THE January number of the best Danish monthly, "Tilskueren," contains an entertaining article on the English language by Otto Jespersen, the well-known authority on phonetics. He asserts, with certain reservations, that the character of a nation may be gauged from the language, and proceeds to show how the English tongue reflects some national idiosyncrasies. "English is a masculine language—there is nothing either childlike or feminine about it. . . . Its merits, as well as its imperfections, are those of a man."

It is to the energetic character of the nation that Jespersen attributes the comparative harshness of spoken English, with its combinations of two or three consonants; these, he argues, require more energy on the part of the speaker to pronounce than is called forth by a softer language, with a preponderance of words ending in vowel sounds. This imparts a quality of virility at the expense of melodiousness, and thus even the shortcomings of English serve to emphasise its inherent manliness.

APPARENTLY ignoring modern British journalese, the author comments on the Englishman's abstention from exaggerated praise and his consequent dislike of superlative terms. "'That isn't half bad,' or 'She is rather good-looking' is often the highest praise that can be extorted from him." In the same way the Englishman vents his disgust in measured language, and where the Frenchman would exclaim "Quelle horreur!" contents himself with a quiet "That's rather a nuisance."

BUT the most striking feature of the English character which Jespersen claims to discover in the language is the love of freedom and impatience of undue restraint. No language is so unfettered by academic rules, none has greater powers of assimilation; provided a word be telling, it will be unhesitatingly accepted, whatever its origin may be. If French be compared to a formal Louis XIV. garden, then our own tongue may be likened to those English parks where all seems left to nature, and where all have leave to wander at will. "The English language would never have become what it is if Englishmen had not for centuries so respected individual liberty, that every man was free to strike out a new path for himself."

IN a very literary number of "The Quarterly Review" there are two articles of special interest. One is that of the President of Magdalen College on Matthew Arnold, and the other Miss Sichel's fascinating account of Canon Ainger. Mr. Warren writes with profound and intimate knowledge of Arnold, and gives such a picture as we do not find in any of the various biographical essays that have been published regarding the critic. And this is saying nothing derogatory to the excellent work done by Mr. G. W. E. Russell, Professor Saintsbury, Mr. Paul, Mr. W. H. Dawson, Mr. Arthur Galton, and the others. Mr. Warren gives the following fine description of Arnold in his young days: "He was indeed a singular mixture, a paradox, or rather a bundle of paradoxes, oscillating, vacillating at all times between the worldly and the unworldly. Handsome, athletic, elegant, fashionable, loving (as he said himself) the ways and sports of the 'barbarians,' full of a superficial levity and even flippancy, calculated to shine in society, to adorn and enjoy it—this was what he appeared on the surface." Mr. Warren insists upon the double nature of Arnold in which the gay and lively were always bubbling up through the grave and severe, so that the world did not quite know "whether to treat him as a mocker or as a mystic, a Socrates or a Scarron."

As long as Canon Ainger lived Charles Lamb did not lack a descendant both in a literary sense and a sort of inherited physical and mental presence. His innocence and delight and wit were re-embodied. To those were joined the devotion and admiration of a spirit kindred in most things—kindred fundamentally in its adherence to the principles of art and conduct of the past, and kindred in a perplexing veil each drew between the man of the world who trifled and punned everlastingly with the externals, and the deep and earnest soul beneath. "Lamb's f-f-fun" covered a tragical impression of both his own personality and the ordinary destiny. The humour that played about all they came in contact with and touched, often enough on the eternal things, yet left an absolute and childlike faith in the lessons of the unseen which the ages had handed down to both. They chose professions which seemed peculiarly unsuitable, and succeeded in them honourably and happily. Lamb's home affections, which are almost unmatched in any record of a man's life, particularly those of men of genius, are found also in Canon Ainger. Lamb used to have a pathetic desire to go and stand under the house where he was born and visit again all the houses that had witnessed his childhood and family life. The feeling is not uncommon, but it is seldom so intense as in Lamb, the "thoughts too deep for tears" came then. It is a comment on the lives and training of the two men to observe the scene that awakens the reflection in Wordsworth. There is also a curious parallel in the case of Thomas Hood, who was a friend of Lamb and was admired so greatly by Ainger. The "old familiar faces" of Lamb has an echo in Hood's

"I remember, I remember

The house where I was born," and Ainger completes the link by his poem to his sister:

"Home is not home where is no kindred face;
And often, wearied with the jars of day,
From stranger hearths I sadly turn away
The story of my childhood's days to trace.

For friends are sweet, but friendship ne'er supplies
The love of those who link us to our race."

There is the real spirit of Lamb, the Lamb who wrote
"Would that thou wert born in my father's dwelling."

MR. DAVID MURRAY, painter, has been elected a Royal Academician, while Mr. David Farquharson, painter, and Mr. Reginald Blomfield, architect, have been elected Associates. At the time of going to press we do not hear that any steps have been taken towards filling the vacancies in the number of the eight engravers.

THE Duke of Westminster is having a commemorative plate placed on No. 8 Victoria Square, Buckingham Palace Road, the house in which Thomas Campbell resided between 1840 and 1843. It was there that the "Life of Mrs. Siddons" was completed; and "The Pilgrim of Glencoe," "Moonlight" and "The Child and Hind" all appeared during the period of his tenancy of the house. Beattie tells many anecdotes of the poet's unbusinesslike methods. His guests often found their meals served in the library, which, famous for its "four scagliola pedestals waiting for their marble busts," and the story of the slipper and the bundle of banknotes which has been repeated recently, shows his absolute neglect of all ordinary precautions in regard to money matters. He wrote to Beattie from Wiesbaden, asking him to send some money which would be found in the press in his bedroom. After a long and exhaustive search a roll of banknotes, of about £300 in value, was found in the press, it is true, but stuffed into the toe of an old slipper.

WHAT is serendipity? The word might have slept in learned obscurity but for Mr. Wilfrid Meynell. He found it, no doubt, in the works of Horace Walpole, its inventor, and hid it delicately in the pages of "Who's Who." But some one must have found it there and asked for an explanation. "He," says Mr. Meynell, "who picks up abroad just the volume that happens to be missing from the otherwise complete set on his own bookshelves, he it is who knows the joys of serendipity." There are joys, doubtless, for him who picks up just the word that happens to be missing from his own and everyone else's vocabulary; but these joys are transient. "Serendipity" will shortly occur on every page of every daily paper. It is already on a sign over a shop. When Sir Thomas Browne wrote down "meticulous" he must have thrilled with pleasure; so must the writer who first discovered it in his pages. The word is now a common hack.

NOTHING has contributed so much to the "waking-up" of "The Burlington Magazine" as its editorial articles, which combine plain-speaking, sound sense, and scholarship in just and sometimes amusing proportions. In the February number, for instance, the author of an excellent article on "The Prospects of Contemporary Painting" slips in a sentence on the works of "deceased aunts" which proclaims him human at once. There is also an important little note on the Insurance of Works of Art. Mr. Ricketts writes on "Watts at Burlington House," Mr. Lionel Cust (who seems to be the strongest candidate for the Directorship of the National Gallery) on Lucas Cranach, and Mrs. Ady concludes her notes on the Staats-Forbes collection of drawings by Millet.

Bibliographical

TO-DAY (February 4) is the hundredth anniversary of the birth of William Harrison Ainsworth, a novelist who enjoyed considerable popularity in his day, and whose works are still, as I think that free library statistics would go to prove, very widely read. Most of his romances are obtainable to-day in various forms from sixpence to five shillings apiece. Messrs. Routledge's list contains half a dozen "editions"; some complete and some comprising only the more popular of Ainsworth's romances, and Messrs. Gibbings also issued an edition. Judging by the number of reissues during the past fifteen years, "Windsor Castle," which has made five reappearances, is the most popular, while "The Tower of London" and "Jack Sheppard" have each made four. "Old Saint Paul's," which, as I remember, entranced me years ago, is rather low on the list for recent reprints, but it seems obtainable in half a dozen different forms, all of which seem to show that Harrison Ainsworth—whose "Rookwood" was published over seventy years ago—remains a serious competitor of living writers of historical and adventure stories.

The recent addition of a volume on Thomas Moore to the English Men of Letters Series has suggested an inquiry as to the sustained popularity of Moore's writings as shown by the number of reissues. During the past ten years there have been about a dozen reprints of Moore's works. His complete poems were published in 1895, and again in two forms in 1897, while as recently as 1903 a selection from them was added to the Golden Treasury Series. The "Irish Meledies" were republished in 1897, and a selection from them translated into Irish was issued two years later. "Lalla Rookh" was published in 1901, while when we come to his prose we find three issues of "The Epicurean," 1897, 1899, and 1900, and a new edition of the "Memoirs of Lord Edward Fitzgerald" in 1897. In 1899 a volume of anecdotes, &c., from "Moore's Journal" formed the opening volume of a Raconteur Series which was not, I believe, carried further.

The late Mr. William Fraser Rae will no doubt be remembered chiefly for his biography of Sheridan, his other writings on late eighteenth-century men and matters, and his contributions to the elucidation of the Junius mystery. He was also the author of several travel books and works of fiction, as may be seen from the following list of his publications: "Westward by Rail: the New Route to the East" (1870, third edition 1874); "Wilkes, Sheridan, Fox: the Opposition under George the Third" (1873); "Columbia and Canada: Notes on the Great Republic and the new Dominion" (1877); "Newfoundland to Manitoba" (1881); "Facts about Manitoba" (1882); "Miss Bayle's Romance" (1887); "A Modern Brigand" (1888); "Maygrove: a Family History" (1889); "Austrian Health Resorts and the Bitter Waters of Hungary" (1888, second enlarged edition 1889); "An American Duchess: a Pendant to Miss Bayle's Romance" (1891); "The Business of Travel" (1891); "Egypt To-day: the First to the Third Khedive" (1892); "Sheridan, a Biography" (1896); "Sheridan's Plays. Now Printed as he wrote Them" (1902). Mr. Rae also translated Edmond About's "Handbook of Social Economy" (1872); Taine's "Notes on England" (1872); and Sainte-Beuve's "English Portraits" (1875). He also contributed an introduction to the catalogue of the library of the Reform Club (1883 and 1894).

The recent tragic events in Russia, with their early sequel in the wholesale arrest of prominent leaders of liberal thought, will probably stimulate the demand for existing English translations of notable Russian books, and perhaps more especially for those of Maxim Gorky, who was among those arrested. It has been suggested that Gorky's grim writings would never have made a mark among English readers had he elected to write under his own name, Alexei Maximovitch Peshkov, and if the suggestion be true it shows that there is much in a name after all. For the information of readers who wish for some acquaintance with Gorky's writings I give a list of English translations which have been published: "The Orloff Couple and Malva" (1901); "Foma Gordyeeff" (1901); "The Outcasts and Other Stories" (1902); "Three of Them" (1902); "Twenty-six Men and a Girl, &c." (1902).

WALTER JERROLD.

Balzac's Short Stories

MESSRS. J. M. DENT & Co. have begun the experiment of printing French classics in England, seeking, by means of clear type and presentable volumes, to induce a closer study of the great French masterpieces on this side the Channel, and, on the other, possibly, to rouse a little friendly rivalry with the French in the matter of paper and print.

The volume under consideration ("Contes Choisis," by H. de Balzac, "Les Classiques Français," publiés sous la direction de M. Daniel S. O'Connor. Dent, 1s. 6d. and 2s. 6d. net) is devoted to a selection of Balzac's short stories, with a preface by M. Paul Bourget. By a curious oversight it has no list of contents, and we may therefore as well state that the stories included are: "L'Elixir de Longue Vie," "La Messe de l'Athée," "Jésus-Christ en Flandre," "Un Episode sous la Terreur," "Le Réquisitionnaire," "Le Chef-d'œuvre Inconnu," "El Verdugo," "La Grande Bretèche," "Facino Cane," "Un Drame au Bord de la Mer." With this selection there is little cause to quarrel. If "Facino Cane" had been omitted the volume would have been more nearly "pure gold"; it is but a slight sketch, interesting as from Balzac's pen, but of little merit, and it possesses few of the distinctive qualities of the short story. For the rest, the reader has in "La Grande Bretèche," "La Messe de l'Athée," "Le Chef-d'œuvre Inconnu" and the others mentioned, the very best of Balzac's work as a writer of short stories—work unencumbered with the moralisings so often found elsewhere in his longer writings, free from the "catalogue" detail so characteristic of him; work in which no strokes are lost, no digressions permitted, in which the pen moves on swiftly, freely, to the inevitable close.

M. Bourget discusses in his few preparatory pages the raison d'être of the short story and Balzac's work as a writer of nouvelles. He points out the fact frequently forgotten—that Balzac's short stories are as great supporters of his fame as are his longer novels; and it is a quality rare in literary history. Those rich pearls, to use the phrase of one of Balzac's most acute and discerning critics, that are scattered profusely throughout "La Comédie Humaine," are as clearly evidence of the wealth of his creative power as are "Le Père Goriot" and "La Cousine Bette." Other French masters in this art are not thus doubly endowed. Mérimée, who made the short story something it never was before, who brought it out of the void and gave it form, who wrote "Mateo Falcone," the despair of all who, with an eye towards economy of means, seek to write a short story based upon elements of pity and terror; even he, Prosper Mérimée, could not write a long novel. Why? Is it not due to a failure to recognise that the method and the technique of the short story are far removed from those of the long novel? To sum up a situation in a hundred words, the gift of Poe to France through the magic prose of Baudelaire, needs qualities entirely different from those needed to build up step by step, with here an elaboration of the diamond panes and there a nicely adjusted colouring of the roof, a structure that stands four-square to the winds of heaven, a logical and coherent whole. In a long novel the truest art consists in the selection and arrangement of those many small, unobtrusive facts which show that, under given circumstances, a man will act in such a way and in no other. Life may be divers et ondoyant: there is no settled sequence of things; but in a dumb, groping fashion we have discovered that certain causes generally produce certain effects, that as a man sows so does he reap. The novelist, whose aim is not merely to amuse, but who wishes to give a true picture of life, will, therefore, avoid that which is out of the common. Years ago Guy de Maupassant pointed this out in the preface to "Pierre et Jean." From the events of every-day life, desiring only that we should seek to understand what goes on, without any thought of judgment or morality, the novelish should select for presentation series of facts that show his characters working out their settled destiny. He must cast aside the superfluous, for it is impossible to give in full the facts of even one day only in the history of a man's soul; he must select only those things which seem to tell, which are the hidden causes of what follows; but, even so, he will need a large canvas to let the play of successive or reiterated facts be seen. In the long novel, we repeat, the exceptional must be avoided, or used as sparingly as exceptional things occur in common life; but the exceptional is the very core of the short story. There the main requirement is the presentation of a single, detached episode, an unexpected tragedy, the life of a few moments, a completed thing, in which the forces of terror and pity and sympathy arise and sway and die. Of such stuff are the stories contained in this slight volume. They grip the heart; they are of the very essence of that species of tragedy which Aristotle, in his "Poetics," describes as purifying the affections by pity and terror. Of this same nature is Guy de Maupassant's "Boule de Suif," perhaps the most perfect short story of the most perfect artist in that kind. And the nearest classical examples we can show in English literature are two stories, both from over the Border: Sir Walter Scott's Wandering Willie's Tale in "Redgauntlet," and R. L. Stevenson's "Thrawn Janet." We have succeeded in many forms of literature, but as yet we have not worked this vein with the easy power of our neighbours. Our workmen are sparing of the file; they have yet to learn that the half is greater than the whole. Few English stories can be named that possess that singleness of aim, that reserve of material, that ruthless trimming away of the unnecessary which is needful to produce a sharply-defined and clear result. At the moment only one can be remembered, written of recent years, that fulfils every canon here expressed—Rudyard Kipling's "Without Benefit of Clergy." An isolated episode that brings us close to the profound depths of life and thought, the suggestion of unsolved problems without the long train of events that illustrate their (to us) apparent cause and effect, the flight of a bird across the warm and lighted hall, arousing questions of whence and whither, unique experiences, revelations of the blinding light that come at rare moments: these are the proper substance of the short story.

In lengthened studies of the human heart and in character-analysis we can show the works of Fielding and Richardson and the novels of Jane Austen; but we have failed in the short story primarily because we have not realised that we must go a different way to work, and, secondly, because of a lack in our conception of the art of writing that has had a malign influence upon more than the short story in recent literature: "Whatever the thing we wish to say," writes Maupassant, "there is but one word to express it, but one verb to give it movement, but one adjective to qualify it. We must seek till we find this noun, this verb and this adjective, and never be content with getting very near it, never allow ourselves to play tricks, even happy ones, or have recourse to sleights of language to avoid a difficulty." Needful in all really great work, this rule is vital in the construction of the short story; but, with a few honourable exceptions, care for the written word, among the writers of to-day, as expressive of the thing imagined, is not deemed essential. Not so did Mérimée and Maupassant understand their art; it was with carefully-wrought tools that they fashioned their works: our imitations do not bear the stamp of such whole-hearted devotion.

W.

Reviews

THE LIFE OF CERVANTES

By Albert F. Calvert. (John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

SPANISH INFLUENCE ON ENGLISH LITERATURE

By Martin Hume. (Eveleigh Nash. 7s. 6d.)

EVERY centenary brings its crop, scanty or abundant, of books, little or big, designed to tell the general reader why the first, third or any other hundredth year since some notable event, is being celebrated. The tercentenary of the publication of the first part of "Don Quixote" could not fail to bring the accustomed following with it. And we have nothing to say against their appearance, if only for the reason, such as it is, that nobody could write worse about Cervantes than some of his professed admirers have written already. Not but that better excuses could be found. When the first part of "Don Quixote" appeared in 1605 Spain took her place among the nations which have produced a great literature. If one were peremptorily called upon to define what constitutes "a great literature" it would be as good an answer as could perhaps be given to say, after modestly confessing the difficulty of giving a definition, that a literature is on the right side of the gulf between great and not great when it has produced at least one man who was not for an age, but for all time; not for a single people, but for all mankind. Now the "Don Quixote" is Spain's patent of nobility in the world of letters. There is much besides which is interesting, but nothing which is not too purely national to have a lasting influence north of the Pyrenees. Without Velasquez there would still be a Spanish school of painting; but it would be that only. There would be a Spanish literature without Cervantes; but then it would have no life outside the Peninsula. He has raised his brethren by excelling them, for, thanks to him, they do belong to the family which has produced one member who ranks with Ariosto, Shakespeare and Molière. The very high names of literature, like the grandees of Spain, have no table of precedence among themselves. Therefore let us proclaim the dignity of Cervantes even unwisely.

Of the two books now immediately before us, Mr. Calvert's "Life" is a little too obviously written for the tercentenary. It will, at any rate, give the unprepared reader much he did not know. The existence of most of the illustrations he reproduces was not justified by intrinsic merit when they first appeared, and to-day they are only something to look at, which serves to prove that "Don Quixote" has, for the space of three hundred years, been one of the books the world does not let die. We confess that we have not subjected his bibliographical lists and quotations of authorities to the minute examination which would justify us in pronouncing on their merits. They would not fail to put the student on the path to better knowledge. Major Martin Hume's "Spanish Influence on English Literature" is more independent and more ambitious. Given originally in the form of University Extension Lectures, his chapters are presented to us as an effort to give "a comparative study of Spanish Literature in special relation to its points of contact with the literature of our own country." Major Hume, in fact, intended to do on a larger scale what M. Brunetière had done for Spanish influence on France in one of those essays which display all the extent of his learning and of his power of analysis and synthesis. To labour the comparison would, of course, be grossly unfair; but even when a lower standard is taken, Major Hume does not stand the test very well. Errors and omissions are to be excused. We will not make too much of such an amazing passage as this: "'Tartuffe,' for instance, which Colley Cibber turned into 'The Nonjuror' in England, would not have been written as it was unless the author had seen Lope's 'Perro de Hortelana' ('Dog in the Manger'), in which a lady was in love with her secretary, and too proud to marry him, and yet too jealous to let him marry any one else." Major Hume's notes have fallen into some confusion, and he has put "Tartuffe" and "The Nonjuror," where "The Duchess of Malfi" ought to have been. But a slip of this kind tells a tale. Major Hume nowhere distinguishes with precision between two things which are essentially different—a point of contact and an influence. Lope de Vega and John Webster both drew on the "Novelle" of Bandello. They came in contact while borrowing from the Italian, but where was the influence of one on the other? We are afraid that not even confusion in his notes can excuse Mr. Hume for saying that Shakespeare took the subject of "The Taming of the Shrew" from the "Conde Lucanor." Nothing is more certain than that he only adapted a still existing play called "The Taming of a Shrew."

Indeed, Major Hume does not succeed in persuading us that he has attained to any clear conception of what is meant by a literary influence. Mere similarity of matter proves nothing, as we see in the very leading case of Webster and Lope. To demonstrate the influence of one literature on another, it is necessary to prove that the disciple has taken from the master what is essentially "literature"—namely, the form, the method, the construction. The stories are naught, for they are a common fund, and, when stripped of the presentment, they are not very numerous. Men repeat, transmit and reinvent the same raw material for ever. M. Maspero has found the skeleton of Sinbad the Sailor in Ancient Egypt. When we ask what the Spaniard gave us directly of "form, method and construction," the answer must be very little; and that little had no abiding influence. Crashaw went, no doubt, directly to Santa Teresa and Juan de Dios for his model of ecstatic, religious and amatory verse. But this plant struck no root, and we need not regret its loss. When we turn to the two kinds of literature for which Spain did give a model—the unheroic prose story of adventure, and the stage play—a moderate degree of attention to the evidence will soon convince the judicious reader that the abiding action of Spain on England was exercised through France. Of ourselves we took from the "comedia" of the Peninsula nothing of its main merit—the artful construction of the fable, the logical development of the story as each scene arises naturally from its predecessor and leads to its successor. Indeed, we have learnt but little even through the French, for this "sense of the theatre" is precisely what always failed, and continues to fail, us. Our record is very different with the prose story; but what did the Spaniard teach us immediately? Practically nothing. Nash began by adapting the Lazarillo in Jack Wilton, but he soon wandered away into the stock blood and thunder, rape and murder of the Elizabethan tale of adventure. Mabbe's translation of the "Guzman de Alfarache" had no progeny belonging to literature. It was not until Le Sage had taken the Picaro and had translated him into the average sensual man that the novela de Picaros became a profitable model for Defoe, Fielding or Smollett. France, said Macaulay, has played Aaron to England's Moses. There is a great deal of the function of Aaron in her literary activity, not only in what she has done for the insular genius of England, but for all, and for the "home-keeping genius of Spain" more, and not less, than for others.

CHILDHOOD. BOYHOOD. YOUTH. THE INCURSION

Vol. I. of the Complete Works of Count Tolstoy. Translated by Leo Wiener. (J. M. Dent & Co. 3s. 6d.)

A LANDED PROPRIETOR. THE COSSACKS. SEVASTOPOL

Vol. II. (3s. 6d.)

WE are extremely glad to welcome the first two volumes of a new translation of Tolstoy's works by Mr. Leo Wiener, Assistant Professor of Slavic Languages at Harvard University. The volumes, at 3s. 6d. each, are extremely cheap and well printed. Mr. Wiener, we note, claims that he is specially competent for the task he has undertaken on the ground that he, a native of Russia, for twenty years has lived in America, and that he is a vegetarian and teetotaler of even longer standing than Tolstoy himself. What a translator puts in his stomach, we may remark, cannot radically affect the knowledge of English idiom that he carries in his head, and it is a little naïve of Mr. Wiener to state: "No liberties are taken with either the language or the expression of the author's diction, which in unconscious artistic moments is sublimely poetical and sonorous. . . ." How to translate into another tongue this "sublimely poetical diction"? "hic labor, hoc opus est." On comparing Mr. Wiener's translation of "Sevastopol" with Mr. Aylmer Maude's version we do not see much difference between them. Mr. Wiener is perhaps a shade more vigorous, but, on the other hand, he uses many slipshod phrases and Americanisms which Mr. Maude has eschewed. Translators are never satisfied with one another's renderings, and with reason, for each language has a spiritual flavour of its own which resides in the native associations of each word. Change the form of the word, and you exchange one spirit for another. But in any case, the more translators of Tolstoy the better. Each new version pushed by its publisher brings Tolstoy home to a fresh and growing circle of readers—that is the main thing.

How many of our readers have read "Sevastopol," perhaps the most vivid and penetrating psychological study of war ever written? "Sevastopol" was written by Tolstoy, himself an eye-witness of the siege in 1854-56, when he was a young and ambitious officer of twenty-seven. The book, which is without any parti-pris against war, and which opens and closes with a note of patriotism, is now fifty years old. How many English people know of this classic? A few thousand, at most. Yet the hundred and fifty pages of "Sevastopol" contain the description of everything essential to our realisation of what serious war is; we do not allude here to those little wars where white men, armed with the latest weapons, smash native tribes, or to military promenades such as at Tel-el-Kebir, or fiascos such as the last Turko-Greek war, but to downright serious wars, such as the Franco-German war of 1871, the Russo-Turkish war of 1874, and the present Russian-Japanese war. While the essential feature of serious war, between two determined well-matched combatants, is ever the same, we find the military historians and war correspondents, in their professional descriptions, giving us the shadow and not the substance. So much is it so that we may say that the many sanguinary wars of the nineteenth century, in which millions of men fell, have produced in creative literature of the first order only Tolstoy's "Sevastopol" and "War and Peace," and perhaps a score of narratives of permanent human interest, such as Sergeant Burgoyne's description of the retreat from Moscow and Von Herbert's "Siege of Plevna." Why is this? The reason doubtless is that an extraordinary genius is required for penetrating into the abnormal states of mind that war induces in men, and, above all, for facing and comprehending the most cruel and sinister truths. As Tolstoy says in "Sevastopol": "The hero of my narrative, whom I love with all the powers of my soul, whom I have endeavoured to reproduce in all his beauty, and who has always been, who is, and always will be, beautiful, is truth."

Now, the able and clever military writers and war correspondents, it may be noted, always dwell at great length on the technical aspects of a battle, giving us picturesque sketches and clear rational abstracts of the material operations, and passing hurriedly in a few sentences over the vortex of human sensations, passions, thoughts, and actual actions of the men who kill or are killed. It has often been remarked that the more a man has seen of serious war the less is he willing to speak of what he has seen. He cannot bring himself to face, but hurries away from his most sinister recollections. And in the works of military writers generally war is presented accordingly as a highly interesting kind of human chess, in which the skill of the opposing player is examined, while that dark bloody background of terrible reality, which General Grant summed up tersely in the phrase "War is hell," is revealed only to the extent of pleasantly titillating the reader's nerves. This kind of literature, though as news of the day or military history it serves its turn and takes its place, is to a piece of great creative art as "Sevastopol" and "War and Peace," what a Bluebook is to life itself—a mere abstraction, useful for certain purposes. To describe war, while veiling its unique essential feature, is a piece of irony as significant as the famous epigram, "Speech is given us to conceal our thoughts." And the majority of readers who are too sensitive to read "Sevastopol," and yet are capable of the feat of sending their sons to war, may, in this fashion, plead their case in a sentence: I do not want to understand what it is I am sending my son to.

What gives "Sevastopol," this absolutely straightforward narrative, its unique place in literature is that its severe sense of moral beauty is relieved both by a quiet tenderness and unspoken passion. There is not a sentimental word in it from the first page to the last. Tolstoy, as we have said, at that time looked on war patriotically, as a necessary and natural, if ugly, phenomenon of man's life. But he carried into the field with him a power of psychological penetration into the "natural man"; into the meaning of instinctive automatic actions of men that betray their feelings and state of soul, a power of penetration which led him to express, with a force unparalleled in the literature of the battlefield, a truth which may be roughly summarised thus: The terrible triviality of the motives and feelings of the living in contrast with the sickening work of suffering and death they are engaged in. Here is the point where Tolstoy's analysis of war in its truth beats right out of the field the work of nearly everybody else on the subject. Nearly every other writer has, consciously or unconsciously, idealised the conduct and behaviour, the secret thoughts and sensations and emotions of the living men on the battlefield, while minimising and screening from our gaze the bloody sweat and agony of the "war is hell" aspect. But Tolstoy fixes his gaze with so piercing a scrutiny on the attitude of mind and characteristic behaviour of the men and officers engaged in their thousand military duties, their conversation and morale under fire, on fatigue duty, volunteering for the dangerous posts, repairing the bastions, resting, eating, chaffing one another, in the trenches, lying wounded in the hospital, screaming under the surgeon's knife, &c., that the reader feels the shock of conviction that here is the actuality of the life itself, displayed not merely in a narrative of the external events of the siege, but in the most secret sensations in the hearts of the thousands who defended, perished, or survived Sevastopol. It is war in all aspects; nothing is minimised and nothing is exaggerated. And Tolstoy does not dwell unendurably on the horrors of the siege or the sufferings of the wounded. His picture is drawn in fine perspective, and in its true proportions. With the skill that only the great masters display, the atmosphere that steals upon us in his pages is the spiritual emanation arising from the whole conflicting environment of the changing temperamental attitude of masses of men, the healthy, the sick, and the wounded, kept waiting and working under the pressure of a long siege: his picture is an extraordinary vision of the innate forces of the human will of ordinary matter-of-fact men, of the tempering and tension of their human qualities under the strain of enforced but necessary heroism. The conflict between man's physical animalism and his bewildered soul, between his self-sacrifice and self-pity, his masculine pride and his fear of death, his native courage, tenderness for himself and indifference for others, his devotion to duty, and his wearied callousness—all is shown in a series of sketches so apparently simple that the artist's subtle selection of his types is lost sight of by us in the cumulative effect of the staggering whole. It is so simple in its details, "Sevastopol," yet it reveals all the immense complexity of life. Tolstoy was able to get all these effects, we repeat—effects which nearly all other writers on war did not in fact consciously realise, and so were unable to reproduce in their pages—by the extraordinary richness of his consciousness in the heat of the very circumstances that tend to confuse a man's perceptions. If his observation of life is not closer, or, indeed, so exquisitely subtle as the observation of certain other artists, his perceptions flow in a deeper, fuller stream than theirs, and embrace a greater area in human feeling than any modern writer's. His analysis of the different species of courage possessed by men—e.g. the brilliant bravery that springs from vanity, the courage of "wooden nerves," the courage that springs from ignorance, the frantic courage that is the violent reaction of fear, and his analysis of the breaking-point of these various species—as shown in his description of the conduct of his characters Kalúgin, Mikháylov, Pest, Volódya, &c.—is closer in its observation of human nature than any similar analysis in literature. All is so simple and all is so true.

We have ventured to direct the reader's attention specially to "Sevastopol," because the book is a remarkable example of Tolstoy's art, of his method of bringing home to us what life is—an artistic method that he developed later, but never surpassed, in the creation of his great novels, "War and Peace" and "Anna Karenin." In testing the work of every artist the first question we ask is does he enrich our consciousness of life, and, if so, in what direction does he enrich it? And examining Tolstoy's life-work, we are forced to conclude that he has extended our consciousness of life in mental planes into which his contemporaries have scarcely penetrated. Just as in his analysis of war he has put into clear and definite form certain confused perceptions which have been floating long in confused nebulous shape before the modern mind, so in his analysis of the hypnotic influence that social conventions exercise on the mind of the individual (see especially "The Death of Ivan Ilyitch" and "Resurrection") he has drawn the distinction with more clearness and force than any other great writer of our age between what society actually feels and what it thinks it is feeling. The whole difference between the propagation of false and true morality, and so the whole direction of our ideals in life, depends on our understanding of this distinction, which lies at the root of Tolstoy's piercing examination of the appearances of life. We have not space here to discuss the bearings of the vast question by which Tolstoy, as marking the advance in self-consciousness of the modern mind, has determined his place in European literature, but the subject may be recurred to with advantage later.

TIBET AND NEPAL

Painted and Described by A. Henry Savage Landor: (Black. 20s. net.)

As the reviewer of this odd, unsatisfactory and fascinating essay put by the book and reached for his pen, he found himself repeating the old Tuscan proverb: Inglese italiano è il diavolo incarnato. This strange, impressive little adventurer, who goes on a second expedition to Tibet in an "every-day" costume, comprising (a) a pair of hideous ankle-boots, (b) a straw hat and (c) a whangee cane, is certainly the devil incarnate.

Why did he do it? One remembers his return to civilisation from his first unfortunate excursion into the same regions; the horrible illustrations of his tortures in a daily paper; and the loud expressions of incredulity from scientific critics who lacked nothing wherewith to annihilate him but a knowledge of the country. It seems probable that what really moved him to make another attempt was the sarcasm heaped on his mountaineering records. How! An altitude of 20,000 and more feet taken by aneroids! protested the members of the Alpine Club. The heights of Himalaya scaled by a man without an alpenstock! Such sneers must have been hardly borne by our unorthodox mountaineer, who straightway resolved—one imagines—to do the whole thing over again, and take his records with the hypsometrical apparatus.

Let it be said at once that no doubts will be set at rest. The delicate question will still arise in some minds: Is Mr. Landor a Bruce or a Psalmanasar? In brief, is he speaking the truth or lying? The present writer can only say that, for his part, he believes his author to be sincere and correct, and one of the pluckiest, truest-hearted and most enterprising men in the world to boot. To this encomium might be added, one of the cleverest, too, for the drawings in colour and black-and-white display a very acute artistic sense and an exquisite perception of the beauty and grandeur of mountain scenery.

The book itself is no more than an essay, as we have already hinted. The journey into Tibet turns out to have been a very small affair; the course it took one can barely follow, but there was certainly no penetrating into the interior, and the reader is left wondering what mysterious reason the explorer had for departing so suddenly from the Forbidden Land. Nor does Nepal fare much better in the book, which resolves itself into a description of a short expedition among the peaks and glaciers about the Tinker River and Lumpa Mountain.

Nevertheless there are many interesting observations on Tibetans, Lhokas and Gurkhas, and an excellent, simple narrative of dangers and hardships encountered, the whole being very truthfully infused with a peculiar sense of repellent discomfort, arising from impressions of chilly, wind-swept heights and grassless tablelands where unwashed tribes roam in a state but little removed from the misery of the fireless days before Prometheus. This is the unromantic end to centuries of wondering! Now that we have drawn the veil from its penetralia we find Tibet, alas! to be not so much the Forbidden as the Forbidding Land.

A COMPANION TO GREEK STUDIES

Edited for the Syndics of the University Press, by Leonard Whibley. (Cambridge: University Press.) WHILE the position of Greek in a liberal education is declared to be doomed by correspondents to the daily press, the study of Greek life and thought has never been in a more flourishing state. New discoveries on Greek soil, whether of civilisations hitherto unknown, as in Crete, or at the centres of Greek life, as at Delphi or Athens; or merely of isolated works of art and of occasional inscriptions, have, during the last decades, caused many changes in our knowledge and have even stimulated popular interest in the work of scholars. The application of the comparative method to the interpretation of custom and myth has resulted in a complete revolution in our ideas of Greek religion, and in this direction also the renewed activity of scholars has awakened the interests of a widening circle. Even in literature and art—the more permanent and valuable relics of Greek civilisation—there are not a few signs that the world is with the scholars. The exhibition of Greek sculpture at the Burlington Fine Arts Club has been followed by the performance on the stage of a London theatre of Greek plays translated by an accomplished poet; and while photography has brought the masterpieces of Greek sculpture into thousands of English homes, the influence of Greek art has penetrated in an even more effective way through the works of the great painter which are hanging at this day on the walls of the Academy.

The University of Cambridge has seized this moment of general interest to call forth a work which aims at being a general encyclopædia of Greek life. Under the editorship of Mr. Leonard Whibley the great classical scholars of Cambridge have joined their forces, and their combined efforts have produced a "Companion to Greek Studies," which deals with every branch of Greek activity from the philosophy of the Greeks to their cookery, and with every circumstance of their daily life, from the physical features of their country to the materials of their books. Each subject is dealt with, after the modern fashion, by a separate writer, and so rich is the University and so capable the editorship, that there is no branch which has not been placed in the hands of an expert. Only in two cases is the aid of the sister University called in. War and Geography are treated by Professor Oman and Mr. Tozer, but for the rest the scholars of Cambridge suffice; and with Professor Jebb dealing with Greek Literature, Professor Gardner with Greek Religion, Professor Sandys with the History of Greek Scholarship and the editor with Greek Constitutions, the reader may be satisfied that he is in good hands.

But it is no easy task to compress the life of a nation into a single volume. Matters of great importance and the merest trifles must both be included in a work of reference which makes any claims to completeness; and, if space is to be considered, they are the more important and the best-known subjects which suffer. If Literature or Art, for instance, were given anything of the same detailed treatment that is accorded to Dress or to Medicine, they would require a volume to themselves almost as large as this whole book. As it is, we find that Æschylus occupies much the same space as the construction of a trireme; and while what is said of the latter is useful and not elsewhere easily accessible, the remarks upon the former are necessarily general and trite. The dates of, and facts known about, obscure authors and artists which correspond roughly to the minuter points of archæological or constitutional detail in regard to their place in our knowledge, must also, if space is needed, be omitted. But the disproportion of the parts is not the only fault of such a compilation. The dogmatic tone, which is a necessary evil of scanty treatment, implies an air of finality which it would be hard to substantiate. There are matters discussed on every page which scholars know to be doubtful; but, with the notable exception of Dr. Jackson and Professor Gardner, there are few contributors who confess that the views they adopt are combated. And yet if even so slight a change in the authorship were made as a transposition of some of the writers, if Dr. Verrall had written, for example, on the Greek Theatre, or Miss Harrison on Greek Sculpture, there would have been not a few statements equally authoritative but very different in character from those now found in the book. Indeed, as it is, discrepancies do not fail to make themselves felt, and the very revival of Greek study which has caused the book to be written has had an injurious effect upon its unity. In connection especially with the recent discoveries of the primitive civilisations does the treatment of different writers disagree. This is not the place to discuss the pious opinion of Professor Waldstein that the centre of the "Mycenæan" civilisation was Argolis, but it is noticeable that while in his account of the position of Greek women Mr. Cornish ignores the evidence of the honour in which they were held in "Minoan" days afforded by the plans of palaces and the remains of mural paintings, Lady Evans, in the very next article, devotes considerable space to the dress of women of that period as we know it from the discoveries of her distinguished son.

Apart from these defects, the book is too large and its subjects and contributors too many for any general criticism to be passed upon it. The larger articles are always lucid and decisive, and there are passages in some of them which are even masterly in their handling of difficult questions. Probably few who will use the book will realise the amount of reading that is required for the manufacture of a single sentence, how much evidence has to be weighed before a "not" is inserted or omitted. In other cases the question arises whether certain remarks or omissions are due to a failure to keep abreast of modern discoveries or to a conviction that these discoveries are mistaken or unimportant. But these are matters of detail which need not trouble the ordinary reader, and the smaller subjects are always full of useful information. These will alone satisfy the more advanced student and will protect the book from the charge of being a mere collection of material compiled for examination purposes. But even in them the lack of references is a serious drawback which is scarcely compensated for by the inclusion of several excellent maps and illustrations, though these will certainly render the book more attractive to the unprofessional student. To them the volume may be confidently recommended, for, if it is too dry to appeal to the imagination as a picture of Greek life, as a companion to the reading of Greek authors, a handbook for reference about Greek things, the book is convenient, well arranged and, in all essentials, trustworthy.

SOCIOLOGICAL PAPERS

Published for the Sociological Society, by Messrs. Macmillan. (10s. 6d.)

THE birth of the Sociological Society was heralded with welcome in THE ACADEMY when yet the plans were inchoate and of small promise. To-day we may acclaim these first-fruits of a Society which has removed a reproach too long and lightly borne by the serious folk of this land. The present volume, the first of its kind ever published here, contains not only papers embodying the new and most important conceptions of such Britons as Mr. Francis Galton and Professor Geddes, but includes an important paper by Dr. Westermarck, and a number of opinions on various topics which have been collected from many eminent Continental thinkers.

It would be absurd to attempt to write a review of a book which contains at least three sentences that might serve as texts for a volume, on topics almost new to literature. Mr. Francis Galton's conception of "Eugenics," for instance, can hardly be dismissed in a review-article, even by one who is fortunate enough to own that distinguished biologist as a friend. Here we will only say that Mr. Galton purposes to utilise the principle of natural selection discovered by his cousin, Charles Darwin, in such a manner as to ensure that the best of each generation shall contribute more than their share to the next: and this without any injury to marriage or that great force which, as everyone knows, "makes the world go round." Now that the University of London has accepted Mr. Galton's gift of £1,500, and has chosen the first Research Fellow in National Eugenics, we may shortly be able to discuss some new aspects of a question which, as the reader will remember, is at least as old as Plato.

In these columns it is more fitting to discuss, at any rate in the first place, the more academic questions involved in the concept of sociology: only thereafter should we consider concrete sociological propositions. As it happens, not the least valuable part of this volume, the publication of which so definitely marks an era in the recognition of scientific thought in this country, is concerned with this very question—What do we mean by sociology? Let us adopt neither the definition given it by the University of London, the first in this country to recognise the existence of this study, nor any of those given by the foreign philosophers who have contributed; but let us rather observe a few definitions which may be condemned as too narrow.

Sociology, as the present writer understands it, is the end and crown and, in the practical sense, the synthesis of all the sciences. It is more than the comparative study of social institutions. It deals with man as a social animal, and with all his products as such. Human history, well conceived, is a province of it, being none other than a continuous series of sociological experiments. Everything that affects the mutual relations of men is subject matter for sociology: the existence of magazines, for instance, is a sociological fact of great significance.

Like every science, this starts with an assumption—an assumption upon which all wise men act implicitly, but to which many will decline to give explicit expression. It is that man and his ways lie within the realm of law.

Where there is no law there can be no science; and if man and his ways be not subject to law, then, whilst they offer an inexhaustible theme for the poet, the dramatist, and, indeed, the artist in all his forms, they do not interest the man of science as such.

Now the conception of law in human doings is slowly coming into its own; but it will more rapidly conquer when it is instilled into our youth: and the writer is desirous of aiding this process. It is not proposed that this volume be given as a school prize, or that children be rudely assured that the idea of a vacillating and shortsighted but potent Providence is untenable. But we urge the Sociological Society to make war without quarter against the teaching of history as it is now understood. Our children spend many hours of their young lives in the study of history which is simply "past sociology." Imagination is barely equal to the task of conceiving the transmutation of the average newspaper "leader," say on a Sunday massacre, which would be wrought a quarter of a century hence, if a scientific (or, if you like, a philosophic) idea of history could now enter our schools. Such leading ideas, for instance, as the inalienable alliance between autocracy and militarism, between militarism and the degradation of women: such generalisations as Buckle's, that there is no instance in history of the unabused possession of unlimited power by any class—these are perfectly intelligible to any schoolboy: they are of the gravest importance; they are universally admitted to be true: yet which of us was taught them at school? and which of us would not have learnt his history better, and be a wiser man now, had he early guessed that the history of man's past is not, at bottom, a record of battles and matrimonial alliances between Royal persons whom the modern publicist would briefly record as integers in a column headed "illiterates"? The Sociological Society must destroy this notion of history: must make it impossible for any boy again to be able to say, as one can, that he spent hours in memorising a long series of headings and dates which began or ended with the year 1649, yet never read a chapter or heard a lesson on the history of the idea that kings reign by Divine right, still less was guided to that page whereon Carlyle asserts that kings, like other folk, have but "the Divine right to be kingly men."

We set out soberly to review a pioneer volume which would repay a month's perusal and the thought of half a lifetime: but we have been led to make a suggestion which we earnestly commend to the Society for its propaganda. In all reforms we are told we must begin with the children: the teaching of history offers an easy means for so doing in the present need, which is the inculcation of the Scientific Idea into all thinking upon human affairs.

Some Comparisons in Poets

THE three great poets who lived into the late Victorian era show very few affinities in the general trend of their work and life. In this respect they are curiously different from the men who preceded them in the poetic world. Coleridge and Wordsworth, however separated in methods of poetry, shared much of each other's thought and aspirations, and linked with them were Southey and Lamb. They all stood together looking out on life. Individuality and genius made each leave an impress that seemed entirely unrelated, but they were the children of one family. Life rested on certain sure foundations; in conduct sifted and tried by the ages; in a religion hardly orthodox, yet in its main features piously accepted; republican yet conservative, and only lightly touched by our later fever of doubts and misgivings. They were brothers, and in shorter poems, where the higher genius of each in its particularised revelation was less obvious, there may be traced an identity of impression and ideal. Take their two contemporaries, Shelley and Keats, and a spiritual union is again apparent. Though neither influenced the other, their minds are wonderfully alike, sensitive and morbid, but while Keats's passionate worship of beauty is as intense as Shelley's, he adds to it that common sense which he denounced. Shelley's visions were already floating away while his hands grasped them, and there was no trace in Keats of Shelley's proselytising enthusiasm on behalf of moral excellence. Byron and Burns could be cited if further example were necessary of that contagious brotherhood of genius and spirit which seemed to pass away with the death of those earlier singers. Tennyson is the embodiment of the solitary, self-sufficing artist. Coleridge leant on Wordsworth, Wordsworth leant on Coleridge; both took the judgment and amendments, as did Southey, of Charles Lamb. Tennyson, indifferent as one of his own gods watching the petty race of men, dreamt his poetry, carved out his art, struggled with the thoughts that the age provoked, and melted them into his poetry, alone. Shakespeare we can imagine laughingly accepting the corrections of some of the choice spirits at the Mermaid on the emendation of some fellow-actor, but it is difficult to conceive of Tennyson relying in the management of his art on any of his contemporaries. He never felt the lack of those brotherly literary men at the Lakes. It is probable that as only poets are supposed to have the greatest devotion to Spenser, so the sincerest and most painstaking of literary artists, who have been ground themselves under the heel of a wily and heartrending perfection, will always be the truest appreciators of the art of art in Tennyson. Browning next, moralist, preacher, poet, presents the contrast to Tennyson's artistic conscience. They were both students, both poets, but Tennyson was given at birth that mystic solitary self which Browning probably never felt move in him. Tennyson partook of the retiring character of Spenser; Browning, on the other hand, has an affinity to the more boisterous and workaday spirits of the Renaissance. He found that the world and its ways have a certain worth; and a healthy equable temperament deprived him of any glamour of poetic mystery. His strenuous and wild originality expressed itself in his work, but the artist is continually succumbing to the "hail fellow well met" atmosphere of the colloquial world he loved. It is probable that the exalted and remote quality of Tennyson's workmanship was the result of his severance from the market-place in every sense of the term. Holding himself apart, regarding himself highly, he had never exchanged one piece of his gold for a million of those pleasant social coins, which, however bartered, always take the edge off the clear fineness of the cherished ideals. Browning's work betrays no lineage and it will have no descendants, for it was less the outcome of carefully conceived art than the complete expression of an unmatched personality. The distinction does not lie in the greatness of the poetry, but in the isolation of his methods. They were the outcome surely of some strange family inheritance. Richard Jefferies does not belong to the elect of literature in one sense, but he possessed what none could imitate. Those who would imitate a Browning or Jefferies only succeed as far as those who, deprived of a sense, have it conveyed to them by mechanical means—as in the speech the dumb learn. We come now to the third of our poets, Matthew Arnold, who, with eyes "estranged and sad," watched the procession of life. He is like one in his favourite Alpine valleys, lured upwards to the cold untrodden peaks and thin air. He, almost more than the other two, stands forth from his kind, consciously detached, and with a fixed purpose to break the chains of habit and sloth which bound so many minds of his England. His face looks out from the canvas, melancholy, kind, almost hopeless. There is no poetry, no prose, which has reflected more accurately the strange features of modern thought and pessimism. Either the purity and sternness of the art or a certain serene physical quality in the man has preserved it from the morbid or hallucinating airs that wander over the page of modern poetry. Alone and fighting his way, he is yet visited by some gentle and pacifying spirit. The purpose is not clear; no sun has ever yet dispelled all the clouds, but when a little comes the warrior must keep the reflection on his earnestly burnished shield and thrust it into the fight. Toiling and living equally with men, Arnold's poetry shows always the painful winding path the spirit goes.

"In mazes of heat and sound
For rest his soul was yearning,
And now peace laps him round."

Short Notices

A LIFE OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE.

By W. J. Rolfe. (Duckworth, 10s. 6d. net.)

WHEN the vicissitudes of manuscripts are written as an additional chapter to the "Curiosities of Literature," the story of this Life will be told; how, when completed, it mysteriously disappeared and its writer was "compelled to undertake the depressing task of rewriting it"—compelled, we suppose, because it was needed as an accompaniment to the New Century Shakespeare with which it was first issued; but for its publication now as a separate volume we can discover no adequate reason. Of lives of Shakespeare we have more than a sufficiency, and the only excuses adequate for an addition to their number would be either new facts or new and reasonable views, neither of which does Dr. Rolfe supply. This heavy volume of over five hundred pages is a laboured compilation: old views and new views are quoted at length and sometimes criticised, but nothing is given us here which has not been better presented elsewhere. The known facts of Shakespeare's life might be written down on "a half-sheet of note-paper," or might, with useful illustrations, be extended to a reasonable volume; but Dr. Rolfe persistently follows the old and bad habit of eking out a few facts with a vast deal of theorising. Such statements as these are typical: "John Shakespeare, like his fellows in the town council, appears to have been a lover of the drama"; and of William, "Whatever he may have learned at the Stratford school, we may be quite certain that it was all the regular schooling he ever had." Is there any good evidence for either of these flat statements? They may be true, they may not. Nor in actual matters of fact is Dr. Rolfe as accurate as he should be.

On many points we should like to break a lance with our author, but will be content to select one, in which—although in good company—he errs, as we hold. It is customary—and Dr. Rolfe seldom departs from custom—to credit to Shakespeare's Stratford days almost all his wonderful love and knowledge of nature and her ways. Had he been born and bred a Londoner, being possessed of such extraordinary assimilative powers, he would probably have written as intimately as he has done of flowers and fields, of birds and beasts. It sounds almost silly to note the fact, but it is usually forgotten that the London of his day was what we should now call a country town. From almost any point within the city walls a walk of a quarter of an hour would then have brought one out on to the country-side. Gerard, the herbalist, is proof sufficient that London town was then a very happy home even for a botanist! We do not wish here to argue this point at length, but it is worth while noting, for it is of the same class, though not so hurtful, as the endeavours to prove that because of his apparently first-hand knowledge Shakespeare was "tinker, tailor, soldier, sailor" and so on. Shakespeare and his brother dramatists were keen, open-eyed men, who knew life and enjoyed it to the full, and he does not stand above them in his knowledge of country and town life, or of this trade or that profession.

To return to Dr. Rolfe's book, we must register a protest against the multiplication of lives of Shakespeare. If Mr. Sidney Lee would cut down his admirable work by leaving out his theorising on the Sonnets and some other matters, we should have a Life which would stand and suffice until new facts be forthcoming. But for such books as Dr. Rolfe's there is no room on our already overcrowded shelves. To whom they make appeal we cannot imagine; to the expert they are simply irritating; to the inexpert not only confusing, but apt to be disheartening. This may seem a hard saying, but it is high time that protest be made by lovers of Shakespeare against the master's works being made the prey of theorymongers. Scholarly attempts to elucidate the text of the plays or to discover new facts regarding the playwright or his times we all encourage and applaud—beyond that the rest might well be silence for many a year to come. But when we are given such a work as this, where the vaporous theories of critics are gathered together and quoted at length, the result is appalling.

THE WOMAN STEALERS

By J. H. Knight-Adkin. (Isbister, 3s. 6d.)
THESE stories have at least the attraction of the unusual and the unknown; they are the outcome of gleanings of prehistoric times, a lively imagination and a power of entering completely into the spirit of the life described. The scenes, strange and foreign as they are to the novel-reader's mind, are so consistent, so isolated, as it were, from modern influence or suggestion, that they appear natural and possible pictures of life among the "Lake-dwellers" and Earth-dwellers. They are far from being dainty tales; they deal with violence, feuds and war of man and beast, but they have a distinct interest of their own, because and almost in spite of themselves. To come across one of them occasionally in a magazine would be a piquant change from the conventional story: to read half a dozen in succession is to experience a surfeit of struggle and bloodshed.

RED HUNTERS AND THE ANIMAL PEOPLE

By Charles A. Eastman (Ohiyesa). (Harper, 6s.)
THE author says, "The scene of the stories is laid in the great North-West, the ancient home of the Dakota or Sioux nation, my people, and they are based upon the common experiences and observations of the Red hunters—even those incidents which are unusual, and might appear incredible to the white man, are actually current among the Sioux and deemed worthy of belief." The result is, one of the most original and delightful books about animal life that have appeared for a long time, full of interest and information not to be found in textbooks. Few sketches of the kind could be more charming than that of Wechah, the racoon, and his young Indian mistress, or more interesting than "The River People," or, again, "The Mustering of the Herds"; but it is difficult to make a choice where all have distinct claims to recognition. Each in its turn will be appreciated by lovers of animals, and to young people will prove a mine of information and amusement. The book is simply and pleasantly written, with no affectation or mannerism; but the frequent use of the word "dove" for dived strikes oddly upon English ears, though the author has Longfellow's sanction for it in "Dove as if he were a beaver."

Fiction

THE APPLE OF EDEN

By E. Temple Thurston. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.) This is the story of a great temptation, of a man's struggle with it and of his ultimate victory. The man is an Irish Catholic priest, and his struggle is to keep the vow of celibacy he made without understanding what it means. He has grown to adolescence first in a remote farmhouse and then in a seminary, and when he is a man in years he knows as little of the world as a child. The book opens with a scene in the village confessional. The priest hears a young man's story of seduction, and he counsels the penitent either to marry the girl or never to see her again. It is on Father Michael's agitation, as the young man speaks of the girl's beauty, that the reader's attention is fixed, for the priest is a student waking suddenly in fear and trembling to the facts of life. Mr. Thurston writes of these facts with a plainness that will give offence to some: to those who think a novel should not deal with questions of sex because it necessarily reaches minds unfit for such discussions; and also to those Catholics who will shrink from the picture of a priest disloyal to his vows. Yet "The Apple of Eden" leaves a stronger impression of spiritual charm than of physical coarseness, and the author succeeds—as the author of that great novel "Ekkehardt" succeeded—in invoking your sympathy with the priest, both in his struggle with temptation and in his horror-stricken repentance. If you are a Protestant you may read a novel that makes a great to-do about a monk and feel at the end of it that any woman might have married him as cheerfully as if he had been a solicitor. But then the author has failed in the main purpose of his story, which was to rouse in all his readers some understanding of the tremendous issues involved for the man concerned, some sympathy with the commotion raised in his soul, some belief beyond all differences of creed in the binding force on mankind of solemn vows. Mr. Thurston has not failed, and this is due partly to his fine portrait of the erring priest, but also to his companion portrait of Father Connolly, the curate's superior and friend, and the most delightful character in the story. His breezy, kindly common-sense appreciates the younger man's subtler nature, forgives him his sins and helps him to save himself at the end. The two priests are the book. The other characters are subsidiary. For a long time even Roona, the girl with whom Father Michael falls so passionately in love, only comes in like a shadow. Why did Mr. Thurston blot her past with an unconvincing story of seduction? She is the girl of whom the young man spoke in the first chapter. After a long delay she becomes his unwilling wife, and soon after her marriage she is ready to leave her husband for a priest of her Church. It is Father Michael who ordains that he and she shall part. But in the scenes where she meets and learns to love him she never for a moment behaves like a girl with a questionable history, and we do not believe that she had one. We should like to know who took her to the theatre and walked with her in Regent Street. If it was her future husband, it is odd that Father Michael, who recognises his former penitent in a later chapter, did not recognise him then. The pictures of Irish country life are drawn with knowledge and are interesting. But the triumph of the book is Father Connelly.

THE SYSTEM

By Percy White. (Methuen, 6s.) The novel is deeply interesting and—as Mr. White's work invariably is—excessively clever. It tells of the struggle of an idealist, Carey Butler, to free himself from the trammels of his worldly surroundings and achieve the development of his own personality. "If civilisation had been founded on perfectly rational principles Carey would have felt more at home in it. To this goal of Pure Reason he imagined human society was moving: his chief mistake was a desire to help it there a little too fast." He has different schemes for the reformation of the world, in all of which he apparently fails. At first he joins with a radical reformer named Rugg; then he edits a newspaper to reform the Press and is put in prison, after a Hyde Park demonstration; lastly, he starts a school on the basis of rational thought, the system from which the book obtains its name. But Carey Butler is not convincing: he does not live as do the other characters. We hear about him, we obtain glimpses of him, of which none is more vivid than when we see him pedalling on his bicycle against a high wind, and the conflict is pointed out as typical: "The wind was always against the dear fellow, and always must be, however nearly he might tie up the weathercock." But we do not get the man himself as entirely as we should like. And for this there seem two reasons. Mr. White does not appear to write of him with sufficient gusto; and it is almost impossible to write dispassionately of an enthusiast without making him merely a crank. Secondly, Butler's methods of reforming the world do not seem to be those which would be employed in the present day, when there is outlet for unregulated enthusiasm and an idealist is no longer an ineffectual solecism. The modern spirit breathes through the book, but the hero's difficulties and aims are not modern; and so we lose sympathy with him. Indeed, the incident of the radical reformer Rugg, who is nearly ducked in the horse trough by the Bonfire Boys, seems to belong to the middle of last century; yet, soon after, we read of electric broughams and steam yachts. This lack of conviction in Carey Butler is accentuated by the striking excellence of the minor characters, especially Morrison, the favourite pupil, and Needham, the pushing young journalist, whom it is not possible to praise too highly. The novel should be read because it stimulates, and stimulating novels are rare.

AN ACT IN A BACKWATER

By E. F. Benson. (Heinemann, 6s.) No one knows how to strike the note of gentle flippancy more dexterously than Mr. Benson; and the opening chapters of the book led us to expect what is sometimes called "a treat" of this kind. The aristocratic Avesham family move into the cathedral town of Wroxton, causing an amusing flutter. Jack Collingwood, the Canon's artistic son, arrives at the right moment "to see a finished picture—just a girl standing on the bridge, keeping off a wet puppy with her parasol." The girl, of course, is Jeannie Avesham. He paints and sends the picture to the Wroxton Art Exhibition; from this gossip arises, which is in the end justified by the marriage of Jack and Jeannie. All this has the makings of a capital light comedy, which no one could have done better than Mr. Benson. But for some obscure reason he has seen fit to introduce episodes entirely out of all harmony that ruin his effect. They give the impression of heartlessness and, what is worse, are bad art. The typhoid plague may perhaps be pardoned on the ground that it brings out the nobility of Jeannie, though it is a somewhat brutal expedient and slightly tedious in spite of the clever thunderstorm and the relief that comes with the rain. But nothing can justify the cancer episode. There are two maiden ladies, quite delightful, wrapped up in each other and their little interests. One writes poems, the other plays the guitar. Just as the plague is over and the wedding bells are about to ring, one of these old ladies develops cancer and dies, leaving her sister alone in the world; and the fact that the happy bride stops in the aisle of the gaily thronged cathedral to kiss the cheek of the figure in black cannot justify the intrusion of this realism. The only effect of it is to crumble the pretty fabric of the book to dust, and show the absurdity of its prettiness. We hope it may be an early work, slightly touched and rewritten in parts. It is certainly a very disappointing piece of work coming from the pen of Mr. Benson.

Books Received

Art

Moore, T. Sturge, Albert Durer. Duckworth, 7/6 net. (Mr. Sturge Moore's volume professes to be an appreciation of Durer in relation to general ideas, not the result of new research. It forms part of the series which has already included Sir Charles Holroyd's "Michael Angelo," Lord Balcarras' "Donatello," and M. Dimier's "French Painting in the Sixteenth Century.")
The Year's Art, 1905. Hutchinson, 3/6 net.

Biography

Rolfe, William J., A Life of William Shakespeare. Duckworth, 10/6 net. (See Review, page 104.)

Classics

Gompertz, Theodor, Greek Thinkers: a History of Ancient Philosophy, Vols. II. and III. Translated by G. G. Berry. Murray, 14/0 net each vol.

Drama

Jones, Henry Arthur, The Manœuvres of Jane. Macmillan, 2/6.
Æschylus, The Prometheus Bound. Edited, with introduction, translation, and notes, by Janet Case (The Temple Dramatists). Dent, 1/0 net. (Greek and English on opposite pages. The translation is in prose.)

Educational

Blackie's Junior School Milton. Paradise Lost, Book VI. Edited, with introduction, notes, and appendices, by Albert E. Roberts. Blackie, 1/0.
Blackie's Little German Classics. Goethe's Die Geschwister. Edited by Ludwig Hirsch. Müllernbach's Die Silberdistel. Edited by A. Meyer. Blackie, 0/6 net each.
Blackie's Little French Classics. Beaumarchais' Le Barbier de Seville. Edited by W. G. Hartog. Blackie, 0/8.
Blackie's English School Texts. Tales from the Decameron, Lamb's School-Days, and other Essays. Macaulay's First Chapter. Blackie, 0/8 each.
The English Counties. Birmingham and the Midlands. Blackie, 0/8.
Æneid of Virgil, Book III. Edited by A. Sidgwick. Cambridge Series for Schools and Training Colleges. Cambridge University Press, 1/6.
Thierry, Augustin, Les Normands en Angleterre et en France. Edited by A. H. Smith. Oxford Modern French Series. Clarendon Press, 2/6.
David, Jules, Le Serment. Edited by Cécile Hugon. Oxford Modern French Series. Clarendon Press, 1/6.
Blackledge, the Rev. G. R., Luganda-English and English-Luganda Vocabulary. S.P.C.K., 2/0. (A vocabulary of the language spoken in Uganda, by a C.M.S. missionary.)

Engineering

Maxwell, William H., Assoc.M.Inst.C.E., National Engineering and Trade Lectures. Vol. I.: British Progress in Municipal Engineering. Constable, 6/0 net. (1. General road engineering. 2. Main drainage, Sewage disposal, Destructors. 3. Water supply, Conclusion.)

Fiction

The complete works of Leo Tolstoy. Vol. I.: Childhood, Boyhood, and Youth—The Incursion. Vol. II.: A Landed Proprietor—The Cossacks—Sevastopol. Translated from the Russian and edited by Leo Wiener. Dent, 3/6 net. (The first instalment of a new translation of Tolstoy by the assistant professor of Slavic languages at Harvard University. See Review, page 100.)
Taylor, M. Inlay, The Rebellion of the Princess. Isbister, 6/0. (A romance of a French nobleman in Russia in the period of Louis XIV.)
Whiting, Mary Bradford, The Torch Bearers. Dent, 6/0. (A story of love and politics in modern Italy.)
Cunningham Graham, R. B., Progress and other Sketches. Duckworth, 6/0. (Sketches and studies of Spanish-America, North Africa, and other parts of the world, with a characteristic preface on prefaces.)
Rennison, Rennie, George's Georgina. Simpkin, Marshall, 6/0. (A story that would be amusing if the author had known where to stay his hand.)
Everett-Green, Evelyn, The Secret of Wold Hall. Hutchinson, 6/0. (Marcus Drummond, who has married Lady Marcia Drefresne, is unjustly suspected of a murder. After a mine explosion and some other exciting incidents the mystery is cleared up.)
McCheesney, Dora Greenwell, Yesterday's To-morrow. Dent, 6/0. (A stirring romance of the Restoration.)
Porter, Gene Stratton, Freckles. Murray, 6/0. (A charming story of a waif and stray, who is left alone in charge of a lumber camp, and is ultimately discovered to be of noble birth. Decorations by E. Stetson Crawford.)
Parrish, Randall, My Lady of the North. Putnam, 6/0 net. (A romance of a Confederate officer and a Federal lady in the American Civil War.)
Oxenham, John, The Gate of the Desert. Methuen, 6/0. (A long but powerful story of self-sacrifice. The scenes are laid in the Canaries, on the edge of the Sahara, and in Mashonaland. Mr. Lewis Cohen, the Jew, "of Tadlet and Kimberley," is a well-conceived and interesting character.)
Russell, W. Clark, His Island Princess. Methuen, 6/0. (Another rattling story in Mr. Clark Russell's well-known manner. Castaways on a South Pacific island, wrecks, and adventures, with a tragic and pathetic ending.)
Isam, Frederic S., The Strollers. Ward, Lock, 6/0. (A company of strolling players in America, one of whom is "Madame Carew," a former favourite at Drury Lane. American in origin.)
Knight-Adkin, J. H., The Woman Stealers: Tales of the House of the Otter. Isbister, 3/6. (See Review, page 105.)

History and Archaeology

Chadwick, H. Munro, Studies on Anglo-Saxon Institutions. Cambridge University Press, 8/0 net.

- Johns, O. H. W., Babylonian and Assyrian Laws, Contracts, and Letters. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 12/0. (A volume of the "Library of Ancient Inscriptions." Sources and Bibliography—Laws and Contracts—Babylonian and Assyrian Letters—Appendix.)
- Ranke, Leopold von, History of the Reformation in Germany. Translated by Sarah Austin. Edited by Robert A. Johnson. Routledge, 5/0. (Many of the notes are given both in German and English. Miss Austin is known as the translator of Ranke's "History of the Popes.")

Literary

- Fitsmaurice-Kelly, James, Cervantes in England. Frowde, 1/0. (The lecture delivered before the British Academy in commemoration of the tercentenary of "Don Quixote.")
- Farmer, S., and Henley, W. E., Dictionary of Slang and Colloquial English. Abridged from the seven-volume work entitled "Slang and its Analogues." Routledge & Son, 7/6 net.
- Burroughs, John, Far and Near. Constable, 5/0 net. (Another volume of the delightful outdoor papers of this accomplished American writer.)
- McSpaddon, J. Walker, Synopses of Dickens's Novels. Chapman & Hall, 2/6 net. (A useful little book, giving lists of characters, short synopses of the plots, and brief bibliographical notes.)

Military

- Cassell's History of the Russo-Japanese War, Part 19. Cassell, 0/6 net.

Music

- Ashton Jonson, G. C., A Handbook of Chopin's Works. Heinemann, 6/0 net. (A very useful kind of handbook or "Musical Baedeker" to Chopin's works.)
- Lunn, Charles, The Voice: its Downfall, its Training, and its Use; a manual for teachers, singers, and students. Reynolds & Co., 3/6.

Poetry

- Herford, Oliver, The Rubaiyat of a Persian Kitten. Bickers, 3/6 net. (A sometimes amusing parody of the best known of Omar's quatrains. Illustrated by the author.)

Political

- Brown, Arthur Judson, New Forces in Old China. Fleming H. Revell, 5/0 net. (The stupendous changes produced in China by western trade, politics, and religion.)
- Joubert, Carl, The Truth about the Tsar and the Present State of Russia. Eveleigh Nash, 7/6 net. (By the author of "Russia as it really is." Plainspoken, personal, and rather sensational accounts of the Government, the army, the real cause of the war, &c.)

Reprints and New Editions

- Cassell's History of England. Empire Edition. Part I. Cassell, 0/6 net. (A new edition to be issued in weekly parts. Copiously illustrated; Rembrandt photogravure plates after pictures by well-known artists; with maps and additional coloured plates.)
- Letters of John Ruskin to Charles Eliot Norton. Two vols. Third impression. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co., $4 net each volume.
- Smiles, Samuel, Lives of the Engineers: Metcalf—Telford. Murray, 3/6.
- Reade, Charles, The Wandering Heir; Collins, Wilkie, The Frozen Deep, and other tales. Popular Edition. Chatto & Windus, 1/0 net cloth, 1/6 net leather.
- Balsac, H. de, Contes Choisis, with preface by Paul Bourget. "Les Classiques Français." Edited by Daniel S. O'Connor. Dent, cloth 1/6 net, limp lambskin 2/6 net. (See page 97.)
- Trotter, Captain Lionel, The Life of John Nicholson. Murray, 2/6 net. (The ninth (popular) edition of Captain Trotter's book which was published in 1897.)
- The Works of Ralph Waldo Emerson. Vol. IV.: Miscellaneous Pieces. Bell, The York Library, cloth 2/0, leather 3/0 net.
- Bridges, T., Punctuation Simplified, second edition. T. Bridges, 37 MacLise Road, West Kensington, 0/6 net.
- Rawstorne, Lawrence, Esq., Gamonia, or the Art of Preserving Game. Methuen, 3/6 net. (One of Messrs. Methuen's "Illustrated Pocket Library of Plain and Coloured Books." Founded on Ackermann's edition of 1837, with fifteen coloured drawings, "taken on the spot" by J. T. Rawlins.)

Science

- Soouller, J., Darwinian Fallacies. Simpkin, Marshall, 3/6 net.

Sociology

- Henderson, Charles Richmond, and others, Modern Methods of Charity. Macmillan, 15/0 net. (An examination of systems of relief, public and private, in the principal countries of Europe and in America. With a bibliography.)

Travel and Topography

- Sladen, Douglas, Sicily, the New Winter Resort. An Encyclopædia of Sicily. Methuen, 5/0 net. (A less jaunty and more informative work than Mr. Sladen's books on Japan. Includes a key to the Sicilian dialect, and a table of railways and coaches. Fully illustrated.)

Catalogues

- West Ham Public Libraries: Passmore Edwards Branch, Plaistow. Catalogue of books in the Juvenile Library. Compiled by Alfred Cotgrave, F.R.Hist.S., Borough Librarian. Caines, Broadway, Plaistow. (An admirable compilation, classified and annotated.) Myers & Co., 59 High Holborn, W.C. B. H. Blackwell, 50 and 51 Broad Street, Oxford.

Science

The Cosmos in Category

"ALL facts belong to science, and are her portion for ever"; let us then take the Cosmos, or the Sum of All that Is, and reduce it, if we may, to its ultimate components, so that we may know with what orders of facts science must deal. But before making such a category as is compatible with the knowledge of to-day, let us contemplate a very simple one which appeared valid to many some thirty years ago.

The dogma of theoretical materialism (which we must not compare with practical materialism or mammon-worship) was not the least clear of creeds outworn. According to it, the spectator of all time and all existence had to deal with an aggregation of moving atoms. These atoms were very small, indivisible, hard or impenetrable bodies, of some seventy-five elemental varieties, each atom being a unit of matter. Now the atoms were in constant movement, and the movement was so important that we might conveniently sum all things as consisting of Matter and Motion. Certain facts, however, indicated the existence of a subtler stuff, believed to be omnipresent, which was called the ether. Some said that this was atomic, some that it was continuous and homogeneous; some thought it imponderable, others ponderable; but at any rate it could only be thought of as a subtler form of matter. There was also—by the way—a certain curious manifestation, hardly to be called an entity, but perhaps worth mentioning, which was known as mind. When certain atoms, arranged in an exceptionally complex fashion, and moving in a peculiar way, were observed, it was noticed that their clashing produced a sort of disturbance, somewhat different from those of sound and heat, which we could call consciousness or mind. This was only a bye-product or epi-phenomenon—to use the term applied to it by a former distinguished contributor to this journal, Professor Huxley: and as a bye-product it could hardly enter into an ultimate category of the All.

That creed was good enough for some in the seventies, and doubtless contents a few to-day, though I have never met one. We need waste no space in criticising it here, save to remark upon the amazing ingratitude—shall we say?—which degraded Mind, the percipient of all else, matter, ether, and motion, to the level of a bye-product. For if mind, the only thing of which we have immediate knowledge, be a bye-product, then surely that which we know thereby—atoms, ether, and motion—is merely a bye-product of a bye-product—and what becomes of Reality?

Now radium and radio-activity have proved what the wise knew without their aid, that the hard atoms, "the foundation-stones of the material universe, which have existed since the creation, unbroken and unworn"—are as much a figment of the imagination as the palace of Kubla Khan, or any other product of an opium-dream. We may regard as proven the modern electrical theory of matter, which has shown that even the root-characters of mass and inertia, which we attribute to matter, are properties of electrical energy. Nor will any trained intelligence now dispute the proposition of Spencer (him the unscrupulous call materialist) that, if it were necessary to describe the All in terms of matter alone, or of mind alone, one's only chance of success would lie in the latter alternative.

Let us, then, make a Category of the Cosmos as we now understand it—not, however, using the word "now" as if to suggest that at last we have reached finality. Our category must include four entities which, at the first glance, we can observe. These are Matter, the Ether, the many obvious forms of Energy, such as light, electricity, heat and Mind. Modern theory, as I have shown, entirely disposes of the first, that matter which was once thought to be the only reality worth mentioning. There is more to be said of this view, which upsets all our notions of every-day things, and which describes the attributes of a chair or a mountain in terms of electricity: but here we will simply accept it. This reduces us to a category of three—energy, the ether, and mind: but obviously we cannot rest here. The human intellect has an irresistible tendency to unify. All thinking people are convinced of the truth of some form of Monism. Monotheism is evidently an ancient expression of this tendency: a tendency which every day's new light further justifies. At present theory seems to suggest that this ether, originally "invented" to account for the phenomena of light, and called the "luminiferous ether," is really the prima materia of the ancients, the Urstoff of the Germans, the protyle of Sir William Crookes: and all forms of energy may be referred to movements—vibratory and other—of the ether. Let us then provisionally reduce our Category of the Cosmos to a dualism; the ether and its energy on the one hand, and Mind on the other.

Such a dualism, as a final statement, will satisfy nobody: indeed has satisfied nobody, for the problem is old though the terms and the details are new. The reader is familiar with the two extremes which thought has taken in time past: and they are the same to-day. The idealists maintain that Mind is the only reality, and that the ether and its energy exist only in mind: as Berkeley would say, their esse is percipi. The opposite school say that mind must be a product of the ethereal energies, though they do not tell us how the law of the Conservation of Energy can be proved to hold in regard to the production of the Eroica symphony or the "Divina Commedia." The third school finds it impossible to explain not-mind in terms of mind, or mind in terms of not-mind, and regards both as manifestations of one Reality. This is the Spinoza-Spencer school. Time is not yet when men shall cease to discuss that Reality's Ineffable Name. For myself, I hold it literally Ineffable.

C. W. SALEEBY.

Drama : The Comic Idea

"Great Friends" at the Stage Society; "Mrs. Dering's Divorce" at Terry's.

IT has more than once happened, in the last year or two, that a play, originally produced by the Stage Society, has subsequently found its way on to the boards of what its admirers call the regular, and its critics the commercial theatre. Such events are, no doubt, occasions of legitimate triumph to an organisation which aims, I take it, not merely at providing caviare for a coterie, but at influencing and even, if the word is not too big, reforming the wider life of the national drama outside its own doors. It is perhaps a trifle less satisfactory when one's first instinct after seeing a play of the Stage Society's is to ask why on earth it should not have been left for the regular or commercial theatre to produce; and this also, I am afraid, has happened more than once in the last year or two. To my mind it very notably happened this week with Mr. Street's "Great Friends." One can understand that even the members of the Stage Society may have felt some reaction towards the conventional after the grim tragedy with which their season opened. But, if you are going to be pioneers, you must expect to be called upon to dig; and "Great Friends" is certainly not the kind of treasure-trove which lies so far beneath the surface as to be imperceptible to the divining-rod of the ordinary manager. May I explain that I went to the Court much prejudiced in the author's favour? Russell Bantock, in "The Trials of the Bantocks," has always seemed to me one of the minor immortals of contemporary fiction, and the merciless analysis and sane moral judgment of Mr. Street's longer book, "The Wise and the Wayward," seemed to point to precisely the qualities needed by your comic dramatist. The greater was my disappointment. Sydney Baldwin, M.P. (Mr. Dawson Milward), is a young man with a future. He is engaged to Grace Pontemarx (Miss Dorothy Grimston), a girl of character rather than brilliance, who will make him an excellent wife. He proceeds, however, to imperil their joint chances of happiness by philandering, by becoming "great friends" with Lucy Lady Raffin (Miss Gertrude Kingston), a lady whose social talents and perhaps her complexion all her female acquaintances appear to regard as amounting to a certificate of immorality. Baldwin succeeds in falling over a cat upon Lady Raffin's doorstep and breaking his leg. He is laid up for a month in the Raffin house in Pont Street, and subsequently goes down to convalesce at the Raffin place in Hampshire. Between you and me, there is nothing very much for society to make a fuss about in all this. Lady Raffin is lonely, and quite frankly endeavours to persuade Baldwin to break off his engagement with Grace. But there is no reason to suppose that he will do so or that the permitted limits of friendship are passed. Grace's mother, however, who detests Lady Raffin, thinks otherwise, and proceeds to write distinctly unpleasant letters both to Baldwin himself and to Lady Raffin's husband. A sufficiently awkward situation is produced, and is only put an end to by Grace herself, who takes her fate into her own hands and sails down to Hampshire to recover her errant lover. The triteness of the finale rather leaves you gasping, and I think it will be recognised that throughout the play there is nothing which can be regarded as of an "experimental" nature. So far as you are amused, you owe it entirely to Miss Gertrude Kingston, who is inimitable in her adroit management of a fatuous husband. But Miss Gertrude Kingston has been amusing us all in this sort of way for a long time, without any help from the Stage Society. Mr. Street's dialogue, again, is neatly turned, although perhaps it is even a little too discreet, too much afraid of being epigrammatic, to be quite as effective on the stage as it is in print. But neatly turned dialogue, although I do not know that it is any great help to a play in the commercial theatre, is after all not an absolute disqualification there.

The fact is, that Miss Gertrude Kingston and an English style are not by themselves sufficient to make a comedy. You want also—and I own I am surprised that Mr. Street should not have discovered it—you want also a comic idea. Indeed, it is the presence of the comic idea which differentiates true comedy from the various other forms of entertainment that often masquerade in its colours. Farcical comedy may enmesh you in an extravagant web of ridiculous situations. Sentimental comedy may beguile you through misunderstanding after misunderstanding to a roseate close. But it is the function of true comedy to isolate from the tangle of life some fantastic tendency of society as a whole, or some absurd or stupid element in the relations of one individual to others in that society, and to lay it bare for the satisfaction of the satirical, humorous, ironic or cynical perceptions which make up the complex of the comic sense. With the best will in the world I cannot see what there is in "Great Friends" to satisfy any one of the comic perceptions. Comedy Mr. Street might have attained without any change in the structure of his play. Imagine Sydney Baldwin between the bad woman and the good girl, the object of the affections and the consequent intrigues of both of them, and himself all the time complacently set upon the achievement of his own career, without any capacity whatever for sentiment; and at once you get exactly the kind of relations with which comedy can deal set up. The actual Sydney Baldwin is a singularly colourless person. If he had any emotions in the course of the play, I, for one, failed to discover them. Perhaps this was partly Mr. Dawson Milward's fault. But whatever Baldwin is, he is not comic. No! I am afraid it must be admitted that, for once, Mr. Street has rather unexpectedly failed to see life with the comic vision; and this just at the critical moment when he was writing a comedy. And so I must leave him, and stomach my disappointment as best I can.

Oddly enough, although Mr. Percy Fendall's "Mrs. Dering's Divorce" is in most respects a vastly inferior play to "Great Friends," it does happen to have precisely that comic idea which the other so singularly lacks. There is an irony in the relation of the husband and wife who seek a collusive divorce because they cannot agree, and, immediately it is declared, begin to find that life is intolerable without each other. Owing, however, to the perversity of things, a comic idea is no more able than any of the other ingredients of comedy to compose a dish by itself. "Mrs. Dering's Divorce" comes to nothing, partly because Mr. Fendall's dialogue lacks distinction and his incident lacks research, but more especially because, when the gods gave Mrs. Langtry a beautiful voice and other good things, they quite unaccountably failed to give her a sense of humour. Now obviously without a sense of humour you cannot be a comédienne.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art

A Craftsman's Ideals

THE visitor to the Watts Exhibition at Burlington House last Monday afternoon may have noticed, a few minutes before four o'clock, a trickle of his fellow-creatures filing off into the dark passage to the right of the grand staircase. If he possessed a ticket admitting him to the winter lectures of the Royal Academy he would brave that dark passage, and would probably lose his way, as I did, in the subterranean corridors and studios that compose the Royal Academy schools. Statues of nymphs, huge plaster heads and reliefs would lean out to him from the gloom; he would stumble up and down stairs, cross a drawbridge, seeing ghostly figures of girls and youths in paint-stained blouses flit past him. Perhaps when he knocked against a torso of Hercules and apologised, thinking in the gloom that it was a burly member of the Royal Academy, he would recall Manet's fine saying that light is the principal person in a picture, and contrast these twilight, statue-lined corridors with the light-drenched, airy hall where the Beaux-Arts students in Paris work from the antique.

I came safely through these adventures and emerged, not without astonishment, from a narrow staircase into one of the Royal Academy exhibition rooms, the walls bare as a newly ploughed field. I followed a group of students through a door, pausing while they signed their names, into the Lecture Room where, at the summer exhibitions, the sculpture is exposed.

When Mr. George Clausen was appointed Professor of Painting, and Mr. Alfred Gilbert Professor of Sculpture, the Royal Academy lectures became significant and popular, not only among those whose profession of faith is art for art's sake, but also with those who believe with that Spanish poet, Ramón de Campoamor, dead so early, that the best artist is the best translator of the works of God. No wonder the students, and those of the public who care seriously about art, crowded to the Clausen and Gilbert lectures. Both men have been touched by the divine fire; both have held the sealing sacred; both are still students ever searching, ever experimenting; both have given great achievements to the world; and both, without the slightest flicker of oratory or the remotest facility for rhetorical periods, have the gift of halting self-expression with that intuitive sincerity which moves mountains and—audiences.

Mr. Clausen's lectures are finished for the season. Mr. Gilbert began his course last Monday, and the only member of the Royal Academy present besides the Keeper of the Schools, Mr. Crofts, was Mr. Clausen. While we waited for their entrance I reflected on the work and on the life of Mr. Alfred Gilbert.

His Work? I affirm, and many will agree with me, that he is the greatest craftsman in plastic beauty that this country has produced. You must not judge him by the Piccadilly fountain, in the creation of which he was hampered and harassed by the local authorities. It stands there shorn of its attributes like a polled willow, from which its natural water has been diverted. Judge him by his masterpiece on which he has lavished mind, heart and fortune—that magnificent memorial to the Duke of Clarence at Windsor; by the working models for this outstanding work of the Victoria era (you will find them reproduced in "The Art Journal" Easter annual for 1903), the models for "The Virgin," "Edward the Confessor," "St. Michael," "St. George" and "St. Elizabeth of Hungary"; by his colossal and triumphant statue of Queen Victoria at Winchester, and the épergne he made for her; by his Fawcett memorial in Westminster Abbey; by his "Icarus" and "Comedy and Tragedy"; by his chains of office; by a dozen smaller things, seals and such-like—he has done solely for the love of doing them.

His Life? We may disapprove of, we may loathe the fusing before the public eye of a man's work with his life; but in this rough-and-tumble world the life of a public man does become public property. It is no secret that Mr. Gilbert's sturdy frame has received persistent attention from the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune. It is not my concern to inquire into the justice of it, or how far he invited the imps of misfortune. Well, Mr. Henry James in a charming essay once explained how those who are sad or distressed or out of joint with the world; those who wish to possess their souls in patience, to work and dream, and take on the mystery of things—drift to Venice. There are other old, unambitious towns—kind and dying—whither the sorrowful drift. Bruges is one of them. To Bruges Mr. Gilbert has gone, and if ever the Bruges folk peep through the doors of his vast studios they must gape at the signs of such activity.

The Lecture? Only a man who had suffered could have given such an address! It was a plea for Idealism; for the growth of the soul inspiring the work of the

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS

OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti,
Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from FREDK. HOLLYER, 8 Pembroke Square, London, W. Illustrated Catalogue 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

hands; for Idealism, the mother of Taste; for humanism in art. Sleeping, waking, the students must hug their ideal; they must "do as I say, not as I do." Not all our eyes were dry when he said that. There was praise, too—veneration, rather—for Watts, for Flaxman and Alfred Stevens. "No man should dare" (this with emotion) "to enter uncovered a room containing a work by Alfred Stevens." At this, I think, the little Stevens lions that used to stand outside the railings of the British Museum, making a walk down Museum Street a pleasure, would clap their paws.

And, after the lecture, I descended the stairs into the labyrinth of dim passages, uplifted by the words of this great craftsman—words whose message is that behind the efforts of the sculptor there should be always something of love, veneration and faith. It was five o'clock. There was still an hour before the Watts Exhibition closed. I was in the mood to see for the fourth time the collected work of this other great Idealist of the nineteenth century. I think I only looked at nine pictures—"Miss Edith Villiers," the little Hayricks landscape, "Joachim," "Prayer," "For He had Great Possessions," "The Dove that Returned Not," "The Dove that Returned in the Evening," "Death Crowning Innocence" and "The Rider on the White Horse."

Then, perhaps because I was becoming too transcendently-minded, I encountered Mr. Brock's huge "Model of the Design for the National Memorial to Queen Victoria." In vain I searched for the love, veneration and faith that should be behind every work of sculpture.

"It will stand," I reflected, "in front of Buckingham Palace; but at any rate it is better than the series of monuments that the German Emperor is erecting, at short intervals, to his ancestors in the Thiergarten of Berlin—dreadful sight! They begin with Albert the Bear; they continue to the present day, and they make the Siegesallee a nightmare."

C. L. H.

Romance, Old Style and New

At the sign of The Green Sheaf, in Knightsbridge, Miss Tadema has lately published "Four Plays." Two of them, "The Unseen Helmsman" and "The Merciful Soul," were printed for the first time some years ago, and, either in London or in Christiania and Antwerp, were afterwards put upon the stage. The other two, which more particularly engage attention, have not been given to the press till now.

What may be Miss Tadema's place in the estimation of the reading public we have no immediate means of judging; but, from remembrance of the reception of her first contributions to imaginative literature, we should say that her gifts made on most minds a strong, but yet uncertain, impression. If so, this is a case in which, we fancy, the general reader and the more critical are pretty much agreed, the difference between them being such as Lawrence Alma-Tadema has no reason to regret. Close attention to her merits takes nothing from their emphasis; and if the feeling described as uncertainty remains, it diminishes as we seek for an explanation of it. It would disappear altogether, or at any rate assume a different character, were this conjecture verified: that, whether from idiosyncrasy (her own) or whether from a calculated preference of free growth to all but the most necessary systematic training, she has shared the history of things that find their own way to such perfection as they are capable of. Preference of this sort is not very uncommon, and minds there are of a reflective order which, however assiduously taught, ward off intrusion as by another kind of maidenly instinct, and only expand in a domain chosen for themselves by themselves. The result, whenever it challenges observation as in a tale or a poem, generally reveals the same drawback with the same advantage: the advantage, a certain wild strength, freshness, freedom; the drawback, unexpected crudities or what may be called innocences, and an occasional absence of the veil where truth should not stare through too thin an atmosphere.

In "New Wrecks upon Old Shoals" an original idea (so far as we are able to bethink ourselves) has been treated with great ingenuity and success. Here in two scenes we have two dramatic sketches—one of Long ago and one of To-day, representing precisely the same love-lorn situation with only that difference: the one is of to-day and the other of long ago. The drama proceeds in the same old house and in the same old room of it—quite unchanged in the second scene except for the "restless medley" of cushions and curtains and photographs and curios which are the proper adornments of my lady's room in these times. The dramatis personæ are two in both scenes; they bear the same names, Aubrey and Ursula; they are in the same relation to each other at heart; and it adds to the force of the double presentation that the two young people are in no strange crisis of distress but about the most common in the whole range of the romance of love. In both scenes the Aubrey of the tale returns from a long absence abroad, and unexpectedly appears at the old house, which is the abode of the lady's father. It is glowing with light and in high revel of music and dancing, for to-morrow the Lady Ursula is to be married—to riches and great estate, but not by any means for love. In the scene of long ago Aubrey contrives a message to his Ursula; will see her, and see her alone; will take no denial; not that she quite unwillingly steals away and goes to him in the dimly-lit little chamber where he waits already. And there, too, he will take no denial. Has come to carry her off, congratulating her no less than himself on having arrived just in time. The contract signed? The rings exchanged, the vows vowed, her father's honour and her brother's future at stake upon the marriage? What of all that? What, then, becomes of her truth to herself and to him? "Do you love me, Ursula?" "Yes. There is no joy but your presence, no pain but the want of you." "All's said, then," he insists. She does not know the real meaning of what else she has been saying. And so, Come!—by the window here. . . . The rest is as if we were reading some wild old ballad. Approaching voices—of the father, of the bridegroom and a dying Ursula, who blesses the wound through which her infidelity departs.

That is the long ago. The scene to-day we are entirely at home in. The modern Aubrey returns to the modern Lady Ursula in precisely the same circumstances, sends his message, and, breaking from the music and the dance, Lady Ursula answers it as readily. But as for what follows, this is the way of it: "Why, Aubrey! you! Where do you spring from?" (They shake hands). "A gentleman to see me on important business—and then only you!" (Both laugh.) "Only me! I like that! A nice thing to say to a man you haven't seen for seven months!" "As long as that? The others will be awfully glad to see you. We are giving a sort of tenants' ball, you know, in honour of—to-morrow." "Yes, of course, to-morrow. Suppose we stay here a bit. Sit down, there's a nice girl, and talk to me a little first." "Well, just a second," and so the conversation runs on. She reminds him that he has not congratulated her. He answers that the moment he heard of her engagement he wrote, and sent her a bushel of orange-blossoms. He did write! He swears he did!—"a perfectly twee letter." And he has brought her a bracelet which she declares is quite wickedly beautiful. And still the interchange of "chaff" goes on till presently they stray off into the subject of marrying for love, when it appears that he knew a man—"but he's dead now"—who was awfully gone upon a girl, and she cared a good deal about him. Oh, yes, she did!—the man knew. No, he didn't marry her. He hadn't any money. Neither had she. "So he just said nothing but stood out of the way; and in the course of time she made a thundering fine match. Ursula exclaims that she does not think much of Aubrey's story, nor much of his friend. Aubrey insists that the man did his duty. "Did he?" cries Ursula, "and what did the girl think?" That seems to make Aubrey uncomfortable. "You do agree with me, don't you, Ursula, that he did the right thing?" "No!" "He did, though. She made a rattling smart match!"

We can go no further with a scene which in itself is admirably done—as faithful a transcript of the speech, mood and manners of the time in a wide circle of society as we have ever yet encountered, and with many good touches that we have given no idea of; for this Aubrey and this Ursula have hearts in their bosoms, too, and are human in spite of appearances. But beyond that there is the interest of a telling contrast, well carried out and well worth thinking of.

FREDERICK GREENWOOD.

Monthly Prize Competition

REGULATIONS.

WE shall give, until further notice, a monthly prize, value £1 1s., for the best criticism of a specified book. The prize will take the form of a £1 1s. subscription to Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son's Circulating Library. In the case of any prize-winner living too far from the nearest branch of this library, or for any other good reason not desiring to subscribe to it, the subscription will be transferred to another library, to be chosen by the prize-winner. If already a subscriber to a library, the guinea will run from end of present subscription or be added to it at once. The prize-winner will be sent an order on the library selected, a cheque for £1 1s. being forwarded with proper notification to the proprietors. The winning criticism will be printed, with the writer's name, in the ACADEMY AND LITERATURE. Style and independence of view will be chiefly taken into account in awarding the prize. We need not remind competitors that they are not called upon to buy the selected books, but can obtain them from a library.

RULES.

1. The criticism must not exceed eight hundred words or be less than five hundred.
2. All communications must be addressed to "The Competition Editor, THE ACADEMY, 5 Southampton Street, Strand, London, W.C."
3. The Editor's judgment in awarding the prize must be considered final.
4. The MS. must be clearly written by hand, or typewritten, on one side only of the paper.
5. No competitor can win the prize more than once in three months. In case a previous prize-winner sends in the best criticism, his (or her) paper will be printed, the prize going, however, to the next best sent in by a non-prize-winner.
6. The competition coupon must be filled in and sent with the MS. (See page 3 of Cover.)

SUBJECT FOR FOURTH COMPETITION

VIVIAN GREY. By Lord Beaconsfield.

Competitors' MSS. must reach the office not later than February 13.

Correspondence

Replies

SIR,—This week I have somehow failed to overtake my ACADEMY correspondence in secret, and must ask the favour of an inch of space from you.

My thanks to Mr. Dawbarn, of Enfield, for his observation that it is a wise religion which appeals to the emotions primarily, since they, as I have asserted, are the mainspring of volition.

Mr. Coddington, of Nantwich, and another correspondent have my thanks for commenting on my remark that our universe may be moving through space as a whole. This, as they suggest must be, is on the assumption, supported by Professor Simon Newcomb, that our universe is a finite disc, bounded by the Milky Way. We could learn of its motion only by meeting other universes in the course of ages. The two senses of the word "universe" are confusing.

Mr. Bindon, of Bristol, asks some great questions, most of which I have tried to answer in past articles. The origin of the sun's heat may rudely be described as due to the friction engendered by the unceasing gravitational contraction of his mass.

My thanks to other correspondents who demand no present answer.—Yours, &c. C. W. SALEEBY.

The Nature of Reality

SIR,—Dr. Saleeby seems to be amazed that Professor Haeckel should regard "modern science as acquainted with the nature of reality." But wherefore? Science is ordered knowledge—the classification of sense-impressions—and what, I ask, have five-sense beings to do with any other "knowledge" or "reality"? The very notion that beneath the phenomenal lies something which is "real"—the noumenal—is, after all, nothing but a projection—an illicit projection—of our sense-derived notion of reality into the metaphysical region of "things-in-themselves." In other words, because we believe in the reality of our sense-impressions per se, we imagine there must be a transcendent reality which produces them. Take a biscuit. It has shape, colour, hardness, taste—sense-impressions. Eat it, and no longer can you see and taste it. Then you must have eaten the "thing-in-itself," else why does not that weird object still produce sense-impressions? Can you eat the properties off a biscuit and leave the "noumenon" on your plate? Futile idealism, whose true name is "unrealism."

The sense-impressions are real enough for us; they are ultimate facts, and it were waste of time to discuss the notion of a phantasmagoria behind them. The "noumenon" is an unreal construction from the "phenomenon," just as a unicorn is an unreal construction from the horse.—Yours, &c.

J. B. WALLIS.

SIR,—The ever-growing circle of readers which Dr. Saleeby's contributions to your columns are securing will, I think, find the one in the current number not the least interesting among them. It is surprising how few even among the baby-adoring mothers, to say nothing of proud fathers, know what to expect from them, and how to account for their apparently queer ways.

The astonishing grip of the tiny hand—by which the newborn babe may actually be lifted—is, among many other like facts, full of hints which it concerns us all to take. And the connection of the absence of "earlids" to be closed like eyelids, with the helplessness of human infancy, is at least an hypothesis of value. One thing which rather militates against such connection, however, is the extent to which really deep—that is, normal—sleep can resist not only shocks of sound, but even some shaking. In truth, most of us enjoy but the thin sleep of the semi-invalid.

I cannot, however, here enter into this wider question; but many of us, to whom the central facts of life and experience are of pressing and practical interest, cannot but thank Dr. Saleeby for the vivid and lucid way in which he presents them.—Yours, &c. V. WELBY.

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 5 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper, which must bear the sender's full name and address, not necessarily for publication. The Editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archaeology, Folk-lore, Art, Music and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published.

Questions must not be such as can be answered from the ordinary works of reference.

COMPETITION.

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5/- each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to "Academy" Questions and Answers.

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The names and addresses of prize-winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk. Each prize will consist of 5/- worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5/-. No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

One of the four weekly prizes will be awarded, whenever possible, to a Shakespearean Question or Answer.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" carries disqualification.

NOTE.

WORMWOOD (ARTEMISIA ABSINTHIUM).—This quality of bitterness is the chief attraction in those objectionable tonics called absinthe and vermouth, as intensified by the addition of alcohol in the form of spirits or wine. Our great authority, Professor Skeat, tells us that the origin of the word "wormwood" is unknown, and utterly repudiates any possible connection with that intestinal parasite called "worms." Historically we have the primitive German werimuota (W.W.S.), wormuota (Kluge), modern wer-muth. The humble but pernicious (in this form) worm is waurnis in Gothic, Latin vermis; the suffix looks like an expulsion, from "out" you go! Dealt with medically "wormwood" was used as a prophylactic, thus defined: "It derives its name from its use in destroying worms in children;" again, "a species of artemisia . . . is reputed to be anthelmintic," from the Greek anti (against) helmins (a worm); perhaps "worm-out" is too definite for a mere speculation, guessing goes such a long way with etymologists.—A. HALL.

Questions.

SHAKESPEARE.

* HOLD OR CUT BOWSTRINGS.—The last lines of "Midsummer Night's Dream," Act I., are:

Quince. At the Duke's oak we meet.
Bottom. Enough! Hold or cut bowstrings.

It is obvious that the above words mean "in any event," but can any one explain the origin of the expression or how it comes to have that meaning? So far as my researches go, the commentators make nothing of it. "Hold or break bowstrings" would present no difficulty, but "cut" indicates a deliberate act of the bowman.—H.C.

LITERATURE.

* BRAVE PRINCE WILLIAM.—In Goldsmith's "Description of an Author's Bedchamber" there occurs the line—

"And brave Prince William shows his lampblack face."

To whom is the reference, and why "lampblack"? Is this expression peculiar to Goldsmith?—E.J.D. (Ealing).

* THE THIEVING EAGLE.—In Isaac Walton's "Life of Richard Hooker" there is a letter from Archbishop Whitgift to Queen Elizabeth, wherein reference is made to "the eagle that stole a coal from the altar and thereby set her nest on fire, which consumed both her young eagles and herself that stole it." What is the origin of this story?—John Feurer, jun. (Upper Clapton).

* "EOTHEM."—In "Eothem" Kinglake quotes:

Soothe him with her finer fancies,
Touch him with her lighter thought.

He tells us this is by Tennyson. It must have been written prior to 1845, but I have been unable to find it in any of the earlier poems. Can any reader identify it?—D. Davies (Winchester).

* AUTHOR AND PUBLISHER WANTED of a volume of Euclid in which the preface is devoted to a prayer for guidance of those using the book.—Tramp (Charing Cross).

* AUTHOR WANTED.

As like as a hand to another hand.

Whoever said that foolish thing, &c.

The above passage occurs in Browning's "James Lee's Wife." Is there any record of such a saying, and where did the poet find it?—Madge S. Smith (Bolton).

Wer die Schönheit angeschaut mit Augen

Ist dem Tode schon anheimgegeben,

Wird für keinen Dienst auf Erde taten,

Und doch wird er vor dem Tode beben,

Wer die Schönheit angeschaut mit Augen.

Can any one identify this quotation?—F.S.B. (Cambridge).

The following lines were given me as a parallel passage some years ago. I should like to know the source. I am quoting from memory:

Nemo me lacrimis nec funera letu

Faxit our nolito dum vivo per ora virum.

Cormes (Truro).

Sic Vita.

Like to the falling of a starre.

Or as the flights of eagles are;

Or like the fresh spring's gawdy hue,

Or silver drops of morning dew, &c.

The poem thus beginning is attributed both to Francis Beaumont and to Bishop Henry King, of Chichester. To whom does it really belong, and how did the confusion in authorship arise?—E. J. Ludlow (Edinburgh).

GENERAL.

* SAVE THE MARK.—What is the origin and explanation of the expression "Save the mark"?—Immerito (Teddington).

* NONCONFORMIST CONSCIENCE.—Who was the coiner of this much-used phrase? It occurs in Oscar Wilde's play "Lady Windermere's Fan." Was he responsible for it?—F.C.B. (Brookley).

* DAME MARY MAY.—In Hare's "Sussex" it says: "In Mid-Lavant Church, St. Nicholas, is a tomb with an effigy, erected during the lifetime of Dame Mary May, 1681." Who was Dame Mary May, and what was she celebrated for?—Charles H. M. Pennycook (Brighton).

* PROPER NAME PRONUNCIATION.—Is there any book published to serve as a guide to the pronunciation of proper names occurring in English literature? One hears such varied pronunciations at different times as to be in doubt which is correct. A few examples are Jacques, Blougram, Catriona, Guinevere, Hugues.—F.W.T. (Dudley).

* FRENCH LAWYERS.—Can any one give me a short account of the position of the bench and bar in France at the present day? In reading Balzac, Hugo and other French novelists one gets the idea that law students fresh from college are at once promoted to the position of minor judges in the provinces, or of the Irish (paid) R.M.'s. A Frenchman whom I have consulted tells me that young judges are allowed to sit only as assessors of their elders, and that the Shallows in the provinces are, as with us, unpaid members of the bourgeoisie. I think Mr. Bryce says somewhere that on the Continent promotion is from the Bench to the Bar.—R.O.F.

* RICHARD III.—I have read that Richard III.'s body after the Battle of Bosworth was buried in a stone coffin. This is said to have been used as a horse-trough of an inn. Is this historically true? If so, where was (or is) the inn, and where is his body interred?—Lawrence Keogh.

Answers.

SHAKESPEARE.

* "THE LADY OF THE STRACHY."—Many suggestions have been made to explain this passage. Stevens thought "the lady of the starohy" laundry was meant; but it is more likely to allude to some popular tale or ballad in which a lady of high degree married beneath her. The title of Strachy was applied to governors of certain Italian towns; and Italian tales were in great favour in Shakespeare's day; many of his plays are, of course, based on them. "Stratigo" might quite easily come through "strategas," "stratagy," "stratgy," etc., to Malvolio's "Strachy"; and on the whole this seems the most likely solution. Collier also suggests "the lady of the Strozzi"; and Thrace (Trachy, Strachy), or Atrakhian (A-Strachy or the Strachy) also offer possibilities.—B.C.H.

* SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS.—Your correspondent's question on the subject of poems addressed to men in the strain which characterises the Sonnets elicited references to Michelangelo and Barnfield. Reference may usefully be made to Eclogue I. in the "Piscatory Eclogues" of Phineas Fletcher. In this eclogue, Thelgon (i.e. the poet's father, Giles Fletcher, LL.D., Cantab. Treasurer of St. Paul's in 1597) speaks of the youth Amyntas. The following lines may be quoted by way of illustration:

Yet once he said (which I, then fool, believ'd)

"When I forget true Thelgon's love to me,
The love which ne'er my certain hope deceiv'd;
The wavering sea shall stand, and rocks remove;"
He said, and I believ'd; so credulous is love.

Sure either this thou didst but mocking say,
Or else the rock and sea had heard my plaining;
But thou, ah me! art only constant in disdain.

Phineas Fletcher, who was born in 1584, became incumbent of Hilgay, in Norfolk, in 1621. In 1633, the forty-ninth year of the poet's age and the twelfth year of his incumbency, the "Piscatory Eclogues" were published, with the prefatory statement that they were "raw products" of the poet's "very unripe years and almost childhood." If this statement be accurate the Eclogues were written before the publication of the Sonnets.—George Newall.

LITERATURE.

* THE RELAXED BOW.—It is from Horace, no doubt, that our English authors, Roger Ascham, Bacon, &c., have derived the comparison of a relaxed bow with mental recreation:

Neque semper arcum
Tendit Apollo.—Odes ii. 10.

R. Bruce Boswell (Chingford).

* NATURE SIMILES.—An example of the use of a manufactured article to supply a figure for Nature is found in Shakespeare, "Henry V., i. ii. 194:

Others, like soldiers, armed in their stings,
Make boot upon the summer's velvet buds.

Gray uses the same figure in "The Progress of Poesy," l. 27:

O'er Idalia's velvet green
The rosy-crowned Loves are seen
On Cytherea's day.

Johnson's criticism on this passage is as follows: "... Idalia's velvet green has something of cant. An epithet or metaphor drawn from Nature ennobles Art: an epithet or metaphor drawn from Art degrades Nature." ("Lives of the Poets": Gray). This dictum certainly applies to the following from Butler's "Hudibras," where, of course, the degradation is intentional:

And, like a lobster boiled, the morn
From black to red began to turn.—W.M. (Aberdeen).

GENERAL.

* NOT ROOM TO SWING A CAT!—This saying arose from the sport of swinging a cat to a branch of a tree, as a mark to be shot at. Shakespeare refers to another variety of the sport: the cat, being enclosed in a leathern bottle, was suspended to a tree to be shot at. "Hang me in a bottle like a cat" ("Much Ado about Nothing," i. i.).—K.S. (Bristol).

* "GUBBINS."—This appellation was given derisively and to imply contempt, as it originates from the word "gubbings"—the offal of fish.—M. Maclean Dobrée.

* ORDER REGIONS AT WARSAW.—Further replies received from Hilda Wood: Percy Selver; and L.L. (Lincoln).

* PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain, on application at the following booksellers, Five Shillings' worth of books. Notices have been dispatched to the several winners and to the following booksellers:

Messrs. Harrison & Sons, 59 Pall Mall, S.W.

Mr. E. Duckworth, 41 Bridge Street, Bolton.

Mr. C. Young, 11 The Parade, St. James's Street, Walthamstow.

Mr. J. G. Bissett, 85 Broad Street, Aberdeen, N.B.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIUMS

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.
THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN
AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current
Literature, and without doubt the best
Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.
Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON ST., HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS

The Morning Newspaper for Aberdeen

AND THE
Northern Half of Scotland.

Reviews of books appear on Mondays and
Thursdays, and on other days as required.

Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.

NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.

LONDON OFFICE: 149 FLEET STREET, E.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most interesting Paper

THE DAILY CHRONICLE

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes.
Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art,
and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art specially dealt with.
Fulllest Reports of All Current Events and Special
Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by O. K. S.
appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR
PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

Applications for above spaces should be made to Messrs. Crossley & Co., 57a Coleman Street, London, E.C. Special Rates for
a Series will be quoted.

Under the General Editorship of Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON.

"FISHING."

Now Ready. In Two Volumes. Price 25s. net. 12s. 6d. net per Volume.

THESE New Volumes (on "Fishing") of the "Country Life" Library of Sport are offered to the public in the full confidence that nothing so complete of their kind have yet been published. The names of the experts whom the editor has been fortunate enough to enlist in his service are a guarantee in themselves of the treatment of the various subjects. The illustrations are very numerous. There are over two hundred and fifty full-page illustrations from photographs, in addition to the reproduction of a very large number of famous old prints, and especial notice may be claimed for the finely coloured and finely reproduced representations of Salmon and Trout Flies.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME I.

The Salmon Family (Salmonidae): Classification and Distribution. By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
Salmon: Their Food and Feeding. By Dr. J. Kingston Barton.
The Natural and Artificial Reproduction of Salmon and Trout. By J. B. Fielding, F.L.S., F.Z.S., &c.
Salmon Flies. By John James Hardy.
Salmon Fishing: Hooks and Knots. By John James Hardy.
On the Make and Choice of Salmon Rods, Reels, &c. By John James Hardy.
Casting the Salmon Fly. By John James Hardy.
The Spey Throw. From Notes by Lord Walter Gordon-Lennox.
Salmon Fishing: Playing the Fish. By John James Hardy.
Spinning, Prawnning, &c., for Salmon. By John James Hardy.
The Making of Salmon Passes. By the Editor.
Norwegian Angling. By Captain C. E. Radclyffe.
Salmon Fishing in the Estuaries. By J. W. Willis Bund.
The Trout (Salmo Trutta): Classification. By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
The Breeding of Trout. From Notes by Mr. E. V. Corrie, of the Itchen River Trout-Breeding Establishment, Chiland, near Winchester.
How to Make a Trout Stream. By E. Valentine Corrie.
Fishing with the Floating Fly: Definition. By Frederic M. Halford.
Fishing with the Floating Fly: Patterns of Flies. By Frederic M. Halford.
Fishing with the Floating Fly: The Rod and Tackle. By Frederic M. Halford.
Fishing with the Floating Fly: Throwing the Fly. By Frederic M. Halford.
Fishing with the Floating Fly: Fishing the Fly. By Frederic M. Halford.
Fishing with the Floating Fly: Killing the Fish. By Frederic M. Halford.
A Typical Day on the Test. By Martin Smith.
Fishing with the Wet Fly. By the Editor.
Angling for Sea Trout. By the Hon. A. E. Gathorne Hardy.
Some Recollections of Sea Trout Fishing. By the Hon. A. E. Gathorne Hardy.
The Charr (Salmo alpinus) and Allies. By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S.
Angling for Charr (Salmo alpinus). By R. B. Marston.
The Grayling and Whitefish. By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
Angling for Grayling. By R. B. Marston.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME II.

The Tarpoons and the Gar-Fish. By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S.
Tarpon and other Big Fishes of Florida. By J. Turner-Turner.
The Mahseer and the Bala: Natural History and Classification. By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
Mahseer Fishing. By Hercules Ross.
Fishing-Rods and Tackle for Mahseer. By John James Hardy.
The Pike (Esox). By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
Fishing for Pike: The Quarry. By A. Jardine.
Fishing for Pike: History and Habits. By A. Jardine.
Fishing for Pike: Fables and Records. By A. Jardine.
Fishing for Pike: Rods and Tackle. By A. Jardine.
Fishing for Pike: "Spinning," "Live-Baiting," and "Paternostering." By A. Jardine.
The Perches (Percide). By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
Perch: "Paternoster" and "Float-Fishing." By A. Jardine.
The Carp Family (Cyprinidae). By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
Angling for Carp. By R. B. Marston.
Angling for Barbel. By R. B. Marston.
Angling for Roach and Rudd. By R. B. Marston.
Angling for Chub and Dace. By R. B. Marston.
Angling for Tench. By R. B. Marston.
Angling for Bream. By R. B. Marston.
The Eels (Anguillidae). By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
Angling for Eels, &c. By R. B. Marston.
Eel Trapping. By J. W. Willis Bund.
British Sea Fish. By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
Sea Fishing: Introductory. By F. G. Adalo.
Sea Fishing from Boats: Mackerel Fishing. By F. G. Adalo.
Sea Fishing from Boats: Pollack Fishing. By F. G. Adalo.
Sea Fishing from Boats: Whiting and other Fish. By F. G. Adalo.
Sea Fishing from Boats: Bass Fishing. By F. G. Adalo.
Sea Fishing from Boats: General Remarks. By F. G. Adalo.
Sea Fishing from Fixed Positions. By F. G. Adalo.
Sea Fishing from Fixed Positions: Fishing from Rocks. By F. G. Adalo.
Sea Fishing from Fixed Positions: Fishing from Sandy Shores. By F. G. Adalo.
Sea Fishing from Fixed Positions: Fishing from Piers and Harbours. By F. G. Adalo.
Some Notes on Baits. By F. G. Adalo.
Fishery Laws. By J. W. Willis Bund.

Published by GEO. NEWNES & CO., LIMITED, Southampton Street, Strand, London, W.C.

TWENTY REASONS

Why we should

. . . BUY . . .

THE TATLER.

I. Its Paper.

II. Its Printing.

III. Its Short Story.

IV. Its Society.

V. Its Sport.

VI. Its Theatre.

VII. Its Bran Pie.

VIII. Its Mixed Bag.

IX. Its Acrostics.

X. Its Humorous Pages.

XI. Its Chestnut Tree.

XII. Its Kodak Competition.

XIII. Its Pretty Girl Competition.

XIV. Its Pretty Children Competition.

XV. Its Who and Why Competition.

XVI. Its Musical Pages.

XVII. Its Golf Article.

XVIII. Its Motor Article.

XIX. Its Furniture Article.

XX. Because it is a Bright
Smart Paper, seen by Bright and Smart
People.

THE BOOK MARKET

Booksellers' Reports of the Best Selling Books

England

BATH:

Mr. John D. Baillie,
Grand Pump Room Library

General Literature

1. Golden Treasury. Palgrave. (Macmillan.)
2. Pocket Ruskin. (Allen.)

Fiction

1. The Secret Woman. Phillpotts. (Methuen.)
2. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)

Messrs. B. & J. F. Meehan,
32 Gay Street

General Literature

1. Sheridan, a Biography. Rae.
2. Famous Houses of Bath and District. (Meehan.)

Fiction

1. Gorky's (Maxim) Novels. (Unwin.)
2. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)

Mr. S. W. Simms,
The Bath and County Library

General Literature

1. The Other Side of the Lantern. Treves. (Cassell.)
2. Truth about the Ozar. Joubert. (Nash.)

Fiction

1. The Secret Woman. Phillpotts. (Methuen.)
2. An Act in a Backwater. Benson. (Heinemann.)

BIRMINGHAM:

Messrs. Cornish Brothers, Ltd.,
37 New Street

General Literature

1. Literary Portraits. Whibley. (Constable.)
2. Quintin Hogg. E. M. Hogg. (Constable.)

Fiction

1. The Sea Wolf. London. (Heinemann.)
2. The Secret Woman. Phillpotts. (Methuen.)

Mr. Achilles Taylor,
198 Corporation Street

General Literature

1. The Gospels in Art. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. Quiet Talks on Prayer. Gordon. (Revell.)

Fiction

1. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)
2. The Abbess of Vlaye. Weyman. (Longmans.)

BOURNEMOUTH:

Mr. A. E. Fulker, Boscombe Library

General Literature

1. Russia: the Land of the Great White Ozar. (Phillips.)
2. Japan: the Eastern Wonderland. (Cassell.)

Fiction

1. The Secret Woman. Phillpotts. (Methuen.)
2. Night of Reckoning. Barrett. (Long.)

BRIGHTON:

Mr. W. Junor,
72 Queen's Road

General Literature

1. Art Library. (Newnes.)
2. Don Quixote, various editions.

Fiction

1. John Chilcote, M.P. Thurston. (Blackwood.)
2. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)

BRISTOL:

Messrs. James Fawn & Son,
42 Queen's Road

General Literature

1. The Other Side of the Lantern. Treves. (Cassell.)
2. Memoirs of Burne-Jones. (Macmillan.)

Fiction

1. The Secret Woman. Phillpotts. (Methuen.)
2. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)

Messrs. William George's Sons,
The Book Store,
Top Corner, Park Street

General Literature

1. Cambridge Modern History. (Camb. Univ. Press.)
2. Psalms. Prothero. (Murray.)

Fiction

1. The Farm of the Dagger. Phillpotts. (Newnes.)
2. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)

CAMBRIDGE:

Messrs. Galloway & Porter,
30 Sidney Street

General Literature

1. A Companion to Greek Studies. (Camb. Univ. Press.)
2. Rubens and Van Dyck. (Gowans & Gray.)
3. Golden Treasury. Palgrave. (Macmillan.)

Mr. Elijah Johnson,
30 Trinity Street

General Literature

1. A Companion to Greek Studies. (Camb. Univ. Press.)

Fiction

1. The Secret Woman. Phillpotts. (Methuen.)

CANTERBURY:

Mr. W. E. Goulden,
St. Paul's

General Literature

1. Canterbury Pilgrimages. Ward. (Black.)
2. Memorials of Canterbury. Stanley. (Murray.)

Fiction

1. Madame Bovary. (Gibbings.)
2. Gate of the Desert. Oxenham. (Methuen.)

CHELTEMHAM:

Messrs. J. J. Banks & Son,
"Imperial Library"

General Literature

1. Christian Character. Illingworth. (Macmillan.)
2. Jane Austin's Works.

Fiction

1. An Act in a Backwater. Benson. (Heinemann.)
2. The Secret Woman. Phillpotts. (Methuen.)

DOVER:

Messrs. Voile & Roberson,
176 Snargate Street

General Literature

1. Twentieth Century Dictionary. (Chambers.)
2. Pictures of Bird Life. Lodge. (Bousfield.)

Fiction

1. Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)
2. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)

EASTBOURNE:

Mr. J. Pulsford,
"The Royal Library,"
80 Terminus Road

General Literature

1. Quiet Talks on Prayer. Gordon. (Revell.)
2. The Other Side of the Lantern. Treves. (Cassell.)

Fiction

1. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)
2. The Abbess of Vlaye. Weyman. (Longmans.)

HOVE, SUSSEX:

Mr. S. Combridge,
56 Church Road, Hove

General Literature

1. Annual reference volumes, various.
2. The Other Side of the Lantern. Treves. (Cassell.)

Fiction

1. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)
2. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)

LEICESTER:

Messrs. Spencer & Greenhough,
102 Granby Street

General Literature

1. Cromwell. Morley. (Macmillan.)
2. Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius. Dill. (Macmillan.)

Fiction

1. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)
2. The Prospector. Connor. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

LIVERPOOL:

Mr. G. G. Walmsley,
50 Lord Street

General Literature

1. Pictorial Annual, 1904-5. (Penrose.)
2. Character and Conduct. (By Compiler of "Being and Doing.")

Fiction

1. The Abbess of Vlaye. Weyman. (Longmans.)
2. God's Good Man. Correll. (Methuen.)

LONDON:

Mr. H. R. Allenson,
1 and 2 Ivy Lane, E.C.

General Literature

1. Bishop O'reighton's Life. (Longmans.)
2. Christian Character. Illingworth. (Macmillan.)

Fiction

1. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)
1. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)

Messrs Bickers & Son,
1 Leicester Square, W.C.

General Literature

1. Roman Society from Nero to Marcus Aurelius. Dill. (Macmillan.)
2. A Companion to Greek Studies. (Camb. Univ. Press.)

Fiction

1. An Act in a Backwater. Benson. (Heinemann.)
2. Brothers. Vachell. (Murray.)

Messrs. Burns & Oates, Ltd.,
28 Orchard Street, W.

General Literature

1. Feasts of Mother Church. Saloma.
2. Mary Immaculate. Marquess of Bute.

Fiction

1. A Spoiled Priest. Sheehan. (Burns & Oates.)
2. The Ridingdale Boys. Bearne.

Messrs. Farmer & Sons,
(Young's Library),
179 Kensington High Street, W.

General Literature

1. Reminiscences of Sir Henry Hawkins. (Arnold.)
2. Russia as It Really Is. Joubert. (Nash.)

Fiction

1. John Chilcote, M.P. Thurston. (Blackwood.)
2. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)

THE BOOK MARKET—continued

LONDON—continued.

Messrs. Hachette & Co.,
18 King William Street,
Strand, W.C.

General Literature

1. L'Eglise et la République. Anatole France. (Pelletan.)
2. L'Indo-Chine française (Souvenirs). Doumer.
(Vulbert & Nony.)
3. Salomon Reinsch. Apollo. (Hachette.)
4. Almanach Hachette.

Harrison's Library,
51 and 53 Church Road,
Upper Norwood, S.E.

General Literature

1. Russia as It Really Is. Joubert. (Nash.)
2. With Kuroki in Manchuria. (Methuen.)

Fiction

1. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)
2. John Chilcote, M.P. Thurston. (Blackwood.)

Mr. J. Jacob,
149 Edgware Road, Hyde Park, W.

General Literature

1. Salome. (Melmoth Press.)
2. Cambridge Modern History. (Camb. Univ. Press.)

Fiction

1. The Secret Woman. Phillpotts. (Methuen.)
2. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)

Messrs. Jones & Evans, Ltd.,
77 Queen Street, Cheapside, E.C.

General Literature

1. Don Quixote, various editions.
2. Gardener's Year. Haggard. (Longmans)

Fiction

1. An Aot in a Backwater. Benson. (Heinemann.)
2. Hurricane Island. Watson. (Isbister.)

Messrs. Lamley & Co.,
1, 3 & 7 Exhibition Road, S.W.

General Literature

1. Cambridge Modern History. (Camb. Univ. Press.)
2. Roman Society. Dill. (Macmillan.)

Fiction

1. The Secret Woman. Phillpotts. (Methuen.)
2. Tales of the Five Towns. Bennett. (Chatto.)

Messrs. Marris & Révéne,
68 High Street, South Norwood

General Literature

1. Tibet. Lander. (Black.)
2. My Devon Year. Phillpotts. (Methuen.)

Fiction

1. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)
2. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)

Mr. Elliot Stock,
62 Paternoster Row E.C.

General Literature

1. Inspiration. Robinson. (Longmans.)
2. God's Board. Benson. (Methuen.)

Fiction

1. The Prospector. Connor. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)

Messrs. Philip, Son & Nephew,
45 to 51 South Castle Street

General Literature

1. Modern Industrial Progress. Oochrane.
2. Tibet. Lander. (Black.)

Fiction

1. The Secret Woman. Phillpotts. (Methuen.)
2. Old Gorgon Graham. Lorimer. (Methuen.)

MANCHESTER:

Messrs. Sherratt & Hughes,
27 St. Ann Street

General Literature

1. Reminiscences of Russian Home. Brodsky.
2. Cambridge Modern History. (Camb. Univ. Press.)

Fiction

1. The Truants. Mason. (Smith, Elder.)
2. The Prospector. Connor. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

OXFORD:

Social Reformers' Bookshop,
56 High Street

General Literature

1. Aiken on the Unemployed. (King.)
2. Various books on Russia.
3. Alien Immigration Blue Book. (Wyman.)
4. Tolstoy's Works.

FAMSGATE:

Messrs. Blinko & Sons,
27 Queen Street

General Literature

1. The New Far East. Dicos. (Cassell.)
2. Downfall of Russia. Ganz. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Fiction

1. The Prodigal Son. Caine. (Heinemann.)
2. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)

FORQUAY:

Messrs. A. Iredale & Son,
13 Strand

General Literature

1. Psalms in Human Life. Protheroe. (Murray.)
2. My Devon Year. Phillpotts. (Methuen.)

Fiction

1. The Secret Woman. Phillpotts. (Methuen.)
2. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)

VENTNOR:

Mr. W. J. Knight,
147-9 High Street

General Literature

1. Life and Times of St. Boniface. Williamson.
(Frowde.)

Fiction

1. The Prospector. Connor. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)

WESTON-SUPER-MARE:

Mr. Frank Gill,
15 Waterloo Road

General Literature

1. Diary and Letters of Madame D'Arblay. (Macmillan.)
2. History of Furniture. Strange.

Fiction

1. The Last Hope. Merriman. (Smith, Elder.)
2. The Truants. Mason. (Smith, Elder.)

Scotland

ABERDEEN:

Mr. J. G. Bissett,
85 Broad Street

General Literature

1. Russia as It Really Is. Joubert. (Nash.)
2. A Comparison to Greek Studies. (Camb. Univ.
Press.)

Fiction

1. John Chilcote, M.P. Thurston. (Blackwood.)
2. The Prospector. Connor. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Messrs. A. & R. Milne,
229 Union Street

General Literature

1. John Knox. Stalker.
2. Psalms in Human Life. Prothero. (Murray.)

Fiction

1. The Affair at the Inn. Wiggin, &c. (Gay & Bird.)
2. John Chilcote, M.P. Thurston. (Blackwood.)

Messrs. D. Wyllie & Son,
247 Union Street

General Literature

1. Forbes of Forbesfield. Forbes. (Wyllie.)
2. Old Time Traders. Cook. (Bon-Accord Press.)

Fiction

1. Downfall of Russia. Ganz. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. Old Gorgon Graham. Lorimer. (Methuen.)

DUMFRIES:

Messrs. Anderson & Son
183 High Street

General Literature

1. The Book of St. Michael's Church. Paton.
2. The Humours of Scottish Life. Gillespie.

Fiction

1. John Chilcote, M.P. Thurston. (Blackwood.)
2. God's Good Man. Corelli. (Methuen.)

EDINBURGH:

Messrs. Robert Grant & Son,
107 Princes Street

General Literature

1. Memoirs. Miss Gordon Cumming. (Blackwood.)
2. Truth about the Czar. Joubert. (Nash.)

Fiction

1. The Garden of Allah. Hichens. (Methuen.)
2. Brothers. Vachell. (Murray.)

Mr. R. W. Hunter,
19 George IV. Bridge

General Literature

1. Liberty and Representative Government. Mill.
(Routledge.)
2. John Knox: his Ideas and Ideals. Stather. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Fiction

1. The Prospector. Connor. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. John Chilcote, M.P. Thurston. (Blackwood.)

GLASGOW:

Messrs. Robert Gibson & Sons, Ltd.,
45 Queen Street

General Literature

1. Raiderland. Crockett. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. Ferguson's Poems. (Gardner.)

Fiction

1. John Chilcote, M.P. Thurston. (Blackwood.)
2. The Prospector. Connor. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

GREENOCK:

Mr. James W. Black,
17 West Blackhall Street

General Literature

1. The Forgiveness of Sins, &c. Smith. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. Lives of Robert and Mary Moffat. Moffat.
(Unwin.)

Fiction

1. The Prospector. Connor. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. Fielding's Works. (Hutchinson.)

KIRKCALDY:

Mr. James Burt,
184-186 High Street

General Literature

1. Quiet Talks on Prayer; Do. on Power. Gordon.
(Revell.)
2. Mark Rutherford's Works. (Unwin.)
3. Burns' Poems, various editions.

Ireland

DUBLIN:

Messrs. M. H. Gill & Son, Ltd.,
50 Upper O'Connell Street

General Literature

1. Newman. Barry. (Hodder & Stoughton.)
2. Moore. Gwyon. (Macmillan.)

Fiction

1. The Chances of War. Finlay. (Fulton.)
2. By What Authority? Benson. (Isbister.)

ENNIS:

Mr. James Hayes,
Church Street

General Literature

1. Féilte na Gaedilge. (Gaelic League.)
2. Ceacta Déasa Gaedilge.
(Irish Book Co.)

Fiction

1. His Share of the World. Griffin. (Greening.)
2. Cat-an Connoí. Doyle. (Gaelic League.)

JUST PUBLISHED

First Edition already exhausted.

Second Impression NOW READY.

THE LIFE OF The MARQUIS of DUFFERIN and AVA

By SIR ALFRED LYALL, P.C.

With Portraits and Illustrations. 2 vols. Demy 8vo, 36/- Net.

LONDON: JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

THE CLERGY LIST FOR 1905

Thoroughly Revised and Corrected to the Latest Date.

Price 12s. 6d. Now Ready.

Times.—"Kelly's Clergy List for 1904 is the 62nd edition of a very useful volume, and its age is no mean advertisement of its worth."
Standard.—"The Clergy List for 1904 is an invaluable work of reference. In point of completeness and accuracy it is as perfect as care can make it."
Guardian.—"As in the past, every care seems to have been taken to secure accuracy."

ESTABLISHED OVER 60 YEARS.

LONDON: KELLY'S DIRECTORIES, LTD.,
182-184 HIGH HOLBORN.

HOMELY HINTS

ON FOOD AND COOKING, DIGESTION
AND INDIGESTION.With over 140 Simple, Practical, and Economical Receipts.

Handsomely bound in cloth, 1s.

PUBLISHED BY ALF. COOKE, Ltd.,

Crown Printing Works, Leeds.

Newnes' Thin Paper Classics

Printed in large, clear type on extremely thin but thoroughly opaque paper.
 Photogravure Frontispiece and Title-page. Narrow Fcap. 8vo (6½ by 3½), Gilt Tops, Cloth Limp, 3s. net. Limp Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net per Vol.

SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS and POEMS. In 3 Volumes, with Glossary.

MILTON'S POEMS.

BURNS' POEMS.

DON QUIXOTE.

BACON'S WORKS.

SHELLEY'S POEMS.

PEPYS' DIARY.

KEATS' POEMS.

POE'S TALES.

EVELYN'S DIARY.

LAMB'S WORKS.

THE VISION OF DANTE.

PEACOCK'S NOVELS.

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHN-

SON. 2 Vols.

HAWTHORN'S NEW ENG-

LAND ROMANCES.

TENNYSON'S POEMS. 1830-

1859.

LANDOR'S

SHORTER

WORKS.

WALPOLE'S LETTERS.
INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.
POEMS OF WORDSWORTH.

Edited by PROFESSOR KNIGHT.

MRS. BROWNING'S POEMS.

2 Vols.

THE TRAVELS OF MARCO
POLO.THE LIFE AND VOYAGES
OF CAPTAIN COOK.THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENVENUTO CELLINI.HOMER'S ILIADS. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.HOMER'S ODYSSEYS AND SHORTER POEMS. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.

SWIFT'S JOURNAL TO
STELLA. With other Writings relating to Stella and Vanessa.COLERIDGE'S POEMS. Edited by Professor KNIGHT.EARLY ITALIAN POETS. By D. G. ROSSETTI.

"Newnes' elegant and compact series of classics in limp leather We expect a great success for these editions."—Athenaeum.

GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd., Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

Chatto & Windus, Publishers.

NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE ENDLESS HERITAGE."

HEIRS OF REUBEN.

By CHRIS HEALY,

Author of "Confessions of a Journalist." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [Feb. 16.]

Tales of the Five Towns.

By ARNOLD BENNETT,

Author of "The Grand Babylon Hotel," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s."This delightful volume."—Vanity Fair."Admirably clever work."—St. James's Gazette."Pleasant and amusing reading from cover to cover."—Daily Express.

Fleur-de-Camp: A Daughter of France.

By A. GODRIC CAMPBELL.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"A strong and picturesque book."—Glasgow Herald.
 "Fleur-de-Camp is a very winning heroine, whose adventures and whose love story have a compelling interest."—Week's Survey.

Mr. Swinburne's Poetical Works.

THE COLLECTED LIBRARY EDITION IN SIX
VOLUMES, price 36s. net, is NOW COMPLETE.

GEORGE R. SIMS'S NEW BOOK.

LI TING OF LONDON. By GEORGE R. SIMS.
Fcap. 8vo, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d. [Shortly.]

WORKS BY RICHARD A. PROCTOR.

Cheaper Issue. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each.

EASY STAR LESSONS. With Star Maps for Every Night in the Year.

FLOWERS OF THE SKY. With 55 Illustrations.

FAMILIAR SCIENCE STUDIES.

MYSTERIES OF TIME AND SPACE. With
24 Illustrations.

THE UNIVERSE OF SUNS. With 11 Illus.

SATURN AND ITS SYSTEM. With 13 Plates.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 6s.

Shortly. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

THE WILD MARQUIS: Life and Adventures of Armand Guerry de Maubreuil. By ERNEST
 A. VIZETELLY, Author of "With Zola in England."

Shortly. 2 vols. demy 8vo, cloth, 21s. net.
 THE LIFE OF CHARLES DICKENS
 as Revealed in his Writings. By PERCY FITZ-GERALD, F.S.A.

New 3/6 Novels.

THE MASSARENES. By OUIDA.

THE LADY OF LYNN. By Sir WALTER
BESANT. With 12 Illustrations by G. DEMAIN

HAMMOND.

THE ALABASTER BOX. By Sir WALTER
BESANT.THE CLYFFARDS OF CLYFFE. By JAMES
PAYN.A QUEEN OF CURDS AND CREAM. By DOROTHY GERARD.AS LUCK WOULD HAVE IT. By WILLIAM WESTALL.

THE ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY.

Printed in clear type on fine paper; full size of page, 6½ by 4¼ inches. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net each;
 leather, gilt edges, 3s. net each.

NEW AND IMPORTANT SERIES OF ELEVEN VOLUMES NOW IN THE PRESS.

MACAULAY'S

History of England. In 5 Volumes; and

JUSTIN MCCARTHY'S

The Reign of Queen Anne. In 1 Volume.

A History of the Four Georges and of William IV. In 2 Volumes; andA History of Our Own Times, from the Accession of Queen Victoria to 1880. In 3 Volumes.

THE OTHER VOLUMES OF THE SERIES ARE

AS FOLLOWS:—

By SIR WALTER BESANT. By RICHARD JEFFERIES.

London. The Life of the Fields.

All Sorts and Conditions. The Open Air.

By HALL CAINE. Nature near London.

The Deemster. (March 16.)

By WILKIE COLLINS. The Cloister and the Hearth.

The Woman in White. Never too Late to Mend.

By DANIEL DEFOE. By ROBERT LOUIS
Robinson Crusoe. With 37 STEVENSON.

Illustrations by GEORGE Men and Books.

CRUIKSHANK. New Arabian Nights.

By THOMAS HARDY. Across the Plains.

Under the Greenwood Tree. The Merry Men. (Shortly.)

By BRET HARTE. The Pocket R. L. S.; Fe-

Condensed Novels. yourite Passages from

By OLIVER WENDELL STEVENSON'S Works.

HOLMES. By MARK TWAIN.

The Autocrat of the Break- Sketches.

fast Table. With Illustr- By WALTON and COTTON.

ations by J. G. THOMSON. The Complete Angler.

By CHARLES LAMB. London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111 St. Martin's Lane.

The Essays of Elia.

The Academy and Literature

No. 1710. Established 1869.

London: 11 February 1905.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17s. 6d. a year.]

Notes

READERS of THE ACADEMY will be interested to know that preparations are being made to effect important changes both in the form and substance of this journal. It is hoped that they will be brought into operation on March 11, and until that day THE ACADEMY will be conducted on its old lines.

THE most important publication of the week has been "The Life of the Marquis of Dufferin and Ava," by Sir Alfred Lyall. It was issued too late for treatment in our columns this week, but we hope to deal with it in our next number. Lord Dufferin was a great part of the life of our times, a consummate diplomatist and a conscientious and trustworthy politician. Occupying such eminent positions as he did, it was natural and inevitable that he should mingle on familiar terms with the most illustrious of his contemporaries, and it will be found that his "Life" gives some pleasing glimpses of the inner circles of politics during the reign of Queen Victoria.

WRITING in "The Library," Mr. John Rivers gives an amusing account of Jean François Ducis, the French eighteenth-century author who took Shakespeare in hand and attempted to purge him of all that offended the classicalism of national and contemporary taste. Ducis himself, says Mr. Rivers, was a modest man of lofty ideals, and it was a genuine admiration of Shakespeare's work that led him to try and improve it. But the result—the now completely forgotten result—was rich in humour.

NORCESTE, whom we know as Horatio, flatly refuses to believe in the Ghost at all, though Hamlet (who has ascended the throne on his father's death) assures him that he saw it in a dream. Ophelia is not the daughter of Polonius, but of Claudius, who for no apparent reason has decreed that she, "the sole and feeble scion of my race, the light of Hymen's torch shall ne'er behold." Claudius and Gertrude, who between them have murdered the late King, "refuse to be bluffed into confession" by the play; but all ends "happily." Claudius is killed by Norceste, and Gertrude stabs herself, while Hamlet remains in possession of the throne. They are doing their best now in Paris to appreciate Shakespeare as they should—doing far more, indeed, than we are to master their great classical dramatists; but the reception of Mr. Marcel Schwob's translation of "Hamlet" was not over-promising.

IN "The Fortnightly Review" M. Maurice Maeterlinck discusses the production of "King Lear" at the Théâtre Antoine. There are only two critics in Paris, it seems, who had a good word for the play, M. Nozière in the "Gil Blas," and M. Brisson in "Le Temps." M. Faguet, the lundiste of the "Débats," talks of "stupid crimes, foolish horrors, and idiotic vices," and dubs the play "bruto-tragedy or bruto-drama." "Almost anybody, no matter who, could write 'King Lear,' with the exception of a few passages"! And the play, says M. Maeterlinck, "received the same hearing that would have been given to an antiquated melodrama, illumined here and there by an occasional gleam of genius."

FOR this strange lack of comprehension (which M. Maeterlinck astutely hints is not so uncommon in England as we should care to admit) he assigns two reasons: the necessary failure of a translation, in the case of an "essential" poet, to reveal more than a quarter of his soul, and the difference between the domestic geniuses of the two countries. The domestic genius spoke in Voltaire's "Drunken Savage," and the feeling still lingers; but it is only fair to point out that French men of letters are doing far more than English to break down the barrier. Quite recently able studies have appeared in Paris of Wordsworth, Crabbe, Burns and Richardson. What, besides Mr. Gosse's "French Profiles" and a few desultory studies of Ste.-Beuve, have we to show since Matthew Arnold?

THE Juliet House, as it is called, at Verona, is in danger of collapsing; but its loss would mean no more than the loss of any other of the picturesque old houses of Northern Italy. It is not, of course, Juliet's house, any more than Juliet's tomb is the tomb of Juliet, or the Andaman Islands the scene of "The Tempest." There is no house in Verona that can be declared with certainty the house of either Montagues or Capulets; and the tomb, we have it on good authority, was a washing-trough. A genuine washing-trough is better than a sham tomb—and the moral of the whole question may be found in Mr. Henry James' story of "The Custodians."

A PROPOS of a woodcut by Schäufolein in the British Museum, Mr. Campbell Dodgson relates in "The Burlington Magazine" for this month a quaint and delightful legend of Alexander the Great. In one version—that of a late Greek manuscript of Pseudo-Callisthenes—the event took place "at the end of the world."

Having reached it, and wishing to know "whether this was indeed the end of the world and the place where the sky slopes down to it," he caught two of the great white birds that came about his army, starved them for three days, and then confined them in a basket, in which there stood upright two spears lashed together, end to end, with the liver of a horse on the top. The birds flew up, like the donkey that follows the carrots dangling in front of his nose, in order to seize the meat; and the basket, with Alexander in it, rose with them. At last, being warned by a winged creature with a human face to return, he reversed the spears. The birds flew down, and he reached earth ten days' journey from the place whence he started.

In the Latin version of Leo's "Historia de Preliis" the basket is replaced by a machine with iron bars, and the motive power was not white birds but griffins—"li oysel ke on apiele gryfz," says a mediæval manuscript. Mr. Dodgson's article is illustrated by reproductions of two miniatures in the British Museum and of the woodcut by Schaufelein, which shows two most fascinating griffins attached by chains to an iron cage. In the cage stands Alexander in armour, grasping the baited spear, to which the griffins' eyes are hungrily upturned.

It appears from Signor Orlando's answer to the question put in the Chamber of Deputies on January 31, and from the conversation between the Rome correspondent of "The Times" and the Minister, that Professor Waldstein has not got quite so far as he thought in his scheme for the international excavation of Herculaneum. There is "a wide difference between an honorary committee composed of crowned heads and rulers of states, and an international committee for the actual execution of excavations"; the difference that one may talk while the other will work. Professor Waldstein appears to have become entangled in this net of diplomacy, from which may he soon be freed—to set to work and do what he wishes.

NATURAL science has lost a devoted and valuable servant by the death of Mr. George Bond Howes, LL.D., D.Sc., F.R.S., who died on Saturday at his house in Chiswick. Dr. Howes, who was only fifty-one years old, entered the service of the Science and Art Department thirty years ago, after a private education, and became at once a staunch lieutenant to Huxley, whom he succeeded in 1895 as Professor of Zoology in the Royal College of Science. The amount of his published work was small, but it included the "Atlas of Practical Zootomy," as the revised form of the work is called, and a number of papers, chiefly on vertebrate morphology.

A COMMITTEE has been formed for the purpose of collecting a fund and founding a prize in memory of Miss Frances Power Cobbe. Their object is to supply an annual prize, open to all students and members under six years' standing in the colleges for women connected with the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and Trinity College, Dublin, for the best essay on any subject, "ethical, psychological, or philosophical," bearing on the evidence of natural religion. Donations will be received by the Hon. Secretary and Treasurer, Lady Battersea, Surrey House, 7 Marble Arch, W., or by the London Joint Stock Bank, Limited, Princes Street, E.C.

A PROPOSAL is on foot to establish a "Ruskin Park," on "the last spur of the Surrey Downs," as Ruskin himself called Denmark Hill. Only £2,000 an acre is being asked, and £50,000 will suffice to preserve the whole "lung" intact. Denmark Hill is not only associated with Ruskin and Mr. Chamberlain. It was the residence of Dr. Lettsom, the Quaker physician, whose park was famous for its plants and for the butterfly Camberwell Beauty, which he bred there. He, for one, would smile upon the "Ruskin Park."

THE dinner given to Mr. J. Nicol Dunn last Saturday night on the occasion of his leaving "The Morning Post" for "The Manchester Courier" was a fine and spontaneous tribute to a distinguished journalist. Mr. Barrie was in the chair, and proposed Mr. Dunn's health in as delightful a speech as one could wish to hear, the greater part of it banter, persiflage, drollery, but sobering into a most manly and earnest God-speed at the end. The company consisted of the guest's private friends, and contained foremost representatives not only of the leading journals, but of law, politics and the kindred professions. Naturally many men of the old "National Observer" were present, and if the shade of W. E. Henley did not hover over the feast, it was not for lack of invocation, both spoken and silent. When nearly every one present had a title to public attention, it was invidious to single out any name for particular mention. Mr. Dunn has made many notable friends in the course of a career which has embraced at least half a dozen different papers, including "The Scotsman," "The Pall Mall Gazette" and "Black and White."

It is most unusual for a journalist to leave a first-class position in London for the provinces, but if Mr. Dunn has chosen to follow a difficult path, he is also working for a great reward. "The Manchester Courier" has always had great difficulty in competing with a most able and well-managed rival, and all the resources of skill and enterprise will be needed to bring it up to the same level. But, on the other hand, these are magical days in journalism, and no doubt the same vigour and determination which have made so much ground elsewhere will be appreciated in Manchester. On "The Morning Post" the place vacated by Mr. Dunn is now filled by Mr. Spencer Wilkinson, a journalist best known for his contributions to military criticism. Curiously enough, he first made his mark in the very town to which his predecessor has gone.

WE have received from an American gentleman a leaflet that carries important news. The American Philosophical Society and the Volapukists "fought a duel and killed each other's influence." That seems to have left the field open for Idiom Neutral, Esperanto and others. "George J. Henderson, of London, has made three languages, and Elias Molee, of Tacoma, Washington, has spent forty years on Tutonish. Such heroic efforts have not been without effects."

THE effects, it would seem, have rather been on George J. Henderson, of London, and Elias Molee, of Tacoma, than on the speaking world. But there is still hope, perhaps, for Tutonish, perhaps for one of the three lingue Hendersoniane. An International Congress of a thousand intelligent members could in five years frame a language, simple and systematic, easy and beautiful. And the cost—the cost of the congress, the invention, the teachers, the pupils, the literature and the minor expenses! A trifle of five thousand million dollars, or some £1,000,000,000! And for that "ignorance and mental slavery would pass away, and the wars, famines and pestilences would vanish from the globe." More, we should be able, perhaps be compelled, to read our Sophocles and Vergil in Tutonish, our Shakespeare and Milton in Hendersonish.

THE February volumes in Messrs. Dents' complete edition of Tolstoy will be "The Snowstorm, Domestic Happiness, &c.," and "Pedagogical Articles, and The Linen Measurer," all written between 1856 and 1862. In the new French series, "Les Classiques Français," Bernardin de Saint-Pierre's "Paul et Virginie," with a preface by the Vicomte Melchior de Vogüé of the French Academy, will be published this month.

IN view of the forthcoming Whistler Exhibition at the New Gallery, Messrs. Bell will publish immediately a third and cheaper edition of "The Art of James McNeill Whistler," by Messrs. T. R. Way and G. R. Dennis.

Bibliographical

LAST year Miss M. F. Sandars published a life of Honoré de Balzac, which was welcomed as supplying a want, for in English we have not many works on the French novelist and his writings, and most of those have their origin in America. Now, however, it looks as though we were making up for lost time, for hard upon the issue of Miss Sandars' book I learn that Mr. W. H. Helm is to give us a new volume of criticism, entitled "Aspects of Balzac." Before the former work was published the only book available for would-be students of Balzac was Mr. Frederick Wedmore's volume, the "Life of Honoré de Balzac," in the Great Writers Series (1889). From America, however, had emanated "Balzac," a small volume of criticism, by E. E. Saltus (1884); "A Memoir of Honoré de Balzac," by Katharine Prescott Wormeley (1892), the translator of "La Comédie Humaine"; and "The Metaphysics of Balzac," by Ursula N. Gestefeld (1898).

It may be safely assumed, I think, that the publication of a book about a distinguished writer creates something of a demand, though it may not, often, be anything more than a small demand, for his writings. It may be hoped that Mr. G. W. E. Russell's "Sydney Smith" (English Men of Letters) will make many readers wish for a fuller acquaintance with Smith's works. I do not know whether his "Essays," published in 1880 by Messrs. Routledge, are still obtainable, but there is a capital selection from his writings, edited by Mr. Ernest Rhys, in the Scott Library; and the famous "Peter Plymley's Letters" may be had in Cassell's National Library. The single-volume edition of his "Works" and the "Sketches of Moral Philosophy" may often be found by haunters of the second-hand bookstalls. Mr. Russell had not many predecessors as biographer of Sydney Smith, the only separate works being "A Memoir of the Reverend Sydney Smith by his Daughter, Lady Holland" (1855), and "The Life and Times of Sydney Smith," by Stuart J. Reid (1884). In 1894 there was published in Paris "Sydney Smith et la Renaissance des Idées Libérales en Angleterre," by André Chevrillon.

There have been many biographies of Charles Dickens published since John Forster completed his "Life" about thirty years ago; but apparently the theme is inexhaustible, for Mr. Thomas Wright, as was announced some time ago, is engaged upon a work of this character: and now it is stated that Mr. Percy Fitzgerald is just completing a "Life of Charles Dickens as revealed in his Writings." Professor A. W. Ward's "Dickens" in the English Men of Letters Series, and Sir Frank T. Marzials' "Dickens" in the Great Writers Series, are available for readers who wish for succinct works on the subject, while altogether the books on Dickens, or some aspect of his work, would now fill a long shelf. Mr. Percy Fitzgerald had already given us "The History of Pickwick; its Characters, Localities, &c." (1891); "Bozland: Dickens' Places and People" (1895) and "The Pickwickian Dictionary and Cyclopædia" (1903).

The issue of a "uniform edition" of a writer's works may generally be taken as marking a definite stage in that writer's popularity. In view of the fact that Messrs. Blackwood are about to issue such an edition of Mr. Neil Munro's novels, it may be interesting to give a list of them, with the dates of their first publication in book form: "The Lost Pibroch, and Other Shieling Stories" (1896); "John Splendid: the Tale of a Poor Gentleman and the Little Wars of Lorn" (1898); "Gilian the Dreamer: his Fancy, his Love and Adventures" (1899); "Doom Castle: a Romance" (1901); "The Shoes of Fortune, &c." (1901); "Children of Tempest: a Tale of the Outer Isles" (1903); "Erichie: My Droll Friend" (1904). The first half-dozen of the volumes named have been announced to form the new set, but I hope that Mr. Munro and his publishers will decide to include "Erichie," for that genial soul deserves inclusion; and many of us would be glad to have his humour presented in all the dignity of a bound book. It is true the authorship of "Erichie" has not been acknowledged, but it has always been an "open secret." Less well known, perhaps, is the fact that Mr. Munro once wrote a highly sensational serial story, which is not likely to be included in the uniform reissue of his novels, and that much of his writing lies buried in the columns of a Glasgow evening newspaper.

In giving last week a list of the English translations of writings by Maxim Gorky I omitted, by an oversight, one of the volumes in which I had found most to interest me—the "Tales from Gorky," translated by Mr. R. Nisbet Bain (1902). I might also have added that shortly after the introduction of the grim realist to English readers came a volume of appreciation in Dr. E. J. Dillon's "Maxim Gorky, his Life and Writings" (1902).

WALTER JERROLD.

Hudibras-Butler

OF the "Hudibras" recently edited for the "Cambridge English Classics" by Mr. A. R. Waller we have only one mild complaint to make.

The plan of Mr. Waller's edition excludes explanatory notes and all introductory matter except a short bibliographical note. But on the blank page opposite the title-page appears this short but disquieting legend:

SAMUEL BUTLER.
Born 1612?
Died 1680.

We cannot deny the exactitude of the question-mark. It is true we do not know that Butler was born in 1612, but research has shown that he was christened in February of that year; and if in corrupta Fides nudaque Veritas demanded the precautionary symbol, surely a drop of comfort might have been afforded to the curious in the form of a note.

A cynic might, indeed, find occasion for a sneer in this record of Butler's christening, being, as it is, almost the only fact of his life about which there is no doubt. For though, "according to all accounts" (says Mr. R. B. Johnson, the Aldine Editor), he "led a life of strict integrity," and though "no sneer has passed the poet's lips against religion or morality," there is singularly little of the distinctive features of Christianity in Butler's character. Perhaps to blame a satirist for uncharitableness is like finding fault with a tiger for inhumanity, or with Rabelais for grossness. He does not profess to supply the milk of human kindness, nor ask you to admire his organ of benevolence. But, for all that, "the great Butler," as "the great Doctor" calls him, gives the unpleasant impression of double-dealing and backbiting to a degree rare even among satirists. Critics are not agreed to what extent "Hudibras" is intended for a portrait of the Presbyterian, Sir Samuel Luke, "who was of an ancient family in Bedfordshire, but, to his dishonour" (says the earliest of Butler's biographers), "an eminent commander under the Usurper, Oliver Cromwell." Other Puritans, and perhaps other patrons of Butler, are laid under contribution by the satirist; and the spirit of burlesque accumulates many traits which have little to do with the Puritans at all. Butler, however, meant to make his "i's" easy to dot when he made Sir Hudibras say—

"'Tis sung there is a valiant Mamaluke,
In foreign land, yclep'd —,
To whom we have been oft compar'd,
For person, parts, address, and beard."

Rhyme and reason alike pitch upon Sir Samuel, or rather Sir Samlle Luke, to fill the gap. Anyhow, he lived in the service of this "Knight so notorious," either as secretary or steward or valet, and employed his opportunities in that situation in accumulating the materials for "Hudibras," and probably composing a good part of the work. He kept the poison of asps well under his lips, however, until it was quite safe to launch it against the defeated party: and was then rewarded, like Horace's schoolmaster, maiore fama quam emolumento. Charles II., we are told, was always quoting "Hudibras," and kept it in his pocket; but he put little or nothing into the author's pocket in its place. Perhaps he thought, or other Royalists who had better memories and fatter purses may have thought, that benevolence might be misplaced in this dull fellow—for so he appears to have been in company—who might, after all, survive them, and then let the world know what he thought of them. As a matter of fact, he was amassing the materials for such an exposure while the wits were laughing over his satire upon the Puritans. He satirised the license, the gaming, the drunkenness, of Charles II.'s court; he satirised poor Sir John Denham, both for his poetry and for his madness; he satirised the newly formed Royal Society, first in octosyllabics, and then expanded these into the heroic measure to which he became more addicted in later years. All these rods, however, were laid up in pickle only when he died; they did not see the light till about eighty years after his death. Altogether, though the patrons who enjoyed his wit did not deserve well of him, it is difficult to avoid smiling at the expressions chosen by Ottway, who was always overflowing with sentiment, in referring to this neglect:

"Tell them how Spenser starv'd, how Cowley mourn'd,
How Butler's faith and service were return'd."

Mr. Waller does break through his reserve in his bibliographical note to the extent of giving us the entertaining passage from "Pepys' Diary" in which Mr. Pepys describes how, "falling into discourse" with Mr. Battersby "of a new book of drollery in use, called 'Hudibras,' I would needs go find it out, and met with it at the Temple: cost me 2s. 6d. But when I came to read it, it is so silly an abuse of the Presbyter Knight going to the warrs, that I am ashamed of it; and by and by, meeting at Mr. Townsend's at dinner, I sold it to him for 18d." Six weeks later, however, he found it necessary to buy "Hudibras" again—presumably for 2s. 6d.; but later entries in the "Diary" show that he never could see the fun of it, though he once records having enjoyed having Mr. Butler and others to dinner—"a good dinner, and company that pleased me mightily, being all eminent men in their way. Spent all the afternoon in talk and mirth, and in the evening parted." Mr. Pepys was not a connoisseur in wit: Charles II. was, and was undoubtedly in the right here. Whatever else Butler was, he was a prince of wits. The Restoration has a great name for wit, and, in spite of Macaulay, deserves it. But Butler is a giant among the Restoration wits, just as Milton is a giant among the Restoration poets. His is not mere verbal wit, nor the raillery of a highly artificial society. It is imaginative and racy, not merely rippling the surface of the mind into a smile, but stirring up the depths of laughter. He is a man of exceptionally sound sense talking outrageous nonsense, a feat which always conveys the impression of great power. In this respect he deserves to be mentioned in the same breath with Aristophanes and Rabelais, and with the master to whom he owed the main idea of "Hudibras," Cervantes, though he is wanting in the good-humour which is half the greatness of these much greater men.

A larger portion of good-humour would have made "Hudibras" more readable to remote posterity. "To-day it is not read," says Mr. R. B. Johnson, "and to a large extent would not be understood." The second remark is true, if the "large extent" be not pressed too hard. "Hudibras" is, of course, packed with topical allusions, as well as with all sorts of allusions the very reverse of topical—out-of-the-way bits of learning such as Rabelais delighted in, which we may be sure were as unintelligible to Charles II. as they are to us. The latter, however, are part of the fun, now as then. And as to the topical allusions, it is true that the objects of Butler's ridicule are no longer before our eyes; while the passions which were then excited over ecclesiastical government have been succeeded by a long line of descendants, which all have a strong family likeness, but are too vigorous in each generation to feel much interest in their ancestry. But the mere fact that we cannot understand many passages without the aid of a note, and even the fact that a note is sometimes inevitably wanting, because the key to the allusion has long been lost—these facts only explain in part why "Hudibras" as a whole is not read to-day. "Don Quixote" has more allusions which are pointless to the average English reader: yet few people find "Don Quixote" difficult to read. You may say that it is because "Don Quixote" is drawn on a larger canvas, and breathes the open air of adventure for all its satire of knight-errantry. Yes, but this is much the same as saying that it is full of good-humour. Cervantes looks upon all the world, including his crazy hero, with a kindly eye. He moves with careless and jovial freedom of gait, and gives his reader time to digest his wit. Butler is like a hanging judge who is witty at the expense of the prisoner. He looks on all the world with "lidless dragon eyes," and mercilessly exposes everybody's faults and follies, without a hint that he is of the same clay as the rest of us. His scorn and contempt for the human race is like that of the only one of his imitators who is his equal: and in reading Swift we seem to be assisting at some dreadful tragedy, a man afflicted with some strange madness, cursing and uprooting his own heart; whereas Butler's satire is just heartless. And his wit gives you hardly any rest. Dr. Johnson puts this matter well in the course of his somewhat jerky and indeterminate account of Butler. "If inexhaustible wit could give perpetual pleasure, no eye would ever leave half-read the work of Butler; for what poet has ever brought so many remote images so happily together? It is scarcely possible to peruse a page without finding some association of images that was never found before. By the first paragraph the reader is amused, by the next he is delighted, and by a few more strained to astonishment; but astonishment is a toilsome pleasure; he is soon weary of wondering, and longs to be diverted."

But what wit it is! One cannot quote it to advantage. Many of his couplets have passed into proverbs too familiar to quote: but even these, to be thoroughly enjoyed, should be read in their context. It is the volubility at such a high level, the agility of the doggerel rhymes, with their ease and naturalness, the apparently uncontrolled spontaneity of the whole performance, that is so amazing every time one takes up the book. It is difficult to believe that the author amassed his material in "Commonplace Books," and wrote and re-wrote with anxious care. Certainly there never was a better illustration of the maxim which Pope paraphrased from Horace:

"Success in writing comes from art, not chance,
As those move easiest who have learned to dance."

The only poet who has attempted the Hudibrastic manner of handling rhyme on a large scale, and as an accompaniment to his matter and not the end in itself, is Browning; but Browning never "learned to dance"; nor did he realise, apparently, that Butler's very triumph depended upon the perfect match between his manner and his matter.

The Guls Hornbook

SOME people carry their love of suitability to the verge of mania, and could not bring themselves to read an old book newly tricked out in the finery of green limp leather and a red silk marker. I am not of their number. They are but captious bibliophiles and have their reward in the sense of their own exclusiveness, from which they doubtless derive a fine satisfaction. "A Guls Hornbook in lambskin!" and their sneer rises to a snort: but I answer unabashed, "My study to any reading-room, museum or Bodleian," with a chant of content as I turn over the dainty pages of old Dekker's pamphlet, which Messrs. Dent & Co. have just issued in their "Temple Classics" series. I have hardly a moment's thought for the Arber reprint, which I do not possess, and leave the discovery of an aged quarto, marked at a mere song, to the godlike dreams of night. Dekker—that "Pasquille madcap," as he calls himself; "with as much poetry in him as one wants," as Charles Lamb (not easily satisfied in that respect) says of him—has always appealed to me in rather a special way by reason of his buoyancy and kindness. Simon Eyre, with his quaint expletives, and his wife—the "bombast-cotton-night-cap-queen"—are among my favourite characters. Indeed, the whole play, the Shoemaker's Holiday, is in its own somewhat domestic way a masterpiece. He lacks the greatness of Ben Jonson, of course; but he lacks also that scathing element which led Jonson to sport with human follies a little cruelly at times, as his treatment of the Puritan shows—and of Dekker himself, for that matter, in their famous quarrel. I wonder why they fell foul of one another. It would be excessively interesting to know the true reason why Jonson's wrath should have been roused against Dekker, of all men—for he was not more unworkmanlike in his plays than many others—to such a pitch that he was obliged to satirise him under the name of Crispinus. Still, Dekker turned and had his say with his Satiromastix; or, The Untrussing of a Humorous Poet. What times these were!

But to your Hornbook, gull. Dekker must have chuckled—with almost more than a journalist's joy at copy found—when he came upon the German Dede-kind's Grobianus and saw how nicely he could fit the book to his own ends! No one could teach a gull to be a gallant better than Thomas Dekker, for what he did not know about town life need not be called knowledge. Moreover Grobianism—his own word for the form of satire which praises and recommends the thing to be avoided—was the manner peculiarly suited to his personality. And it is delightful to notice that he does not seem ever to have passed so far beyond the realm of the gallant but that he occasionally forgets that in writing of him his tongue should be in his cheek. I hear a certain ring of sincere feeling as he denounces the absurdity of early rising and advises his gull to lie long abed—"Care not for those coarse painted cloath rimes made by ye University of Salerne, that come over you with 'Short let thy sleep at noone be, or rather let it none be.' Sweet candied councill, but there's rats-bane under it."

He thoroughly enjoyed writing his book: he wrote with such gusto that its freshness—though a mere pamphlet—lasts after the lapse of so many years and the passing of so many fashions; for human nature has an odd way of remaining in essentials the same, and the gull and the gallant, though they have not such picturesque names nowadays, continue to exist, and always will exist as long as there is money to spend and youth to spend it: the cult of the correct thing is as everlasting as youth, always wishing (and quite rightly) to cut a fine figure, though what that figure should be is according to the opinion of the period. The gallant used to ruffle it down Powle's Walk or Chepe Side; the "dog" strolls down Bond Street or Piccadilly. The gallant used to smoke on the stage and listen to Shakespeare; the dog takes his cigar in the promenade of a music hall and applauds the cake-walk. Dekker takes his gull and schools him through the day from noon to midnight, tells him where he should dine, how he should enter an ordinary, what company he should affect, what sights he should see (especially the top of Powle's Steeple, where "I would desire you to draw your knife and grave your name in great characters upon the leades"), how to avoid duns, and how to behave in Duke Humphrey's walkes or at the play. And while he laughs at gullery and gallantry, he seems always to remember that his knowledge is not second-hand, and that he himself passed through these same stages of gull and gallant. There is a touch of pride, too, in his memory—the pride of a man who has lived hard and is glad of it. For even in those days, when life hummed, no one lived more "robustiously" than did Thomas Dekker.

Reviews

SYDNEY SMITH

By George W. E. Russell. English Men of Letters Series. (Macmillan, 2s. net.)

THE career of a wit resembles in one respect the career of an actor. He writes his name in water, and his most brilliant effects are evanescent, like the ripples which disturb the glassy surface of a lake. For the true wit relies not merely upon a whimsical phrase. He jests also with his voice, his hand, his whole bearing. And these accessories played a larger part in Sydney Smith's humour than in the humour of most. As Charles Greville has told us, "his appearance, voice, and manner added immensely to the effect, and the bursting and uproarious merriment with which he poured forth his good things never failed to communicate itself to his audience, who were always in fits of laughter." But sixty years ago Sydney Smith's tongue was silenced for ever, and if we would recover even an echo of his wit we must rely upon his own reported words and the testimony of those that knew him.

Mr. George Russell, then, has performed a task of no small difficulty in writing the life of one whose crowning virtue died with him, and he has wisely touched upon his humour with a light hand. And Sydney Smith's career justifies this discretion. A man of letters, a zealous clergyman, a keen pamphleteer and energetic politician, he does not depend for remembrance upon the repetition of half-forgotten jokes. Moreover, the flashes of drollery with which he enlivened the dinner-parties of his friends did not reveal the best side of his talent. He too often made jokes at table, because jokes were expected of him. His very presence was a check upon conversation, for conversation might spoil a jest, and he was doubtless oppressed by the duty laid upon him by others. Whether he was in the vein or not, he was obliged to appear humorous, and sometimes the result may have been as tiresome to others as it must have been to himself. But when he preached or wrote he employed an easy, spontaneous humour, which is never tiresome, because it did no more than illustrate or clench a serious argument. It was but the sauce which gave a piquancy to a well-cooked dish; and even if we know little of the Sydney Smith who "set the table on a roar," we can none the less appreciate the Dean of St. Paul's and the Edinburgh Reviewer, who never ceased to blend the dulce with the utile.

To a modern ear Sydney Smith's sallies may smack of irreverence, but he joked in the pulpit, as he joked elsewhere, because it was natural for him to joke. He could not help seeing the incongruities of human life. Moreover, to him the Church was a profession rather than a vocation, and he thumped the cushion of his pulpit, to use his own phrase, because he regarded it as his duty. Born in 1771, and educated at Winchester and New College, he was ordained in due course, though, had he followed his bent, he would have been called to the bar. "The law," said he, many years afterwards, "is decidedly the best profession for a young man if he has anything in him. In the Church a man is thrown into life with his hands tied, and bid to swim: he does well if he keeps his head above water." Sydney Smith always kept his head above water, but then the Church never absorbed all his energies. Sent to Edinburgh with a pupil in 1798, he numbered Jeffrey, Horner and Brougham among his friends, and with them he founded "The Edinburgh Review." With characteristic humour he chose as the motto for the new enterprise Tenui musam meditamus avena, which he translated into "We cultivate learning on a little oatmeal"; but the truth of the motto condemned it, and another was found with a blunter point and less chance of being misunderstood. The first number was edited by Smith himself, but his profession called him to London, and Jeffrey, a far more highly gifted editor, took his place. Preferment, however, came slowly, for Sydney Smith was a Whig among Tories, and he was compelled to put his hand to any enterprise that offered. At the outset he lectured on moral philosophy at the Royal Institution, with conspicuous success. The subject, familiar in Edinburgh, was new to London, and Smith was hailed as the preacher of a new gospel. When he lectured there was not room for all those who flocked to hear him, and the neighbouring streets were packed with carriages. But his triumph brought him no pleasure. He assured Jeffrey that he was heartily ashamed of his own fame, conscious that it was ill deserved. When, years afterwards, Dr. Whewell wished to read them, "My lectures are gone to the dogs," wrote Smith, "and are utterly forgotten. I knew nothing of moral philosophy, but I was thoroughly aware that I wanted £200 to furnish my house." But if he knew nothing of moral philosophy, he knew perfectly well how to interest and amuse an audience—a knowledge which never left him, and it is not surprising that people flocked to hear him. For paradox and epigram were always at his command. "Bishop Berkeley," said he, in one of his lectures, "destroyed this world in one octavo volume; and nothing remained after his time but Mind, which experienced a similar fate at the hands of Mr. Hume in 1737."

However, despite their faults, these lectures made Sydney Smith known to the polite world. Henceforth he was a brilliant member of the circle of which Lady Holland was the centre. He was the friend of Rogers and Luttrell and all the other wits. He was a Whig, to whom a crushed party looked for guidance and support, and he was always ready to fight the battle of what he deemed Liberal principles with energy and brilliance. "Peter Plymley's Letters" are among the finest specimens of controversial irony in our literature, and they made so great a stir in England that their author could not but be famous. And then, at the height of his reputation, he was presented to the living of Foston in Yorkshire, and straightway settled down to the life of a country parson. But his gaiety of mind carried him through all difficulties. "I have bought a book about drilling beans," he wrote, "and a greyhound puppy for the Malton Meeting. It is thought I shall be an eminent rural character." And he very soon was. He not only preached to his parishioners, he doctored them when they were sick, and he discussed their crops with them on all occasions, although a few months before he had not known the difference between a carrot and a turnip. Then, too, he designed and built himself a house, which he called the Rector's Head, and there he entertained his distinguished guests from London with so amiable a hospitality that even Luttrell, the famous epicure, "tasted and praised." And all the while he was writing pamphlets, fighting the battle of Catholic Emancipation, and contributing articles to "The Edinburgh Review," whose levity made even Jeffrey shudder.

That a free-lance like Sydney Smith did not find preferment from the Church is not wonderful. He was never so happy as when he was casting ridicule upon his own cloth, and he could not resist making fun of a bishop. Moreover, he was bold enough to attack both Methodists and missionaries in the "Review," and it was plain to all that in so doing he was walking upon forbidden ground. But he could not help his sense of humour. In his mind gravity and fun were so intimately confused that he was always unable to separate them. For this he suffered in his lifetime, but it is this admirable confusion which makes his essays such good reading to-day. His review of Waterton's "Natural History" is perhaps the best example of his banter. Thus he describes the campanero, a bird of the size of a jay: "The campanero," he writes, "may be heard three miles off!—this single little bird being more powerful than the belfry of a cathedral ringing for a new dean just appointed on account of shabby politics, small understanding and good family." Again, he writes that "the sloth, in its wild state, spends its life in trees, and never leaves them but from force or accident. The eagle to the sky, the mole to the ground, the sloth to the tree; but, what is most extraordinary, he lives not upon the branches, but under them. He moves suspended, rests suspended, sleeps suspended and passes his life in suspense—like a young clergyman distantly related to a bishop." The natural history may be bad, but the fun is excellent; and though Sydney Smith was a dignified clergyman, he was none the less the founder of the "new humour"—a fault which was not his own, and for which we cannot blame him.

Mr. George Russell's biography is adequate and sympathetic. He has selected his material with discretion, and has let Sydney Smith tell his own story as far as possible. Now and again the biographer permits his own prejudices to intervene, and so strikes a jarring note. It is not just to call Sydney Smith "a Philistine" because he does not look with a kindly eye upon missionaries and Methodists. Again, to say that Copley was "unscrupulous" is merely to repeat the foolish slander of partisans; and there is no excuse for the habit of exaggeration which can denounce Burke's "diatribes" against the French Revolution as "obscene," and can calmly speak of Swift's "beastliness." But the book is a coherent, intelligible account of a great man. "In ability," said Macaulay, "I should say that Jeffrey was higher, but Sydney rarer. I would rather have been Jeffrey; but there will be several Jeffreys before there is a Sydney." A rare compliment, and well deserved.

LETTERS OF JOHN RUSKIN TO CHARLES ELIOT NORTON

Two vols. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co., $4.00 net.)

In these volumes Professor Eliot Norton has given us an important addition to literature. The friendship between him and Mr. Ruskin endured for forty years, and was of the most intimate description. Ruskin writes more like a lover than an ordinary friend. His epistles generally begin "My dearest" and often "My darling Charles," and the little pouting quarrels and reconciliations are exactly such as are likely to occur between a man and his mistress. Pathetic they are from the very extent of time they cover. They began when Ruskin was a comparatively young man of thirty-five, already celebrated, but gay and hopeful, full of schemes of work and plans for the future; they end just before his death, when the old man, weary and thwarted and disappointed, looked forward not only with tranquillity, but almost with longing, to the time when at last he would be "in earth's soft arms reposing." The letters give a more intimate picture of the events of his pilgrimage than any formal biography could. They inspire us with a certain compassion. His parents, estimable though they were, were not in sympathy with what was best in their son. There is a little anecdote that sets the father before us:

"One evening at dinner, when the cloth was drawn, Mr. Ruskin, senior, in special honour of the occasion, had set before him a decanter of sherry from the cask which had been on board the Victory for Nelson's use in what were to be the last months of his life. Mr. Ruskin was always proud of his sherry, but this wine, of supreme excellence in itself, not only pleased his fine palate but touched his romantic fancy. It had been ripened on a fateful voyage, it had rocked to the thunder of the guns of Trafalgar; a glass of it might have moistened Nelson's dying lips. The old wine-merchant's appreciation of the associations which it evoked was a pleasant exhibition of his suppressed poetic sensibilities."

At that time Ruskin himself is described as possessed of "a sweet gentleness" and consideration for the wishes of others. He had not yet acquired the tone of dogmatism and arbitrary assertion that came to be manifest in his writing. His letters of the period fully carry out that impression. They are full of such sallies as this:

"Go to bed. Moonlight's quite a mistake; it is nothing when you are used to it. The moon is really very like a silver salver—no, more like a plated one half worn out and coppery at the edges. It is of no use to sit up to see that."

The life the letters describe is that of a studious and unworldly recluse whose interests are in art, architecture, letters and the like; too little, perhaps, in the individual human being. It is good for a man that he should bear the yoke in his youth, and if, by having to labour for his daily bread, Ruskin had at an early age been brought into contact with the bare necessities of life and had been obliged to know men as they are, he would probably have been saved from many mistakes afterwards. But he became heir to a fortune of £157,000, and so the stern schoolmistress Poverty had no opportunity of teaching him certain painful but most valuable lessons. We recognise the theorist even in such few judgments of men as appear in these volumes. No one who really knew humanity, for instance, could have bewailed the evil influence of "Don Quixote" in terms such as these:

"It always affected me throughout with tears, not laughter. It was always throughout, real chivalry to me; and it is precisely because the most touching valour and tenderness are rendered vain by madness, and because, thus vain, they are made a subject of laughter to vulgar and shallow persons, and because all true chivalry is thus by implication accused of madness and involved in shame, that I call the book so deadly."

The sentence is Ruskinian to the core, but it simply defies comment. It was the death of Dickens that led to this remark, and here is his opinion of Boz himself:

"It is Dickens's delight in grotesque and rich exaggeration which has made him, I think, nearly useless in the present day. I do not believe that he has made any one more good-natured. I think all his finest touches of sympathy are absolutely undiscovered by the British public; but his mere caricature, his liberalism, and his calling the Crystal Palace 'Fairylane' have had fatal effect and profound . . ."

But this sort of distress is that which arises only in the mind of the brooding solitary. And when he praises he is equally extreme, as when he declared of Carlyle that his words are "written in white-hot fire on every city-wall of Europe." On the contrary, every day seems to show more and more that much of Carlyle was writ in water. He, too, looked at one side, and one side only, till imagination magnified and distorted, and the clear eyes of reason were blinded.

But the passages in these letters that appear to us most unforgettable are those in which the gifted and earnest dreamer speculates on the great mystery of existence. Sad and melancholy are his musings on "the mystery of it all—the God's making of the great mind, and the martyrdom of it, and the uselessness of it all forever as far as human eye can see or thoughts travel." Meditation drove him to what many will think a sad and pessimistic conclusion. On October 10, 1869, he wrote:

"That I am no more immortal than a gnat, or a bell of heath, all nature, as far as I can read it, teaches me, and on that conviction I have henceforward to live my gnat's or heath's life.

"But that a power shaped both the heathbell and me, of which I know and can know nothing, but of which every day I am the passive instrument, and, in a permitted measure, also, the Wilful Helper or Resister—this, as distinctly, all nature teaches me, and it is, in my present notions of things, a vital truth."

In connection with this it is worth while reading his declaration about the Rubaiyat:

"Omar is very deep and lovely. But the Universe is not a shadow show, nor a game, but a battle of weary wounds and useless cries, and I am now in the temper that Omar would have been in, if somebody always stood by him to put mud into his wine, or break his amphora."

Whatever Ruskin's ultimate opinions might be, they did not militate against his resolve to do the best that was possible for his fellow men. Indeed, towards the later period of his life he grew to believe passionately that he had a mission to reform the political economy of the country, and in especial to undo the teaching of John Stuart Mill. Many of us think he would have done well to leave politics alone, but no one will attempt to deny that he, in the truest sense, lived a vita vitalis, a life worth living.

THE FALSTAFF LETTERS

By James White. (De La More Press, 1s. 6d. net.)

THIS delightful little book ought to be most cordially welcomed by all lovers of Charles Lamb, not only for its author's association with the god of their idolatry, but also for its own sake.

Who does not remember "My merry friend, Jem White," who instituted the annual dinner in Smithfield for the young chimney-sweepers, who "carried away with him half the fun of the world when he died—of my world at least," and who, having accosted Dodd, the "Aguecheek" of Lamb's day, with "Save you, Sir Andrew," received for reply "Away, fool!"? White, a schoolfellow of Lamb's at Christ's Hospital, must have been a fellow of infinite jest and one who appealed most strongly to the humorous side of Lamb's character, though there was a time when Lamb's response to his witticisms was not of the heartiest. Writing to Coleridge (January 28, 1798), with reference to a quarrel with Charles Lloyd, he says: "He (Lloyd) was hurt that I was not more constantly with him; but he was living with White, a man to whom I had never been accustomed to impart my dearest feelings, though from long habits of friendliness, and many a social and good quality, I loved him very much." Subsequently, however, the references to White were thoroughly appreciative, and Lamb appears to have lost no opportunity of recommending the "Letters" to his friends and acquaintances. His interest in the book continued almost up to his death, for we find him giving it to Landor on the latter's visit to him in September 1832.

One interesting fact has been omitted by the editor in his short account of the author. This was related by Mr. W. C. Hazlitt in his book "The Lambs." It appears that, on Lamb's appointment to the India House clerkship, his father became a surety in £500 in 1792, and in 1810 a fresh bondsman was required—Mr. Hazlitt thinks on promotion—and was found in the person of Mr. James White, "of Warwick Square, newspaper agent."

The chief interest of the "Falstaff Letters" for students of Lamb lies in the question how far Lamb was concerned in their composition; but beyond referring to the statements of Southey, Gutch and Mr. E. V. Lucas, the editor does not make any addition to our knowledge. Lamb's part, if any, was probably confined to the Dedication and Preface; otherwise we cannot understand his anxiety to help on the sale of the little book.

Most of the letters are supposed to have been written by Falstaff, the remainder by his friends, either to him or to others. These are very cleverly done, and it is astonishing how they could have been written by such a young man, for White was only about twenty when he composed them. Those from Falstaff are the most interesting, and are full of the humour of the fat knight; but two from Davy to his Master, Justice Shallow, are delightful. The one in which Davy describes the death of Abram Slender (caused by the rejection of his love-suit with sweet Anne Page) was singled out by Lamb as a good specimen of White's style, in his review of the book in "The Examiner" for September 5 and 6, 1819, a few months before White's death. Keeping in mind the fact of Fanny Kelly's rejection of Lamb's offer of marriage, a little less than two months previously, Lamb's comments have a very interesting personal application. "Or are you, reader, one who delights to drench his mirth in tears? You are, or, peradventure, have been a lover; a 'dismissed bachelor,' perchance, one that is 'lass-lorn.' Come, then, and weep over the dying bed of such a one as thyself. Weep with us the death of poor Abraham Slender."

We do not, however, think he wasted many "idle tears" over the failure of his own love-suit.

BOOKS AND THINGS: A COLLECTION OF STRAY REMARKS

By G. S. Street. (Duckworth & Co., 6s.)

MR. G. S. STREET is a good writer whose pose is the informal, as might be inferred from the seeming careless "Books and Things" and the "stray remarks" of his title. They sound as though he did not take himself seriously—an idea effectually exploded by his prodigal use of the first personal pronoun. He is, however, best when least self-conscious. For example, the papers on Fielding and Sterne, which consist of honest argument, are much superior to any of those which begin with some such personal statement as "It is commonly called the great public, but I am rather sorry for it and would show my sympathy," "I have been reading, &c., &c.," "'I am sick,' said I to the editor, 'of literary subjects,'" "It was nearly twenty years since I had visited it." Yet there is no law to be laid down on the subject. The problem in good writing is how to reveal personality without obtruding it. To take an example from the book before us, it is the charm and the greatness of Laurence Sterne that he is able to write himself on the page and that he has a self worth writing. The question so ingeniously discussed by Mr. Street, following Mr. Whibley and Mr. Miller, as to whether it was lack of courage or literary artifice that made Sterne play with the improper instead of either suppressing it altogether or being frank with the frankness of Rabelais, is of very minor importance. The greatness of Sterne as a writer lay in this: that in the whole of the "Sentimental Journey" and in certain immortal pages of "Tristram Shandy" he shows us life exactly as it appeared to his own eyes. But the small egoisms were shorn away as completely as they are in the plays of Shakespeare, where, though the writer is inscrutably veiled, we yet feel his personality in every line. All that the greatest author can do is to carry the reader to a high mountain and show him the world of men—dream, pageant, procession, or what you like to call it—exactly as it appears to his eyes. And if his greatness is to be measured at all, it is by the sweep and depth of his vision. In his estimate of Fielding that is what Mr. Street fails to take into account. For the qualities he possessed no one can overpraise Fielding. His style is for its purpose matchless, his picture of manners unapproached; but there is an inner sanctuary of life to which he had no access. It is where "the floor of heaven is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold"; it is where Juliet loves and Ophelia sings and weeps; it is the land of Scott's Lucy of Lammermuir and of all those beings who are compact of tears and blood. Fielding is simply the country gentleman of literature. Land and air and sky he loves, but with no more passion than he can infuse into his Sophia, his dear and wholesome and loveable Sophia. Compare her or Amelia either with Rebecca the Jewess, with Diana Vernon or the other famous heroines of Scott, and it is seen at once where Fielding falls short. The theme is so interesting as almost to carry us away from our subject. But it also bears on one point, that Fielding gave us what every sincere writer is bound to give—his personal equation. Only he does it unconsciously, and self-consciousness is perhaps the most flagrant characteristic of the modern school of which Mr. Street is a very distinguished member. He is so skilful, however, that it seems almost unfair to make him the object of our remarks, which apply more directly to the lower order of those who call themselves impressionists and are remarkable chiefly for the possession of a cherished "liver." They at all events take no pains to purge their small egoisms and conceive that they are modern and personal when "I finished breakfast with something of a headache and languidly, &c."

Another point on which it would be pleasant to argue with Mr. Street is in regard to the paper he calls Provincialism. He makes much ado about the proper definition of this word, but surely the meaning is simple enough. A provincial writer, whatever be his place of residence—Clapham or Pitsligo—is simply a writer for a tea-party. The subject does not matter at all. It might be the parish pump which bulks so much in the eye of the villager and shrinks into so small a space when allotted its just proportion. But the individual "liver" and general "melancholiousness" are in writing exactly what the pump is. He who exaggerates them has only a tea-party in his eye. We have no wish, however, to take leave of Mr. Street in a spirit of fault-finding. The literary essays in this volume, though, as we think, somewhat lacking in depth and clearness, are scholarly and clever, and they abound in "excellent good phrases." Even when we differ from the writer, we find him stimulating and suggestive, and many of these papers were worth reprinting.

THE MARTIAL CAREER OF CONGHAL CLÁIRINGHNEACH

Edited and Translated by Patrick M. MacSweeney, M.A.
(Published for the Irish Texts Society by David Nutt.
10s. 6d. net.)

AN interesting feature of Irish Epic, as Mr. MacSweeney remarks in his introduction, is "the variety and number of the minor sagas dealing with heroes of the second grade." Possibly the fact that the vehicle of the early Irish Epos is prose has not less to do with this than the number and individuality of the independent tribal communities. The story-teller was unhampered by any restrictions of metre; he poured forth his unpremeditated prose with an abundance as gratifying to the historical student of to-day as to the warrior of old; so that, in those happy days, it must have been a sorry hero indeed who lacked his sacred bard. Cuchulainn may have employed the cream of early Irish genius, but there remained enough to treat also of the doings of Conghal and of other heroes innumerable, some of whom may hardly have merited the posthumous renown they acquired at the hands of these chroniclers. That Conghal Cláiringhneach headed a revolt against the Ardrioh sometime in the first century B.C. is probably true enough; but it is doubtful whether we should have heard much of his exploits but for the struggles between the many provincial rulers for the kingship of Ireland in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. The Conghal saga is, in short, of political origin, even as the "Chanson de Roland" owed its origin to the necessity for glorifying the struggle of Christendom against the Saracen. Chronologically, it belongs to the pre-Cuchulainn stage of the Red Branch Cycle.

This volume appears to be the fifth issued by the Irish Texts Society. It is easy to admire the enthusiasm that prompted the editor in his labour and the completeness with which he has carried out his scheme. The book is produced as well as the most exacting of students could wish. It has preliminary matter enough to furnish out a small volume; then follows the text and translation of the saga, page by page; and finally some forty pages of notes, a glossary and index. For the student the labour was no doubt worth undertaking: the only point upon which the reviewer who is not "in the movement" is likely to join issue with the editor is upon the literary value of the story. In his Literary Study of the text, which Mr. MacSweeney includes amongst his numerous introductions, he speaks of the Conghal saga as a work of high perfection. "The incidents are full of dramatic force, and are so correlated as to sustain interest to the end. When we yield our imaginations to it, free from the bias and predilections of the almost morbidly introspective literature of to-day, we are conscious of a certain simple robustness of imagery which possesses a singular charm of its own." Simple robustness is a virtue common to most sagas; it is to be detected here also; but for dramatic force the honest seeker may look long, and go at the last unrewarded. And when the editor goes further, and speaks of the introduction of that "subjective note that is so strong a mark of modern literature," the honest reader can but admire his enthusiasm and marvel at his judgment. Historically the story has its value. A simple directness of diction may be conceded to its author; but the reader who looks for more—for dramatic force or for the modern subjective note—will inevitably be disappointed.

THE GROWTH OF THE MANOR

By Dr. P. Vinogradoff. (Swan Sonnenschein, 10s. 6d.)
EVER since Professor Vinogradoff published his "Villainage in England" in 1892, students have been expecting further contributions from him on the political antiquities of this country, and one now comes to us in the shape of lectures delivered at Oxford from the chair of the Corpus Professorship of Jurisprudence. In his former work Professor Vinogradoff dwelt more upon the comparative evidence, using Russian analogues to illustrate English difficulties. In his present work he dwells more upon the influences he sees on English soil. He estimates what was the position of the Celtic tribe founded upon kinship, what was the position of the Roman polity founded upon state organisation of an advanced type, what was the position of Teutonic and Scandinavian tribalism; and then he tries to disengage these elements and estimate the result on the growth of English institutions. His method and the mastery of the details of his subject combine to produce a notable book; but we confess to disappointment that he did not pursue to a greater extent the test of comparative polity. Where he now sees succession from a disestablished or displaced system, he would, we think, sometimes have discovered, under his older method, survival of primitive forms. And to this extent we regret that his unrivalled knowledge of both Slavonic and English institutions has not been put to its fullest use.

But everywhere the master hand is to be noticed. If he submits to the influence of Dr. Seebohm, he does not come under the uncontrolled power of Professor Maitland; and in those chapters where he discusses the legal aspect of the natural communities, he disposes of one of the strongest arguments against them by explaining how inquiries into the juridical character of the Sippe or the Maegth have been conducted "with an exaggerated sharpness of juridical definition and construction and a certain disregard of the peculiar setting given to juridical problems by place and time."

Dr. Vinogradoff gives to the Celtic evidence just that placing which was necessary if we are ever to understand what Celtic polity has done in the building up of the national constitution. It was not destroyed by the Romans. It was twisted, so to speak, from its place; it was, moreover, broken here and there, but it was never destroyed. There is no room, of course, in this view of the case for the exaggerated notions of Celtic influence which some scholars try to bring about, but equally there is plenty of room for a sound basis of legitimate research into Celtic modifications of the Teutonic settlement. Dr. Vinogradoff will have nothing to do with a pre-Celtic social organisation. If it existed, it was swept on one side without much to do, and fell in ultimately to a place in the Celtic polity. This is a subject upon which it is possible to argue, but not to dogmatise, and all we would say is that the evidence is not yet forthcoming for deciding the matter, and that the evidence is rather anthropological than historical.

The Manor comes in at the end of the series of natural social developments and lasts on well into the historical period. In the historical period it gets dated, legalised; handled by king and witan, church and lord; influenced by economic changes and by political events; and historians having attached the Manor to their domain, will not allow the anthropologist and the student of comparative politics to have much say in the matter. But, in spite of documents, there are more elements in the Manor than can be traced to historical origins. Dr. Vinogradoff understands this point well, and his fine study of manorial origins is worth, and will receive, the closest attention.

We have dealt with this work in its broad outlines rather than in its detail. But it is one of its greatest merits that, broad as it is in outline, it is full to the highest degree of the most valuable details. Documents have been overhauled in order to get from them every fact they can yield, and the result is that we have a mass of material brought together and classified in a manner which must remain of permanent value.

THE DICKENS COUNTRY

By Frederic G. Kitton. (Black, 6s.)

DICKENS

By W. Teignmouth Shore. Miniature Series of Great Writers. (Bell, 2s. & 1s.)

SYNOPSIS OF DICKENS' NOVELS

By J. W. McSpadden. (Chapman & Hall, 1s. 6d. net.)

THE charming volume that stands first on the list is compact of sadness and of pleasure; it is sad reading because it is the last touch of a vanished hand, and it is full of pleasure because it is of the same high order of excellence as was all the work that was done by the late Frederic George Kitton. Mr. Arthur Waugh has performed with great tact and true sympathy the delicate task of writing a memorial introduction, adding to our regret for the untimely death of an accurate scholar regret for the world being made the poorer by the loss of "a true and generous man." Of Mr. Kitton's services to all lovers and students of Dickens it is not necessary to speak, but it is indeed pleasant to be able to record, not out of any kindness to the dead, but of sheer justice, that in "The Dickens Country" we have a work worthy of the subject and of the writer.

The more we learn of Dickens' life the more we are able to understand the method of his work, for no other English writer of fiction embodied in his stories so much of his experiences of life and of his knowledge of places; indeed, to read the story of Dickens' career from boyhood to his death is to read a commentary on his novels of unexampled value and interest. With both human beings and with localities Mr. Kitton has dealt in this volume, telling in brief the biography of the novelist, tracing him from home to home, from the earliest days at Landport, where he was born, to the latest at Gad's Hill, where, pen in hand, he died. As each place is mentioned he tells us what part it played in Dickens' stories; so is it with each person and with many an incident. Strangely enough, however, in dealing with London, Mr. Kitton has practically confined himself to those buildings and quarters of the town with which Dickens was personally connected, leaving untouched the many places which are described in the novels yet which formed no part of Dickens' recorded life. But a difficulty had to be faced: had Dickens' London been entirely covered, there would have been no room for aught else in this volume; also many identifications are matter of guesswork and of controversy, whereas Mr. Kitton was a lover of fact even when he was criticising fiction. Nor are Dickens' foreign residences, in Italy, Switzerland, France, more than touched upon; and the same course is pursued with regard to America. Perhaps it would have been well to have given us a little less concerning Dickens and a little more about his foreign travels, which were not entirely without influence upon his work. The pages tracing "The Lazy Tour of Two Idle Apprentices" are amongst the most interesting in the book. We should very much like to know on what grounds the King's School at Canterbury is identified with Doctor Strong's, and his private residence with "an old building at the corner (No. 1) of Lady Wootton's Green." In "Copperfield" we read, "I went . . . to the scene of my future studies—a grave building in a courtyard, with a learned air about it." Where, there were tall iron rails and gates outside the house, great stone urns flanking them, a red-brick wall and so on. Also that "the school-room was a pretty large hall, on the quietest side of the house," "commanding a peep of an old, secluded garden." Now surely this reads that house and school were sheltered under one roof and in no way points to the King's School? At Canterbury a cottage in North Lane is pointed out as the 'umble 'ome of the 'umble Uriah Heep, but of this Mr. Kitton makes no mention, and, indeed, the matter is one of considerable doubt.

That so large a portion of this book is devoted to the country towns and the country-side serves to remind the reader of what is too often forgotten—that, devoted lover of London as Dickens was, he was not only intimately acquainted with several of our counties, notably Kent, but also that country sights and sounds held a large place in his large heart; town vagabonds were a delight to him, so were the tramps and other itinerants who frequented country roads. Some of Dickens' most brilliant descriptive writing was of country scenes, and that he was a close and accurate observer of nature we know from the famous storm in "Copperfield," admired by Ruskin.

The illustrations to this volume are, on the whole, excellent, though we do not understand on what grounds is given the fancy picture of young Dickens at work in the blacking-factory. As we turn from picture to picture it is saddening to note how year by year Dickens' localities are being changed and Dickens' homes and haunts being swept away. "The Golden Cross" of today, both in itself and its surroundings, is scarcely recognisable as one with the hostelry of 1827; Dickens' and Bob Sawyer's home in Lant Street is no more; Furnival's Inn has been entirely rebuilt, with advantage only from the point of view of beauty (no mention is made of Thackeray's famous visit to Dickens); Jack Straw's Castle has been modernised—odious word and odious deed; Tavistock House has been pulled down; the old office of "Household Words" is a victim of the London County Council—a dreary tale to tell and here told but partially. Still, the Dickens pilgrim has left him many a shrine to visit; he can tramp the streets of London, visiting with Dickens, or with the children of his imagination, many a delightful old-world corner. To Canterbury, Dover, Broadstairs; to Ipswich, to Yarmouth, to many a pleasant place he may journey; and wherever he may list to go, he should carry this book with him—a sure and faithful guide, and a pleasant travelling-companion. Would that there were more to come from the same pen, as indeed there may be, for Mr. Waugh mentions a valuable MS. dictionary of Dickens topography. We understand that this MS. is now in America and that it is hoped that arrangements will be made for its publication. As with all Mr. Kitton's work, the MS. is so carefully written that the intervening hand of the "editor" will scarce be needed. For this book to come we shall keep a vacant place next to the volume here reviewed.

Mr. W. Teignmouth Shore's "Dickens" in Bell's "Miniature Series of Great Writers" is a model of what such a little book should be. Mr. Teignmouth Shore knows his subject thoroughly; his admiration is tempered by sound judgment, his praise is never exaggerated and he contrives to give a true impression of the life of his author without setting out subjects and incidents that less adroit people might have thought it necessary to mention. The book, in fact, is marked by scholarship, critical ability and good taste.

As to the "Synopsis of Dickens' Novels" of Mr. J. Walker McSpadden, we know not whether more to admire the compiler's desire to be useful or his solemnity. The man who can sit down and draw up a synopsis of "Pickwick" must surely be an agelast of the worst! And yet Mr. McSpadden is not that; he has, clearly, a sense of the humour of the thing. The most fatal consideration is that Dickens' plots are exactly what no one wants to know or to remember, and while the lists of characters and the short bibliographical notes may be useful to some, we can see no good purpose likely to be served by the remainder of the book.

Fiction

THE BELL IN THE FOG

And other Stories. By Gertrude Atherton. (Macmillan, 6s.) "Authors," observes Mrs. Atherton, generalising gloriously in the eponymous story of this collection, "are far closer to the truths enfolded in mystery than ordinary people, because of that very audacity of imagination which irritates their plodding critics." There are certainly some truths enfolded in mystery, to the explanation of which the present critic is no closer, for all his plodding, than when he began, and the greatest mystery of all is the book itself. It is extraordinary that a writer who has made for herself so considerable a reputation should deliberately republish four old magazine stories, eked out with five apparently new ones and a prologue to an unwritten play, evidently intended to be a dramatised version of her finest novel, "The Conqueror." The stories are not bad, considered as magazine stories. They show, most of them, something of Mrs. Atherton's characteristic qualities—a certain rough power of presentation and an insight into character, especially feminine character. But there is no unifying thought running through all this miscellany. In some we are taken to that mysterious borderland, the "great pale world" which Mr. Henry James has treated with exquisite subtlety in "The Two Magics" and Lucas Malet in "The Gateless Barrier." But Mrs. Atherton's art is not delicate enough for such a theme; neither, to speak plainly, is her mastery over the English language sufficient. "His ego raised its goose-flesh," she says in one place; and, again, "They harlequined their misgivings and were happy when together"; while what are we to say of the word "literally" in "His grey eyes seemed literally to send forth smoke"?

YESTERDAY'S TO-MORROW

By Dora Greenwell McChesney. (Dent, 4s. 6d. net.) A sharp American lady has recently said that the historical novel is remarkable for its lack of history and novelty, and we fear that Miss Dora Greenwell McChesney's would-be romance of the Restoration will not, in the main, disprove this statement. But it is extremely likely to prove a popular book none the less, for the clever people who like simple novels of theatrical action are many, and their voice is a power in literature. Without disclosing the main plot, we may say that the most effective idea in the book is that connected with the return of a strenuous Cavalier at the time of Charles I., one who has fought from Nottingham to Naseby, and has served as a slave for some twenty years to the latitudinous Court of Charles II. Like all of the many characters in this book—the King and Rupert, the ardent lovers, the courtiers, the Quakers, and so forth—the returned and mysterious Cavalier gives one the impression that he has learnt his part well and plays it for all he is worth, but that the footlights glare upon his endeavours. For, notwithstanding the author's obvious sincerity and interest in her subject, her knowledge of the period, her lush sentiment and popular style, she fails to convince us that her people are of flesh and blood. "Yesterday's To-morrow" is always "a drama of the Restoration" as it lately appeared on the stage of, shall we say, the Imperial, with excellent effects of lighting and curtains that come pat upon a situation. With nicely adjusted theatrical sentiment and a continuous pageantry of historical characters passing up and down to the music of "Shirley's solemn dirge":—

"The glories of our birth and state
Are shadows, not substantial things;
There is no armour against fate;
Death lays his icy hand on kings."

THE CHILD ANDREA

By Karin Michaëlis. Translated from the Danish by John Nilsen Laurvik. (Duckworth, 3s. 6d.) In spite of the loss that is invariably entailed by the medium of translation—and in this case the loss is considerable, for the book has been rendered into ungrammatical American—it is always interesting to make the acquaintance of a new foreign writer, because he comes to us with two-fold credentials—the enthusiasm of the translator and the judicious acceptance of the English publisher. This story, though quite short, contains proof that Karin Michaëlis is an artist. The idea of it is simple and profound. Karstin and Jutta have a child, Andrea, a grown-up daughter to whom each is jealously devoted; but there is no link of love or sympathy between either. The child dies, and sorrow draws the father and mother nearer to one another than they had been before: not so much the sorrow at her death (and the point is significant) as sorrow that her last days were made more terrible by her knowledge of their disagreement. Vigour of imagination is displayed in the delineation of all three characters. They abound with subtle touches, but the invention of devices—the machinery of the story—is not on the same level as the rest of the work: especially do we take exception to the grandmother's letter to Andrea, which she is never able to read, telling her exactly why it is that her father and mother are not happy together. The importance of the letter in the novel is obvious, but we are not at all convinced that an old woman would under any circumstances write thus to a dying child, and this troubles the illusion of reality which is essential to a novel of this type. Hence the book leaves us with the impression that it is the work of a genuine artist, but of an artist who has not yet attained to a full mastery of his craft.

DIANE

By Katharine Holland Brown. (Heinemann, 6s.) This novel is "A Romance of the Karian Settlement on the Mississippi River": a small body of French colonists with communistic views who had been brought to America by Père Cabet; and the story opens in 1856, when most of them were thoroughly tired of him and of the artificial equality enforced under his despotic rule. Diane is his beautiful ward, and as she wears silks and muslins while all the other women must wear sackcloth or its equivalent she is naturally not popular. But the schisms of the commune pale in interest beside the affairs of the American Abolitionists who come into the story. In 1856 to be an Abolitionist was as bad as to be a thief. So there is a divided interest. In one chapter Robert Channing is carrying runaway slaves to safety; in the next Père Cabet is preaching his flock into rebellion. The petty affairs of the Icarians and the quarrel that shall shake the States run side by side. Their separate currents meet in the loves of Robert and Diane. The value of the story depends on its description of the Commune, and to English readers on its sympathy with the intimate, tremendous issues forced on American men and women by the abolition of slavery. Rose Faulkner, the girl who loves Channing but abhors his views and deeds, illustrates the struggle as it presented itself to the individual, riving old affections, breaking old ties. The novel is worth reading for the sake of its pictures of people so near us in point of time, so immeasurably removed from us in sentiment and surroundings. They have charm.

OLD GORGON GRAHAM

By George Horace Lorimer. (Methuen, 6s.) "No man's a failure till he's dead or loses his courage, and that's the same thing." "There's only one place in the world where you can live a happy life, and that's inside your income." "Books are all right, but dead men's brains are no good unless you mix a live one's with them." The Chicago pork-packer has been writing letters to his son again, letters of wit and wisdom. Every boy in the Empire ought to read them, and for that matter every girl, because the qualities the old merchant demands of his son are the qualities a nation wants of all her citizens. It is true that the letters are written by a wealthy business man who considers success in trade the young man's highest goal. The great spiritual ideals are untouched, are perhaps unseen by the hustler. But, to be honest and wise and to work hard is very excellent morality, and never can be preached too widely. Mr. Graham preaches well because he wraps his sermon in such amusing epigrams that you swallow it laughing. When you shut the book you wish the vigorous, kindly, caustic old man was your personal friend; you believe that "though the world has some pretty rotten spots on its skin, it's sound at the core," and you know that the best way to keep it sound is for you to be shrewd and straight and energetic. Incidentally, too, the game pays. "I've found that this is a mighty big world for a square man and a mighty small world for a crooked one." Simple sentiments and healthy. But it was rather unkind of Mr. Graham to lend money to his son's worthless friend and charge the loan to his son's account.

THE GOLDEN BOWL

By Henry James. (London: Methuen, 6s.) Mr. Henry James has here put forward the most important work, in point of bulk and complexity, which he has issued for some time. It is, indeed, the longest novel we have of late years read; close-packed, full of matter, elaborated with remarkable and meticulous precision of labour. It is no novel which he who runs may read. Its every page exacts of the reader concentration; it must be followed with care and patience; nor can the critic without much diffidence judge on a first reading work of such a scale and prepared with so manifest, so conscientious a deliberation. For it is pre-eminently Henry James, and Henry James of the latest, the most difficult refinement. The plot is cunningly contrived, artfully interwoven. Perhaps for "plot" we should say "situation," since (as in all James novels) it is the evolution of character under the development of a situation rather than plot in the usual sense, which is the groundwork of the story. A James situation is always subtle; but this is intricately subtle—so intricate in its subtlety as to intimidate any attempt at brief description or analysis. It is the case of a couple (an Italian Prince and an Anglo-American girl) forced into a false position by a love affair preceding the Prince's marriage to an American heiress; a love affair concealed from the bride, who is the Anglo-American girl's bosom friend. Conceive that the latter girl afterwards marries the bride's millionaire father, is thus brought into permanent relation with the Prince and his bride, and that circumstances drift her into renewing her former connection with the Italian—you then have but a part, the most obvious part, of the tangled web woven by Mr. James. The interest is heightened by the fact that all the four people thus netted in domestic tragedy—indeed, all the chief people of the story—are in their varying measure sympathetic to the reader. The issue (as one foreknows in a James novel) is partial and unsatisfying as life itself. The emotion, the tragedy, though keen, is never violent, never full-blooded. Mr. James knows that modern domesticity is a thing of half-tints, even in its suffering: it bleeds, but it does not bleed red. The "Golden Bowl" is a crystal vessel cased in gold, which plays a part in the tale with somewhat Ibsen-like symbolism; a crystal vessel with a secret flaw, which finally shatters—allegorising the character and fate of the Italian Prince. Not only in length and elaboration is this a novel which claims attention, even among Mr. Henry James's work. As the plot, so is the execution, subtly intricate. Often, alas! but too much so! Mr. James' later work has frequently carried his peculiar qualities to a baffling extreme, and much of this book has the defects of those qualities harassingly in evidence. The intellectuality overpowers the sensuous and objective traits proper to a novel, until one has the impression of reading an abstruse treatise of psychology rather than a tale. The reader is never for a moment allowed to "take it easy." He is required to be alert always and at all points. Even the inverted commas, to which the schoolgirl looks as marking the green oases in the sands of narration, betoken for him no relaxation of vigilance. We know that in life people often answer to each other's meaning rather than to the thing actually spoken; that you may have passages of dialogue wherein the actual words are but signposts pointing to the intended significance. Especially is this the case with very cultivated intelligence or very uncultivated intelligence, where the sense and habit of language is very trained or very untrained. In the one case it is an art of delicate suggestion, in the other a groping for expression. Mr. Meredith, at his best, handles this manner of dialogue admirably; so, in his separate way, can Mr. James. But in this book it is at times pushed to a nebulousness, a tenuity, which gives one the feeling of walking on tight-ropes. Moreover, people, after all, talk in this way but at moments, under stress of some withheld emotion, impelled by some particular motive. But here people often propound enigmas to each other for page after page, till the wearied reader rebels. Then, too, Mr. James' extraordinary gift in detecting and expressing the most evanescent complexities of psychological feeling, subconscious or unconscious thought, has seemingly become such a passion that he cannot for an instant disembarass himself of it. It overpowers his instinct of proportion: he must analyse everything, important or trivial, with like minuteness and like prolixity. Thus you have page upon page in which the game is beautifully played, but the game was really not worth the candle. Nay, at one point there is the (we should think) unparalleled exhibition of three successive chapters almost wholly engrossed by analysis and unbroken by a single conversation. It is magnificent, but it is scarcely novel-writing. Also, Mr. James' faculty of finessing with and reducing to psychological abstractions what with any other would be the most pedestrian commonplaces of statement, in association with these other things grows rather appalling to the jaded attention of the much-tried reader. But his analysis, in the proper place, triumphs. A father marries his daughter's young friend mainly to satisfy his daughter; and we believe it, for Mr. James persuades us of its truth. When he does concentrate on his story there is the old power and art. He is admirable in sureness and cumulative convincingness: through all the intricate evolutions and changes of emotional situation, which from another hand would seem artificial as a Congreve comedy, he guides us with perfect persuasion of natural truth. Despite exasperations of detail, the novel in the main is masterly. The three leading women are differentiated with the nicest skill: each is living and persuasive. The Prince, in a position somewhat recalling that of Tito Melema, never forfeits the reader's sympathy, or appears less than a natively high-minded man—a Southern man. But the women are the success of the novel. To analyse its charm, its power, is far less easy than to note its defects. But it fairly ranks as a master-work—if a master-work flawed by some of his obscurest later mannerisms. It is not built for popularity; but no lover of Mr. Henry James can neglect it without loss. It is a last word of subtlety, marred at times by subtlety out of place.

Short Notices

THE UNEMPLOYED: A NATIONAL QUESTION

By Percy Alden, M.A. (P. S. King & Son, 1s. 6d.)

It is by no means to depreciate this clear and well-balanced little book to say that perhaps the most important sentence it contains is in Sir John Gorst's preface—a sentence which forcibly struck the writer of this note when recently Sir John was discussing this question with him: "Nothing degenerates from lack of use faster than the capacity to work." Who has not observed this for himself on return from a holiday? (The right word, by the way, is not "degenerates," but "atrophies.")

Accepting, then, the view that the unemployed constantly tend to become the unemployable, Mr. Alden has approached the question in a liberal fashion, carefully avoiding the opportunity to make political capital of his subject. Indeed, he is indebted to opponents on the fiscal question so irreconcilable as Mr. Chamberlain and Sir John Gorst.

Once we realised—as indeed the author's name certified—that he approached this problem in scientific fashion, we turned to the chapter on the therapeutics of this grave disorder of the body politic. Since the volume was in type, a newspaper has published some details of Mr. Walter Long's proposed enactment to deal with unemployment, and it is a satisfaction to observe no small measure of congruity between the forthcoming Bill and Mr. Alden's views. The spectacle of unemployment, causing not merely direct misery to the innocent, but moral degradation of its subjects, as Sir John Gorst indicates—and this in the twentieth century and the incomparable land where money always abounds for charitable purposes, but where the scientific treatment of charitable impulses is yet in embryo—sometimes causes one to think that, pace Leibnitz, this is the worst of all possible worlds; but recent indications serve to show that wiser views are beginning to prevail; and we can really seek no better cause for hope than in a phenomenon so striking as this synchronism between the expression of the views of a non-partisan thinker, and the promulgation of Mr. Long's Bill. This is a quite striking exception to the general rule that the English politician is commonly just two generations behind the thinker. But, of course, Mr. Alden is on the Mansion House Unemployed Committee.

RELIGION FOR ALL MANKIND

By Charles Voysey. (Longmans, 2s. net.) In a volume of 224 pages, dedicated "in all humility" to the Supreme Being, the Rev. Charles Voysey has undertaken to provide a "religion for all mankind, based on facts which are never in dispute." At the same time he informs us on page 9 of his preface that "It is the right and duty of every man to think for himself in matters of religion." It is difficult to understand how these essentially contradictory theses can be maintained; and, in fact, they are not maintained, save by eclectic methods of belief as fairly open to criticism as those Mr. Voysey seeks to combat. The subject matter is of too controversial a nature to be discussed in these pages from a theological point of view; and it would involve a triangular debate, in which the orthodox believer in revelation and the philosophic doubter would equally oppose Mr. Voysey's conclusions. There are doubtless minds which are satisfied with the theistic hypothesis, and to them Mr. Voysey's statement of the case will be welcome. That it will convince any scientific thinker, or prove more than a stone to many who ask for bread, is difficult of belief.

Monthly Prize Competition

REGULATIONS.

WE shall give, until further notice, a monthly prize, value £1 1s., for the best criticism of a specified book. The prize will take the form of a £1 1s. subscription to Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son's Circulating Library. In the case of any prize-winner living too far from the nearest branch of this library, or for any other good reason not desiring to subscribe to it, the subscription will be transferred to another library, to be chosen by the prize-winner. If already a subscriber to a library, the guinea will run from end of present subscription or be added to it at once. The prize-winner will be sent an order on the library selected, a cheque for £1 1s. being forwarded with proper notification to the proprietors. The winning criticism will be printed, with the writer's name, in the ACADEMY AND LITERATURE. Style and independence of view will be chiefly taken into account in awarding the prize. We need not remind competitors that they are not called upon to buy the selected books, but can obtain them from a library.

RULES.

1. The criticism must not exceed eight hundred words or be less than five hundred.
2. All communications must be addressed to "The Competition Editor, THE ACADEMY, 5 Southampton Street, Strand, London, W.C."
3. The Editor's judgment in awarding the prize must be considered final.
4. The MS. must be clearly written by hand, or typewritten, on one side only of the paper.
5. No competitor can win the prize more than once in three months. In case a previous prize-winner sends in the best criticism, his (or her) paper will be printed, the prize going, however, to the next best sent in by a non-prize-winner.
6. The competition coupon must be filled in and sent with the MS. (See page 3 of Cover.)

SUBJECT FOR FOURTH COMPETITION

VIVIAN GREY. By Lord Beaconsfield.

Competitors' MSS. must reach the office not later than February 13.

Books Received

Art

The Masterpieces of Van Dyck. Brimley Johnson, 0/6 net. (Reproductions of sixty Hanfstaengl photographs.)

Biography

- Shore, W. Teignmouth, Dickens. Bell, 1/0. (See Review, page 127.)
Simpkinson, C. H., Thomas Harrison, Regicide and Major-General (Temple Biographies). Dent, 4/6.
Russell, George W. E., Sydney Smith. Macmillan, 2/0 net. (See Review, page 122.)
Fitzgerald, Percy, Lady Jean: a Study of the Douglas Cause. Unwin, 21/0 net. (The pith of the Great Douglas Cause was whether Lady Jane Douglas, who married at or about the age of fifty, was really the mother of the twin boys, whom she produced as heirs to her brother's estates.)
Pollard, A. F., Thomas Cranmer and the English Reformation, 1489-1556. "Heroes of the Reformation." Putnam, 6/0.
Dobson, Austin, Diary and Letters of Mme. D'Arblay, Vol. III. Macmillan, 10/6.
Scott, A. MacCallum, Winston Spencer Churchill. Methuen, 3/6.
Dent, Edward J., Alessandro Scarlatti: his Life and Works. Arnold, 12/6 net. (A scholarly and interesting life of a musician whose biography has never before received proper attention in England. Plentiful extracts from Scarlatti's music.)
Kitton, Frederic G., The Dickens Country. Black, 6/0. (See Review, page 126.)

Economics

Ackworth, W. M., The Elements of Railway Economics. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 2/0 net. (A text-book of railway economics, the need of which struck Mr. Ackworth as lecturer at the London School of Economics.)

Educational

Ellery, T. B., The "Council" Arithmetic for Schools, Parts III. and IV., Scheme B. Black, 0/3.

Fiction

- Jackson, Wilfred S., Helen of Troy. New York: John Lane, 6/0. (An amusing farcical tale of how Paul Arden, who had a taste for private theatricals, was drawn into a duel as second, and made use of his histrionic gifts to escape the consequences.)
Meade, L. T., Little Wife Hester. John Long, 6/0. (So far as we can discover from the defective copy sent us, there is nothing to distinguish this from the other medical stories of this author.)
Cleeve, Lucas, Stolen Waters. Unwin, 6/0. (An "unpleasant" story of a clergyman who drinks and a girl with a "past"; but it is cleverly written.)
McCutcheon, George Barr, The Sherrada. Ward Lock, 6/0. (A man and his two wives: one in England, the other in Chicago.)
Barnes-Grundy, Mabel, The Vacillations of Hazell. Simpkin, Marshall & Co., 6/0. (Mild but amusing. The story seems largely to consist of spring cleaning.)
Atherton, Gertrude, The Bell in the Fog, and Other Stories. Macmillan, 6/0. (See Review, page 128.)
Wilson, M. F., When the World went Wry. Sonnenschein, 6/0. (A very mild story, suitable for girls.)
Mott, F. B., Before the Crisis. John Lane, 6/0. (An amateurish story of John Brown, the abolitionist hero, by an American author.)
Lane, Elinor McCartney, Nancy Stair. Heinemann, 6/0.
Fitzpatrick, Kathleen, The Weans at Rowallan. Methuen, 6/0.
Ystride, G., Three Dukes. Unwin, 6/0. (See Review, page 128.)
James, Henry, The Golden Bowl. Methuen, 6/0. (See Review, page 129.)
Brown, Katharine Holland, Diane. Heinemann, 6/0. (See Review, page 128.)
Holdsworth, Annie E., A New Paola and Francesca. Lane, 6/0.

Gardening

McIver, D. Grant, Pruning, Training, and Trimming Trees and Shrubs. Dawbarn & Ward, 0/6.

History and Archaeology

- Wall, J. Charles, Shrines of British Saints. Methuen, 7/6 net. (A new volume of "The Antiquary's Books.")
Daly, Augustus A., The History of the Isle of Sheppey. Simpkin, Marshall & Co., 2/6 net.
Griffin, A. P. C., Select List of References on Impeachment. Library of Congress, Washington.
Bain, Nisbet R., Scandinavia: a History of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden from 1513 to 1900. Cambridge Historical Series. Cambridge University Press, 7/6.

Okakura-Kakuzo, The Awakening of Japan. Murray, 5/0.
Ford, Worthington Chauncey, Papers of James Monroe. Library of Congress, Washington.

Literary

Gibbs, Philip, Facts and Ideas: Short Studies of Life and Literature. Arnold, 3/6. (Able short papers, originally contributed to various periodicals with the object of introducing young people, working men, and others to various branches of study.)

Miscellaneous

Latham, Edward, Who Said That? A Dictionary of Famous Sayings, with their Sources. Routledge.

Military

Fraser, David, A Modern Campaign. Methuen, 6/0. (Mr. Fraser was sent by "The Times" to establish the wireless telegraphy station at Wei-hai-wei, and afterwards accompanied Kuroki's army.)
Villiers, Frederic, Port Arthur: Three Months with the Besiegers. Longmans, 7/6 net.

Poetry

Carryl, Guy Wetmore, The Garden of Years. Putnam, 6/0. (There is sterling vigour and much lyrical beauty in these verses by a young American author, recently deceased.)

Reprints and New Editions

Wordsworth, William, Resolution and Independence. Lane, 1/6 net.
Adam, L. Gowans, The Hundred best Poems. R. Brimley Johnson, 0/6 net.
Die Besten Gedichte. R. Brimley Johnson, 0/6 net.
Smiles, Samuel, Lives of the Engineers, George and Robert Stephenson: Lives of the Engineers, Boulton and Watt. Murray, 3/6 each.
Schreiner, Olive, Trooper Peter Halket, of Mashonaland. T. Fisher Unwin, 1/0 net. (Uniform with the new issue of Mark Rutherford's books.)
The Lamb Shakespeare for Young People: The Tempest. De la More Press, 1/6 net.
The Robert Browning Calendar and Birthday Book, selected by M. E. Gibbings. De la More Press, 2/6 net.
White, James, The Falstaff Letters. De la More Press, 1/6 net. (See Review, page 124.)

Science

Caton, Richard, M.D., F.R.C.P., (1) I-em-hotep and Ancient Egyptian Medicine; (2) Prevention of Valvular Disease. The Harveian Oration, June 21, 1904. Cambridge University Press, 3/0 net.
Grimaldi, A. B., M.A., Catalogue of Zodiacs and Planispheres Ancient and Modern. Gall & Inglis, 2/0 net.

Sociology

Report of Proceedings at the Sixth Congress of the International Co-Operative Alliance.

Theology

- Burton, Ernest de Witt, Principles of Literary Criticism and the Synoptic Problem (The Decennial Publications). University of Chicago Press, $1 net.
Purvis, the Rev. David, The Life Everlasting. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 4/0 net. (Papers on the Life Everlasting, Resurrection, and Future Life and Immortality in Literature.)
Burn, A. E., D.D., Niceta of Remesciana: his Life and Works. Cambridge University Press, 9/0 net. (Editio Princeps based on many new manuscripts: the introduction occupies 160 pages. Niceta was the author of the Te Deum.)
Voysey, Charles, Religion for all Mankind. Based on facts which are never in dispute. Longmans, 2/0 net. (Written to replace the book entitled "Mystery of Pain, Death, and Sin," now out of print. See Review, page 130.)
Wood, Irving F., The Spirit of God in Biblical Literature: a Study in the History of Religion. Hodder & Stoughton, 6/0. (By the Professor of Biblical Literature and Comparative Religion in Smith College, Northampton, Mass. Part I.: The Spirit of God in Hebrew Thought. Part II.: The Spirit of God in New Testament Thought. Part III.: The author's conclusions, briefly stated and without technicalities. A short bibliography.)
Church History in Luganda. S.P.C.K., 1/4. (A translation by the Rev. Henry Wright Duta Kitakula of Robertson's "Sketches of Church History during the First Six Centuries.")
Ekitabo Ekitageza Katekismu Eye Kanisa. S.P.C.K., 0/6. (A translation into Luganda by the Rev. F. Rowling, of Norris's "Manual on the Prayer-Book.")
Wordsworth, John, D.D., Teaching of the Church of England on some Points of Religion. Arabic-English Edition, translated by the Rev. Simon Stephen. S.P.C.K., 2/0.
Ukubamba Kwenposi Nomsindisi Wetu. S.P.C.K., 1/0. (A translation into Zulu of Father Osborne's "The Children's Saviour.")
Mitchell, E. J. Murray, Shukuda Za Dini Ya Kimasihi. S.P.C.K., 1/4. (Evidence of the Christian religion in Swahili.)
Hallifax, Sydney, The Heart of Humanity. Brimley Johnson, 5/0 net. (Thoughtful essays, somewhat "liberal" in tone, by an author of wide reading and considerable freshness of ideas.)

Topography and Travel

Khan, Hadji, With the Pilgrims to Mecca. John Lane, 12/6. (The journey of Hadji Khan, special correspondent of "The Morning Post," and Mr. Wilfrid Sparrow, in 1902. Introduction by Professor A. Vambéry.)

Periodicals

"Abstracts of the Proceedings of the Geological Society of London." "Notes and Queries." "The British Journal of Photography." "Connoisseur." "Casell's Magazine." "Chambers's Journal." "Independent." "Fortnightly Review." "Every Boy's Monthly" (0/1; a new venture in the production of a cheap monthly magazine for boys. Copiously illustrated. Containing an instalment of a story by Sir A. Conan Doyle). "Cornhill Magazine." "Cunard Christmas and New Year Atlantic Souvenir." "Journal of Theological Studies." "Century Illustrated." "Home Magazine of Fiction." "Pearson's Magazine." "Manchester Quarterly." "Harper's Monthly Magazine." "Macmillan's Magazine." "Temple Bar." "Windsor Magazine." "Commonwealth." "Isis." "New York Times Saturday Review." "Surveyor." "Antiquary." "Occult Review." "Blackwood's Magazine." "Lippincott's Monthly Magazine." "Cambridge University Reporter." "Dawn of Day." "Harper's Weekly." "Bookman." "Collector's Magazine." "Journal of the Royal Colonial Institute." "Myos Review." "Boston Museum of Fine Arts Bulletin." "Bibelot." "Westminster Review." "Bookman" (Cervantes Number). "Gardener." "Indian Sociologist." "Dana." "Golden Sunbeams." "Macmillan's Magazine." "Nature." "Educational Times." "To-day" (February 1, 1905. The first of the new series at 0.1). "Sale Prices" (supplement to "The Connoisseur"),

"School World," "Book Monthly," "Buddhism," "Independent Review," "United Service Magazine," "Library," "Library Assistant," "Burlington Magazine," "Geographical Journal," "Fortnightly Review," "Books of To-day and the Books of To-morrow," "Notes and Queries," "Author," "Architectural Review," "Transactions of the Essex Archaeology Society," "Index of the Archaeological Papers," "Cambridge University Press Bulletin."

Sport

White, Stewart Edward, The Mountains. Hodder & Stoughton, 7/6 net. (Sporting experiences of a party on the West Coast of North America. Well and vigorously written by the author of "The Blazed Trail," and illustrated by Fernand Lungren.)

Foreign

Educational

Biese, Dr. Alfred, Römische Elegiker. Leipzig: G. Freytag, 1m. 20pf. Siepmann, Primary French Course, Part II. Macmillan, 2/6.

Fiction

Georget, Alphonse, Emancipées: Mœurs Parisiennes. Lemerre, 3f.50c. (Another volume of the "Pages de la Vie contemporaine.")

Theological

Brandon-Salvador, Marguerite, A Travers les Mémoires. Paris: Félix Alcan, 4f. (Extracts from the Old Testament, the Talmud, the Apocryphal and medieval authors for each day in the year.) Sabatier, Paul, Examen de Quelques Travaux Récents sur les opuscules de Saint François. Paris: Fischbacher.

Economics

Guiraud, Paul, Etudes Economiques sur l'Antiquité. Paris: Hachette, 3f.50c.

Periodicals

"Le Courrier Européen," "La Vérité sur le Congo," "Deutsche Rundschau," "Altpreussische Monatschrift," "Mercure de France," "Le Mois Scientifique," "Norsk Familie Journal."

Catalogues

Bernard Quaritch, Francis Edwards, Bertram Dobell, Douglas & Foulis, Charles Higham.

The Man Richard Strauss

Not the musician, the composer, the conductor, the artist or the creator, but just the Man, as he lives and moves and has his being. Richard Strauss, although he is beyond all question the one great dominating figure in the world of music to-day, does not at first sight suggest the typical musician. He is not burly and leonine as were Beethoven and Rubinstein; neither is he delicate and chétif like Chopin or Mozart; but the initial impression, which on nearer acquaintance is fully confirmed, is that of an essentially thinking man whose genius might take the form of literature maybe, or perchance painting, but certainly not music.

Rather above the middle height, fair in complexion, with deep-set eyes of a palish blue, short hair over an exceptionally high forehead, a small sandy moustache, a straight, small nose and firm lips. Such is the bare portrait of the man, to which must be added a pair of working but not artistic hands, the fingers spatulate rather than taper, an entire absence of nervousness, a quick, decided manner of speaking and an attire which is as neat and unobtrusive as that of a diplomat. Watch him conduct the orchestra at the Berlin Opera. There is no unseemly swaying or ugly contortion, no monkey-tricks of manner, but a firm, decided simple beat, with scarce an indication beyond the use of the bâton. Even the head barely moves, and the torso not at all. There is rather more animation when he conducts a concert orchestra on a platform, but even then the whole figure is self-contained and dignified.

Away from his orchestra, his piano and his scores, Richard Strauss is a strange mixture of frank simplicity and profound depth; a curiously complex individuality, probably the product of an intensely high form of intellectual culture, for Strauss, almost alone among great musicians, is an extraordinarily cultivated man. The other exceptions to the general rule of crass ignorance of any art and science outside their own are, first and foremost, Hans von Bülow, and then Liszt and Mendelssohn. The average musician is intensely self-absorbed; his letters and his conversation show it. If you did not know who the man was, you might talk for an hour with Richard Strauss and not know that he was a musician and a genius. You would come away with the impression that you had met an exceptionally well-informed man, conversant with the latest developments of science and politics, well versed in ancient and modern literature, more than commonly interested in painting and sculpture, no stranger to sport and possessed of a very keen sense of humour; no ordinary man and, indeed, no ordinary musician.

The extent and variety of his intellectual interests may be gauged even in the titles and subtitles of his great works. In "Ein Heldenleben," for instance, we have the Hero, followed by his Antagonists, his Companion, his Battlefield, his Words of Peace, his Renouncement of the World and the Fulfilment. The Hero is not a single poetical or historical figure, but rather a general ideal of manly heroism in the abstract; not the heroism to which one can apply the every-day standard of valour, with its material rewards, but that detached heroism which describes the inward battle of life and which aspires through effort and renouncement towards the elevation of the soul.

Again, in "Also Sprach Zarathustra," that great tone poem, with its subtle subdivisions into: Concerning the Men of the Backworld; of the Great Longing; of Joys and Passions; the Grave-Song; of Science; the Convalescent; the Song of the Dance; and the Song of the Night Wanderer, we have not, as has been falsely alleged, a musical interpretation of Nietzsche's philosophy, but "a representation of the various stages of development of humanity as conceived by Nietzsche, or the soul's history of a man who ends by becoming a disciple of Nietzsche"—which is a very different thing. Only a scholar, a man of vast learning and deep thought, could conceive the comprehensive scheme of any one of Strauss' great works. Their formulæ may be in terms of music, but their intrinsic purpose and value are human in the widest and most general sense.

Lastly, an anecdote just to illustrate Strauss' quickness of wit and sense of humour. On one of his visits to London he was entertained at a dinner at which musicians and critics were present. One of them made a speech, long and flattering to fulsomeness, concluding with the sentiment: "Richard Strauss knows all. He is the Buddha of composers." During the applause that followed Strauss remarked in an undertone to his neighbour: "If I am a musical Buddha, then that last speaker is a musical Pesth!"

Science

The New Theory of Matter

THE statement was recently made in "The Academy" that the dogma of the conservation of matter is no longer believed by modern physicists, and a correspondent very naturally asks for further discussion of this "law," which has held sway in men's minds for a century—a reign coextensive more or less, with that of the indivisible atoms of Dalton. The assertion of the conservation of matter—which we really owe to the great Lavoisier, aristocrat and chemist, not spared by the unrighteous excesses of a most righteous Revolution—and the assertion of the integrity of the atom are obviously complementary. It is radium the revealer that has caused the supersession of both.

Of course, the law of the conservation of matter still holds for the ordinary purposes of the chemist. If you weigh and then burn a candle in suitable conditions, you can show that nothing was lost in the process—the resultant gases contain all that was in the candle. But the chief discovery of the twentieth century hitherto is a confirmation of the central dogma of “First Principles” as applying even to the “foundation-stones of the material universe,” to use the phrase I quoted from Clerk-Maxwell last week. Observe that we are promised an English translation of M. Gustave le Bon’s views on the evolution of matter! And if, as is already abundantly proved, matter itself is but a transition stage in the evolution of Something else, we can plainly no longer speak of its conservation.

Premising, then, that physicists are now coming to believe that radio-activity is a property of all matter, let us look at it as shown in radium. Let us also premise that the disintegration or evolution theory of the radium atom has lately been accepted by its one outstanding opponent, Lord Kelvin, who may probably be regarded as the greatest physicist of any age. With his conversion to it the theory now to be presented in outline may be said to be established.

An atom of radium—and the atoms of all the other so-called elements differ only in detail—consists of a large number (probably hundreds of thousands) of incredibly minute bodies known as electrons. These are in rapid motion, describing orbits, as is believed, around some central point. So small are the electrons that the distances between them are relatively as great as those between the planets of the Solar System. In size they are to the atom “as a full stop to a cathedral.” But even when we substitute for the simple conception of an atom entertained by Democritus, or Newton, or Dalton—that of a minute hard speck—such a conception as modern physics entertains, we do not necessarily impugn its stability. Such a complex atom, microcosm though it be, might conceivably be conserved, permanent, indestructible. But far more remarkable than our recent discovery of the complexity of the atom is the discovery that it is only a stage in all-embracing evolution. All the phenomena of radio-activity—the production of heat and light and electrical disturbances—are due to the fact that these atoms of matter are not conserved, but are impermanent not merely from second to second, but from one-millionth of a second to another. By the action of causes yet dimly guessed these electrons are constantly flying out from the atomic system, and pass, at speeds comparable with that of light, outwards to an unknown fate.

Here, as the acute reader will observe, I have an excellent opportunity of begging the question. Having shown that the atom is not conserved, I might rest content and try to persuade him that I have disposed of the conservation of matter. But he will say, “Not so fast, my friend. I grant that your so-called atoms are falsely so called, but what if I propose to transfer this term to the electrons of which the atoms (literally, the uncut) are now known to be composed? Plain it is that if the electrons be permanent, then the law of conservation of matter stands. Recent discoveries have only given it more accurate expression. It will not do to juggle with the term ‘atom,’ as if it were not your own fault that it has hitherto been misapplied.”

In attempting to meet this most legitimate criticism I must first ask, What is an electron? Is it a hard, impenetrable, indestructible speck of stuff or matter? At first sight it might appear to be such, for it is certainly possessed of mass and inertia, and our minds will not permit us to imagine that it does not occupy space. But recent study has shown that mass (which may conveniently be here regarded as equivalent to weight) and inertia are properties of electricity. All matter, in short, is an electrical phenomenon.

Now we are in deep waters, and I am not sure that contemporary physics, utterly remaking as it is, can quite keep its head above them. But if we admit that the electron is the unit of matter, and that it is electrical, and then find evidence to show that it is a “particle” of “negative electricity” we can at any rate convince ourselves, even while admitting our sore need of a brand-new vocabulary, that the electron is really no more than a transient expression of a relation. When a negative and a positive charge of electricity—I quite admit that we hardly know what we are talking about—have met and “satisfied their affinity” for each other, they each cease to be. There is no annihilation of the Something of which they are transient expressions, but there is annihilation of the temporary relation which formerly was, and in virtue of which they existed. Matter, then, is no more than the transient expression of a transient electrical relation.

I have every sympathy with the reader who has now come to the conclusion that modern physics, if this be a sample of it, is hardly distinguishable from metaphysics; but at least he will accept my word that I am not aiming at a general befuddlement, nor trying to refine matter into an abstraction, when I call it, in the most accurate language at my command, an expression of a relation. I have attempted briefly to indicate the problems upon which all physicists are now engaged, since they realise that the last few years have given us a modicum of truth and a first step onwards, beside which all previous inquiry into the nature of matter may be regarded as nugatory and stationary.

The late Professor Tait, joint-author with Lord Kelvin of the leading work on physics in any language, was fond, as one who had the honour of sitting at his feet remembers, of styling the law of the conservation of energy “this grand principle.” He never showed the same enthusiasm for the law of the conservation of matter, though there was no reason, at that time, why he should not regard the two as peers. But Tait had the insight which many a most distinguished and useful servant of science does not possess. I fancy this partiality of his, which has often been remarked upon, was due to what we may perhaps call an intuitive perception that the two laws are not peers; in short, that the law of the conservation of energy would ultimately be found to include the other. And so it has turned out. Whilst no one can now regard matter as other than a phase of the cosmic activity, yet no physicist is one whit disturbed in his belief that the Power of which matter is an expression is Eternal and uncreatable. Atoms may come and atoms may go, “and leave not a wrack behind,” but assuredly this Power goes on for ever. The last problem of all philosophy is the relation of this Power or Energy to the Mind by which it is known. In the last analysis, is this relation an Identity? Spinoza said yes, and Goethe declared his framing of and answer to this question to be the greatest, truest and profoundest thought of all the ages.

C. W. SALEEBY.

THE Board of Agriculture and Fisheries desire to give notice of the publication of a “Handbook to a Collection of the Minerals of the British Islands in the Museum of Practical Geology, Jermyn Street, London.” Copies of this handbook may be obtained from any agent for the sale of Ordnance Survey maps, from the Ordnance Survey Office, Southampton, or through any bookseller, price 1s.

Drama

The Plays of Sudermann

Hermann Sudermann, Poète Dramatique et Romancier.
Par Henri Schoen. (Paris: Henry Didier.)

WHEN one looks down the list of Sudermann's plays one realises with something like a pang the deplorable state of the theatre in England at the present time. Here is a dramatist of European celebrity whose works are played in every country on the Continent. How many of them have been played in England? How many of them have even been translated into English? "Magda" of course we know, for it furnished Mrs. Patrick Campbell with one of her successful rôles. "Sodom's Ende" (disguised under another title to appease the scruples of the Lord Chamberlain's office!) had a brief and inglorious career in London about a year ago, but neither the quality of the performance nor the quality of the English version gave it any hope of success. "Es lebe das Leben" was produced by Mrs. Campbell two seasons ago, but insufficient rehearsals and an inadequate performance proved fatal to it. The other works of Sudermann have only been seen in London, if at all, in isolated performances, either at the German Theatre or in the répertoire of some travelling company of foreign artists who have made a temporary descent on our shores. Thus the German Theatre have played "Die Ehre," "Das Glück im Winkel," "Johannisfeuer," and "Der Sturmeselle Sokrates." "Johannes" has never been given here in any language, and, in a country where Oscar Wilde's "Salome" was refused a licence, is presumably unlikely to be given unless the Stage Society comes to the rescue with a performance of it. It is a humiliating thought that England, with what are called "free institutions," should contrive to remain, in matters of dramatic art, so hopelessly behind despotically governed Prussia, but so it is. The reasons for this state of things are probably twofold. One is that very real distrust and dislike of anything like fine art which is such a feature of the English character. The other is unquestionably our English censorship of plays. In politics we may—and do—plume ourselves on having representative government and the rest of it. But in matters dramatic Russia itself is not more hopelessly enslaved.

In writing of the career of Hermann Sudermann one is inevitably led to refer to the censorship, because it was that institution which nearly succeeded in throttling the modern realistic school of drama in Germany. But for the establishment of the Freie Bühne (Independent Theatre as we should say) at Berlin in 1889, it is probable that Sudermann would have abandoned the career of a dramatist altogether. Certainly his work for the stage must have assumed a different character. The Freie Bühne was an Association of men interested in literature and in the theatre for the production of plays of the modern realistic school. It was a sort of Stage Society, in fact. The performances were technically private, and therefore did not require the licence of the censor, but they were widely attended, much written about in the Press, and hotly discussed, and it is certain that they produced an effect in modifying the rigid attitude of the official mind towards the drama of such writers as Hauptmann and Sudermann. They did not succeed in abolishing the censor altogether. The production of "Sodom's Ende" was only sanctioned after its author had trimmed and pared it to satisfy that functionary, and that of "Johannes" was only permitted after months of hesitation. But the obstinate conservatism of Berlin was fortunately shaken by the success of the Freie Bühne, and the relative freedom which the Berlin stage at present enjoys as compared, for example, with our own, is mainly due to that Association. If the Stage Society can succeed in doing the same thing for London we may yet have a drama in England that compares in importance with the contemporary drama of France, of Germany and of Scandinavia.

Dr. Schoen's book is interesting for the very full and accurate accounts it gives of the plot of each of Sudermann's plays. These are narrated with clearness and always with sympathy. On the critical side it is not so good. The writer is at times the victim of that terrible tendency (which used to mar so much of Mr. Archer's work on Ibsen) to deduce a lesson from his author's work and provide him with a mission. Ibsen is the most objective of dramatists, the most detached, the most dispassionate. He drew mankind as he saw them. His characters are human beings observed with the eye of a master and drawn with ruthless fidelity. Yet to read much that has been written about him in England one would suppose that he was mainly concerned with promulgating certain doctrines as to the emancipation of women or the institution of marriage. Similarly, Sudermann is primarily an artist depicting life as he sees it. You can draw a moral from his presentment of things if you choose, just as you can draw a moral from a case in the police courts or from the upsetting of a Clapham omnibus. But the interest and the value of his work lie in his presentment of life, not in your deductions from his presentment. "Heimat" ("Magda") is a great play because it deals with an intensely human situation, because the struggle between the old, clinging to their authority, and the young, asserting their right to liberty, is eternally interesting, and because the various characters, Magda herself, her mother and father, her gentle sister Marie, the well-meaning pastor Heffterdingk, and the miserable Keller, are all admirably drawn and admirably contrasted. To say that the play would be improved if Magda were a more "sympathetic" character is to misunderstand Sudermann's object in writing it. His is not the vulgar ambition to furnish us with a "heroine" who shall absorb all our sympathies to the exclusion of the rest of the characters. Sudermann is much too good a naturalist and much too good an artist for that. Where the old-fashioned dramatist, in dealing with Magda's life, would have been content to show us only one side of the question, he shows us all sides. He claims our sympathy, or at least our comprehension (which is sympathy in the making), for all his characters, even down to the wretched Keller. Far from wishing us to side wholly with Magda, he shows us that she is vain and self-willed and fond of luxury, just as he shows us that her father, with all his grey hairs and high sense of honour, is an obstinate and tiresome old gentleman; that Heffterdingk, with his good intentions and moral earnestness, is a man of small brain and no imagination, whose interference is disastrous and his advice idiotic; and in fact that the family generally are a very ordinary and human family, neither better nor worse than their neighbours, and deserving our sympathetic attention just because they are of like passions with ourselves and not embodiments of an imaginary perfection. "Il n'y a que les lâches et les paresseux qui s'entourent d'idylles trompeuses." If Magda had done as Dr. Schoen would have liked her to do, and in place of that terrific suggestion to her exasperating father, "How do you know if he was the only one?" had made a speech about her art and her child and generally comported herself like the rhetorical heroine of romance, she might have been a more admirable character, but she would have been a far less human and interesting one. Dr. Schoen complains that both in "Heimat" and in "Die Ehre" he has an uncomfortable feeling that the sympathies of the author are not always with one character, but shift now to one, now to another. This is perfectly true. The sympathies of Sudermann are hardly ever with any one character in his plays to the exclusion of the others. His aim, and Ibsen's aim, is to endeavour to express the personality of all his characters from their own point of view, and therefore to sympathise with them all. That is the point in which modern realism is so much greater than the old romanticism, and it is the glory of Ibsen to have so often attained to this complete detachment, and of Sudermann to have followed in his footsteps.

Art

Events and Tendencies in 1904

THE past year, if it has been notable for the death of the great veteran G. F. Watts, has been important in other ways. As a period of change and transition it has shown signs of many things which must always occur in the early part of a new century, and I would beg for a little patience in favour of my attempt to separate these events from that which seems but the mere use and wont of the artistic year. I admit that my assumption that a new century brings about a difference in things is in itself a fiction or convenience of speech, a habit of mind which likes to view events in picturesque perspectives with recognisable landmarks, and that twelve months is a very short time in which to detect change or development; yet the past year has shown a departure from the well-worn tracks which marked the end of the last century; new ground has been broken, and one or two new signposts set up. While these few pages are in hand, two difficulties of great importance have occurred, whose solution should be of importance in the future, since they affect the management of our museums; and these afford the evidence of a nation's value of art, and influence directly or indirectly the tendencies of public opinion. The directorship of the Victoria and Albert Museum has become vacant, and the National Gallery is also without a director, Sir Edward Poynter not having sought re-election to this difficult post which he has filled for ten years. These subjects are almost beyond the scope of this article; but on the readiness of those in authority to solve these two vexed questions must depend a great deal, and one might wish that the final settlement of these matters rested in other official hands than those indirectly responsible for the past state of affairs. The vacancy at South Kensington calls for the election of a man, or body of men, capable of coping with what amounts to the reconstruction of that museum. That which Mr. Claude Phillips had to do for the Wallace Collection will have to be done at South Kensington; the effect of its reconstruction counts in the formation of the national taste and should influence the art industries. So far, South Kensington has been out of gear and control, unwieldy and inert.

The directorship of the National Gallery is no less important, though the museum is formed and does not require remaking. The post should be given to a man of profound and varied knowledge and experience; it must not fall (as it has been rumoured) into the hands of some popular good fellow or well-supported "official museum official." We expect the selection of men for these vacancies to be made in good faith, and, with a view to the more intelligent interest which the public takes in these matters, a man with the knowledge and experience of Mr. Sidney Colvin is required; or, failing him, Mr. Claude Phillips should be elected as a set-off to the genius and insight of Doctor Bode, the great director of the Gallery at Berlin, to whose energy and insight we owe the loss of many masterpieces bought in England.

This last remark may seem uncalled for, since, during the last year at least, the National Gallery has benefited by two priceless additions which count as events in the history of the Gallery. The early portrait by Dürer and the earliest known portrait by Titian have each filled gaps in our collection which seemed likely to remain empty; they are priceless as art, and priceless historically. These two important works have at least not been allowed to drift out of the country like the "Millais" Holbein, the "Ashburnham" Rembrandt, the two "Peel" Van Dycks, the "Willet" Ghirlandajo, the "Ashburnham" Botticelli and the "Darnley" Titian, only to mention works which count among the masterpieces of each of the above masters. The Greek Department at the British Museum has benefited already by the additions made by the new director, and we may expect a break from that period of stagnation which hung upon that department in recent years.

The most prominent event and the greatest sign that the public has become alive about the future of our permanent collection has been expressed by the agitation which culminated in the Chantrey Fund inquiry. The official report is excellent reading and reveals, even among our critics, the perception of an aim or some sort of standard which their current criticisms have not always led us to expect; yet the essential difficulties besetting the case remain unsolved. A collection is good in proportion to the number of fine works it contains, and these must always be produced by a few men only, whose works are always open to discussion, disapproval and faint praise. Let us give the Academy its due. Had the Chantrey bequest been conducted with all desirable foresight the public would long since have clamoured for popular works. By the public I mean the large body of lagging artists and pressmen. Yet it remains a healthy sign that an inquiry should have been possible, that the subject should have been a welcome one for academic discussion and that certain forms of popular art are in fact no longer popular.

What have been the tendencies in the picture market? On the whole, we find reassuring signs, for the sale-rooms have emphasised the fall in purely commercial painting. With one or two exceptions we have been able to note a lull also in that tiresome speculation on the seventh-rate work of the mere hack face-painters of the eighteenth century. The sale rooms have even been dull. The marvellous Holbein miniature which sold at Christie's for rather less than £3,000

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS

OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti,
Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from FREDK. HOLLYER, 8 Pembroke Square, London, W.
Illustrated Catalogue 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

being the one work of supreme artistic interest which has appeared, to be sold, alas! to an American, though it might be said that the "American peril" has often been overstated; and the forthcoming Whistler show should prove that even the latest American art boom is largely a fiction, and that the works of Mr. Whistler are still appreciated and kept, as in the past, by collectors in England.

The picture market has still to steady itself from recent speculation in that which the rich alone care to buy—in fact, the dealer may have to reconsider his policy, though the dealer in England has rarely controlled the course of art, if his influence has spread disaster in the provincial galleries and among the large class of the "new rich" who require pictures like furniture to be got expeditiously and at a large cost. The course of art has been ever separate from the politics of Bond Street; Watts, Rossetti, Burne-Jones and Whistler each flourished in his own way, unsupported by the dealer.

The immediate sign of what the future holds in store will be found in the character and aims of the exhibitions; and in this the last twelve months have been full of development and change. The practical reconstruction of the International Society of Sculptors, Painters and Engravers, under the intelligent election of the new President, M. Rodin, is an event of the greatest importance. Previous exhibitions held by that Society under Mr. Whistler were fated to be limited in scope by certain idiosyncrasies and restrictions which characterised that master, and, to some extent, the weaker points in the organisation of the Society as it now stands are surviving traces of the conditions first imposed by the circumstances of its foundation. If the aims of the New English Art Club are too specialised and too restricted for the use of the word "English," since it represents mainly one phase of art as it is practised in London, the International Society flies too big an ensign. The title is to some extent an illusion also, for no really international yearly exhibition in so restricted a gallery as the New Gallery could be possible; it is not even desirable, for internationalism breeds a false or composite standard in art; it leads, or has led—in Paris, for instance, notably during the 'seventies—to the invasion of crude foreign ideals. Internationalism tends to force the pace in the matter of novelty, sensationalism and other undesirable elements. Yet the Society can boast a number of works which it would be difficult to match elsewhere, and, since the death of the great master, G. F. Watts, has rendered the spring show at the New Gallery in future only a matter of slight importance (it is now merely an annexe to the Royal Academy), the succession to the Grosvenor Gallery tradition must be fought out during the autumn—indeed, the art season has for some time tended to change its date and to occur in the autumn; the spring in the future will remain conspicuous only for the Academy show, which has against it the Ascot week, Henley and the distracting social movements in the wake of Royalty.

Will the new forces scattered in different quarters unite in a movement as big and active as the "Secessions" in Germany? or must the younger school split up into several small groups of artists with a recognised aim such as the New English Art Club, the Society of Landscape Painters and the most recent of all associations, "The Society of Twelve"? Who can tell?

Will the provinces continue in their allegiance to the past state of things, or show signs of some constructive effort, such as we noted at Bradford and more recently in Dublin? The future of our public museums must count indirectly for a great deal in this, for a nation's interest in its arts is a sign of its vitality and future; a nation which remains inert in this matter is a nation without a will and without a history. The qualities and virtues of a nation are embalmed by its arts; a statue or building, a book, a picture, tells us more than what may survive in its records. The civilisation of a nation is proved by the value it attaches to these things.

C. RICKETTS.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY has lately received, under the will of Mr. Frank McClean, a most valuable collection of manuscripts, early printed books and works of art, which are to be permanently exhibited in the Fitzwilliam Museum. Mr. McClean, who established the astronomical observatory at Tunbridge in 1874, and was a leading authority on spectroscopic work, devoted his leisure to the formation of the collection which he has bequeathed to his University. The manuscripts, two hundred in number, include a Greek Uncial Evangelistarium of the ninth century, and three gospel-books of the thirteenth century, a ninth-century Latin Bible, and a magnificent fragment of a twelfth-century missal, and many other most valuable and important things. Among the printed books is an "Augustinus de arte predicandi," printed by J. Mentelin at Strassburg before 1466; and the works of art include oriental objects, ivories, enamels, engraved gems and some examples of Verre-Eglomise.

The Council of the International Society of Sculptors, Painters, and Gravers has decided to close their exhibition now open in the New Gallery, on Saturday evening, February 11. The Whistler Memorial Exhibition opens to the public on February 22. On this day the charge for admission will be ten shillings.

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 5 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper, which must bear the sender's full name and address, not necessarily for publication. The Editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archaeology, Folk-lore, Art, Music and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published.

Questions must not be such as can be answered from the ordinary works of reference.

COMPETITION.

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5/- each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to "Academy" Questions and Answers.

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The names and addresses of prize-winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk. Each prize will consist of 5/- worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5/-. No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

One of the four weekly prizes will be awarded, whenever possible, to a Shakespearean Question or Answer.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" carries disqualification.

Questions.

SHAKESPEARE.

SINGULAR AND PLURAL.—In "Julius Caesar" (II. iii.) Artemidorus, writing to Caesar says: "If thou beest not immortal look about you." Why is this abrupt change from the second person singular to the plural made? No explanation is given in the annotated editions I have seen.—E.D.J. (Bartholomew following—)

LITERATURE.

AUTHOR WANTED.—Can any of your readers tell me who is the author of the following:

What is the blooming tincture of the skin
To peace of mind and harmony within?
Or what the shining of the brightest eye,
To the sweet soothing of a calm reply?—B.B. (Glasgow).

AUTHOR WANTED.—"May virtue all thy paths attend." Will any of your readers kindly inform us who wrote a short poem commencing with this line, and in what work it can be found?—Glasgow Public Libraries.

DICKENS, THE POET.—Dickens, besides excelling as a prose writer, was a poet of no mean quality, as the many pieces he has left behind amply testify. Two well-known songs written by him, "The Ivy Green" and "Hail to the Merry Autumn Days," are still popular. Being anxious to further my knowledge of Dickens' poetry, I shall be glad to know if a collection of his poems and songs has ever been printed, and if it is still obtainable?—R.S. (Sunderland).

* DICKENS AND "THE BASKET OF FLOWERS."—There is a well-known story called "The Basket of Flowers," written originally in German and translated into English some seventy years ago, since when it has been issued in editions almost innumerable. The two principal characters in it—a young girl and her grandfather, who wander about the country after being banished from their home—strongly remind the reader of Little Nell and her grandfather and their wanderings in "The Old Curiosity Shop." Several other points of similarity lead me to infer that Dickens borrowed a good deal from "The Basket of Flowers." Am I right in my surmise?—R.S. (Sunderland).

TITLED AUTHORS.—The "Life of Charles James Fox," by Earl Russell, came out as follows: In 1859 appeared Vols. I. and II. by "Lord John Russell." In 1866 appeared Vol. III. by "Earl Russell." Are there other instances of an author's change of title during the progress of one work, and were such changes notified on the title-page?—Percy L. Babington (Tonbridge).

GENERAL.

PUMPS.—In Hay's "History of Chichester" it says: "Pumps were first introduced into Europe about the year 1425, and into England not before 1512 or 1513." Who introduced the first pump into England, and where?—Charles H. M. Pennycook (Brighton).

* POOLAR.—Cecil (Lord Burleigh), in a communication to Queen Elizabeth, formed on Sir Peter Carew's report on the condition of the army in Scotland (1560), says: "My Lord Grey is a noble, valiant, painful, and careful gentleman; Randolph worth more than I fear our time will well consider, and no poolar nor robber." What is a "poolar"? Chambers' gives "pooler," as "a stick for stirring a tan-vat"; is there any connection?—Alex. J. Philip (Gravesend).

"UPWARDS OR."—Out of a group of twenty-eight persons suddenly interrogated twenty-one understood "upwards of," say, £2,000, to mean "more" than that sum; the other seven had not the slightest doubt that it meant "less"—i.e. "rising towards." Which is considered correct and on what authority?—J. Presgrave (Penang, Straits Settlements).

ROSEMARY.—What is the origin of the saying—
Where rosemary flourishes, Mistress is master?—Madge S. Smith (Bolton).

THE JUDGES' WHITE GLOVES.—What is the origin of the custom of giving a pair of white gloves to the judge when there are no criminal cases to be tried?—W. L. Harle.

DETACHED COUNTIES.—What is the history and present significance of the small detached portions of other counties in the main body of larger ones? Part of Durham, for instance, in Yorkshire.—M. (Carlisle).

LONG AND SHORT "O."—Why is the o in progress, process, sounded short? It is surely a recent usage, and at variance with the Latin words from which they are derived.—M. (Carlisle).

KILLIGREWS OF FALMOUTH.—Was the Killigrew who built the King's House (Drury Lane) in 1663 one of the famous Killigrews of Falmouth?—W. L. Harle (Falsfield).

AN ARMY OF BROWNBILL MEN.—In Besant's "London," page 260, in a description of the plague in 1603, "an army of brownbill men, that kept the shore" of the river, and prevented plague-stricken people landing, is mentioned. Can any one tell me what "brownbill" men were?—W. L. Harle (Falsfield).

Answers.

SHAKESPEARE.

* HOLD OR CUT BOWSTRINGS.—A colloquial expression among archers, suggesting a forfeit for failure, which grew into general application. The meaning appears to be that Bottom and the company will hold to their engagement, or, failing therein, they shall be disgraced in their calling—i.e. have their bowstrings cut. Capell says: "When a party was made at Butts, assurance of meeting was given in the words of that phrase; the sense of the person using them being that he would 'hold' or keep promise, or they might 'cut his bowstring,' demolish him for an archer." In "Much Ado about Nothing" Don Pedro says of Benedick that "he hath twice or thrice cut Cupid's bowstring, and the little hangman dare not shoot at him"—that is, dare not play the archer.—F. Scannell (Lewisham).
[Replies also from T.H.M. (Newcastle) and J.J. (Norwich).]

LITERATURE.

* LIONS' SKINS.—"We sleep in lions' skins in our progress unto virtue, and we slide not, but climb unto it." A possible explanation of the allusion is to be found in Ruskin's "Queen of the Air" (§§ 161 et seq.), in which he applies the parable of Hercules and the Nemean lion. The slaying of this lion, without weapons and in the solitude of its noisome den, the subsequent wearing of the skin as a protection, are shown as types of what each of us may perform in overcoming some special weakness or temptation. "But, alas," says Ruskin, "how many of us have to go uncovered!"—Laurence Saunders (Nottingham).

As like as a hand to another hand,
Whoever said that foolish thing, &c.

Probably an imperfect recollection of Horatio ("Hamlet," I. ii. 211-2):

I knew your father;
These hands are not more like.—F.W.

ST. BRANDAN (Brandan or Brandon) was an Irish monk (historical), ob. circ. 578, May 16, and so his story was well known in England. His voyage seems to be founded on that of Sinbad (so B. Gould), or is a "monkish Odyssey" (M. Jubinal). It became popular in the eleventh century, as is shown by maps after that date placing the Terrestrial Paradise in the extreme west from Ireland. The first English edition is in verse, early fourteenth century (Percy Society's Vol. XIV.); the first prose English is in the translations of the "Golden Legend." St. Brendan finds a tree full of birds on an island, asks the meaning, and one of the fair birds, making a full merry noise like a fiddle, says: "Some times we were angels, but when our master, Lucifer, fell into Hell for his high pride, we fell with him for our offences," &c. They are not represented as in pain; they sing all the hours, "that it was a full heavenly noise to hear." It seems as if the belief in half-fallen angels originated in Ireland; the peasants identify them with fairies, and when they see a cloud of dust (supposed to be fairies) they cross themselves and say, "There go the good (sic) folk." The legend of St. Brendan is important as one of the causes of Columbus' expedition.—E.L.B.B. (Ramsgate).

ST. BRANDAN.—The "Voyage of St. Brandan" was translated into English verse about the end of the thirteenth century, and the Latin version must have been known in England at a much earlier date. A French metrical version was dedicated to Henry I.'s second wife, Adeliza of Louvain. See H. L. D. Ward's "Catalogue of Romances," ii. 516-557.—J.A.H. (London).

NATURE SIMILES.—Similes from manufactured articles can be found frequently up and down the English poets. Here are some examples similar in character to the lines quoted from the "Lotos Eaters":

And then I know the mist is drawn,
A lucid veil from coast to coast.—Tennyson.

Thou Air,
Which like a mourning veil thy scarf hadst thrown O'er the abandoned earth.—Shelley.

Soft, soft wind, from out the sweet south sliding,
Waft thy silver cloud-veils athwart the summer sea;
Thin, thin threads of mist on dewy fingers twining,
Weave a veil of dappled gauze to shade my babe and me.

—Kingsley.

Compare as illustrating the same point:

Flowers that their gay wardrobe wear.—Milton.
The olive-sandalled Apennine.—Shelley.

—G.B.C. (Oxford).

BRAVE PRINCE WILLIAM.—There can be little doubt that the brave Prince William who showed his "lamp-black face" in Goldsmith's "Author's Bed-chamber" would be William Prince of Orange. A coarse engraving some fifty or sixty years old well answers the description.—H.C.

"EOTHEM."—The quotation from Tennyson, "Soothe him with (thy) her finer fancies, . . ." is from "Locksley Hall," written in 1842.—S.C.
[Replies also received from H. Pearl Humphrey; F. Scannell (Lewisham); H.C.; P. L. Babington (Tonbridge); L.H.; K.K.; and H.O.D. (Dulwich).]

THE RELAXED BOW.—This illustration was used by St. Antony, according to an anecdote in the "Vite Patrum" (Migne, "Patrologia," lxxiii. col. 912). Cassian, in his "Collations" (ib. xlix. 1312) puts it in the mouth of St. John the Evangelist. Both versions are preserved in the "Legenda Aurea."—J.A.H. (London).

AUTHOR FOUND.—The Latin lines beginning "Nemo me lacrimis . . ." are those of Ennius, quoted by Cicero in his "De Senectute," chap. xx. In most editions we find "Nemo me lacrimis deoet neque funera fletu Faxit"; but in some editions the second line runs "Cur? Volito vivus per ora virum."—J. Edwin Datch (Stechford).

AUTHOR FOUND.—The lines beginning "Like to the falling of a starre" are by Dr. Hy. King, Chaplain to James I., and are to be found in his poems. See also Chambers' "Ency. of Literature," where no doubt is thrown on his authorship.—H.C.

GENERAL.

PROPER NAME PRONUNCIATION.—The best modern work is Smith's "Cyclo-pædia of Names," 1895, but it includes biographical and geographical as well as literary names, and being so complete is naturally expensive. The best cheap book is Wheeler's "Noted Names of Fiction," which contains literary names only, and was published in Bohn's Library, 1866. Of course, the very recent names are absent from it, such as Catriona, the correct sound of which is Catrenea, three syllables, the "o" being silent. Hugues is one syllable, as in French. Guinevere is three syllables. Jacques is a name it is impossible to pronounce wrongly; there are so many opinions about it. Some sound its vowels and consonants as in French, others as in English. It may be either one or two syllables, at pleasure. Shakespeare himself varies between one and two, Scott makes it one, Charles Lamb makes it two.—James Platt, Jun.

SAVE THE MARK.—In archery when an archer shot well it was customary to cry out "God save the mark!"—i.e. prevent any one coming after to hit the same mark and displace my arrow. Ironically, it is said to a novice whose arrow is nowhere.—T.H.M. (Newcastle).

[Replies also from S.C. (Hove) and B.R.S. (Manchester).]

"ARCADES AMBO."—The literal meaning of this phrase is "Arcadians both," i.e., dwellers in Arcady, the central portion of the Greek Peloponnese. Arcadia is surrounded by mountains, and its inhabitants are therefore cut off from the main civilisation of Greece. Hence in classical times they were noted for their simple country life, and were more backward in civilisation than the rest of Greece. An Arcadian is first a countryman, then a boor or simpleton, and then a knave. We may compare the degeneration of this word with that of "villain," which was primarily of similar meaning, being connected with "villa." Arcadia has also provided the literary phrase, "a solemn Arcadia."—R. B. Appleton.

"ARCADES AMBO."—Arcadia was pre-eminently the land of rustics, not influenced by the growth of Greek civilisation. Thus Conington says: "Arcadia, being the country of Mercury, who invented the lyre, and of Pan, who invented the pipe, Vergil makes his ideal minstrels (in Ecl. vii.) Arcadians, as in modern days they might be made Tyrolese." Hence arose the meaning of simple or rustic, which, as in the classic example of "Simple" Simon, easily became transferred to that of "knave."—E.M.W.B. (Hove).
[Replies also from Richard Smith (Bolton); E. T. Quinn (Dublin); and H.O. (Torquay).]

THE RELAXED BOW.—Cassian, or Joannes Eremita Cassianus, circa 420 A.D., tells a story about St. John. A young hunter, just returned from the chase, was astonished to see the aged Apostle caressing a pet partridge—a useless waste of time for such an illustrious man. "What have you in your hand?" asked John. "A bow," answered the youth. "Why is it unstrung?" "Because," replied the hunter, "if it were always bent it would lose its elasticity and become useless." "And in the very same way," said John, "my spirit must have relaxation, else it would lose its elasticity and fail to respond to the call of duty." I cannot give the reference for this story, nor do I know if the idea is found in earlier writers.—W.M. (Aberdeen).

PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain, on application at the following booksellers, Five Shillings' worth of books. Notices have been dispatched to the several winners and to the following booksellers:

North of England School Furnishing Company, Limited, Fawcett Street, Sunderland.

Mr. A. Ridgway, 61 Windmill Street, Gravesend.

Mr. H. Burnside, 26 Tranquil Vale, Blackheath, S.E.

Messrs. Cambridge & Co., 16 Wheeler Gate, Nottingham.

Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE'S NEW NOVEL.

AT ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

PETER'S MOTHER.

BY

Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE,Author of "Deborah of Tod's," "Adam Grigson,"
"Cornelius," &c.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15 Waterloo Place, S.W.

Under the General Editorship of Mr. HORACE C. HUTCHINSON.

"FISHING."Now Ready. In Two Volumes. Price 25s. net.
12s. 6d. net per Volume.

THESE New Volumes (on "Fishing") of the "Country Life" Library of Sport are offered to the public in the full confidence that nothing so complete of their kind have yet been published. The names of the experts whom the editor has been fortunate enough to enlist in his service are a guarantee in themselves of the treatment of the various subjects. The illustrations are very numerous. There are over two hundred and fifty full-page illustrations from photographs, in addition to the reproduction of a very large number of famous old prints, and especial notice may be claimed for the finely coloured and finely reproduced representations of Salmon and Trout Flies.

Published by GEO. NEWNES & CO., LIMITED, Southampton Street, Strand, London, W.C.Messrs. J. M. DENT & CO.'S LIST.*THE COMPLETE WORKS OF LEO TOLSTOY.

To be completed in 24 volumes, at the rate of two every month.

Edited and Translated by PROFESSOR LEO WIENER,Professor of Slavic Languages and Literature at Harvard University and Author of "An Anthology of Russian Literature," "Yiddish Literature in the Nineteenth Century," &c., &c.

FIRST FOUR VOLUMES NOW READY.

- Vol. I.—CHILDHOOD, BOYHOOD, YOUTH 1852-1857.
 .. II.—THE COSSACKS, SEVASTOPOL, &c. 1852-1856.
 .. III.—THE SNOWSTORM, DOMESTIC HAPPINESS, &c. 1856-1859.
 .. IV.—PEDAGOGICAL ARTICLES, LINEN MEASURER 1861-1862.

Ordinary Edition, 3s. 6d. net per vol. Sold separately.
Large Paper Edition, 10s. 6d. net per vol. Sold in sets only.

Please write for a Prospectus.

LES CLASSIQUES FRANCAIS.

EDITED BY DANIEL S. O'CONNOR.

Pott 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; limp lambskin, 2s. 6d. net.

PAUL et VIRGINIE. PAR BERNARDIN ST. PIERRE. Préface du Vicomte
MELCHOIR DE VOGÜÉ.ATALA, RENÉ, et LE DERNIER ABENCÉRAGE. PAR CHATEAUBRIAND
Préface du Vicomte MELCHOIR DE VOGÜÉ, de l'Académie Française.CONTES CHOISIS DE BALZAC. Préface de PAUL BOURGET, de l'Académie Française.
Please write for a Prospectus.

NEW VOLUME OF THE

TEMPLE CLASSICS.With Photogravure Frontispiece, bound in blue cloth, 1s. 6d. net; in green lambskin, 2s. net.The Athenæum says:—"This wonderful series of little books is now extending to the byways of literature and the paths of the scholar, having long since given us the standard volumes which interest the ordinary reader."THE GULS HORNBOOKE. By THOMAS DEKKER.

Including also "The Belman of London," and "Lantern and Candle Light."

Edited, with Notes and Marginalia, by OLIPHANT SMELTON.

SPECIAL NOTE.—The New Number of the Temple Classics Magazine is now ready, containing many articles by well-known writers; a subscription of 6d. a year is charged for this, which entitles the subscriber to a copy containing a photogravure plate, post free, every quarter. Write for a Prospectus of the Series.

London: J. M. DENT & CO., 29 and 30 Bedford Street, W.C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIUMSTHE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN
AND HIS FAMILY.Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current
Literature, and without doubt the best
Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.Special Columns for New Books.
Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON ST., HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE IRISH TIMES

DUBLIN.

The largest and most influential circulation in Ireland.

Special page of book reviews every Friday.

London Editorial Offices: 153 FLEET STREET.

Advertisement Offices: 61 FLEET STREET.

The Best, Brightest, and most interesting Paper

THE DAILY CHRONICLE

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes.
Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events.Science and Art specially dealt with.
Fulllest Reports of All Current Events and Special
Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by O. K. S.
appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR
PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

Applications for above spaces should be made to Messrs. Crossley & Co., 57a Coleman Street, London, E.C. Special Rates for
a Series will be quoted.

Surplus LIBRARY BOOKS & NEW REMAINDERS

OFFERED AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

The FEBRUARY LIST, NOW READY, contains Popular Works on Sport,
Travel, Biography, and Fiction.

Sent POST FREE on application to

MUDIE'S LIBRARY,

30-34 New Oxford Street, London.

NOTICE.—"THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE"
is POSTED FREE (52 issues at 3d.) to every ANNUAL SUB-SCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying 13/-. FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a prepayment of 17/6 will secure it being sent regularly and Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy. Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or Newsvendor, or direct to the Publisher, 9 East Harding Street, E.C.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

DRINK THE

RED
WHITEDELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
& AFTER DINNER.& BLUEIn making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

MESSRS. METHUEN'S NEW BOOKS

GREAT ZIMBABWE. By R. N. HALL, part Author of "The Ancient Ruins of Rhodesia." With numerous Plans and Illustrations. Royal 8vo. 21s. net.
In 1902 Mr. R. N. Hall resumed his archaeological researches at Great Zimbabwe, and continued the work of exploration at this central group of monuments down to the year 1904. The results, which have exceeded all expectations, are embodied in the present volume, which thus forms a necessary sequel to "The Ancient Ruins."

GASPARD DE COLIGNY, ADMIRAL OF FRANCE. By A. W. WHITEHEAD. With many Illustrations and Maps. Demy 8vo. 12s. 6d. net.

"An important and original contribution."—DAILY CHRONICLE.
"A fine piece of historical portraiture, vivid in individual characterisation, and conceived in a spirit of impartiality."—ACADEMY.
"The book is a thoroughly good one in every respect."—GUARDIAN.
"It is a good piece of writing, this book about Coligny. It is careful and judicious, and shows on not a single page the hasty dogmatism of youth. Especially valuable in Mr. Whitehead's book is his clever disentanglement of the complex threads which surround notorious incidents like the murder of Francis, Duke of Guise, and the great Massacre of St. Bartholomew."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

ENGLAND UNDER THE STUARTS. By G. M. TREVELYAN, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, Author of "The Age of Wycliff." With Maps and Plans. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

This is the Fifth Volume, though the first published, of the Six Volumes of a New HISTORY of ENGLAND (Edited by Prof. G. W. C. OMAN), from the earliest times down to the year 1815.

"Mr. Trevelyan has performed a great literary feat. No one who begins the volume will be tempted to leave it unread."—SPEAKER.

A HISTORY OF THE ART OF WAR. By C. W. C. OMAN, M.A., Fellow of All Souls, Oxford. Vol. II. The Middle Ages, from the Fourth to the Fourteenth Century. Illustrated. A New and Cheaper Issue. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

THE THEORY OF KNOWLEDGE. By L. T. HOBBHOUSE, Fellow of C.C.C., Oxford. A New and Cheaper Issue. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

A HISTORY OF ROME: During the Later Republic and the Early Principate. By A. H. J. GREENIDGE, M.A. In 6 vols. Vol. I. (133-104 B.C.). With Maps. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.
"A worthy introduction to Gibbon. Mr. Greenidge is a deep political thinker and an admirable writer."—OUTLOOK.
"His diction is clear and pleasant, his judgments based upon definite conceptions of persons and things."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

THE LIFE OF FATHER IGNATIUS, O.S.B. By the BARONESS DE BEHROUCH. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

"A unique book of a strange arresting figure."—ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

"A striking and extraordinary book, more romantic even than a romance."

DAILY CHRONICLE.
"Full of miracles and prodigies."—DAILY MIRROR.

SHRINES OF BRITISH SAINTS. By J. C. WALL. With numerous Illustrations and Plans. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
[The Antiquary's Books.]

THE WORKS OF CHARLES AND MARY LAMB. Edited by E. V. LUCAS. With numerous Illustrations. In Seven Volumes. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. each. Vols. VI. and VII., "The Letters."

OLD GORGON GRAHAM. Crown 8vo. 6s.

This is a pendant to Mr. Lorimer's "Letters from a Self-made Merchant," a book which has had, both here and in America, an almost unprecedented success. In this book the father tells the story of his own rise with the same inimitable wit and racy wisdom.

"There is not a line in it to be neglected. The whole book is a fascinating stimulant."—MORNING LEADER.

"A thoroughly entertaining and sparkling book. Open the pages where he will the reader will come upon some pregnant sentence that deserves committing to memory."

BIRMINGHAM POST.

ENGLISH SEAMEN. By ROBERT SOUTHEY. Vol. II. RICHARD HAWKINS, GRENVILLE, ESSEX, and RALEIGH. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Second Volume of a well-known Series of Lives by Southey, the First Volume of which was published by Messrs. Methuen some years ago.

A MODERN CAMPAIGN; or, War and Wireless Telegraphy in the Far East. By DAVID FRASER, "Times" Special Correspondent. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 6s.

SICILY. By DOUGLAS SLADEN. With 234 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

JEREMY BENTHAM. By C. M. ATKINSON. Demy 8vo. 6s.

A short survey of the Life and Works of the man who was at once the greatest of English jurists and the founder of the older school of Utilitarians. The book displays his relations with Shelburne, Camden, Romilly, Brougham, the Mills, &c., and indicates the nature and aims of his principal works.

DE PROFUNDIS. By OSCAR WILDE. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

Also an Edition, limited to 200 copies, on large hand-made paper. Demy 8vo. 21s. net.

A very remarkable work, by the author of "A Ballad of Reading Gaol," which should take an enduring place in the literature of misfortune. The book, written in prison, expresses with unfailing lucidity the philosophy which he gathered in his two years' imprisonment, and is of great interest not only for the light which it throws on the curiously complex nature of its author, but also for its intrinsic beauty. Some of the best prose of this most sensitive artist is contained in its pages, not the least noteworthy of which are devoted to a very subtle and persuasive study of Christ as the Precursor of the Romantic Movement in Life.

ANECDOTES OF SOLDIERS. Edited by J. H. SETTLE. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

This book contains over 1,500 stories of soldiers in peace and war.

"A very readable volume."—T.P.'S WEEKLY.

"A volume of capital stories."—PUBLIC OPINION.

GAMONIA: or, The Art of Preserving Game; and an Improved Method of making Plantations and Covers. Explained and Illustrated by LAWRENCE RAWSTORNE, Esq. With 15 Coloured Drawings by T. RAWLINS. Fcap. 8vo. 3s. 6d. net. [The Illustrated Pocket Library.]

A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM. By WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE. Edited by H. CUNNINGHAM. Demy 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [The Arden Shakespeare.]

WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL. By A. M. SCOTT. With Portraits and Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

THE LIFE OF JOHN RUSKIN. By W. G. COLLINGWOOD, M.A. With Portraits. Fifth Edition. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net. [Half-Crown Library.]

Messrs. Methuen are publishing a series of books under the above title which will contain many books of general interest and first-rate quality at the low price of 2s. 6d. net. They are well printed and bound uniformly in cloth.

NEW NOVELS

THE GOLDEN BOWL. By HENRY JAMES. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE SECRET WOMAN. By EDEN PHILLIPOTS.

Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"Never before has he attempted so great and impressive a tragedy. There is something simple and elemental in its construction; it is in its way as merciless as 'King Lear.' 'The Secret Woman' is a great tragedy, and not unworthily told."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Unquestionably a work of exalted imagination. The author has never risen so high."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

THE SYSTEM. By PERCY WHITE, Author of "The West End," &c. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"Very lifelike and intensely readable."—DAILY MAIL.

"A very bright story, full of cleverness, and equal to anything Mr. White has produced."—MORNING POST.

"A novel of high excellence."—OUTLOOK.

THE GATE OF THE DESERT. By JOHN OXENHAM, Author of "Barbe of Grand Bayou." With a Frontispiece. Second Edition. Crown 8vo. 6s.

HIS ISLAND PRINCESS. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE TEMPESTUOUS PETTICOAT. By ROBERT BARR, Author of "The Countess Tekla" &c. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 6s.

THE MYSTERY OF THE MOAT. By ADELIN SERGEANT. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"Highly sensational, bright, and vivacious."—SCOTSMAN.

"An excellent specimen of Miss Sergeant's powers, very fascinating and entertaining."—MORNING LEADER.

"Full of excitement from start to finish."—LLOYD'S.

THE WEANS AT ROWALLAN. By K. FITZPATRICK. Crown 8vo. 6s.

HE THAT EATETH BREAD WITH ME.

By H. A. MITCHELL KEAYS. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"A really interesting and remarkable novel."—GUARDIAN.

"A remarkable book and of much solid power."—MORNING LEADER.

"Great is the power of atmosphere and greater still the charm of good writing."—DAILY GRAPHIC.

HEART OF MY HEART. By ELLIS MEREDITH. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"Curious, unique, informing, and obviously the outcome of experience."

STANDARD.

"Delicate fancy, descriptive vigour, and uplifting moral survey."

GLASGOW HERALD.

"A book of unusual merit, written with genuine literary charm and distinction."

DAILY MAIL.

THE VIRGIN AND THE SCALES. By

CONSTANCE COTTELL. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"Written with freshness of inspiration. The story is good, very good, and captures the mind with the freshness of early flowers."—BLACK AND WHITE.

"Bright and lively and clever."—SPEAKER.

Kindly write to Messrs. METHUEN for particulars of their Two New Series, "METHUEN'S HALF-CROWN LIBRARY" and "METHUEN'S SHILLING NOVELS."

METHUEN & CO., 36 Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

The Academy and Literature

No. 1711. Established 1869.

London: 18 February 1905.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17s. 6d. a year.]

Notes

PREPARATIONS for altering THE ACADEMY are getting on apace and we have now every reason to hope there will be presented to our readers on March 11 a journal beautifully printed on fine paper, whose contents will offer something new in the annals of literary journalism. A good wine needs no bush, and it is not our purpose to say more at present, but to do our best and leave our readers to form their own judgment.

SINCE the death of Robert Browning very little of his poetry has been unearthed that had not previously seen the light, but a find has recently been made. The poem is called "A Forest Thought" and it was written as far back as November 4, 1837, in one of the ladies' albums that were so popular at the time. Browning was quite young then and the verses are done in his most beautiful style. By the courtesy of "Country Life," in whose pages the verses will shortly appear, we are in the position to give four lines that will at least show the metre and the character of the poem:—

"In far Esthonian solitudes
The parent-firs of future woods
Gracefully, airily spire at first
Up to the sky, by the soft sand nurst."

THE proposed Shakespeare memorial has made a stride towards actuality. The County Council has expressed a willingness to grant a site for "an adequate Shakespeare monument," and on the strength of this promise a Provisional Committee has been formed, with Professor Gollancz as its honorary secretary. The committee's aim is not confined to the monument. They would rather aim at the establishment of a great Shakespeare House, to be devoted primarily to the furtherance of the study of the poet's works, and also to serve as a recognised centre for humane learning generally.

THE "House," it is hoped—or dreamed—will include a Shakespeare library, a lecture-theatre, and a central hall to receive (it is here that we begin to be a little nervous) "a fitting statue of Shakespeare, statues of other famous men being added from time to time." The statues are the part of the scheme on which all will reserve judgment, though, indeed, anything would be better than the Roubillac. But one suggestion will rise to every mind. There is only one sculptor living, if there is even one, who could express Shakespeare in marble: and that one is M. Rodin.

THERE is plenty of time, however, for that. The first thing is to collect the necessary funds. Mr. Richard Badger has offered in all £3,500, and the Shakespeare Commemoration to be observed in England, America and all parts of the world in Shakespeare week should result in large contributions. Pens and tongues of the ablest, like the pen of Mr. Sidney Lee, which is to deal with the subject in a forthcoming number of the "Nineteenth Century," will be put in requisition, and in order to reach not only the wealthy but persons of limited means, volunteer workers will be organised in different countries and localities. Lord Avebury is the treasurer of the fund, and Messrs. Robarts, Lubbock & Co. its bankers.

RECENT discoveries of old books suggest that there may be sensational surprises yet to come, even from the best worked fields. It is not long since Arthur Wilson's play of "The Swisser" was recovered (and published some months ago in Paris); then came the discovery in Sweden of a unique copy of the first edition of Shakespeare's "Titus Andronicus" (1594); and now Mr. R. A. Peddie has contributed to "The Times" particulars of the finding of a copy of a "hitherto uncatalogued and undescribed Elizabethan translation of Achilles Tatius"—"The Most Delectable and Pleasant Historie of Clitophon and Leucippe," translated out of the Greek by "W. B." (1597). The translator was William Burton, brother of the famous author of "The Anatomy of Melancholy," and though his translation has been known to have been published—thanks to an entry in the Stationers' Registers—no copy has hitherto been identified. "The Swisser" manuscript has been secured by the British Museum, and it would be good news to learn that the new "Titus Andronicus" and "Clitophon and Leucippe" were also added to the national collection.

IN 1797 there came into remote Somerset one whose stay there for a year introduced a new element into English poetry. About that time Coleridge was living in a cottage at Nether Stowey, and to be near him Wordsworth and his sister came to Alfoxden. Before he left, the "Lyrical Ballads," the fruit of his happy companionship with Coleridge, was written, and "Tintern Abbey." In this month's number of "Temple Bar" there is an excellent account of this little-known chapter in Wordsworth's early life. Two friends that the poets had there are mentioned incidentally, John Thelwall and Thomas Poole.

THE latter was a farmer of independent and original mind, whom they greatly appreciated. There could hardly be higher praise applied to a "mere layman" than that of Coleridge, who said he got from him "truths plucked as they are growing and delivered to you with the dew on them, the fair earnings of an observant eye, armed and kept on the watch by thought and meditation. There was something both in his understanding and his affections so healthy and manly that my mind freshened in his company, and my ideas and habits of thinking acquired, day after day, more substance and reality." Earth, mother earth, had proved a wonderful muse to this tiller of her. Like "Michael" in the poem in which Wordsworth had Poole in his thought,

"His mind was keen,
Intense and frugal, apt for all affairs,
And in his shepherd's calling he was prompt
And watchful more than ordinary men."

A story of Wordsworth in the article is too good to be passed. A worthy "statesman" had walked many miles to hear the poet-laureate address a meeting, but left immediately he discovered that high-sounding personage was "Nobbut old Wadswuth o' Rydal efter aw!" Then there is the other story of the stonebreaker who regarded the poet as a harmless lunatic, and told Hartley Coleridge "that old Wadswuth's brocken lowce ageean."

IN "The Independent Review" there is an article on the "Poetic Quality in Liberalism." It begins in this way. "Suppose, for the sake of argument, that a man were turned into a mackerel. His sentiments touching the change may not be a matter for urgent, but they cannot fail to be a matter for clarifying, consideration. There are many things that he would lose by passing into the fishy state; such as the pleasure of being in the neighbourhood of a Free Library, the pleasure of climbing the Alps, the pleasure of taking snuff, the pleasure of joining a heroic political minority, and also, I suppose and hope, the pleasure of having mackerel for breakfast. But there is one pleasure which the man made mackerel would, I think, lose more completely and finally than any of these pleasures; I allude to the pleasure of sea-bathing." To this we would venture to add another pleasure—the pleasure of reading a typical article in "The Independent Review" on the "Poetic Quality in Liberalism" by—it is hardly necessary to give the name—Mr. G. K. Chesterton.

OF Hawker of Morwenstow, whose biography by his son-in-law, Mr. C. E. Byles, Mr. John Lane is to publish in one volume on February 21, Mr. Francis Coutts writes in his "Musa Verticordia"

"Here, by this black forbidding coast,
Dwelt one who heard the heavenly host
Singing in every wind that blows,
In wave that breaks, or stream that flows.

And surely deemed that love divine,
Whose tendrils all his church entwine,
Is not too distant to be won
By Nature's humblest orison.

Wherefore amid these moors and steeps
His spirit ever laughs and weeps;
Weeps with the storm or laughs with glee
For rhythmic laughter of the sea."

The poem was written on the occasion of the unveiling of a window in Morwenstow Church last September, and Mr. Coutts remarks how the pilgrims (and pilgrims to Morwenstow are not a few)—

"Shall hear the whisper of the well,
The clamour of the torrent, tell
Of him who had strange power to teach
Their wordless human voices speech."

ONE among several literary anniversaries that have been celebrated lately seems to have been overlooked by every one except Mr. R. F. O'Connor, a writer in an unpretentious but well-conducted little paper, "The Catholic Fireside." One hundred years ago last December Francis Sylvester Mahony, better known, if known now at all, as "Father Prout," was born in a suburb of Cork. It would be a pity if Father Prout were completely forgotten before the anniversary of his death in 1966; but it seems not improbable that the eccentric old scholar and wit who delighted our grandfathers will disappear from memory entirely in the next sixty-two years. He was not so great a man as Peacock, whom in many ways he resembles; and even Peacock is little read to-day.

AND yet, in his time, no writer was more popular than Father Prout. He wanted first to be a Jesuit, and found himself unfitted for the religious life; he was ordained a priest, and followed his office with by no means a single heart. He loved roaming, he loved reading, he loved writing, and he loved talking better than any of them; and he lived mainly abroad, in Rome and Paris, a strange, Bohemian but respectable life. The numbers of "Fraser's Magazine" which contain "The Reliques of Father Prout" contain also "Sartor Resartus"; and there can be no question which was voted then the better of the two.

THERE is a good deal of punch in the wit of Father Prout; there was a good deal, too, in his life. But the Prout papers, to our thinking, are well worth reading to-day, if only there were a pleasanter edition to read them in than Messrs. Routledge's now old and always unattractive reprint. They are crammed with scholarship, with rollicking good-humour, with prejudice and wit. The mental agility of their author is astonishing. From admirable criticism of literature and politics it is but a step with him to the kind of joke that goes with punch or the most exhilarating nonsense. His prejudices are as violent as Peacock's, and as constantly to the fore; what Lord Brougham was to the author of "Headlong Hall," Daniel O'Connell was to Father Prout. And Thomas Moore was his favourite butt.

WHICH of the two, Peacock or Prout, was the better scholar it would be hard to say. Prout excelled as a translator, in particular of Horace and of Béranger; all good literature, new or old, was alive to him, and he made it live for his readers in translations or through the talk of his fictitious old priest, Father Prout, of Watergrasshill, Co. Cork. His original poetry includes one of the most charming lays in existence, "The Bells of Shandon"; and the half-pathetic, half-jovial spirit of the man makes everything he writes attractive.

DICKENS made him Rome correspondent of "The Daily News" in 1846, and he saw and described the Rome of the early Pontificate of Pío Nono. Then he went roaming again, and finally settled in Paris, where, as correspondent of "The Globe," he was a quaint and well-known figure in the streets. There Mrs. Oliphant saw him. He was calling on an old, old lady, a friend of many years, and he sang "The Bells of Shandon" with the tears in his eyes.

THERE is an objectionable form of title much in vogue now. The latest example is "The Truth about the Czar." Before that we had "Russia as it really is," "The Transvaal from Within," "The Real Siberia." It may be wisdom from the publisher's point of view, but most people would be suspicious of a book so titled. In any case it is silly. But there will always be children who insist on asking for the "right" time.

THE British Museum will shortly open a branch in Wales. In other words, the Treasury has at last consented, on condition that "sufficient local support is forthcoming," to make a grant in support of a national museum and a national library in the Principality. The homes of the new institutions will be where promises of local support are most freely forthcoming. Bangor, though not one of the largest nor wealthiest of Welsh towns, likes to be called the Athens of Wales; and no doubt the new buildings would look well on the heights above the Menai Strait. There will be keen competition for the coveted honour. Lord Balfour of Burleigh, the Earl of Jersey, and Lord Justice Cozens-Hardy are appointed by the President of the Council to consider ways and means of carrying out the Treasury proposals.

Bibliographical

THE approaching centenary (April 2) of the birth of Hans Christian Andersen—guide of millions of children into the fascinating realms of fairyland—is not likely to be neglected by the publishers, though it might be thought that his stories are obtainable already in sufficient variety of forms to satisfy such extra demand as is likely to be made. During the past fifteen years there have been at least three dozen "selections" or "collections" of Andersen's stories issued—sufficient proof of the steadiness of his popularity. About twenty years ago, Andersen's "Works" were issued in an American edition of ten volumes, but I know of no English edition of such a character. Some of his writings other than the fairy-stories should repay republication—"In Spain" or "In Sweden," to mention two of his pleasant books of travel talk. "The True Story of My Life" is a delightful piece of autobiography, though it only deals with his earlier years—he lived until 1875. This has been twice translated—by Mary Howitt (1846) and by Dr. Spillan, A.M. of Trinity College, Dublin (1852)—and there must be many lovers of Andersen who would be glad of a reissue. Readers who would know something of his later years may be interested in "Hans Christian Andersen's Correspondence with the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar, Charles Dickens, &c.," selected and edited by F. Crawford (1891).

Some weeks ago I had occasion to refer to Dekker's "Guls Horn Book," a welcome reprint of which has been added to the Temple Classics. Now I notice that we are to have from the Cambridge University Press a reprint of another of Dekker's quaintly entitled pamphlets on his contemporary London. This time it is to be "The Seven Deadly Sinnes of London: Drawne in Seven Severall Coaches through the Seven Severall Gates of the Citie, Bringing the plague with them." First published in 1606, this work was reprinted in John Payne Collier's "Illustrations of Old English Literature" (1866), in Professor Arber's "English Scholars' Library" (1880); and presumably in Dr. Grosart's edition of Dekker's non-dramatic works (1884-1886), to which I have not been able to refer. I fancy the satire is still obtainable in the attractive form of the "English Scholars' Library" as reissued by Messrs. Constable in 1895. A complete library edition of Dekker's works should be worth undertaking by some competent scholar and enterprising publisher, for Dr. Grosart's edition of twenty years ago was, I believe, but a small one.

"Oroonoko" and Mrs. Aphra Behn's other stories are to form a volume of Messrs. Routledge's series of Early Novelists. The story named was reissued in 1886 and in 1890, but the only other recent reprint of the witty woman's writings of which I know was a six-volume edition of "The Plays, Histories and Novels of the Ingenious Mrs. Aphra Behn" in 1871; and this has, of course, long since become unobtainable. The fact that Aphra Behn was "the first female writer who lived by her pen in England" gives a special interest to her work; but so much of that work—and particularly the dramatic—was marked by the licentiousness of the time that it is little suited to present-day taste. It will be interesting to see how far "Oroonoko, or the Royal Slave," and its companion novelettes will be popular to-day; during the eighteenth century they ran through many editions, the story named being translated into French and German.

To the series of Early Novelists to which I have referred there is also to be added Mr. J. M. Rigg's translation—first published in a very costly form in 1903—of the "Decameron" of Boccaccio, to be prefaced by John Addington Symonds' essay on "Boccaccio as Man and Author," which was published by itself in 1895.

The announcement of a further book from the pen of the lady who elected to be known as "Michael Fairless," and who unhappily died just as her work was receiving the widest recognition, suggests that some readers may like to have the brief list of her publications. These are: "The Gathering of Brother Hilarius" (1901); "The Roadmender"—and other papers reprinted from "The Pilot"—(1902); "The Child King: Four Christmas Writings"—a booklet—(1902); and the forthcoming "The Grey Brethren." All her books were short ones, and many readers will hope that before long they may be reissued in a single volume.

WALTER JERROLD.

Richard Jefferies

THE publication of a new edition of Mr. Salt's "Richard Jefferies" (A. C. Fifield) invites some comment on an author of whom it is stated in the preface that he is enjoying a steadily growing appreciation. Sixteen months after the death of Jefferies Mr. Henley wrote in "The Athenæum" that he "was not interesting at all," and that the biography of the future would not concern itself with him. Mr. Salt says this criticism already stands pilloried by time. It is worth while seeing now, after a lapse of sixteen years, if the balance cannot be held between these two opinions. It is impossible to classify Jefferies, to show that the peculiarity of his genius was derived from any race of literary men. Nature, turning aside for a moment from her usual processes of heredity, circumstance, environment, strayed from her beaten track. Poets, naturalists, thinkers, are made every now and then amid the great mass of commonplace; but here was one in whom, in the combination of these, her methods altered. The loneliness of wide plains, the green life of forest and meadow, the mystery of the wind, the loveliness of flowers, the unrest of the sea, the depth and wonder of the skies—the love and spirit of that outer world were all given to Jefferies. In varying manner the feeling of these things has been the dowry of all poets, and all poets are really naturalists and thinkers in the wide meaning of the term; but Jefferies was the possessor of something which had never found expression before. Tracing roughly his development, we find at the beginning evidence of the sporting instinct; then observation and love of life in all its forms made him a keen naturalist; to those was added a poetic fire which had possibly long lain dormant; and, finally, the conscious thinker struggled into being. It is the last phase which marks out Jefferies, that parts him from his fellows, that separates him from poet and naturalist. We all begin with a germ of poetry, we are all infant naturalists, but time treads down the first impressions and interests. The few who have genius survive all buffetings. Then we have the poet, the naturalist—perhaps a later day may call him scientist; but in them all it is the wonder, the inquiry of the child that has never been crushed or contaminated. So in all times the poet has sung the glories of natural objects. Lucretius in the dimness long ago descanted on the wonder of nature: the poet, the naturalist, the scientist, the thinker, have all been similarly inspired. But it was left to the nineteenth century to discover some hint of a new and unexpressed quality in nature. In England Wordsworth first gave passion and worship to nature in every form. Taking the natural features of our world, we may say that the manuscript of recorded nature suffers a hiatus from the pastoral age of the Greeks up to his time. Such a remark seems to skip over the great utterances of poetry, but we refer to that especial loving spirit which endeavoured to establish an intimacy between man and the features of the scene in which he found himself. It is true that Theocritus, to take one example, made no attempt to interpret consciously or ally himself to the nature he describes. But he was the child who spoke in the sweetness of the falling water, the sweetness of meadow and flower, and he heeded not, he knew not, that there was separation between them and the joy of animal life, the sweetness of maid and youth. They were all parts of one whole unquestionably blended. Then the days came when man and his works and inventions for ever intervened between the poet and any vision of the direct communion of man and nature. She became more and more a background for scenic devices and more and more artificially divorced. Civilisation was rotting at the roots. Man no longer sprang from the earth and derived his nourishment therefrom. He tended to a sickly superficiality of growth, making towards the high heavens perhaps, but losing the healthy union with the earth that had nursed him. Wordsworth, with divine instinct, felt its "healing power." Consciously he set himself to walk in the ways that had long been forsaken. Of course, his thought, the philosophy he evolved, took him far from the simple Greek. But he re-established the claims of nature on the imagination and literature of the nineteenth century. Can it be proved that Jefferies was in any sense an outcome of the Wordsworthian ideal? We do not think so. Wordsworth accepted the past, its wisdom, its experience, he only added to his poet's gift a deep sense of the divinity and inseparableness of the animate and inanimate. Jefferies passes across the stage like an emanation from a new world! With immeasurable desire, with crude expression, he strove to draw sustenance for thought and life from the mere contemplation and absorption of natural beauty. To him an undiscovered country lay in the world about our feet, an unknown magic dwelt in sun and stars to lift the soul into unimaginable altitudes. The burning heart of the poet never followed the elusive splendours of love and fame with more entirety than Jefferies this mirage of a new earth he was ever on the verge of entering. To him the dawn came to quicken with white fire the frenzy of his worship; the blueness of noon dropped a flower of the sky into his spirit; the sun flaming above a London square burned up the ant-like race that crawled there, and Jefferies found himself solitary on some Pisgah height. He was driven to the sea to seek air and depth and breadth for his dream to grow. The salt winds filled his lungs; the sea-scents rose to his brain; the murmuring waves stilled the inward turbulence. He heard behind him the yellow cornland whispering of plenty for the labouring earth and thankfully took the message of good and beauty. He used it all to exalt his sense of the completeness of man's destiny, if only the evolution of a deeper and fuller life were kept in view. His generous and sanguine soul was prepared to suffer and struggle with limitation and prejudice and sorrow if only he could be assured that he was to discover the boon which would give eternal aspiration and happiness to the race. In all his descriptions of what might be, there breathes the simple, sensuous, passionate nature of every poet's dreams. He does not evince any sympathy with the airy floating images of mystic fancy, nor does he evolve a wonderful Republic or visionary Utopia. He believes that in man resides a sense which would widen every conception, deepen every impression of beauty and love, dispel disease of mind and body, disease of civilisation and baneful heredity. He, alone on the hilltop, visited by the pure airs from above, in the wood where the tender flowers look up and thrill with real eyes, among the corn which the beneficent earth ripens for man, by the brook, singing of past and future, under Orion, under the sweetness of the Pleiades—everywhere did Jefferies fill his soul with beauty and longing and pray that these might enter into him and into the life and hopes of generations to come. Have all this blood and tears of thought and yearning left no mark? That Jefferies, the naturalist, the essayist, is read and appreciated each new edition of his writings testifies, but how many have tasted that deep summer life he would have given the clue to? "The unsearchable riches" he never found. Like Arthur's knightly saints, he pursued and fasted after the Holy Grail; and perhaps was granted him the incommunicable vision that comes to him who is content to watch and pray.

The Undergraduate's Art

PARODY is the undergraduate's art. It requires the high spirits and the plentiful lack of reverence of youth to produce it in perfection. True the authors of "Rejected Addresses" were never at a university. But if it be possible for a man to remain all his life an undergraduate without ever having been one, that feat seems to have been performed by Horace Smith. Mr. Swinburne's parodies ("Heptalogia") date from his post-university days, but then, Mr. Swinburne possesses the secret of perpetual youth, and certainly no one can accuse him of an excess of reverence. There has just been issued by Messrs. Macmillan & Bowes a collected edition of the works of one of the most accomplished undergraduate parodists who ever lived—Arthur Clement Hilton. In May of the year 1872 there appeared at Cambridge the first number of a "superior and high-class periodical" (to quote the title-page) called "The Light Green." A second and final number was issued in the following November. The contents consisted of half a dozen brilliant parodies and one or two miscellaneous articles, almost all by Hilton. He died at the early age of twenty-six at Sandwich, where he had a curacy, and with the exception of these parodies wrote nothing of the smallest value; but these have immortalised him. The first of them was "Octopus," a skit on Mr. Swinburne's "Dolores," and it opens thus:—

"Strange beauty, eight-limbed and eight-handed,
Whence camest to dazzle our eyes?
With thy bosom bespangled and banded
With the hues of the seas and the skies;
Is thy home European or Asian,
O mystical monster marine?
Part molluscos and partly crustacean, Betwixt and between."

"Whence camest" is atrocious. It should have run "Whence com'st thou." Otherwise this is very fair Swinburne. The remaining stanzas are not so good, and, indeed, "Octopus" is a little outside Hilton's line. In it he is trying to satirise a poet's thought and manner as a whole rather than to travesty any particular set of his lines. This is the fine art of parody, but it is rather beyond Hilton's powers, since he is weak on the critical side. What he really excels at is the purely verbal parody which, following its original verse by verse and almost line by line, gets its effects by the subtle or the absurd misapplication of the author's words to subjects for which they were never intended. In this genre "The Vulture and the Husbandman" has never been excelled. So good is it that at times it actually improves on Lewis Carroll. Take the following stanza:—

"The papers they had written lay
In piles of blue and white.
They answered everything they could,
And wrote with all their might,
But though they wrote it all by rote,
They did not write it right."

For mere metrical dexterity those last two lines are a masterpiece. They are worthy to rank with Peacock's famous "War Song of Dinas Vawr":—

"The mountain sheep are sweeter
But the valley sheep are fatter,
We therefore deemed it meet
To carry off the latter."

But then, Peacock's lines are an immortal piece of satire. Hilton's are merely a delightful jingle. Again, in "The Heathen Pass-ee" (the story of a Pass examination), there is a stanza which for fidelity to the original and for humour is quite exquisite. Every one will remember in Bret Harte's "Heathen Chinee," how—

"We found on his nails, which were taper,
What is common on tapers—that's wax."

Here is Hilton's stanza:—

"In the crown of his cap
Were the Furies and Fates,
And a delicate map
Of the Dorian States,
And we found in his palms, which were hollow,
What are frequent in palms—that is dates."

Verbal parody up to this standard is extremely rare. No parodist can keep it up through an entire poem. To achieve it even in an occasional stanza is something of a feat. Mr. Lawrence Binyon is responsible for one of the best examples. Every one knows the famous verse in Mr. Swinburne's "Garden of Proserpine":—

"From too much love of living,
From hope and fear set free,
We thank with brief thanksgiving
Whatever gods may be
That no life lives for ever,
That dead men rise up never,
That even the weariest river
Winds somewhere safe to sea."

Here is Mr. Binyon's parody, in "The Garden of Criticism," which the curious will find reprinted in the first series of "Echoes from the Oxford Magazine":—

"From too much love of Browning,
From Tennyson she rose,
And, sense in music drowning,
In sound she seeks repose.
Yet sometimes joys to know it—
And is not slow to show it—
That even the heavenliest poet
Sinks somewhere safe to prose."

It is lamentable that the man who could parody like that should have turned aside to become a merely serious poet. It is an Apostasy!

There was an anonymous writer in "Punch" some years ago who was responsible for a very happy parody on the Browning verse:—

"And did you once see Shelley plain?
And did he stop and speak to you?
And did you answer him again?
How strange it seems and new!"

It was just after the Shelley Society's performance of "The Cenci," and the parodist wrote:—

"And did you see the Shelley play?
And did you really sit it through?
Nor, at the third act, steal away?
How strange it seems—if true!"

Mr. Kipling in his younger days tried his hand at verbal parody with considerable success. Witness the travesty of a famous chorus of "Atalanta in Calydon" in "Departmental Ditties." But "Atalanta" has been the butt of more than one parodist. Many people will recall "Atalanta in Camden Town," by Lewis Carroll. The poem which has suffered more frequently than any other in this respect is supposed to be Longfellow's "Excelsior," but Tennyson's "Break, break, break" must run it close. Its refrain has been made applicable to breaking crockery and breaking cricket-balls and breaking records, to breaks at billiards and brakes on railway trains. One of the best of them (the undergraduate's art again!) began:

"Break, break, break,
At the foot of my stairs, Oh scout!
And it's good that my tongue can't utter
The oaths that my soul points out."

But the author, whoever he was, was no match for Hilton. Indeed, in his own line Hilton stands alone. It is therefore very satisfactory that his verses are now accessible in a cheap and handy form. "The Light Green" is very rare and very precious to the happy few (mainly Hilton's contemporaries at Cambridge) who possess the two green-bound numbers, and the new volume has the additional advantage of a biography of the little-known wit.

Reviews

THE LIFE OF THE MARQUIS OF DUFFERIN AND AVA

By Sir Alfred Lyall, P.C. 2 vols. (John Murray, 36s. net.)

THE late Lord Dufferin was in a peculiar manner at once the product and the ornament of a great empire. His name is mostly associated with those distant dominions of the King that the forefathers of this generation founded and that we have taken so much pains to solidify into an empire. He came of a stock from which the qualities he displayed are naturally expected. It seems that the earliest record of the family name, Blackwood, was discovered in a deed witnessed by John de Blackwode at Morpeth in 1386. After that the name occurs frequently in the town and parish registers of southern Scotland during the next two centuries. Whether all the Blackwoods mentioned came from one stock is doubtful: in the fifteenth century the family seems to have established itself in Fifeshire; but we need not trace out his pedigree from its dim and uncertain beginnings to the birth of the hero of this biography. As Sir Alfred Lyall points out, in Lord Dufferin we have a notable example of the blending of hereditary qualities, namely, those of the Blackwoods on the one side and the Sheridans on the other. Lord Dufferin himself was born at Florence on June 21, 1826, but shortly afterwards his father brought his wife and son to Clontarf, in Ireland, where Hans Lord Dufferin was living in a house "where no two rooms had floors on a level, and consequently everybody was tumbling up and down steps all day, no doors or windows shut, and the sea breezes played freely over every sofa and bed, frisking out of the room after cooling every corner." However, they did not remain long at Clontarf, but presently removed to Clandeboye, "where the old lord made his grandson, then four years old, drink Tory toasts at dessert." Eventually he was sent to a school at Hampton, kept by a Mr. Walton, of whom Lord Dufferin records that "the floggings at Eton were child's play compared with the Hampton ones." From Hampton he passed in 1839 to Eton, whence in due time he went up to Oxford. He gives the following graphic picture of the life of the gentleman commoners of Christ Church:

"We dine at a table by ourselves, raised on a dais at the top of the hall; our gowns are made of silk, and a gold tassel is put on the cap, whence the name of 'tufts'; all others are interdicted from keeping servants and horses; we are not even expected to do so much in our college examinations; in short, there is no circumstance in which we are not given the advantage, consequently we are tempted to think that there must be some intrinsic merit in ourselves to deserve such attention, and begin to look with contempt upon those our fellow-students who are not treated with like respect."

In 1847 he became President of the Union Debating Society, to the great joy of his mother, who in one of her letter inquires whether there is any salary or emolument attached to the office of President's mother. Lord Dufferin came of age on June 21, 1847, and two years later he accepted from Lord Russell the post of a Lordship-in-Waiting. He had already begun to nourish political ambitions, but fate did not permit him to study politics in the House of Commons, for on January 31, 1850, he took his seat as Baron Clandeboye of Clandeboye in the House of Lords. His way of life at this time is well illustrated by a quotation from his journal:

"Saw Thackeray shaving! Breakfasted with the Bishop of Oxford; went down to the House of Lords to hear him speak, and was turned out of the gallery by the usher. Talked for some time with Gladstone.

Had my head examined, and was told that I had no political ambition. Talked to Sharman Crawford about tenant-right. Took a lesson in reel-dancing."

From the beginning Lord Dufferin attached himself to the Liberal cause, and he gives us many interesting glimpses of the leaders. His first meeting with Gladstone had been while he was still a boy, and he was a guest at Hawarden in December, 1861, when the Prince Consort died, and in February, 1862, he was charged with the duty of moving the address in the House of Lords in answer to the Queen's speech. He kept the friendship of the great Liberal leader up to the very last, and on his appointment to the Embassy at Paris in 1891 Mr. Gladstone, writing to a friend on the staff of the Embassy, said:

"Will you be kind enough to congratulate Dufferin very warmly, on my own and my wife's behalf, on his appointment to Paris. The country is also to be congratulated. I, at least, do not know how any different and equally good appointment could have been made."

Of Lord Randolph Churchill there is the following mention in 1886:

"I had a long talk with C. Villiers on Saturday evening at the Athenæum. He spoke in the highest terms of Randolph Churchill. He thinks him one of the most remarkable men he has known, not merely on account of his debating power, but from the mastery he has obtained over every subject which comes under discussion, and from his strength of will, which has, from sheer force of character, swept away every obstacle, triumphed over innumerable jealousies and dislikes of his colleagues and of the Court, and has made him for the present the most powerful man in the House of Commons, and with widespread influence out of doors. He thinks, however, that his health will give way."

Of literary people we get many mentions. It is generally known that Dufferin was one of Tennyson's friends, if from nothing else from the fact that "Demeter and other Poems" is dedicated to the Marquis of Dufferin as a tribute of affection and gratitude. The poet laments his son's death "beneath alien stars" and says:

"But while my life's late eve endures,
Nor settles into hueless gray,
My memories of his briefer day
Will mix with love for you and yours."

In the first volume a meeting with Carlyle is recorded at dinner at Lady Ashburton's, the entry in Lord Dufferin's diary being as follows: "Peel, Carlyle, Ellice: Carlyle saying Sydney Smith had no humour and was like a Yorkshire innkeeper." When he was at Boston, U.S., Longfellow asked him to be his guest at the monthly dinner of the Literary Club, and among the guests were Wendell Holmes, Lowell, Emerson, and the two Danas. But naturally enough the great Pro-consul's friends were more frequently dramatists and ambassadors than men of letters. From New York we get the following characteristic vignette:

"The only piece of Yankee sharpness I observed was the following: A horse had dropped down dead in the street. The afternoon was too far advanced to admit of its removal that evening. Five minutes afterwards the carcass was completely plastered over with electioneering placards."

Russia provided him with more exciting incidents. He was there when the Emperor was assassinated and an attempt was made on the life of Count Melikoff. Lord Dufferin writes:

"I saw Loris Melikoff within a few minutes after he had been shot at, and he showed me the hole in his coat where the bullet had grazed his spine. It was a very near thing. He was very much pleased when I observed that it was probably the first time his enemies had ever had a chance of aiming at that part of his body."

After St. Petersburg his next appointment was to Constantinople, and his letters home contained vivid accounts of what took place there in the 'eighties. Of the Egyptian Campaign he narrates the following curious incident:

"After the English troops had stormed the Egyptian lines and advanced far beyond them, some of the men returned to their original position. On their way back they came across an elderly Arab lying on his stomach with a heap of empty cartridges beside him, and firing away at a high elevation. Some one hit him a crack on the back and asked him what he meant by what he was doing, upon which he replied, with some irritation, 'I don't in the least know who you are; I am blind,' and wanted to return to his original occupation of shooting imaginary foes."

In these pages we do not discuss politics, and it has been our object merely to skim this biography and show by extracts some of the incidents in Lord Dufferin's career, and give a hint of the atmosphere in which he lived. But the real value of the book lies in the information it supplies in regard to the great movements in foreign and colonial politics that have been going on during the last thirty years. We have had few ambassadors as able as Lord Dufferin, and not one whose life was more irreproachable. With a cool and clear eye he discerned the operations that were going on round him, and he had a sense of justice that makes every account of anything given by him absolutely reliable. One has only to look at the fine clear-cut features of the photographs that adorn these pages to understand the eminence he attained as the representative of Great Britain. He was great and he was illustrious, and as we read the biography we seem to be following some fine and stately figure threading the mazes in a turmoil of intrigue, and menace, and danger. It has been done at very great length, but when the biography has been placed on the shelf for reference those who find most use for it will not regret the fact.

MR. HOLYOAKE'S REMINISCENCES

By George Jacob Holyoake. 2 vols. (Fisher Unwin, £1 1s.)

Mr. Holyoake has already published—in two volumes—"Sixty Years of an Agitator's Life," which was an interesting and even notable book, but it did not exhaust all the material afforded by his career. We are obliged, however, to admit that in this later book the gold is beaten rather thin; and, in fact, the reminiscences—which are none of them to be described as wildly exciting—are eked out with extracts from newspapers. Mr. Holyoake's sententiousness also sometimes betrays him into platitudes, such as "Life would be impossible or very unpleasant if every one persisted in remembering what had better be forgotten"; and again, "Noble maxims have their limitations. Few have universal applicability." Our author's passion for newspaper quotation is illustrated in the twenty-eight pages which he devotes to telling the story of how the Lambeth Palace grounds were opened to the public. From that momentous year of 1878, when Mr. George Anderson, "an eminent consulting gas engineer," "in whom business had not abated human sympathy," was struck with the advisability of substituting the children of Lambeth for the sheep in the Palace pastures, down to the taking over of the fields by the London County Council some two or three years ago, we are given an extraordinary olla podrida of memorials, articles, letters, and so on, industriously rescued from old newspaper files. Mr. Holyoake should have summarised the whole business in a couple of pages, which would have been infinitely more effective for his purpose as against the obstructive authorities concerned. Another example of this copiousness is a passage about Church rates, of which the captions are: "The Predatory Vicar of St. Bride's," and "A Sacred Shylock." Mr. Holyoake actually gives us the full text of two demand notes, dated 1856, for £1 4s. 8d., and we wade through all this legal verbiage before we get to the real point, which is that Mr. Holyoake ultimately decided to pay the vicar in kind; and as the chief produce of his "farm" in Fleet Street consisted in volumes of the "Reasoner," "I sent the vicar," he says, "three volumes, which exceeded in value his demand. He troubled me no more." Now that is really an entertaining incident, which would have gained enormously if it had been told succinctly.

Mr. Holyoake is dryly humorous about his early ambitions. His first was to be a prize-fighter; his second to be a clown; his third to be a poet; and his fourth to be a critic.

Of special interest is Mr. Holyoake's chapter on Disraeli, which should certainly be compared with Mr. Bryce's essay in "Studies in Contemporary Biography." After pointing out the remarkable analogies between the characters and the careers of Disraeli and Ferdinand Lassalle, Mr. Holyoake gives a ludicrous description of Disraeli's famous speech at Manchester in 1872, when, inspired by brandy and water, he went on speaking for hours after the time fixed for him to sit down. But those were days when members who were manifestly inebriated did not hesitate to address the House of Commons. The favour which her late Majesty showed to Disraeli is certainly difficult to understand in view of what Mr. Holyoake tells us about his Aylesbury speech in September 1871, when he said: "We cannot conceal from ourselves that Her Majesty is physically and morally incapacitated from performing her duties." Mr. Holyoake tells us that one of the reporters who took down the astounding words afterwards read the passage over to Mr. Disraeli, who assented to its correctness. Mr. Holyoake also mentions a Lord Mayor's banquet at which Mr. Disraeli gave an insulting and defamatory account of the Russian Royal Family, with whom, of course, our own Royal House was allied by marriage. And he points out that, whatever even Republicans may think of the theory of the Crown, they are against any personal outrage upon it.

Naturally more interesting, because based on much wider knowledge of the man, are Mr. Holyoake's comments on Mr. Gladstone. He gives the full text of Gladstone's first electoral address, to the electors of Newark, containing those paragraphs about slavery which afterwards formed the basis of so much misrepresentation. It actually fell to Mr. Holyoake's lot to report that famous speech of Mr. Gladstone's at Newcastle, when he said that Jefferson Davis had not only made a navy, but had made a nation. Curiously enough, when Mr. Gladstone returned to the subject the next night and made various qualifications, the press took no notice of them. Mr. Holyoake was certainly useful to Mr. Gladstone in keeping him informed as to the state of public opinion on various questions, which was apt to be misrepresented by the London newspapers. We cannot resist quoting Mr. Holyoake's noble tribute to the great Liberal statesman:

"In the splendid winter of Mr. Gladstone's days there was no ice in his heart. Like the light that ever glowed in the temple of Montezuma, the generous fire of his enthusiasm never went out. The nation mourned his loss with a pomp of sorrow more deep and universal than ever exalted the memory of a king."

In some ways the most interesting chapter of the whole book is that in which Mr. Holyoake tells the story of the British Legion sent out to help Garibaldi. Mr. Holyoake was the Acting Secretary, and drew up an advertisement of an attractive excursion to Sicily and Naples, which was particularly addressed to members of Volunteer rifle corps. Unfortunately many of the volunteers who appeared and were enrolled had their own game to play, and had no notion of rendering that obedience to orders the necessity for which was impressed upon every applicant. Among the earliest recruits was a young man, wearing the uniform of a Garibaldian soldier, of specious manners, and calling himself Captain Styles. This gentleman, whose military experience seems to have been taken for granted, made quite a good thing out of the enterprise, for he secretly sold commissions without the knowledge of the Committee, and pocketed the proceeds. The cardinal weakness of the Legion was that there was no competent commander to enforce order. Of course Captain Styles disappeared and was no more heard of. Garibaldi's praise of the services of the Legion was characteristic of his generosity; but Mr. Holyoake declares that the majority of them really deserved it.

A word must be said, in conclusion, in praise of the numerous and exceedingly interesting portraits with which the book is illustrated.

DO WE BELIEVE?

A Record of a Great Correspondence in "The Daily Telegraph," October, November, December, 1904, with an Introduction by W. L. Courtney. (Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d.) It is not easy to forbear a smile at the somewhat boasting statement prefixed to this book that nine thousand letters were received by "The Daily Telegraph" in its singular correspondence, and that "if all the letters and sermons had been printed they would have occupied two thousand five hundred columns of the newspaper." The illustration is of a sort dear to the popular imagination. The correspondence, even when set out with a show of order and introduced by Mr. Courtney, leaves a vague impression on the mind as of a babel of voices reiterating "Yes" and "No," but it is instructive as showing how various classes of the community have been influenced by the teaching and discoveries of the past century. It would be idle to pretend that the Christian faith or rather the faith of Christians at the opening of the twentieth century is exactly what it was when the nineteenth dawned. Even if we grant that its teaching is not only right but Divine, we must also admit that scientific discovery has modified it. No thoughtful man now seriously disputes the doctrine of evolution. After a period of vigorous protest and controversy it has gradually come to be accepted that the world as it is was not called into sudden existence by the voice of a magician, but has arrived where it is after a process extended over æons. Biology has shown that man himself is intimately connected with the life around him. At what period and in what manner life came to the planet remains a mystery, but, given the first protoplasm, the development of the most complicated organisation becomes at least intelligible. The study of embryology has shown that from the ovum to the finished organism this history is repeated in the individual, while many organs that have become atrophied through disuse still remain to show the stages through which man has passed. His divinest gifts, reason included, may be studied in the lower animals, while the care and labour spent on investigating the usages and manners of savage nations show in the rough how his most cherished institutions began with the first attempts of men to live in some sort of organised society. Add to all this the effects of historical criticism applied with a new precision, and it will no longer be gainsaid that the old simple faith has suffered a rough assault. The results are open and visible. There is scarcely a grade or class which has not lost something of its interest in religion and religious questions. Even the peasant, though he may not be able to explain why, he ceases to go to church; if he is young he rides on his bicycle instead; and in this he is following the example set him by the classes immediately above that to which he belongs.

But was it for good or evil that a discussion on the subject was allowed to go on to such an inordinate length in the columns of the favourite paper of the middle classes? Mr. Courtney, at least, has no doubt on the subject. In his opinion, newspapers "in a sense represent the conscience [the italics are ours] of the nation," and in this matter "The Daily Telegraph" has served "as a modern substitute for the confessional." Which cryptic saying he amplifies by telling us that men and women have confided to its columns "their most intimate perplexities and doubts." Of course there is a rich variety in the letters. One man seems to think doubt is at end because "the Bible as it stands was accepted by the late Dean Farrar and the late Mr. Gladstone, men of stupendous intellect and profound learning"; others seek to justify their faith by elaborate argument. The tendency of what are in our opinion the most thoughtful letters is to exhibit an honest wish to believe. Whether it were Divine or no, the vision of one who was "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief" seized the imagination of mankind as it never had been seized by the potent early deities. Poet and preacher and painter tried to outdo one another in impressing on the world the material events of his career, till the stable he was born in, the manger that was his cradle, Nazareth, Bethany, Capernaum and Dark Gethsemane, his "bloody sweat," the nails of his cross, were materialised before every Christian eye. Probably it was only given to the elect of the ages to recognise the Divine and deep and kind wisdom, a wisdom true to the heart of man, that underlay such sayings as "Suffer the little children to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of God." They could see how wise this was if applied to the commonplace affairs of life, but the duller crowd, to whom rule and formula are necessities, only learned the superficial meaning, the invitation to little children, and did not recognise that it was mainly a demand for the child-like spirit. Understood by a few, it was wrapped in dogma and accepted by the multitude. When Christianity was first promulgated there were but a few small spots where civilisation flourished. Nations now at the top of the wave of advancement were then made up of gloomy savages. And it is small wonder if the rude tribesmen of the day failed to catch the gentle spirit of the new teaching. Progress is a slow process, and the ideals opened up by Christianity, though they helped it along, worked no miracle. Of the sayings of those moderns who could not accept the creed, the most profound was that of Goethe, who asserted that he was proud of human nature, inasmuch as it had evolved such a religion. But it would be vain to expect any wide philosophic view from the correspondents of a daily paper; rather let us be thankful for the evidence that so many think seriously about the gravest of all questions. Sometimes one is tempted to believe that the religious feeling is being atrophied, so few appear to be interested. On the Exchange and in the mart, in the haunts of fashion and the meeting-places of intellect, but seldom do we hear such topics mentioned. A quarter of a century ago the reviews were full of theological controversies; now one scarcely ever arises. Yet all history goes to show that religion, as distinguished from mere dogma, never is extinguished, though there have been periods when it has almost died out. Like everything else, it has developed, and perhaps we have now arrived at a new point of departure. In that case it is well that a great daily paper has taken the trouble to mirror for us the ideas passing through the minds of the "men in the street."

LADY JEAN: THE ROMANCE OF THE GREAT DOUGLAS CAUSE

By Percy Fitzgerald. (Fisher Unwin, 12s. net.)

THOSE who enjoy antiquated mysteries—not to say scandals—will doubtless find a feast of satisfaction in Mr. Fitzgerald's book; those who have no taste for such matters will be inclined to wonder whether or no it was worth while to call the Lady Jean Douglas out of her grave merely to put her in the pillory as an adventuress. It may be conceded, however, that she fills the rôle of adventuress to perfection, and that the author makes out a very strong case against her. The story of the famous "Douglas cause," as here set forth, makes curiously unpleasant reading, though not without some grim humours of its own. The violent and eccentric Duke of Douglas, Jean, his sister, with her plausibility and unscrupulous cunning, the broken-down gambler, her husband, and the train of dupes and accomplices—these provide a complete Rogues' Gallery. After much coquetting in youth, the Lady Jean, when close on fifty, married Colonel Stewart of Grand Tully, a gentleman of a not too savoury reputation, with the expressed intention of providing heirs for her brother's estates. As she was deep in debt and out of favour with the Duke, the proceeding was advisable, but prudence might have suggested her setting about it a little sooner. However, after a year and a half of wandering on the Continent, the Lady Jean duly produced twin boys, and presented them as her brother's heirs. Mr. Fitzgerald gives a close account of the manner in which—presumably—the boys were bought from their real parents, and of the elaborate artifice by which the Lady Jean sustained her part. The narrative does not err on the side of reticence, and we grow rather weary of physical detail. Whether Lady Jean got her twins at different times by purchase or both together in the more accepted fashion seems, after the lapse of so many generations, scarcely a burning question, though Mr. Fitzgerald is as keen on the track of the secret as was that Andrew Stewart who, in the interest of the Hamiltons, ransacked France for proofs of imposture. It would appear, as far as the matter can be considered without going through the "1,200 quarto pages of evidence" that there probably was an audacious fraud, in consequence of which the estates of the house of Douglas went to a youth who had no connection with the family. We will not go so far as Mr. Fitzgerald, who considers that the judgment of heaven on the imposture was shown by the fact that all the eight sons of the fortunate claimant died without children. Heaven does not, as a rule, work in so obvious a manner. A little less personal detail, a little more of the legal aspect of the case, might have resulted in a more valuable as well as more dignified volume; for the "great Douglas cause" was debated by famous lawyers, was decided against the claimant in the Scotch Court of Session, and decided for the claimant in the House of Lords. Unhappily, the marked legal figures are not individualised; Mansfield and the rest are mere names. Neither is the atmosphere of the eighteenth century so conveyed as to raise this chronique scandaleuse to the rank of an historic study. Mr. Fitzgerald has, in fact, given us a somewhat repellent chapter of gossip, narrated in a style so slipshod as to suggest doubts as to its accuracy in other points. It is, of course, possible that an author who misuses his "and which" and writes "different to" may yet be capable of weighing points of evidence; but we are inclined to give Lady Jean Douglas the benefit of the doubt.

ALESSANDRO SCARLATTI: HIS LIFE AND WORKS

By Edward J. Dent, Fellow of King's College, Cambridge. (Edward Arnold, 12s. 6d. net.)

GERMAN, Italian, French, and Flemish writers have produced exhaustive monographs on the lives of individual musicians or the musical histories of particular cities. Hitherto such work has had but little attraction for English writers. The paucity of biographical material which the closest research into our own early musical history brings to light discourages the antiquary; nor have we hitherto devoted attention to foreign musical personalities. Mr. E. J. Dent has broken fresh ground, and has published an ambitious work dealing with the Neapolitan composer whose share in the evolution of opera has made his name one of the most familiar in the history of music, though his works are completely neglected, and not a single one of his airs remains upon the vocalist's repertory. Appreciation of Mr. Dent's adventurous excursion into a new path is called for by the attempt as such, and the result of his labours is a handsome volume which should find a place in every music-lover's library.

Let it be premised that certain blemishes are perceptible here and there. Accuracy, not elegance of style, has been aimed at, yet there are occasional sentences where Mr. Dent has endeavoured to impart interest to the manner as well as the matter. But from an alumnus of Eton and a Fellow of King's one expects better English than "We must remember that music in the seventeenth century occupied a different position to that which it occupies in the twentieth" (p. 10).

To write a biography of an Italian composer necessitates a vast amount of knowledge other than musical; local dialects as well as literary Italian must be understood; local customs as well as general history demand attention; even terms of cookery are repeatedly introduced. Here Mr. Dent shows himself fully competent. Without blind adoration of his hero, he has brought himself into thorough sympathy with Scarlatti's personality, and has studied all his circumstances and his relations to Italian art. There are indications that the author is not quite so intimately acquainted with the early musical history of England and Germany. On page 80 he speaks of the German chorales as if they had always been in even notes like the Genevan and English psalm-tunes; apparently he is not aware of the fundamental difference between the "rhythmic chorale" (where the rhythm was of words, not of music) and the later chorale as we find it in Pachelbel and Bach, with musical rhythm. Such a hymn-tune as the one Wagner composed for the opening scene of "Die Meistersinger" is quite unlike any chorale Hans Sachs ever heard. Again, the allusion to Ground Basses on page 13 suggests imperfect acquaintance with English instrumental music.

Scarlatti's biography is fairly clear, except as regards his early years; there is no doubt that he was a Sicilian, born about 1659, but the actual birthplace is uncertain. Nor is anything definite recorded of his youth until in 1679 he appears in Rome as an opera composer. He was at once successful, and appointed Maestro di Cappella to Christina, ex-Queen of Sweden. Opera had a precarious life in Rome; Pope after Pope forbade it, and women were never permitted on the stage. Most of the performances were private, in the palaces of the nobility. In 1684 Scarlatti became Maestro to the Spanish viceroy at Naples; his sister, a disreputable actress, was instrumental in obtaining his appointment by intrigues which remind us that the age was that of Barbara Villiers and Louise de Kerouaille in London, and of La Montespan in Paris. In Naples Scarlatti remained eighteen years. Then he went for a time to Florence, Rome, Venice and Urbino, returning to Naples in 1708; and at Naples, except for a stay at Rome, 1718-21, he remained till his death in 1725. He was perpetually composing, and is credited with hundreds of operas, hundreds of masses, many hundreds of solo cantatas, hundreds of miscellaneous pieces, which must have run as by their own impulse out of his pen. The very finest opera he produced was, says Mr. Dent, "Mitridate Eupatore," a work of his Venice time, and one air, "Cara tomba," he describes as "head and shoulders above" every other air of Scarlatti's. The beginning is quoted, and is so remarkable that one must regret Mr. Dent did not publish the whole; he pronounces it "worthy of J. S. Bach at his best." Judging from the tantalising fragment, it resembles rather the finest inspirations in Handel's operas; and when we recall that Handel was about 1707 in Venice, it is difficult to doubt a kinship between "Cara tomba" and the immortal "Cara sposa" in "Rinaldo." Scarlatti's air should be made accessible by inclusion in some collection of vocal music, such as the "Gemme d'Anhita."

The libraries examined, besides those in London, Oxford and Cambridge, include the Paris (Nationale and Conservatoire), Brussels, many at Rome, Naples, Bologna, Florence, Milan, Montecassino, Padua, Modena, Venice, Munich, Dresden, Darmstadt, Vienna and, above all, the celebrated collection of Fortunato Santini, now lying in the miserablest neglect at Münster in Westphalia. Mr. Dent has described in "The Monthly Musical Record" what a sight met his eyes when he entered the room where Santini's collection is preserved. A long spell of housemaid's work was necessary before he could even get at the MSS., but he finally succeeded in profiting by Santini's labours, and found them especially useful as regards Scarlatti's church music. And the article in "The Monthly Musical Record" has had the important result of calling attention both in England and Germany to the disgraceful condition of Santini's collection.

As regards critical opinions, the author is moderate and discriminating; he occasionally lets slip utterances which show a want of sympathy with certain aspects of modern German music. Such phrases as "Elsa or any other namby-pamby maiden of early (?) German romanticism" are less startling than the remarks upon one of Scarlatti's brilliant dramatic airs:

"'Coloratura' employed in this way has a dramatic value which no declamation, to however elaborate an accompaniment, can equal. Such a triumphant rush of rapid notes can only produce its proper effect when sung.

The modern plan of giving the 'Coloratura' to the orchestra and declamation to the voice makes us almost always feel that the singer is battling against the instruments, instead of leading them."

Most musicians will hardly agree with this last sentence; yet it is well that occasional utterance should be found for antiquated beliefs, certain to revive one day. We have been baptized into another creed; but there are distinct signs of a reaction in this direction as well as in others, and Mr. Dent's book is itself one of the signs. He does not perceive that a change has begun; for he says: "To most lovers of music at the present day, Schumann, Wagner and Brahms represent the normal style of musical expression." This represents the standpoint of 1890. Instead of Schumann, he should have said Dvorak, Tchaikovsky, Rachmaninoff, Arensky and Strauss, while beside these newer lights, the classical school—Mozart, above all—is shining steadily on, while Beethoven's epigoni grow dim. This reaction makes the older Italian school, Handel's operas as well as Scarlatti's, more intelligible to us. Mr. Dent's book will in some measure aid this reaction towards the appreciation of constructive skill rather than the violently prominent detail German romanticists loved; and it must also be recommended because it assists the comprehension of a most important figure in musical history, who closed the transitional seventeenth century and ushered in the culminating period of Handel and Bach.

GREAT LAWN-TENNIS PLAYERS

By G. W. Beldam and P. A. Vaile. (Macmillan, 12s. 6d. net.)

To Mr. G. W. Beldam came, in a happy moment, the thought of utilising his considerable talent as a photographer in a novel field—that of book-making. "Great Golfers" was the result, and a very interesting result it proved. From that book the ardent golfer may indubitably learn a good deal. He can discover how the best exponents of the game take up their stance for the different shots: he can select his models where he pleases (and there is enough diversity among the experts' positions to satisfy all tastes); and it is possible for him at the same time to effect a considerable improvement in his own methods and to satisfy a natural curiosity as to the personal appearance of the great exponents of the game. The golf book, in fact, was a success; and from its success the book before us has naturally sprung. Human nature is such that when an author scores a bullseye with a fortunate shot his publishers will not be satisfied until they have persuaded him to a second attempt. And so Mr. Beldam comes forward once more with his series of snapshots, and Mr. P. A. Vaile comments diligently on the various strokes; and the "trade," we may presume, mindful of a former success, buys freely. Every one concerned in the production should be satisfied. The photographs are very good indeed—as photographs. Possibly a good many lawn-tennis players will buy the book, and turn over the pages at odd moments. But they will not gain anything like the instruction from it that the golfer found in Mr. Beldam's previous work. The golfer can learn much from photographs, for the simple reason that he has to deal with a ball at rest, and the stance, address and swing can be reproduced by the camera with absolute fidelity. The lawn-tennis player, dealing with a ball approaching him in all manner of different ways, with innumerable variations of pace, flight and spin, finds it impossible to gain much information from these reproductions, excellent as they may be. And the letterpress, to speak frankly, is often merely fatuous.

For Mr. P. A. Vaile as a lawn-tennis player and as a theorist we have a considerable respect. He is one of those athletes (like Mr. A. C. M. Croome and some others we could name) who bring their minds to bear upon a game and are never satisfied until they have approximated it to an exact science. Also, hailing from the colonies, he has the inestimable advantage of approaching the subject with a mind freed from reverence of tradition. The Dohertys may be champions, but he criticises them with no less freedom on that account. He is in no danger of bowing down and worshipping their game as faultless. Many of the remarks he makes upon their methods are sound and useful. But the amount of space he devotes to himself and his own performances (especially in the direction of authorship) strikes us as disproportionate to the verge of absurdity. Shortly before the last championship meeting, it appears that Mr. Vaile wrote in a few days and "rushed through the Press" (to use his own words) a book called "Modern Lawn Tennis." We have not gone to the labour of counting the references made to this work in the volume before us, but it would be hardly overstating the case to say that there is at least one mention of the book in each page of printed matter. Dr. Johnson's comment on conduct of this kind was severe, but merited: "He used to write books," he said of some unhappy hack, "and then other books praising those books, in which there was something of rascality." But that was before the days of the "expert" in literature. Proficiency in sport was not then regarded as a sufficient passport to letters, and books were seldom that cheerful mixture of slang and solecism that we find to-day. Mr. Vaile can play lawn tennis and can talk about it, but he certainly cannot write. He rarely encounters an infinitive without splitting it with the utmost promptitude and despatch.

However, Mr. Beldam's photographs make an excellent album. To regard the volume in which they appear as a book is perhaps unnecessary. One might as well apply the canons of literary criticism to the reviewing of an illustrated fourpenny magazine.

Fiction

NANCY STAIR

A Novel. By Elinor Macartney Lane. (Heinemann, 6s.) Amid the welter of machine-made fiction of the present day, it is a pure delight to happen upon a story which can be heartily and sincerely commended with no critical qualifications and reservations whatsoever, with no unspoken thought in the reviewer's mind that he could have done it so much better himself. Such a black swan among novels is "Nancy Stair," a story of which the extraordinary charm is due chiefly to the intense natural human feeling which colours it and makes it live. Nancy Stair herself draws indescribably at the reader's heartstrings, and the other characters—even her own father—are presented in their proper subordination to that little central, all-compelling figure. Most moving is the story of Lord Stair's tempestuous wooing of the half-gypsy, Marian Ingarrach, and we feel it is only from the union of two such noble natures that a creature so wonderful as Nancy could have been born. Nancy's birth costs her mother's life, and Lord Stair betakes himself to travel, the long travel customary towards the end of the eighteenth century, and the child is nearly five years old before he returns. Such a child! A slender, round figure to look at, with broad, low forehead, noticeably black brows, heavy-lashed clear gray eyes, a dear, quaint baby with glorious chestnut curls. But it was really the spirit and mind of her, beautiful as she was, that conquered every one, and especially her father, who was indeed her slave from the day when he drove up to Stair Castle in a gipsy waggon of an abandoned character in company with Dame Dickenson, Father Michel, Uncle Ben, the two or three dogs, the kittens, the one without a name, the "drey" hen, and a small child holding a dissipated-looking owl with but one feather in its tail. The loving kindness of this small child towards all created things that were sick or suffering, her education as a gentleman in classics and logic, her poetry (here our author owes a debt to "Pet Marjorie"), her training in jurisprudence by a hard old Scots lawyer, above all, her undaunted bravery and honesty of soul—the whole portrait is one that Stevenson might have been proud to draw. He would have delighted in Nancy's "daffing" with Robbie Burns, as well as in the murder of the Duke of Borthwicke, and Nancy's saving of Danvers Carmichael at his trial with her subtle, woman's wit, strengthened as it had been by her upbringing at the hands of men. The ending of the tale is both conventionally happy and artistically right; and we find nothing to regret save a sudden attack of "preachiness" from which Nancy suffers in the final pages.

PETER'S MOTHER

By Mrs. Henry de la Pasture. (Smith, Elder, 6s.) The relations existing between mother and son are apt to be slightly strained, and the strain between a mother and an only son is invariably tighter from the very loftiness of mutual sentiment. Our sympathy is all with Peter's Mother, for she is charming and human; not at all with Peter, for he is a cub and selfish, taking, as his aunts are proud to point out, entirely after his dear father, who effectually managed to cloud the youth and spirits of his wife by his chill austerity. But he dies, just as Peter starts for the war; and Peter's mother is alone for three years. During this time she grows young in the air of freedom, and Peter at the war grows into a young man—the crisis of cubhood—more like his father than ever. He loses an arm and returns to a mother determined to place him on a pedestal and worship; for now he is not only her son, but a wounded hero. But Sarah, a brilliant girl with red hair, is too fond of them both to allow the sacrifice and clever enough to turn Peter round her little finger, revealing in the process his true character—faults and qualities—to his mother and himself. Both are shocked, but the situation is saved by the over-setting of the pedestal. It is a delightful story, told with a certain distinction and much charm: for the whole thing is in harmony, and though the dangerous notes of sentiment are continually touched, the touch is so true and delicate that there is never a single dissonance.

THE FATE OF FELIX

By Mrs. Coulson Kernahan. (Long, 6s.) It will be a matter of regret to Mrs. Coulson Kernahan's readers to find her descending to such a wretchedly stale plot and incidents as those of the present story. A death-bed marriage, a bride who did not die but lived a lunatic hidden away in a country house, unknown to all but two persons, in defiance of all the probabilities. A second marriage, and a baby, followed by the startling discovery of the mad first wife. A murder, a ghost, and a grateful escaped convict who eventually proves that the death-bed marriage was not valid, that the ceremony was, in fact, performed by another escaped convict in disguise. It is time such battered old puppets were left to grow dusty upon the shelf. To produce new novels in rapid succession when there is a welcome awaiting them is no doubt a temptation, but when a standard has been established by an author's first book the public expect it to be maintained, there or thereabout; and if authors would only realise it, it is of no permanent advantage to themselves to throw off careless work, and it is a disappointment to those readers who remember their better work. Yet, setting aside the ridiculous plot, Mrs. Kernahan does not fail us altogether. She can write agreeably when in the vein; there are some effective scenes, the characters are generally lifelike, such people as are met with every day, and who would be pleasant enough company in other surroundings.

THE THREE DUKES

By G. Ystridde. (Unwin, 6s.) A study of life in a Russian country-house as seen by an Englishwoman with an observant eye for minor characteristics presents a certain novelty and interest. It would not, however, be fair to accept "The Three Dukes" as an accurate description of an average Russian household, since the head of it is regarded as an ogre by his family, eccentric by his friends, and as a wizard by the peasants; while his wife is full of small deceits towards him, rates her dependants like a fishwife, beats her grown daughter, and is in all domestic relations ill to live with. Still, there are true pictures of the ordinary daily round, the women's side of life, more particularly in the house of a rich aristocrat, with its extravagances and discomforts and complete disregard of the feelings of inferiors. The story—or, rather, series of incidents and dialogues—suggests that it is the outcome of the personal experiences of one well acquainted with Russian customs, and she keeps strictly to the narrative, adding little or no comment or reflection by the way. The desire to tell much that she knows carries her through many pages that would have gained in attraction and value by sharp pruning by a friendly hand, and there are occasional faults of expression that call for correction. Nowhere is there a glimpse of the author's self, the book is as free from personal feeling and bias as a police report. She records what she has seen and heard, and her photographs of scenes and people bear the stamp of truth and individuality.

HELEN OF TROY, N.Y.

By Wilfrid S. Jackson. (John Lane, 6s.) For humorous stories there is a great and commendable demand, and they are the only kind of which the supply is inadequate. Even if it were not so, Mr. Jackson, already favourably known for his "Nine Points of the Law," would deserve a hearty welcome, for his fooling is excellent. It is rollicking farce, this tale of an American millionairess and her lovers, and as you read it at breakneck speed you catch yourself picturing the absurdity produced at the Strand Theatre, and you have no difficulty in fitting Mr. Willie Edouin and Mr. James Welch and the rest of a "strong cast" with their parts. From the duel in the Green Park by moonlight between Freiherr von Deggendorf and Mr. Raggleston Mr. Jackson contrives a constant succession of diverting situations, misunderstandings, disguises, awkward meetings, and wild rushings to and fro—the usual material of farce. But Mr. Jackson has more literary ability than commonly goes to the making of farces, and one or two of his scenes are touched with the true spirit of comedy. He has style, observation, and a pretty gift of dialogue, so that his characters talk with a naturalness which immensely heightens for the moment the plausibility of his wildly impossible plot. Lord Billingham and his father, Lord Horsham, are well drawn, and so are Paul Arden and the politically-minded Lady Theodosia. Bobby Vane, the youthful "Johnny," is good, too, but the young ladies of the piece are shadowy, save Lady Maud, who stands out from the rest, and wins the reader's whole heart. Mr. Jackson appears to have entrusted the reading of his proofs to unskilled hands.

A LITTLE UNION SCOUT

By Joel Chandler Harris. (Duckworth & Co., 3s. 6d.) The Confederate war in the States has formed a background for many a story and will furnish material for many yet to come. Its picturesque diversity of incident, its irregular skirmishes, and the relationships between those who took different sides—all give opportunity for the interweaving of the element of romance in any quantity desired. The book now in hand is readable undoubtedly; that is to say, it is written in good style with nothing to jar on the ears of those sensitive in such matters, but it is doubtful whether it will evoke enthusiasm. It is a book which, if there are no untoward interruptions, will probably be finished, but it could be put down at any moment without wrenching one's mental fibres. The characters are probable but not striking, the little corner of incident brings us not a whisper of the greater events of the war; and the worst fault of all is that it is muddled. We do not know, to use a homely expression, quite what the people are "driving at." It all seems meaningless. They wander hither and thither in an aimless fashion, and much is left to the reader's own deductions. The hero of the book, who sets out to capture a spy, actually comes in contact with his man in a tavern, without knowing that it is he. He quarrels with him, and the spy is knocked out by the hero's negro servant. There he is left, while the hero, still unconscious of his identity, goes off philandering with the heroine, who, without much apparent reason, appears at every alternate entrance in man's clothes. Yet, at the end of the book, the hero is publicly praised for having "captured" the spy! The book is full of loose threads, but over it all there broods that atmosphere of quietude which appeals peculiarly to some people and is seldom found without a degree of literary quality. The type is good, and the illustrations are peculiar, having only one colour note—red—to relieve wash drawings of the ordinary sort.

A NEW PAOLO AND FRANCESCA

By Annie E. Holdsworth. (Lane, 6s.) There occurs in a recent musical comedy an engaging little ballad of cross purposes. Set down in prose, it relates, as far as memory may serve, the old, old story how Jack is in love with Jill; while Jill (one of many) likes Jim, who loves Jenny, who madly adores Will. Now, Will woos dainty Dorothy, but Dorothy, straight and tall, is sighing and yearning for Tom, who is burning for Kate, who loves no one at all! If the lovers concerned in "A New Paolo and Francesca" are fewer in number than all these, they may at least lay the flattering unction to their souls (and they are full of soul), that in point of complexity their amatory entanglements may successfully challenge even the above cited curious combination. There are, of course, four of them. (1) Janice Catesby (Francesca), Janice of the laugh and the sad eyes, as she calls herself, a passionate, pretty baby, as her prospective mamma-in-law calls her, and a somewhat fly-away little neuropath in the opinion of one heartless critic. (2) Her inseparable friend Heriot, dowered with beauty and gloom. (3) Sir Logan Catesby, stern and masterful Scotch baronet; and (4) Knight, his twin brother, gay, penniless, and tender. They are all cousins or cousins of cousins, and all obsessed by the ghosts of two promises made to a dying father and cousin that Logan and Janice, who have never met, shall marry. The actual position, however, on the first possible opportunity is that Janice, convinced that she ought to love Logan, falls in love at a glance with Knight; that Logan loves Heriot but is absolutely certain till the last page that he loves Janice; while Knight and Heriot, instead of conveniently loving each other (as, indeed, they are suspected of doing), love respectively Janice and Logan. This sad coil is further complicated by various "if-onlys" and "might-have-beens." The "if-onlys" are a foregone conclusion as soon as ever we know that Janice's life "tore within her and shrieked against the bonds in which she had bound it," before she saw either of her cousins. As for the "might-have-beens," they have chiefly to do with that sadly wicked and rather delightful old woman, the Lady Elizabeth Catesby. For Lady Elizabeth, it appears, had long ago, by a secret interchange of certain blue and pink baby-ribbons, transferred to Logan the heirship which properly belonged by a bare few minutes to his twin, to the great convenience and comfort of the story. The uses to which a little common sense might have put her astonishing confession are obvious. But, alas for them! all concerned are most honourable fools, and the two hundred or so pages treating of their perplexities are so surcharged with emotion that the arrangement of a marriage calculated to bring all this unhappiness to a head is a positive relief to the harassed reader. If only Miss Holdsworth had succeeded in convincing us of the necessity of it all, her tragedy might have easily won a share of the tremendous pathos that attaches to its prototype. But these are, surely, quite unreasonable self-sacrifices.

LADY PENELOPE

By Morley Roberts. (F. V. White & Co., 6s.) In the last year or two a sort of society novel of very slight texture, having hardly any plot at all and no delineation of character, has appeared pretty frequently. Such books depend for their success almost entirely on a conversational smartness which makes them amusing; and in truth they fill a place, for they supply pure recreation of the most trifling kind. In "Lady Penelope" we have one of this class without the single quality which might have made it worth having. The conversation is curt to the last degree, an exaggeration of that self-restraint in expression which is demanded by modern taste, but it is neither brilliant nor amusing. The motif, the way in which an heiress, who is only saved from dead perfection by a lack of the sense of humour, sends off her pack of lovers in ill-assorted couples is too farcical to be accepted as even a pretence at real life, and the lovers themselves are all stock figures—the fine, muscular athlete, the little timid poet, and so on. Mr. Roberts is a prolific writer, bringing out on an average his two novels a year, and he is now suffering badly from the disease of over-production. His "Colossus" was amusing; but that appeared six years ago, and since then the machine has been worked for all it is worth. Among the earlier books we remember some which certainly contained the stuff of which books are made, real raw life evidently taken from experience. The stuff was served up crudely, it lacked manner in presentation, but in those days it seemed possible that manner might come by practice, and that Mr. Roberts might develop into one of the virile school. Unfortunately, there seems to be no chance of that now; he has long ago deserted his original themes for the weakest style of society novel, and in the present book we find neither matter nor manner.

Short NoticesMODERN METHODS OF CHARITY

By C. R. Henderson, assisted by others. (The Macmillan Company, New York, 15s. net.) POVERTY and affliction are always with us. To the statesman they present the aspect of social weakness or danger, to the philanthropist they are piteous, and either feels bound to deal in his own fashion with the problems raised. It is the philanthropist, however, who is the more eager of the two to point out the way—he it is who first finds time to pity the blind, the dumb, the epileptic, the insane, the fallen woman or neglected child, and to consider even the claims of the lost dog and the Yorkshire pit-pony. The complex interaction of private effort and public ordinance is clearly and on the whole interestingly set forth in Mr. Henderson's seven hundred pages. The editor and his assistants give a conspectus of the systems of relief throughout the chief countries of Europe, the British Empire, and the United States, concluding with a special account of Jewish charities.

In fact, this work attempts to do in a rough way for the civilised world in general what the Charities Register and Digest has done for the United Kingdom—namely, to guide enquirers to the best place for obtaining expert information on any given charitable subject. The editor expresses, indeed, a hope that general laws of right social action may be inferred from the numerous facts recorded, but he prudently makes no attempt to indicate such laws. The only clear "social imperative" which emerges from a perusal of this book is the duty of each worker to find out what others have done and are doing in his own special line, and to be willing to learn what these others can teach him. It is the petulant unteachableness of charitable men which so often blocks the way to united and effective action.

No nation has solved the problem of public relief.

This is clearly shown by the fact that the machine-made poor laws of England and America and the humaner systems of Germany and France are overlapped by hundreds of private societies. Reasonable men feel uneasy at the sight of this formless welter of activities, and in England especially the duty of organisation and co-operation has been strenuously urged. But no private body, however influential, will have weight enough for the work. Is it too much to hope that some day there will be a Minister of Charities?

We can strongly recommend this book as giving a temperate and impartial account of the world's charitable doings. There is a serviceable bibliography for those who wish to go more deeply into any particular matter, and an adequate index of contents.

SHRINES OF BRITISH SAINTS

By J. Charles Wall. (Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.)

THIS is the latest addition to the series called the Antiquary's Books, which the Reverend Dr. Cox edits with notable success. The present volume may be said to be of a slightly more popular character than that on "Old Service Books," but the same wide research and careful compilation of facts have been employed, and the result will be, to the general reader, equally informative and interesting. At a time when England and Ireland were both called the "Isle of Saints," when William of Malmesbury said that every corner of the Monastery of St. Augustine at Canterbury was filled with the bodies of meritorious saints, when a single small island, two miles and a half in length by one and a half in breadth, was said to contain the bodies of twenty thousand of them, can it be wondered at that shrines grew apace and the manufacture of reliquaries flourished in the land? Great Britain became saturated with saintly remains and the memories of a thousand thousand holy deeds drew pilgrims to almost as many shrines. The action of time, assisted by the personality of Henry VIII., changed all this. Mr. Wall says, in effect, that although nearly the whole of the visible shrines in Britain have been totally destroyed, the entire land is a shrine, its soil is permeated with the dust of her saints; but, alas! the sins of her children arrest the continued application of the name "The Isle of Saints." It is true we are no longer called by so pleasing a title, but we doubt very much if the author could prove to the satisfaction of the most compliant sociologist that, age for age, the entire morale of Great Britain was higher before the sixteenth century than, say, afterwards or at the present day. It is certain that his admirable lists of prelates and priests, his descriptions of shrines, tombs and reliquaries will not do it. But this is a side issue, although one on which Mr. Wall is somewhat insistent; the real matter before the reader is, as he says, an attempt to picture the various classes of shrines which were raised in Great Britain to honour the memory and the relics of her saints, to describe the construction of the greater shrines, to comprehend the riches of art bestowed upon them, and to expose the dominating reason for their destruction—and this attempt is carried to a highly satisfactory issue. The large number of illustrations from, we gather, drawings by Mr. Wall, and the photographs of actual remains, such as the shrine of St. Frideswide, Christ Church, Oxford, will prove helpful to all those desirous of pursuing with the author his researches among the relics of mediæval devotion. If to the sociologist Mr. Wall's treatment of his subject will make but slight appeal, to the student of religion this volume on the once overflowing number of British saints will not be without its value; while the antiquary will be constantly interested in the work. Although he is unlikely to learn much that is new to him the present pages will recall to his memory many happy discoveries and queer traffics.

THUMBNAIL ESSAYS

By K. C. (Brown, Langham & Co., 3s. 6d. net.)

THESE forty or so neat little essays upon old truths and problems express the thoughts of hundreds of ordinary intelligent people in pleasantly rounded phrases. The author, in a modest dedication, alludes to them as "Philosophic Tabloids for Household Use," and no doubt they will be found an agreeable moral tonic for many minds, and may be administered to old and young alike with confidence that the result can only be beneficial. Here and there a fresh fancy or a touch of humour enlivens the page; here and there also there are definitions that will not meet with general acceptance—"Self-respect contents itself with externals and can survive all but being rudely found out." Again, how many men could give an honest affirmative to the question: "If a mirror existed which would show man his inner personality, would he not even more eagerly seize the opportunity of regarding his soul therein, with all the tricks and traits of his mental character?" By their nature some of these slight papers "contain counsels of perfection," but they are always on the right and bracing side of moral life, well written and presented with good feeling and good taste.

BITS OF GOSSIP

By Rebecca Harding Davis, author of "Silhouettes of American Life," &c. (Constable, 5s. net.)

MRS. DAVIS is of opinion that each human being, "before going out into the silence, should leave behind him, not the story of his own life, but of the time in which he lived, its creed and purpose, its queer habits." Possibly, as she suggests, it would help to make history "live and breathe"; but to few of us is given such opportunities as hers, or the gift of the right touch and happy phrase that make her own memories so deeply interesting. The recollections of "The Old Home" in Virginia, where "nobody was in a hurry to do anything, least of all work, or to make money," are delightful. There are tragic stories, too, in "Life in the South," where the planters lived in magnificence and squalor, and "the washing of reputations clean by blood was going on perpetually." Perhaps the most sparkling chapter is "Boston in the 'Sixties," in which Mrs. Davis records her impressions of the "Atlantic" coterie, whose greater lights "did not appear to the eye of an observer belonging to a commonplace world precisely as they do in the portraits drawn of them for posterity by the other Areopagites," "While they thought they were guiding the world, they stood outside it, and never saw it as it was." Hawthorne alone stood aloof, "the alien among men, not of their kind"; "even in his own house he was like Banquo's ghost among the thanes at the banquet." "There was a mysterious power in his face I have never seen elsewhere in picture, statue, or human being." To Emerson as she saw him Mrs. Davis devotes considerable space, and gives us a striking portrait of the man who wielded such immense power over his disciples. In appearance "he was Uncle Sam himself. I have often wondered that none of his biographers have noticed the likeness. Voice and look and manner were full of the most exquisite courtesy, yet I doubt whether he was conscious of his courtesy, or meant to be deferential." "His interest in his Ego was so dominant that it probably never occurred to him to ask what others thought of him.

He took from each man his drop of stored honey, and after that the man counted for no more to him than the robbed bee." In her recollections of Holmes there is a kindlier note. Everybody loved and laughed with "the little doctor"; "he attracted all kinds of people as a brilliant child would attract them, but nobody, I suspect, ever succeeded in being intimate with him." Mrs. Davis, who saw both sides of the Civil War from her home in the South, the hatred, corruption, political jobbery, as well as its finer aspects, evidently feels something of a grudge against Lowell and the Boston clique for their persistent exaltation of it; to them, she complains, it was always "only the shining track."

"Bits of Gossip" is hardly a happy choice of title for this volume. It conveys too trivial an impression of a charming and informing series of memories and portraits.

STORIES FROM BALLADLAND

By Maye H. Black. (Digby, Long, 3s. 6d.) On its own merits this book would not call for notice; taken as an example of a practice that is growing only too common, it demands attention. The author has taken twelve stories from what she calls "Balladland," and told them in her own language for the benefit of children. Why? What is there in the tale of "Kinmont Willie," of "Wicked Lord Soulis," or "Sir Patrick Spens" that a child cannot learn for itself, with a little explanation, from the original ballads? And how is that child's mind more likely to grow to vigour and its literary taste to purity and ripeness—by the study of the ballad or the easy absorption of these insipid little morsels? For the "Tales from Shakespeare" there is ample excuse, not only in the nature of the material they were drawn from, but in the exquisite beauty of their form and the unerring rightness of their selection. But when we find Scott's words boiled down by Mr. Crockett into sop for babes, and these ballads turned into the language of the Sunday School reader, we can only be sorry for the modern child who is never left to himself.

Reprints and New Editions

VOLUME IV. of THE WORKS OF RALPH WALDO EMERSON, which Messrs. Bell have just issued (3s. leather, 2s. cloth), has many interesting features, and will be most heartily welcomed by Emersonians. It is on the title-page marked "Miscellaneous Pieces," which, however, gives only the slightest hint of its interest. Naturally and inevitably the work even of Emerson varies in quality, and though some of the pieces here reprinted partake of the nature of occasional addresses and slight essays, I agree with the editor, Mr. George Sampson, that "they are far too good to be lost." Many to whom Emerson's Essays published in the previous three volumes of this admirable series are well known and long familiar will be charmed to discover special pieces which have not already been published except in "The Dial." Such essays, for example, as "The Senses and the Soul" and "Saadi and Persian Literature" are now for the first time reprinted, as is the editorial preface to "The Dial." Also, the official edition published after Emerson's death was considerably revised and altered from that which left Emerson's pen in life, and I note with pleasure that in this present volume the original text has been followed as closely as possible, with careful reference to the original sources of publication. The alterations and omissions were sometimes quite considerable, as a glance at the two editions will show. "Thoughts on Modern Literature" lost very considerably by the process. Here we have it in full. It is a very serious question to the lover of literature, "to revise or not to revise," but I think most readers will agree with me in preferring an original copy or an exact copy of the original, in which we can make our own "cuts" if necessary; somebody else's blue pencil may not agree with our tastes. I note that the fifth and last volume of the series will contain Emerson's Poetical Works.—I place TROOPER PETER HALKET OF MASHONALAND (Fisher Unwin, 1s. net) among the fictional reprints of this week. Yet it is more truly a political pamphlet. While we think of Olive Schreiner as the author of "The Story of an African Farm" with admiration and high esteem, we cannot yet call her a "one-book" author. It was so notable an achievement that one always hopes that perhaps some day—? It is not quite clear why "Trooper Peter Halket" should be reprinted, for it was never successful even as a political pamphlet.—First a play, then a reading, and lastly a novel, THE FROZEN DEEP (Chatto & Windus, 1s. 6d. net leather, 1s. net cloth) achieved great popularity. As a play, it will be remembered, the part of Richard Wardour was created by Charles Dickens, who, says Wilkie Collins, "literally electrified the audience." An old playbill of August 1857—"in remembrance of the late Mr. Douglas Jerrold"—is given in the preface, where such famous names as Mark Lemon, Shirley Brooks, and Augustus Egg occur, as well as those of the author and Charles Dickens. Charles Dickens might have been a great actor had he elected to go on the stage; how grateful ought we to be that he chose literature, for his delightful personality is still with us in "David Copperfield," whereas had he taken to the boards, as he endeavoured to do, we should only have had some photographs and dry dramatic criticisms. Is there anything so dry in the world as the average dramatic criticism of old days? Messrs. Chatto & Windus give excellent value for the money in these two novels. They are not pretentious volumes, but something better—simple and serviceable.—Of Samuel Smiles' LIVES OF THE ENGINEERS, METCALFE—TELFORD (Murray, 3s. 6d.) there is little to say. The edition is an excellent one, the print good and clear, the binding handsome.—The De La More Press has issued THE TEMPEST, for young people. I was at first a little puzzled by the half-title—a "Lamb Shakespeare, based on Charles Lamb." It is really half Shakespeare, half Lamb, ornamented by numerous illustrations by Helen Stratton. The story of "The Tempest" as Lamb relates it has been strictly adhered to, but Professor Gollancz has interpolated frequent lines from Shakespeare himself. What shall we have next? First we have Shakespeare, then Lamb, now we have Shakespeare—Lamb—Gollancz; next we shall have, no doubt, Shakespeare—Lamb—Gollancz—Mr. Bernard Shaw or Mr. Beer-bohm Tree. Some day someone will rediscover Shakespeare.—Numbers 1 and 2 of Mr. Brimley Johnson's POCKET ANTHOLOGIES, published at 6d. net each, have just left the press. They comprise "The Hundred Best Poems in the English Language" and "The Hundred Best Poems in German." It seems that the first series has been given so hearty a welcome and support that a second was rendered necessary. Who says there are no readers of poetry? F. T.-S.

Books Received

Art

- Hatton, Richard G., Figure Composition. Chapman & Hall, 7/6.
Bygone Eton: a Collection of Permanent Photographs: Part IV. Spottiswoode & Co., Eton College. (Eight large historical views, with a short descriptive note on each.)
A Selection from the Pictures by Boudin, Cézanne, Degas, Manet, Monet, Morisot, Pissarro, Renoir, and Sisley, exhibited at the Grafton Galleries, 1905. Durand-Ruel & Sons. (Some fifty excellent reproductions.)

Biography and Memoirs

- Lyall, Sir Alfred, P.C., Life of the Marquis of Dufferin and Ava, 2 vols. Murray, 36/0 net. (See Review, page 144.)
Crosby, Ernest, Edward Carpenter, Poet and Prophet. Fifield, 0/6 net.
Holyoake, George Jacob, Bygones Worth Remembering, 2 vols. Unwin, 21/0. (See Review, page 145.)
Wellesley, Colonel the Hon. F. A., With the Russians in Peace and War. Nash, 12/6.

Drama

- Trevelyan, R. C., The Birth of Parsival. Longmans, Green & Co., 3/6 net.

Educational

- Lindsey, J. S., Medieval British History: a Student's Guide. Cambridge: Heffer; London: Simpkin, Marshall, 6/0. (The second volume of "Problems and Exercises in British History." Knowledge tabulated for the use of teachers and learners. Contains an immense amount of information, and should prove a useful guide to historical literature.)

Fiction

- The Complete Works of Leo Tolstoy. Translated by Leo Wiener. Vols. III. and IV. Dent, 3 6 net each. (Vol. III. contains "A Moscow Acquaintance," "The Snowstorm," "Domestic Happiness," and "Miscellanies"; Vol. IV., "Pedagogical Articles," "The School at Yasnaya Polyana," and "Linen-Measurer.")

- Tracy, Louis, The Sirdar's Sabre. White & Co., 6/0. (The adventures of Sirdar Bahadur Mohammed Khan. Ten stories with a continuous interest. Very good reading.)
Tweeddale, Violet, Lord Eversleigh's Sins. Long, 6/0.
Griffith, George, A Mayfair Magician. White, 6/0.
Gull, Ranger, A Story of the Stage. White, 6/0.
Middlemass, Jean, Count Reminy. Long, 6/0.
Vesey, A. H., The Clock and the Key. Appleton, 3/6.
Naish, W. P., An Awful Legacy. Drane, 6/0.
Hamilton, M., Cut Laurels. Heinemann, 6/0.
De la Pasture, Mrs. Henry, Peter's Mother. Smith, Elder, 6/0. (See Review, page 149.)
Dui-Palor, Jost and Earnest. Drane, 1/0.
Richards, Hedley, The Meshes of Fate, or the Curse of the Blue Diamonds. "Weekly Budget" Novels. Henderson, 0/3.

History and Archaeology

- Sandbärg, Gustav, Sweden. Government Printing Office, Stockholm. (A historical and statistical handbook, published in fulfilment of a measure passed in the Riksdag in 1898. Fully illustrated. Published also in French and Swedish.)
Hubbard, Arthur John and George, Neolithic Dew-Ponds and Cattle-Ways. Longmans & Co., 3/6.

Military

- "O," The Yellow War. Blackwood, 1/6.

Philosophy

- Turner, Arthur Tisdall, A New Morality. Grant Richards. (A violent little statement of "egoism" by a follower of Nietzsche.)

Political

- Williams, Constance, How Women can help Political Work. Hayman, Christy & Lilly. (A handbook for women anxious to take an active part in politics, telling them how to begin and what to do.)
Doyle, N. Grattan, Free Trade or Freer Trade. Drane, 1/0. (Six addresses delivered by Mr. Doyle under the auspices of the Tariff Reform League.)

Poetry

- Hurst, Cyril, Scrap-Ironies. Illustrated throughout by A. Carruthers Gould. Drane, 1/0. (Topical and political verses and skits, reprinted from "Public Opinion.")
Crosby, Ernest, Broad-Cast. Fifield, 1/6 net. (The "poems" are mainly in the form of expression used by Walt Whitman.)
Kaese, D., Hither and Thither. Liverpool: Edward Howell, 1/0 net. (Mainly brief and aphoristic verses, with a "Reply" and a "Rejoinder.")

Reprints and New Editions

- George Whitefield's Journals, edited by William Wale. Drane, 3/6 net. (Whitefield's Journals have not been reprinted in full since 1756. This volume also includes the "Short Account" and "Further Account," with appreciations by Canon Hay Aitken and John Foster, and Cowper's lines on Leuconomus.)
Bernardin de St. Pierre, Paul et Virginie. Dent, 1/6 net.
Holmes, Oliver Wendell, The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table. Dent, 6/0.
Salt, Henry S., Richard Jefferies: his Life and Ideals. Fifield, 1/6 net.
Stubbs, Bishop, Biblical Criticism. S.P.C.K. (Reprinted from a charge delivered in 1893 and from Ordination Addresses.)
Villari, Pasquale, The First Two Centuries of Florentine History. Translated by Linda Villari. Unwin, 2/6 net.

Sociology

- Blount, Godfrey, For Our Country's Sake. Fifield, 0/6 net. (A manifesto of "The New Crusade," which has for its object a return to "the Country Life, with the ideal purity of its simplicity, industry, and innocent faiths." Proposals for corporate action in the purchase of land, the establishment of a museum of traditional arts and crafts, a school of handicraft and design, a hospice, a journal, and a church. At the end a detachable "form of allegiance" for those who wish to become Fellows of the Crusade.)

Theology

- Wynne, Canon G. Robert, Archdeacon of Aghadoc, The Example of His Patience. S.P.C.K. (Holy Week addresses on the Collect for Palm Sunday.)
Courtney, W. L., Do We Believe? Hodder & Stoughton, 3/6. (See Review, page 146.)
Geddes, Patrick, The World Without and the World Within. Birmingham: The St. George Press; London: Allen. ("Theology" is not, perhaps, strictly the right heading under which to place Professor Geddes' imaginative, almost mystical, "Sunday Talks" with his children.)
Dickinson, G. Lowe, Religion: a Criticism and a Forecast. Brimley Johnson. (Reprinted from the "Independent Review." The author's object is to "maintain that truth is not revealed in any sense of the word 'revelation,' which can be appropriately distinguished from the sense of the word 'science.'")

Periodicals

- "Library World," "New York Times," "Hither and Yonder," "Notes and Queries," "Struggle for America," "Journal of Agricultural Science," "Current Literature," "Critic and Literary World," "Collector's Magazine," "Motorist and Traveller," "New Africa," "The London Magazine," "Harper's Weekly," "Pictorial Comedy," "Animals' Friend," "New York American," "Dial," "Isis."

Pamphlets

- Warren, General Sir Charles, The Holy Land. S.P.C.K.
Taylor, G. W., John Wesley and the Anglo-Catholic Revival. S.P.C.K.
Malone, R., Penitential Psalms. S.P.C.K.
For Self-Examination. S.P.C.K.
A Practical Catechism. S.P.C.K.
Fenwick, George D., The Good of Lent. S.P.C.K.

Catalogues

- S.P.C.K., Suckling & Co., Godspeed.

Foreign

Periodicals

- "Courrier Européen," "Norsk Familie Journal," "La Revue des Idées," "Mesmy's Chinese Miscellany."

Science

Knowledge and Reality

IT would seem self-evident that, before drawing any conclusions from observation and reflection, it is necessary for the philosopher, if not for the man of science, to make most stringent enquiry into the nature and conditions and validity of what he desires to regard as knowledge. Yet it was not until the coming of a great thinker who died scarcely more than a century ago that the fundamental importance of this enquiry was fully recognised. This is by no means to say that Kant was not preceded by many writers, such as Locke, who devoted much thought to the nature of the knowing process: but even to-day there is probably only a very insignificant minority of people prepared to make positive assertions about something—be it only the weather or the fiscal question—that have ever spent a moment in asking in what senses and in what measure any one can be said to know anything. And the term epistemology, which connotes the study of the nature of knowledge, is not, as in logic it should be, the most familiar and the first to be learnt of all the many words with the same termination.

In here attempting, not to recount in brief the doctrines taught by the immortal author of the critical philosophy, but rather to indicate the beliefs of psychology a century after the close of his long and meritorious life, we must begin by admitting that our initial problem is not merely unsolved, but insoluble. In front of me, as I believe, is a table. Few readers outside of Oxford will quarrel with me if I assume, as I do, that this table has—or, at any rate, indicates—a real existence which does not depend for its being upon my perception of it. If, then, I may assume that the external world, as represented by this table, exists by virtue of itself and independently of my mind or any other, we have first to admit that no one has yet begun to offer us the scantiest explanation of the manner in which we can have any knowledge at all of the existence of the table. Such explanations as have been offered are no more than admirably contrived verbal exercises. The prime fact that the Ego can, in some fashion, become aware of the non-Ego must simply be accepted. But it is of the first importance to inquire in precisely what fashion and with precisely what limitations, if any, this knowledge is attained.

Now all men have at one time in their mental development tacitly accepted the theory which we may call unqualified realism; and, in point of fact, it is only the very few who do not accept it without any question from first to last. According to this theory, which any plebiscite in any age or place would approve, things are what they seem—a table is simply a table. There can be no doubt about it. Behold it—a hard, flat, wooden object, supported upon four legs. Room for refinement or argument there is none: no sane man—say Realism and its countless adherents—can possibly dispute the unequivocal evidence of his senses. There can be no use in discussing the nature and conditions of human knowledge in such a connection as this. The man who would dispute that a table is precisely what it appears to be can never have seen a table—or must be moon-struck and outside serious consideration, save as a pathological product.

If this is so, then science, which deals with tables and stars and plants and rocks and other material objects, is not subject to any necessary limitations. The eye may be short-sighted, but the telescope will remedy that. The sense of touch may be coarse, but the scales will do its weighing for it. We have merely to invent suitable instruments for reinforcing and supplementing our senses—and all may be known if we persevere. As for Reality—well, the capital letter is misplaced: what could more palpably be a solid chunk of Reality than—a table?

Crude realism, however, though it is, always has been, and doubtless will long continue to be, the most widely accepted of all beliefs whatever—answering more closely than any other belief ever did to the famous test of being accepted semper, ubique et ab omnibus, always, everywhere and by all—has nevertheless been found out. It is more certainly untenable, the universal plebiscite notwithstanding, than the crassest superstition of the most ignorant age.

The argument is not that no two people see a table in exactly the same way: for that does not exclude the possibility that at least one person may see it—or, at any rate, might be conceived to see it—in the right way: steadily and whole, as Matthew Arnold would say. The argument against crude realism is infinitely more cogent than that. For when, begging the insoluble question as to how it is possible to know at all, we come to ask ourselves what, in point of fact, we actually do know, there can be no doubt about the answer. In feeling and seeing this table I know merely the occurrence of changes in myself. It is not merely that a different nervous constitution might give me a very different idea of the table, though it is obvious that the eye sees only what it brings with it the power of seeing, and that eyes vary. The point is that, no matter what my sensory arrangement be, no matter whether I have a hundred senses for every one I possess now, yet all I know is change in my consciousness. As I cannot escape beyond the limits of my consciousness, I can never hope to know more. In order to know the table as it really is, I—or my consciousness—would have to become identified with it, which can never be.

Now, though this doctrine is not exactly of universal acceptance, yet we all employ a couple of terms in which it is implicit. The words phenomenon and phenomenal are perhaps the most consistently abused in language: as they are certainly amongst the most valuable and significant when rightly understood. Of course these words no more mean marvel and marvellous than they mean green cheese or hypochondriacal. A phenomenon is an appearance, such as this table or the Pleiades: and science deals with phenomena and their relations. When John Locke proved that we have no innate ideas, he proved that our knowledge can only be of phenomena. But we crave to know Reality: phenomenal knowledge does not satisfy us—we should be poor creatures if it did. And so we have metaphysics, or, as it is now more properly called, ontology—the science of Being, the study not of appearances, but of the Reality of which they are the appearances. But this high emprise ordinary folk may leave until such time as, happily, two ontologists understand and agree with each other.

Nevertheless it is plain that though Reality be, strictly speaking, unknowable, yet science, which deals with its appearances, can yet infer from them somewhat of its nature. If, for instance, science can prove, as it has conclusively proved, that all phenomena are inter-related, that in virtue of gravitation, for instance, I cannot push this table without affecting the position of every atom in the universe throughout all coming time; or, as Mr. Francis Thompson says,

"Thou canst not stir a Flower Without troubling of a star";

then we may surely make the sublime inference that there are not many realities, but one Reality: or, to adapt in the light of modern knowledge the words of the Athanasian Creed, not many incomprehensibles, but One Incomprehensible. C. W. SALEEBY.

Whistler

WITH all the solemnity proper to a High Celebration, a great exhibition has been organised at the New Gallery of the works of Whistler, and the public has been summoned to pay their tribute of genuflexion. The homage is well deserved, for there are few who have not learned the greatness of the artist and the truth of his message. But the sincerity of the worshipper must be the outcome of his own appreciation; it is too late in the day now to be guided only by the injudicious pæans and fanfares of Whistler's dazzled henchmen who, in their ineclectic enthusiasm, have even written up his faults into virtues. As Whistler, in one of his rare serious and confidential moods, said of a certain voluble champion: "When he praises me he lauds only my errors."

Now is the time to see and understand the true Whistler; now when the indiscretions are all but forgotten, when the bitterness has disappeared and has been forgiven. For, with certain exceptions, the chief work of his life has been gathered together, and the pictures are still at their best. For the opinion is strongly entertained by not a few that many of the subtlest of Whistler's pictures, like the subtlest of Turner's, are destined to a short life. The delicate tones, the exquisite gradations, the charming effects obtained by subtle glazes and scumblings, are often as evanescent as the bloom upon a peach, especially when the painting is not solid. Some of Whistler's pictures are already changing, and it is possible that in many cases future generations may wonder, as they stand before canvases on which we of to-day have lavished our warmest praise, what are the outstanding qualities that so stirred us to admiration.

It is this quality of subtlety which places Whistler on his pinnacle. Others before him have shown us much of the taste, the elegance, and the distinction, in different measures, which we see in his canvases; but none in our day allied to these qualities the rarer merit which is the touchstone of his genius. It is not surprising that, when he first declared himself, the eyes of the public, unaccustomed by such refinement and attracted more by the novelty and originality in his works, should have failed to recognise and appreciate. The marvel is not that there were so few to understand, but that there were so many. And to-day we have forgotten, or are on the way to forgetting, what was erratic in the man, what was eccentric and defiant in his pose, and the world is able to judge the work with the seriousness and calmness which the effervescence of the artist and his entourage used to render so difficult.

We see him here, in his landscapes, as the sweet singer in colour, and again as the poet-painter of the night. The mere facts of Nature are nothing to him—for Nature to him is bucolic, the Audrey who is to be trained judiciously into a Divinity. That is to say, he ignores the flesh and sees only the spirit and the romance, bathed in light, immersed in atmosphere, or shrouded in caressing darkness. There is in them the delicacy and melody of ineffable colour of which Swinburne speaks, as full of delight and freshness "as a blossom or a fruit." Could Whistler have painted a landscape as Claude or Turner painted it? Most probably not. With him the essence of his picture was not fact poetically rendered, but the poetry removed as far as possible from fact.

But who cares for such limitations if the result is beautiful? We do not reproach Pieter de Hooch that he could not render the elevated sentiment of humanity like Raphael, or the might and nobility of style like Michael Angelo. But we should blame him if he were guilty of bad drawing, for bad drawing is not a limitation but a defect. Such a defect we sometimes find in Whistler in his figure-work—the result of lack of that training to which he would not submit. But what we might reproach him with is the absence of other qualities essential to figure- and portrait-painting—qualities which, notwithstanding, are not wanting in his masterpieces "An Arrangement in Black and Grey: Portrait of my Mother" and "Arrangement in Green and Gold: Portrait of Thomas Carlyle." There are the qualities of anatomical construction, of sought-for character, and of realised expression. When Whistler said "Why drag in Velasquez?" he was not guilty of the absurdity of vanity which most people still see in his quaint remark; it was really a rebuke, addressed not only to the flattery but to the blindness of his more foolish eulogisers. He knew well enough where his pictures fell short of the mighty Spaniard, and where the comparison was absurd. He knew that he lacked the fine, nervous draughtsmanship of the master, based on a profound knowledge of the human frame. He knew that he could not match, and did not attempt to match, the expression and character and the swift and brilliant brushwork of the First Impressionist. But he also knew that where he did enter into rivalry was in his unerring choice of his palette, in his perfect tones and values and in the exquisite colour. At one period, it is true, he detracted from the effect of these merits by importing black into all his tones as a "universal harmoniser," so as to bring his picture "together." On this account his canvases often look dirty, and the effect is, in consequence, not infrequently unpleasing. But in his portraits he invariably gives us that fine artistic presentment of a character which is so rarely met with in modern work. He always seems to think of his sitter as painter's material rather than as a subject; the sitter is to him not the subject but a means to an end, and that end a pattern, a decorative panel, not the mere imitation of a lady or gentleman. And as he held that a sweetstuff shop was as worthy a subject as the earliest saint or the latest sinner, so he felt that the artistic effect of a human being against an absorbing background was as fine an artistic problem as the unmistakable rendering of the form and features of Mr. Jones or Lady Smith. He therefore commonly failed, or at least did not choose, to render one of the dimensions—that of projection. In fact, he was the decorative artist throughout, who proclaimed himself more brilliantly and convincingly in the peacocks in Mr. Leyland's room than in many a so-called portrait in which the subject was an excuse for an arrangement. Indeed, it is a question whether the

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS

OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti,
Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from FREDK. HOLLYER, 8 Pembroke Square, London, W.
Illustrated Catalogue 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

wonderful subtlety of the graduated black background in the portrait of "Sarasate" is not a more remarkable and interesting achievement than the figure of the violinist who stands in its shade.

In painting, Whistler covered nearly the whole ground, and his view of art enabled him to cover it well. "It is not necessary that I should be a coal-scuttle painter," he said, "to be able to paint coal-scuttles." Nevertheless, he knew he should not try to draw horses and the like without special study. Had he attempted to do so, had he wished to paint flowers (which he did so exquisitely in the earlier part of his career), the treatment would have been in mass not in line. He was, in fact, a great decorator, and he was right. Where he was mistaken was in his frequent suggestion that all forms of art that were not decoration were wrong.

For there were three Whistlers, in his general art-work as in his etching, and his views became modified with growing years, perhaps, too, with his growing short-sightedness. In his first stage he began with a searching after exactitude. In the second, he became the impressionist. In the third, he sought to unite the two states. In his etching he succeeded in his aim; in his painting he failed to a considerable extent. But his failure was but partial, for although his suggestion does not always realise the form he endeavours to achieve, and although his local colour is often unacceptable and his sense of facial beauty is as defective as a Dutchman's, the general result is fine and harmonious, sometimes bold in its originality, and impresses the spectator with the strong personality of the man. His theory that the work of a good artist "is finished from the beginning" caused him to mistrust himself to carry his work as far as most would think desirable; indeed, in his pastels he would often leave the little essays in a state of incompleteness which would be accepted as completeness at the hands of no one else. They were notes, but usually so charming in their rhythm and colour that they sing "Tra-la-la," as it were, as sweetly and beautifully as "Tra-la-la" has ever been sung before; but not carrying the song to its end.

Still, as we consider the full sum of Whistler's achievement—whether in his portraits we compare him with Velasquez or only with Goya, whether in etching we place him beside Rembrandt or below him—we recognise in him a genius who would doubtless have risen higher still had that prodigious talent permitted him to base himself on education according to rules. He was, above all, a great innovator, who preached the gospel of the eclectic sensuous emotion of art, to the exclusion of all else—and he now lies at Chiswick hard by where Hogarth lived and died and now lies buried too, the first and the latest of the great, courageous innovators of art in England; the first the great Reformer of Leicester Fields, and the other the Prophet from the West.

Drama

Mollentrave on Women at the St. James's

FORM is important, but the need of the English stage at the present moment is not so much form as ideas. We have plenty of dramatists who have mastered the technique of their art, and can "work" or "carpenter" a play to perfection. Unfortunately, as a rule, they have nothing to say that is worth the expenditure of experience and skill they bestow on their production. And, therefore, when we meet with a playwright who has an idea, it is better to thank him for that than to blame him for expressing it badly.

There can be no question that Mr. Alfred Sutro has expressed his idea badly, for the formal confusion of his play amounts to nothing less than bad work. It is not a comedy; it is not a farce. It is now one and now the other. Or, rather, there is one figure of pure comedy, that of Mollentrave himself, surrounded by the most farcical set of puppets that could well be imagined. Mollentrave lives; he is quite real and a most suggestive conception; all the rest are nothings, put there merely to show off Mollentrave. But had they even less of life and character than Mr. Sutro has given them, and had the incidents of their story been even less probable and comprehensible than they are, the play would have been worth writing and worth seeing for the sake of Mollentrave himself and the idea he suggests.

Every one knows by now that Mr. Mollentrave was the author of a large book "On Women," of whom he had made a lifelong and scientific study. He had gone to work thoroughly, for in the pursuit of his investigations (hale and hearty old amorist that he was!) he had married and buried no less than three wives. And the result of all his researches was this, that there was such a thing as Woman; a being that could be classified, labelled, and pigeon-holed. His large book, which he appeared to know by heart, and quoted on every occasion, as Sir Austin Feverel quoted his System, contained a full explanation of this creature called Woman (we cannot help thinking that the title of Mr. Sutro's play would have been more pointed if he had written Woman instead of Women). It explained her lucidly under every conceivable circumstance; told you exactly what she would do under any given set of conditions, what plan of action you should follow in order to produce certain effects—in fact, explained away all the mystery that ever has enwrapped and ever will enwrap her, and laid the secrets of her nature as bare as a chemist lays the secrets of a combination of elements.

That was Mollentrave's idea of Woman. It is not uncommon in real life, but it rarely persists in any man after the age of twenty-five. Mollentrave had managed to preserve it till sixty, and it was not unnatural that, since he went about proclaiming his knowledge and presenting copies of his treatise to his friends, they should call him in as a kind of doctor for complaints of the heart. Lord Contareen had called him in because he wanted to marry Mollentrave's own daughter, the widowed Lady Claude Derenham. Sir Joseph Balsted, K.C., M.P., called him in because, being a hard-working bachelor, he was a little annoyed at having to share his house with a sentimental young female ward and a nephew who had fallen in love with her, and was only too anxious to be rid of both. Mollentrave, the specious, glib physician of the heart, undertakes both cases, and makes a mess of both. It is needless here to follow the succession of failures through which, with all the assurance of a great specialist, he blunders with a suave, even a triumphant, manner and a readiness to take all the credit to himself when anything, by accident, falls out as he predicted. The morning papers have all had a try at explaining Mr. Sutro's most complicated and rather annoying plot, with a measure of success which is ample warning of the danger of the attempt. It is more profitable and amusing to disentangle the idea which Mr. Sutro meant not so much to elucidate or prove as to hint.

We get the first hint of that idea from Lady Claude Derenham. She sees through her father, and knows perfectly well that he is behind all the twists and turns in the love chase so clumsily and grotesquely performed by Lord Contareen. "Oh, don't practise on me, papa!" she says almost with scorn. She is the one sensible person in the circle of Mollentrave's flabby victims, and it is appropriate that she should be the first to suggest the idea. In effect, she says, dutifully enough: "My father's theories may be true of ninety-nine women out of a hundred—but I think I am the hundredth." You accept the statement, for the moment, of her individually; you are ready to believe that Lady Claude is actually the hundredth, and that the rest are the ninety-nine. It is later, considerably later, after you have been for some time thoroughly amused by single lines and separate scenes and rather wearied by the inequality and complication of the general effect, that the same thought is enounced by another woman in the play, the silly, sentimental little ward of Sir Joseph Balsted, who believes herself in love with her guardian. Her eyes have been opened to the truth, not by any of Mollentrave's elaborate schemes, but by the fact that Sir Joseph in a rage called her to her face a "silly little idiot." She sees that she really loves, not the middle-aged barrister, but the youthful medical student, his nephew; and she says to him, in effect, "It may be all very well for ninety-nine women out of a hundred, but I think I am the hundredth."

And there we have the idea round which the whole play is constructed. Every woman is the hundredth woman. There is no such thing as Woman; there are only women; Lady Claude Derenham is one, Margaret Messilent is another; yet another and a wholly different woman is Edith Farrington, whom Mr. Sutro presented to us earlier in the same evening, superbly played by Miss Edyth Olive in "A Maker of Men." They are all different, and the Mollentraves of life, who try to formulate, to generalise, to arrange and classify, are either humbugs or ignorant of the subject of their science. Generalities, Mr. Sutro would tell us, are dangerous things. Even generalities about Man (and there may very likely be such a thing as Man) are likely to allow too little for personality; generalities about Woman are all in the air. If, in dealing with a woman, you count on your knowledge of other women, you are pretty sure to make mistakes; for in women the personal is everything, and the personal is subject to no laws.

The idea may be considered cynical, but we question if it can fairly be called so, and whether Mr. Sutro intended it to be so. Cynicism there is in plenty in his play; but it takes the form of amusing and flowery remarks from Mollentrave, who is the one person in the play to show complete ignorance of the subject. The women themselves, Lady Claude and little Margaret Messilent, both upset his theories by proving themselves better—possessed of more sense, that is, and character—than he supposed. It was Mollentrave and his scheme that encouraged their folly. Left to themselves they act sensibly and healthily in the end.

Mr. Sutro's play may be commended then, in spite of its manifest faults, because the author has consulted human nature first and the rules of play-writing second. It would have been far more commendable had he consulted both in fairer proportion. Another welcome sign is that his play is amusing. There has been lately some reason to fear that Mr. Sutro was going to mistake the stage for the lecture-platform or the pulpit, and become didactic in the manner of M. Brieux and others of the French theatre. "Mollentrave on Women" removes that fear. It is not as light, as whimsical, as irresponsible as Mr. Barrie would have made it, though it has something of the same aim; but it contains Mollentrave, and Mollentrave is a creation that fills the stage and the mind. Mr. Eric Lewis played him to perfection. Miss Marion Terry made the most of Lady Claude, and Miss Lettice Fairfax had no trouble in doing what she had to do as Margaret Messilent. No one else had a chance.

Monthly Prize Competition AWARD

VIVIAN GREY

By Benjamin Disraeli.

IT is a truism to say that our estimate of any book depends largely upon its comparison with our preconceived ideas of its author. But in the case of a writer like Disraeli—of a man, that is, who, whether he achieved greater things or not, attained far wider fame in a sphere other than that of literature—it is a truism which must naturally be especially applicable. Almost of necessity one approaches the book with certain opinions, vague or defined, of Disraeli the man and the statesman; and the average reader's impressions will vary just according as his standpoint inclines to the blind hero-worship of the Tory, the qualified admiration of, say, Professor Bryce, or the bitter hostility displayed toward the "Jew adventurer" by men so different as Carlyle and Lord Acton. The curious detachment, for example, shown in Disraeli's judgments on Western ways and manners, traced unquestionably by Mr. Bryce to his Jewish blood, is commonly labelled by his detractors as an ignoble spirit of mockery—the outcome of looking on mankind on a degraded plane. The extreme sentimentalism, too, which was but the reflex of the circles in which the youthful author moved, is put down as cheap affectation, or, worse, as mere satire on sacred things, all the more detestable for its concealed irony.

All this, of course, points to the fact that the main interest of Disraeli's novels, as in the case of other men whose personalities are greater than their works, is a subjective one. In "Vivian Grey," valuable though it be as a picture of certain phases of society, it is the author who most commands our curiosity, and not less so because the actual autobiographical touches are so often uncertain, and so much manipulated. For Disraeli was above all things a poseur. He never by any chance takes one entirely into his confidence, and in this first book of his he revels in every opportunity of mystification and effect. The cynicism is without doubt exaggerated; his satire, keen as Voltaire's own, is given rein until it becomes mere burlesque in the description of the Grand Duke of Johannisberger and his bibulous cronies. The hero's boundless ambition—or, at least, his unscrupulous methods of advancing it—which make the first by far the most fascinating portion of the book, are perhaps equally overdrawn—so far, that is, as they are intended to portray qualities in the author himself. They represent pretty accurately the Disraeli his bitterest opponents would have us believe him to be, but which, in the bald outline indicated here, he never became. All of which exaggeration, of course, is due mainly to the author's youth and to the purposes of self-advertisement for which the book was written. The hero's savage cynicism is capriciously dropped after the crisis which drives him from England to adventures of an entirely different kind abroad. The Vivian Grey who fawns on Carabas is by no means the same individual who at the agonised request of Lady Trevor saves her brother from the aristocratic card-sharpers, and magnanimously forgives the penitent Baron. Each is an incarnate version of one side of Disraeli's character—as complex as any this most complex age has produced. Each may, in some degree, be traced to his youthful adoration of Byron; "wild, melancholy young men" were the rage in the salons of the Blessington and Count d'Orsay. The cynicism—Jewish, and of a kind with Heine's, says Mr. Bryce—was fostered by Byronism, while the sentiment was of the latter's school altogether. There is one peculiarly Oriental characteristic, however—the love of magnificence and display, and hence of society and its doings in general. Not the fair Madame Carolina's rival, Von Chronicle himself, could have described with more enthusiasm for detail the fancy ball "of the period of Charles V.," which fills so many pages of the last book. It is almost the only trait of which Disraeli himself seems to be unconscious—hence an added charm.

In spite of all apparent lack of cohesion in various divisions of the book, "Vivian Grey" leaves with one a very definite impression. It is expressed, I think, most admirably in the last paragraph of Book I. After a whole chapter of moralising addressed by Grey the elder to his ambitious offspring, touching in airy manner on Education, on Wealth and on Life, he concludes: "For, O my son, the wisest has said, 'He that maketh haste to be rich shall not be innocent'; then, without a break, 'Let us step into Clarke's, and take an ice!' A touch, surely, which fulfils all Mr. Watts-Dunton's requirements for a piece of Absolute Humour.

J. FRANK HORRABIN.

THE MONTHLY PRIZE COMPETITION will in future be discontinued.

The Bridgewater House Gallery.

ONLY a small proportion of the crowds that flock annually to the exhibition of the Royal Academy ever think of turning aside to visit the smaller collection in the Diploma Gallery, which contains several masterpieces of the first rank. Fewer still are those who have taken advantage of the generous permission of successive owners since the beginning of the nineteenth century to see the treasures of Bridgewater House, not a quarter of a mile away, which among private collections are almost unique.

Bridgewater House has long been famous among the great galleries of the world in virtue of the pictures attributed to Raphael and Titian, which form its most notable possessions. In these days, of course, the fame of Raphael has been somewhat dimmed, and modern criticism has proved conclusively that many of the masterpieces attributed to him for centuries are the work of his hand only in part, if at all. The star of Titian, on the contrary, has been rising steadily all the while, and now occupies a paramount position among our artistic constellations. Thus the inclusion of no less than five pictures attributed to Titian, of which four at least rank high as masterpieces even among Titian's masterpieces, would in itself be enough to make the Bridgewater collection worth a special pilgrimage.

Yet the Titians, though they are the chief glory of Bridgewater House, are not its only claim to consequence. Most of the great painters of Italy other than the primitives are represented by fine pictures, while the series of works by the Dutch masters is of surpassing variety and excellence. So high is the average of the gallery that two fine portraits by Reynolds, a great sea-piece by Turner, and a charming landscape by Gainsborough—which in any less carefully chosen collection would at once arrest the attention—appear in the Bridgewater House to be no more than a fitting supplement to the magnificent array of paintings by the great Continental masters.

Mr. Lionel Cust, in his introduction to the huge volume just issued by Messrs. Constable, gives an account of the extraordinary succession of accidents owing to which the collection was formed. The story will bear re-telling. The first Duke of Bridgewater was no collector, but chanced when dining with his nephew, then Earl Gower, to see and admire a picture which the latter had picked up for a small sum at a broker's shop that morning. "You must take me," said the Duke, "to that d——d fellow to-morrow." From this small beginning was developed apparently the taste for buying pictures which led to the formation of the Bridgewater Gallery.

This incident was followed by an amazing stroke of good fortune. The well-known "Philippe Egalité," Duc d'Orléans, had inherited the famous Orléans collection, the nucleus of which was the collection of Queen Christina of Sweden. For political and private reasons he was in need of money, and to get it disposed of his Italian and French pictures to a banker at Brussels, who in turn sold them to a M. Laborde. On the outbreak of the Revolution M. Laborde fled to England with his collection. Later he returned to France, was recognised, and fell a victim to the guillotine. His pictures, however, remained in London and, through the agency of Mr. Michael Bryan, the well-known expert, were purchased on behalf of the Duke of Bridgewater, the Earl Gower, and the Earl of Carlisle, for the sum of £43,000.

Having obtained this splendid collection for such an absurdly small sum, the three noblemen selected a certain proportion of it for themselves and offered the rest for sale by private treaty. The result of this sale was surprising. The pictures which the three noblemen did not think worth keeping fetched the sum of £41,000—that is to say, they acquired their collections for next to nothing. Moreover, this residue contained such paintings as "The Raising of Lazarus," by Sebastiano del Piombo, the "Rape of Europa," and apparently the "Perseus and Andromeda," by Titian, with many other famous pictures. Such is the story of the foundation of the Bridgewater House Gallery.

The volume published by Messrs. Constable must of necessity appeal to a limited audience, since only a rich man could afford the fifty guineas which it costs. Nevertheless, it may be doubted whether such a magnificent series of plates has ever been published before. The photographs by Mr. Bourke are of an excellence so unusual as to make the study of these reproductions hardly less profitable than seeing their originals. Those who are acquainted with the processes of photography and photogravure will know their disadvantages as well as their advantages. It may be doubted, however, whether the disadvantages have ever before been minimised to the degree that they are minimised in this publication. Time after time one is forcibly struck by the perfect rendering not only of texture, tone and handling, but also by the suggestion of colour which the prints convey, a suggestion especially difficult in the case of the great Venetians, whose glowing and complex harmonies place their pictures among the most difficult things which the camera has to render.

It is impossible to keep the eye in training without some constant exercise in the presence of good pictures, and among the scholarly and sumptuous works of reference which have been issued it would be hard to name any single one of such consistent and exceptional value. The only cause for regret that the reader may have is the shortness of Mr. Lionel Cust's notes. They are always sound and admirable criticism, but we think most readers of the book would be glad if he had made them two or three times their present length.

C. J. H.

Correspondence

Sound Sleep

SIR,—In your issue of February 4 one of your correspondents says (re "earlids" in Dr. Saleeby's article) that "most of us enjoy but the thin sleep of the semi-invalid," and suggests that normally sound sleep is impervious (more or less) to shocks of sound. But do not most animals sleep so lightly that they are awakened by sounds that we do not hear?

May not the "soundness" of human sleep, then, be part of that sense-degeneracy which is part of the price we have paid for the evolution of certain of our more purely human characteristics.—Yours, &c.

J. W. HOME.

"Religion for all Mankind"

SIR,—If I may venture a question in connection with your notice of a book I have not read, by an author I know only by name (Rev. Charles Voysey), I might arrive at a better understanding of your critic's allusion to the following quotations made by him as "essentially contradictory theses." He says the author "has undertaken to provide a religion for all mankind based upon facts that are never in dispute," his second quotation being as follows: "It is the right and duty of every man to think for himself in matters of religion." Where is the contradiction? Though the "facts" be actually such as are never in dispute, far otherwise, it would already appear, is it held to be likely with the religion based upon them. The first words quoted are perfectly consistent with those that follow, should a man prefer to base his own views on all or any of numberless points that are very much in dispute, and on which he may both claim the "right," and perform the "duty," of thinking for himself.—Yours, &c.

W. L.

Tolstoy's Sevastopol

SIR,—Apropos of the review in your issue of February 4, may I draw attention to a little-known article which, recalling the sensations he had lived through during the siege, Tolstoy wrote many years after the Crimean War was over? It was too strongly worded for the censor, and consequently is not included in any Russian edition of Tolstoy's works. I do not find it in the volume, lately issued, containing Professor Wiener's version of "Sevastopol," nor did I myself know of its existence when my wife and I first translated that work; but it is included in our sixpenny edition of "Sevastopol and other Stories," which appeared in 1903. That, I think, is the only edition of Tolstoy's works in which it has as yet been printed, though it well deserves to be read as a preface or a pendant to the Sevastopol sketches.

Another matter deserving mention is the unfortunate mistake Professor Wiener has made by including passages Tolstoy has repudiated, and which he requested me to omit from our version. "This epic of Sevastopol, of which the Russian nation was the hero, will long leave grand traces in Russia," is one instance of the clap-trap which a Russian editor found it necessary to introduce to mollify the censor, but which it is a great pity to continue to reproduce after Tolstoy has publicly disowned it.—Yours, &c.

AYLMER MAUDE.

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 5 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper, which must bear the sender's full name and address, not necessarily for publication. The Editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archaeology, Folk-lore, Art, Music and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published. Questions must not be such as can be answered from the ordinary works of reference.

COMPETITION.

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5/- each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to "Academy" Questions and Answers.

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The names and addresses of prize-winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk. Each prize will consist of 5/- worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5/-. No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

One of the four weekly prizes will be awarded, whenever possible, to a Shakespearean Question or Answer.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" carries disqualification.

Questions.

SHAKESPEARE.

GENEVIVUS, speaking of Hamlet, says: "His conversation with her [Ophelia] is equivocal, and not as Romeo, Bassanio, or even Proteus have spoken with their beloved ones," but he does not draw any conclusion from it. Professor Dowden refers to the passages in question in even stronger terms, "half-ambiguous obscurities," but treats the incident as merely casual. Dr. Conolly, writing from the medical point of view, does not mention it. That indecency is one of the surest symptoms of mental derangement Shakespeare was, of course, well aware; witness Ophelia's songs—it did not need Goethe's injurious suggestion to account for them—certain passages in Lear also, with his wish for an ounce of civet to sweeten his imagination. I shall be glad to know if this note of degeneration has been taken into account in the endeavour to determine Shakespeare's intention in the character of Hamlet.—S.C. (Ealing).

LITERATURE.

HUDIBRISTIC RHYMES.—Are there any examples of "Hudibrastic" rhymes in English verse before the publication of "Hudibras"?—E. J. Ludlow (Edinburgh).

HOLY ASIA.—In the "Prometheus Bound" of Æschylus the Chorus speaks of "the inhabitants of holy Asia." Why does Æschylus call the land of the barbarians "holy"?—E.S. (Nottingham).

* SAINT CHARLES.—"Saint Charles!" exclaimed Thackeray one day, as he finished reading once more the original of one of Lamb's letters to Bernard Barton. These words are from Canon Alinger's Preface to the Eversley "Elia." Can any reader give the authority for the story?—G.S.R. (Burnley).

* EAGRE—EAGOR.—Dryden, in his "Threnodia Augustalis," speaks of the tide-wave as the "Eagre" ("the Eagre rose in triumph o'er the tide"), and Camden speaks of the bore of the Severn as the "Eagre." Is there any ground for connecting this term with the Anglo-Saxon "Eagor," a word frequently used in Beowulf for the sea?—E.H.W.-B. (Hove).

KIPLING'S NORNS.

When the Conchimarion horns
Of the reboantic Norns
Usher gentlemen and ladies,
With new lights on Heaven and Hades,
Guaranteeing to eternity
All yesterday's modernity: . . .

Kipling, Files ("Five Nations").

Does this mean that the newspaper columns (the Norns) fix for all eternity the faded fancies of yesterday? And is it correct to figure the fies, which only register doings, as Norns, who were, I understand, fate-spinners? They made history, not reported it. Are their Conchimarion horns derived from conch, meaning "shell"? has the word ever been used before? and is there any authority for it in Norse literature? Lastly, is "reboantic" from the Latin (or English) re-boo, meaning to yah-yah mockingly, and antic? And has that word been used before?—John Bland.

DIOTREPHES AND HIS ANAPASTA.—"Married at last! Has Diogenes found his Anapsia?" cried Claude (from Kingsley's "Two Years Ago," Chapter xv.). I presume that in this allusion Diogenes stands for a confirmed misogynist, and Anapsia for a typical charmer, as the name implies: but one would expect Pericles rather than Diogenes in connection with the name of Anapsia. Is there any romance in which Diogenes and Anapsia figure? I can find no light on this point in any works of reference.—K.C.B.

THOMAS MOORE AND BRAHMANISM.—In the "Veiled Prophet of Khorassan," in the song beginning "A Spirit there is, whose fragrant sigh," the eyes of this "Spirit of Love, Spirit of Bliss" are described as resembling—

Blue water-lilies, when the breeze
Is making the stream around them tremble.

What authority had Moore for this description? In C. F. Volney's "Ruins" a note on Brahmanism cites Chatter Neadirsan as saying: "Brahma has the eyes of the lotus to denote his intelligence; his eyes swim over everything, like the flower of the lotus on the waters." Brahma was certainly recognised by the Vedic poets as the highest cosmical principle, the primary source of the universe, the other members of the Hindu Trinity being Vishnu and Shiva. The existence of other gods is recognised, but in a very different way from that of the trinitarian divinity: the office of the God of Love is held by Kamadeva, also called Ananaka (the bodiless), because, as the myth relates, having once tried by the power of his mischievous arrow to make Shiva fall in love with Parvati whilst he was engaged in devotional practices, the urehin was reduced to ashes by a glance of the angry god. There is a figure of Brahma, four-faced, on a lotus in the cave of Elephantia Isle.—C.R.W.

NOVELISTS.—Speaking of novelists Balsac says: "La nature s'est, de tout temps, permis d'être plus forte qu'eux." Is this merely a variation of the familiar theme, "Truth is stranger than fiction"? Or does Balsac mean that real characters are more vivid than the creations of the novelist's art, as the actual colours of the sky (according to Ruskin) are incomparably brighter than the artificial colours on the painter's palette?—Student.

Answers

SHAKESPEARE.

HOLD OR CUT BOWSTRINGS.—Whether this phrase was originated in, and intended to mean, "in any event" is not quite clear. It is probable that the word bowstring was used figuratively to mean the bow itself—to cut—i.e. meaning to draw. The bow would therefore, of course, be to shoot, which would mean deliberate action on the bowman's part; and to explain the use of the expression in the quotation given by your correspondent—

Quince. At the Duke's Oak we meet.

Bottom. Enough! Hold or cut bowstrings.

Shakespeare alludes to this: "He hath twice or thrice cut Cupid's bowstring, and the little hangman dare not shoot at him" ("Much Ado," III. ii.).—K.S. (Bristol).

MONEY IN SHAKESPEARE'S DAY.—£130 per an. is too low for the poet's prosperous day, when he was reputed to "spend at the rate of £1,000 per annum"; the smaller sum could not include his professional earnings, viz., as property man, dramatist under contract, and actor; very probably his shares in the company were worth £600 as invested capital. In 1597 he bought the "great house" in Stratford, £60 down, and subsequent additions. In the same year he was rated at £5 for his residence in Bishopsgate, then paying 13s. 4d. (a mark). In 1604-5 his tithe rent purchase of £60 per annum cost £440; in 1612-3 he paid £140 for a house in Blackfriars.

Then, £5 x 8 = £40 present currency.

13s. 4d. x 8 = 5 "

£60 x 8 = 480 "

140 x 8 = 1,120 "

440 x 8 = 3,520 "

600 x 8 = 4,800 "

Here we mix capital and income, for the details are merely selected, not fully extended.—A. Hall.

WARWICKSHIRE.—In your issue of December 31, 1904, "E. S., Edinburgh," answers "F. T.'s" question as to whether there are sufficient dialectal peculiarities in Shakespeare's plays upon which to base an argument for a Warwickshire origin for said plays. He says "No," and adds that Dr. Appleton Morgan, President of the New York Shakespeare Society, produced 518 words from the plays which he claimed were Warwickshire words, but that not one of them is peculiar to Warwickshire. This proves nothing against Dr. Morgan's assertion that the plays contained Warwickshireisms, nor against his proposition that their presence pointed to a Warwickshirean authorship of the plays, especially as the question Dr. Morgan was discussing was as to whether Shakespeare (a native of Warwickshire, where that dialect was spoken) was the author of the plays, as against (for example) Bacon, who was not a Warwickshire man, whatever else he might have been. Doubtless Warwickshire vocabularies, like all other vocabularies, had origins, and very probably, they were used in other shires besides Warwickshire. "E. S." might as well say that the Italian language was not really Italian because every syllable in it had a Latin origin. Dr. Morgan's "Glossary," by the way, was a propos of a study of the puns in the plays, and of his attempt (which seems to me a successful one) to show that these puns depended upon Warwickshire vowel pronunciations, which are unusually arbitrary, for their intelligibility.—H. McC. (Newmarket).

"LADY OF THE STRACHY."—This passage is a problem which has never yet received an entirely satisfactory solution. Hunter has suggested that in the scene between Sir Topas and Malvolio, Shakespeare is ridiculing the exorcisms by the Puritan ministers in the case of a family name Strachy (1596-99), and therefore introduces the word Strachy as a hint to the audience of what is to follow. Unlike his contemporaries, Shakespeare is certainly sparing of allusions to the Precians (cf. Ben Jonson), who were one of the staple butts of playhouse wit at this time. Halliwell refers to a Russian word meaning lawyer or judge. Other suggestions are "Strozzi," "Stracci," and "Stratarch."—F.W.T. (Dudley).

LADY OF STRACHY.—See "Strathy," river and parish, Sutherland; ch and th are convertible, as in Strachan, Strahan, for Strath-aven. This points to a Scottish origin for the anecdote cited in "Twelfth Night," ii. 5; that "the Lady of the Strachy married the Yeoman of the Wardrobe." Now, the notorious James Hay, who became Earl of Carlisle, was in the "Wardrobe" under James I.; he started as a Court favourite, and by royal patronage, married a great heiress and baroness, named Lady Honora Denny, whose father was Earl of Norwich. Here we must postulate a change of designation, just like the substitution of Falstaff for Baron Oldcastle, to avoid censure. There is a family of baronets named Strachey, but their annals supply no explanation of the passage cited from Shakespeare.—A. Hall.

"STRACHY."—A word of doubtful form and meaning, occurring only in "the passage quoted," while in earlier editions it is italicised as a title or proper name. It seems possible to have been an historical reference to an incident which occurred in the Twelfth Night revels at Holyrood, where Mary Fleming, maid to Mary Queen of Scots, was chosen Queen of Twelfth Night, 1563.—Edith Philip.

LITERATURE.

THE RELAXED BOW.—The following story is told of Æson by Phædrus (III. xiv.): The sage was discovered playing "nuts" with a crowd of children, and consequently incurred the ridicule of a passer-by. Thereupon, by way of rebuke, he placed a relaxed bow in the middle of the road, asking the scoffer to explain the point of the action. The latter was nonplussed, and Æson gave his own explanation. "You will soon break your bow," he said, "if you always keep it taut. So you ought at times to allow your mind recreation, that it may return to you better fitted for thought."—M.D.

* BROWNING AND DARWIN.—Darwin was not the first in the field of evolution; there were evolutionists before his time. Not only Browning's "Paracelsus" (1835), but Tennyson's "In Memoriam" (1850), abound in evolutionary terms. Darwin's first book, "The Origin of Species" (1859), gave to evolutionists a definite theory of evolution. See Clodd's "Pioneers of Evolution from Thales to Huxley" for further information.—T.H.A.

"EOTHEN."—Further replies received from Harmatopogon; C.R.W. (Hornsey); G.S.R. (Burnley); M.S.: S.B. (Malvern); H. D. Barclay; D. Davies (Clapton); and H.H.F. (Eastbourne).

"AN ARMY OF BROWN-BELL MEN."—The brown-bell was a kind of halbert used in the days before foot soldiers carried muskets. The marks and stains of combat were highly valued in medieval times, and no fighter cared to keep his weapon bright, and thus remove the witness to his skill and prowess. Old ballads make mention of "brown brand," "brown blade," or, like Chaucer, "rusty blade." In Marlowe's "Edward II." (III. ii.) are the lines:

Lo with a band of bowmen and of pikes,
Brown bills and targetiers, four hundred strong.

—S.C. (Hove).

WRITER'S "ETYMOLOGICUM MAGNUM."—Only one part of this work appeared, printed at Cambridge, 1800. The author appears to have abandoned the work in favour of another, with the title "Etymologicum Universale," or universal etymological dictionary on a new plan . . . with illustrations drawn from various languages . . . the Celtic dialects, Gaelic, Irish, Welsh, Breton, etc. Vols. I-II. Cambridge University Press, 1811-1822. Quarto.—John Ballinger.

KALEWALA.—The story of Aino is only touched upon in this epic, but there is an excellent collection of Finnish legends, translated from the original "Kalewala" by John Martin Crawford, and compiled by J. O. Brown, LL.D., published in 1892 by Kegan Paul & Co.—M.S. (Bookham).

BROWNING AND DARWIN.—Darwin's originality does not consist in the theory of evolution, which, in its modern form, found its first exponent in Herbert Spencer, some years before the appearance of "The Origin of Species," but in the precise method by which, according to him, biological evolution was actually brought about. Hints and adumbrations of this method had been put forth from time to time, but A. Russell Wallace alone contests with Darwin priority in the epoch-making discovery, as based upon elaborate research.—R. Bruce Bonwell.

BROWNING AND DARWIN.—Evolution was not discovered by Darwin; see "Pioneers of Evolution," from Thales to Huxley, by Edward Clodd; not only Browning's "Paracelsus," but Tennyson's "In Memoriam," which was published nine years before Darwin's "Origin of Species," abounds with evolution.—T.H.A.

THE RELAXED BOW.—It is improbable that the originator of the comparison of a relaxed bow with the beneficial effect of mental rest can be found. When bows and arrows were the familiar weapons, every one would know, not that a bow gains strength by being relaxed, but that if it is kept strung up for any length of time both the bow and the string lose some of their tendency to return to their original position and length. The cohesive power of their particles tends to become exhausted; hence the propulsive power, which depends upon this, is lessened. A violinist does not leave his bow "strung up" for a long interval. The obvious parallel that attention becomes weaker if the demand upon it is unduly prolonged must have occurred to thinkers at a very early period.—S.C. (Hove).

LIONS' SKINS.—"We sleep in lions' skins in our progress unto virtue" suggests an allusion to the legend that Hercules, having slain the Nemean lion, wore its hide. Taken with the context, the inspiring idea is that great difficulties overcome are an aid and an incentive to attempt further achievement. In Tennyson's

Men may rise on stepping-stones

Of their dead selves to higher things is a variant of the same idea.—S.C. (Hove).

"LEARNED HEATHEN."—The passage referred to by John Wesley is from the so-called "Longinus" on the Sublime, ix. 9: "Similarly, the legislator of the Jews, no ordinary man, having formed and expressed a worthy conception of the might of the Godhead, writes at the very beginning of his Laws: 'God said—' What? 'Let there be light, and there was light; let there be land, and there was land.' The authenticity of the passage has often been doubted, but needlessly. (See pp. 251ff. in Rhys Roberts's edition.)—Methodist.

"THE LEARNED HEATHEN" referred to by Wesley was Longinus, who, in his "Treatise on the Sublime," Chapter VII., after quoting some lines from the Iliad exhibiting the majesty of the gods, proceeds (I quote from Birlan's Translation): "Ainsi le législateur des Juifs, qui n'était pas un homme ordinaire, ayant fort bien conçu la grandeur et la puissance de Dieu, l'a exprimée dans tout sa dignité au commencement de ses lois, par ces paroles: Dieu dit: 'Que la lumière se fasse, et la lumière se fit; que la terre se fasse et la terre fut faite.'"—T.F.J. (Greenock).

GENERAL.

* NONCONFORMIST CONSCIENCE.—This phrase undoubtedly had its origin in the "Conscience" Clause, first introduced into the Endowed Schools Act of 1860. In 1863 the Clause was extended for the benefit of Dissenters from the Church, that their children should be exempted from any religious teaching their parents objected to and from attendance at the Established Church. This was an essential provision of the great Education Act of 1870.—K.S. (Bristol).

TIB'S EVE (ST.). NEVER.—St. Tibs is supposed to be a corruption of St. Ubes. There is no such saint in the Calendar; and therefore St. Tib's Eve fell neither before nor after New Year's Day. This phrase is similar to a "week of two Thursdays," "once in a blue moon," and its origin is doubtful.—K.S. (Bristol).

"THE DEVIL LOOKING OVER LINCOLN."—The legend runs that when Bishop Remicus built Lincoln Cathedral the devil tried to prevent him, and would have killed him had not the Blessed Virgin Mary sent a mighty rushing wind, which made the devil take refuge in the church, where he remains through fear of the wind. We are told that the devil naturally "looked upon the building of the Cathedral with a sour and malicious countenance. From whence they deduced a proverb to express the ill aspect of envious and malicious men at such good things as they don't like." "He looks as the devil over Lincoln."—"Lincolnshire," p. 1441, 1719.—R. B. Appleton.

ST. EULALIA.—The story of St. Eulalia, of Merida, is told by Prudentius. At the time of the publication of the Edict of Diocletian (303 A.D.) Eulalia, a child of twelve, went to the Prefect and reproached him for his persecutions of the Christians. She was immediately seized, and required to make offerings to the idol, with the alternative of being tortured to death. She trod upon the offerings, overthrew the idol, and spat upon the judge. As she was dying under torture a white dove issued from her mouth and flew to heaven. She is buried at Merida, in the province of Badajoz, Spain.—E.C.E. (Irvington, New York).

PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain, on application at the following booksellers, Five Shillings' worth of books. Notices have been despatched to the several winners and to the following booksellers:

Messrs. Lupton Bros., 38 and 40 Manchester Road, Burnley.
Mr. S. Cambridge, 56 Church Street, Hove, Sussex.
Messrs. Wilson & Whitworth, 20 Broadway, Stratford, E.
Messrs. Fawn & Son, 42 Queen's Road, Bristol.

March Nos. Now Ready.MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.*CONTENTS FOR MARCH.

- THE TOLL OF THE BUSH. By WILLIAM SATCHELL. Chapters XV.-XVII.
- BRITISH SEAMEN FOR BRITISH SHIPS. By WULFF RICE.
- THE PROFESSION OF ART. By LEWIS F. DAY.
- MOLE-WARFARE.
- THE FELLOW-WORKERS OF VOLTAIRE. By S. G. TALLENTYRE. I.—Diderot.
- PEOPLE WHO IMAGINE VAIN THINGS. By MARCUS REED.
- THE CHURCH IN THE METROPOLIS.
- THE PUNKAH-WALLAH.
- KURDS AND CHRISTIANS. By F. R. EARP.

TEMPLE BAR.CONTENTS FOR MARCH.

- LONE MARIE. By W. E. NORRIS. Chapters VII.-IX.
- TAXATION: Its Facts, Fallacies and Curiosities. By BENJAMIN TAYLOR.
- WOOD FAIRIES. By LAURENCE HOUSMAN.
- THE RIOTS. By SAMUEL GORDON.
- SCIENTIFIC BIRD'S-NESTING. By the Rev. S. CORNISH WATKINS.
- CONSOLATION. By S. MACNAUGHTAN.
- FROM SOUTH TO NORTH IN SPAIN. I.-V. By HELEN H. COLVILL.
- THE BLANCS OF MONTE CARLO.
- A BYWAY. By H. J. MATHESON.
- THE BASKET OF FATE. By SIDNEY PICKERING. Chapters VI.-VIII.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY.

SUBSCRIPTIONS opened at any date for THREE, SIX and TWELVE Months. Town Subscriptions, 21s. Yearly. Books of past Seasons, 10s. 6d. Yearly.

Terms for Country, Suburbs, and Parcel Post, sent on application to

MUDIE & CO., 30-34 NEW OXFORD ST., LONDON.

NOTICE.—“THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE” is POSTED FREE (52 issues at 3d.) to every ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying 13/-. FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a prepayment of 17/6 will secure it being sent regularly and Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy. Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or News vendor, or direct to the Publisher, 9 East Harding Street, E.C.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS.A COMPANION TO GREEK STUDIES.

Edited by LEONARD WHIBLEY, M.A., Fellow of Pembroke College, and University Lecturer in Ancient History. With 141 Illustrations and 5 Maps. Demy 8vo, 18s. net.

The Contents include Chapters on Geography, Fauna and Flora; History; Literature, Philosophy, and Science; Art, Mythology, and Religion; Public Antiquities; Private Antiquities; Criticism and Interpretation, contributed by H. F. Tozer, Canon Tristram, R. D. Hicks, Sir R. Jebb, Dr. Henry Jackson, Dr. Gow, Dr. F. C. Penrose, Prof. E. A. Gardner, Dr. Waldstein, F. R. Earp, A. H. Smith, Prof. Ridgeway, Dr. Archer-Hind, L. Whibley, W. Wyse, R. J. G. Mayor, H. J. Edwards, Prof. Oman, A. B. Cook, Miss Harrison, Dr. Wilkins, Dr. M. R. James, F. Warre Cornish, Lady Evans, Prof. Albutt, R. A. Neil, P. Giles, E. S. Roberts, J. Rendel Harris, Dr. Verrall, and Dr. Sandys. A Prospectus will be sent on application.

Glasgow Herald.—"It is practically an extremely convenient encyclopedia of what readers of Greek books want, presenting as it does, in a handy and concise form, what would otherwise require to be sought in many volumes."

NOW READY. FOURTH EDITION.

THE GROWTH OF ENGLISH INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE DURING THE EARLY AND MIDDLE AGES. By W. CUNNINGHAM, F.B.A., D.D., Fellow and Lecturer of Trinity College, and Vicar of Great St. Mary's, Cambridge. Fourth Edition. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

THE GROWTH OF ENGLISH INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE IN MODERN TIMES. Third Edition. Demy 8vo. In Two Parts. Part I.—THE MERCANTILE SYSTEM. Part II.—LAISSEZ FAIRE. 25s. net.

Westminster Gazette.—"One of the finest studies in economic history that has yet been produced in this country."

THE RISE AND DECLINE OF THE FREE TRADE MOVEMENT. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"The series of Cambridge Lectures contained in a little volume bearing the name of Dr. Cunningham will not be long in securing their place in the literature of the Tariff controversy."

THE CAMBRIDGE HISTORICAL SERIES.
New Volumes.

General Editor: G. W. PROTHERO, Litt.D.

SCANDINAVIA: a Political History of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, from 1513 to 1900. By R. NISBET BAIN, Author of "The Daughter of Peter the Great," "Charles XII. and the Collapse of the Swedish Empire," &c. Crown 8vo, with 5 Maps, 7s. 6d.

EUROPE AND THE FAR EAST. By Sir R. K. DOUGLAS, Keeper of Oriental Printed Books and MSS., British Museum. With 4 Maps. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

Outlook.—"There are few better authorities on Chinese questions than Sir Robert Douglas, and the new volume which he has contributed to the Cambridge Historical Series is an able and timely contribution to our knowledge of Far Eastern affairs."

CAMBRIDGE ENGLISH CLASSICS.
New Volumes.

A Series of Editions of Classical English Writers, based upon a Uniform Plan, and giving faithful Reproductions of the Original Texts. Prospectus, with Specimen Pages, will be sent on application.

ROGER ASCHAM.—English Works.—Toxophilus; Report of the Affaires and State of Germany; The Scholemaster. The Text edited by W. ALDIS WRIGHT, M.A., Vice-Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. Large crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

Athenaeum.—"No better edition of Ascham's text is ever likely to be printed."

SAMUEL BUTLER.—Hudibras.—Written in the time of the late wars. The Text Edited by A. R. WALLER. Large crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

LONDON: CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE, AVE MARIA LANE. C. F. CLAY, MANAGER.

Newnes' Thin Paper Classics

Printed in large, clear type on extremely thin but thoroughly opaque paper.

Photogravure Frontispiece and Title-page. Narrow Fcap. 8vo (6½ by 3½), Gilt Tops, Cloth Limp, 3s. net. Limp Lamb-skin, 3s. 6d. net per Vol.

SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS and POEMS. In 3 Volumes, with Glossary.

MILTON'S POEMS.

BURNS' POEMS.

DON QUIXOTE.

BACON'S WORKS.

SHELLEY'S POEMS.

PEPYS' DIARY.

KEATS' POEMS.

POE'S TALES.

EVELYN'S DIARY.

LAMB'S WORKS.

THE VISION OF DANTE.

PEACOCK'S NOVELS.

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON. 2 Vols.

HAWTHORNE'S NEW ENGLAND ROMANCES.

TENNYSON'S POEMS. 1830-1859.

LANDOR'S SHORTER WORKS.

WALPOLE'S LETTERS.

INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.

POEMS OF WORDSWORTH.

Edited by Professor KNIGHT.

MRS. BROWNING'S POEMS. 2 Vols.

THE TRAVELS OF MARCO POLO.

THE LIFE AND VOYAGES OF CAPTAIN COOK.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENVENUTO CELLINI.

HOMER'S ILIADS. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.

HOMER'S ODYSSEYS AND SHORTER POEMS. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.

SWIFT'S JOURNAL TO STELLA. With other Writings relating to Stella and Vanessa.

COLERIDGE'S POEMS. Edited by Professor KNIGHT.

EARLY ITALIAN POETS. By D. G. ROSSETTI.

"Newnes' elegant and compact series of classics in limp leather. We expect a great success for these editions."—Athenaeum.

GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd.,

Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

NOW READY.

EMPIRICAL ESSAYS. By the Author of "Unthinkables." Crown 8vo, 5s. net; per post, 5s. 3d.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS:

"The title of this work appears wholly inadequate for its contents. The essays are four in number.... and each is a masterly work opening up fields of discussion far beyond the suggestion of the title. Unlike works of a similar character, there is a freedom of thought such as can only be expected from a master mind.... The most striking probability is that on 'The Higher Agnosticism.'"—Oxford Review.

"The author is detached from the orthodox position, and holds that reincarnation is one of the keys to the problems of life. He has a vigorous and interesting way of expressing his views."—Literary World.

"The four essays in this book have all a religious bearing, and are partly critical and partly constructive.... The Higher Agnosticism, the author tells us, believe in the principle not of the shut but of the Open Door.... and that no one has a right to say in the name of science, 'Thus far cannot thou go and no farther.' Of the four Essays, that on 'Rome, Jerusalem, and an Ideal' strikes us as the best.... The author is ingenious in his surmises.... and the strictures he passes on the type of Christianity developed by Rome are historically just."—Glasgow Herald.

"The Higher Agnosticism" is a useful plea for breadth of view and receptivity. This last contains a lively defence of spiritual phenomena, especially as the subject has recently been made respectable by Mr. Frederic Myers."—Light.

EDINBURGH: GEO. A. MORTON.

LONDON: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & CO., LTD.

LONGMAN'S MAGAZINE.

MAROH. Price SIXPENCE.

HAY FEVER. By WALTER HERRIES POLLOCK and GUY C. POLLOCK. (Chaps. 6-7.)

TIME AND TIDE. By L. JEBB.

THE JARL'S MERCY. By G. W. MURRAY.

THE MAKING OF A MAN. (In Two Parts.) Part I. By Captain VAUGHAN.

A PORT OF STRANDED PRIDE. By E. HALLAM MOORHOUSE.

THE VAGARIES OF TOD AND PETER. By L. ALLEN HARKER.

WILD WHEAT. By M. E. FRANÇOIS (Mrs. Francis Blundell). (Chaps. 6-8.)

AT THE SIGN OF THE SHIP. By ANDREW LANG.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.

39 Paternoster Row, London. E.C.

THE FAUNA OF BRITISH INDIA, including Ceylon and Burma. Published under the Authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council. Edited by W. T. BLANFORD. Medium 8vo, with numerous Illustrations.

MAMMALIA (for sets only), £1.—FISHES. 2 vols., £1 each.—BIRDS. Vol. I, £1; Vols. II-IV, 15s. each.—REPTILIA and BATRACHIA (for sets only), £1.—MOTHS. 4 vols., £1 each.—HYMENOPTERA. Vols. I and II, £1 each.—ARACHNIDA. 1 vol., 10s.—RHYNCHOTA. Vols. I and II, £1 each.—BUTTERFLIES. Vol. I, £1.

London: Taylor & Francis, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street. Calcutta and Simla: Thacker, Spink & Co. Bombay: Thacker & Co., Ltd. Burma: Myles Standish & Co., Rangoon. Berlin: Friedländer & Sohn, Carlstrasse, 11.

In English Homes.

The Internal Character, Furniture, and Adornments of some of the most Notable Houses of England, historically depicted from Photographs specially taken by Charles Latham. Demy folio (17½ ins. × 11½ ins.). Printed on Art Paper and handsomely bound in cloth, gilt edges.

42s. net.

This beautiful book, the most sumptuous work of its kind, contains 200 full-page Plates and about 100 smaller Plates.

Chatte & Windus's New Books.

New Six Shilling Novels.

HEIRS OF REUBEN.

By CHRIS HEALY,

Author of "The Endless Heritage."

TALES OF THE FIVE TOWNS.

By ARNOLD BENNETT,

Author of "Anna of the Five Towns."

FLEUR-DE-CAMP: A DAUGHTER OF FRANCE.

By A. GODRIC CAMPBELL.

A SPOILER OF MEN.

By RICHARD MARSH,

Author of "The Beetle." [March 23.]

THE YOUNGEST MISS BROWN.

By FLORENCE WARDEN,

Author of "The House on the Marsh." [April 3.]

THE ISLAND OF TRANQUIL DELIGHTS.

By C. WARREN STODDARD,

Author of "Summer Cruising in the South Seas." With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. net.

LI TING OF LONDON.

By GEORGE R. SIMS ("Dagonet").

Fcp. 8vo, picture cover, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d. [Shortly.]

New

Three-and-Sixpenny Books.

AS LUCK WOULD HAVE IT.

By WILLIAM WESTALL.

A PRINCE OF GOOD FELLOWS.

By ROBERT BARR.

ILLUSTRATED BY J. F. SULLIVAN.

THE MAN-HUNTER.

By DICK DONOVAN.

A New Edition. Crown 8vo, picture cloth, flat back, 2s.

The St. Martin's Library.

Printed in clear type on fine paper; full size of page, 6½ by 4½ inches. Cloth, gilt top, 2s. net each; leather, gilt edges, 3s. net each.

IMPORTANT SERIES OF ELEVEN NEW VOLUMES IN THE PRESS.

MACAULAY'S

History of England. In 5 Volumes; and

JUSTIN MCCARTHY'S

The Reign of Queen Anne. In 1 Volume.

A History of the Four Georges and of William IV. In 2 Volumes; and

A History of Our Own Times, from the Accession of Queen Victoria to 1880. In 3 Volumes.

THE OTHER VOLUMES OF THE SERIES ARE AS FOLLOWS:—

By SIR WALTER BESANT.
London.
All Sorts and Conditions.

By HALL CAINE.
The Deans.

By WILKIE COLLINS.
The Woman in White.

By DANIEL DEFOE.
Robinson Crusoe. With 37 Illustrations by GEORGE CRUIKSHANK.

By THOMAS HARDY.
Under the Greenwood Tree.

By BRET HARTE.
Condensed Novels.

By OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.
The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table. With Illustrations by J. G. THOMSON.

By RICHARD JEFFERIES.
The Life of the Fields.
The Open Air.
Nature near London.

By CHARLES READE.
The Cloister and the Hearth.
"Never too Late to Mend."

By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.
Memories and Portraits.
Virginibus Puerisque.
Men and Books.

New Arabian Nights.
Across the Plains.

The Merry Men. [Shortly.]
The Pocket R. L. S.: Favorite Passages from STEVENSON'S WORKS.

By MARK TWAIN.
Sketches.

By WALTON and COTTON.
The Complete Angler.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111 St. Martin's Lane

The Academy and Literature

No. 1712. Established 1869.

London: 25 February 1905.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17s. 6d. a year.]

Notes

FOR its Sunday evening gatherings The Playgoers' Club has been getting recently a more lively kind of lecturer than it used to be content with, and on Sunday night Mr. Frank Harris delivered an oration that was literary rather than dramatic. His theme was Shakespeare, and with characteristic modesty he declared that to an English audience William was an unknown poet. No one, we are given to infer, except Mr. Frank Harris, had been able to read the poet's life in his works. The deliverance had at least the merit of being extremely interesting, Mr. Harris ingeniously extracting a biography from the works of Shakespeare. For example, the poet's departure from Stratford was described as the result of his matrimonial troubles, and the poem "Venus and Adonis," which he carried in his pocket, as a glorified description of the boredom of a golden youth under the blandishments of an old woman.

MANY passages were cited from the plays for the purpose of showing that William Shakespeare lived a life of spiritual struggle and unrest. He was, so to say, Hamlet all through the piece. The gaiety and lightness of his early plays gradually passed away and left nothing but gloom and blackness behind. It was only by a supreme effort that he plucked up sufficient spirit to write his final comedy, "The Tempest," with its sad and tragic epilogue. The Shakespearean theme of two kings—one of whom was the usurper and in possession, the other the rightful heir—was also given a personal application as though Shakespeare, by divine right king of his contemporaries, had been dethroned in favour of the fashionable poets of the hour. It was an ingenious essay, and whatever might be the opinion of the audience in regard to its soundness, there could be no dispute as to its being thoughtful and suggestive.

CONVOCATION at Oxford has accepted Mr. Alfred Beit's munificent offer of £1,310 a year for seven years for the maintenance of a Professor of Colonial History with appendages in the form of lecturers, prizes, and books. If at the end of the seven years the endowment proves of advantage to the University, Mr. Beit proposes to make it permanent. According to the Provost of Oriel, this is by far the largest gift that has been made to the University for a very long time; and it appears to have had the additional advantage of having been made by a man of business in a business form, which includes not only present certainty, but room for future modification.

THE Bodleian Library is to be congratulated on recovering its lost copy of the first folio Shakespeare. The copy was sent to the Bodleian, as the discussion at the Bibliographical Society this week showed, from the Stationers' Company, under an agreement of 1611, on February 17, 1624. But the Library Catalogue contained only the third edition of 1674. The book, once chained and apparently much read by graduates, disappeared. Thirty years ago it was offered to a large English library for opinion, and some vandal advised that it should be rebound. But the old binding was still in existence, and that, with the chain-marks on it and the threading and arrangement of the leaves, proved the genuineness of the volume.

AN interesting detail is the observation of what plays were most read between 1624 and the Civil Wars. The most worn play was "Romeo and Juliet"; and then, in order, "Julius Cæsar," "Macbeth," "King Henry IV." (Part I.), "The Merry Wives of Windsor," "The Tempest," and "Hamlet." The last clearly did not hold then the position it has won since, while "Julius Cæsar" has dropped behind.

HARVARD College Library has had the good fortune and the enterprise to secure from a German bookseller a copy of a poem, hitherto supposed lost, by Samuel Rowlands. The only thing known about the poem before this discovery was the entry in the Stationers' Register, May 22, 1617: "Master Pauier. Entred for his Copie vnder the handes of master Tauernor and both the wardens, A Poeme, intituled The Bride, written by Samuel Rowlande." The volume is a small quarto, and the poem, which is in Rowlands' favourite six-line stanza, is a discourse and dialogue for and against marriage by a bride and her friends. When the book has been published in facsimile, it will, no doubt, be clear that the poem claims descent from the many Italian works of the same kind which are reflected in much of our Elizabethan and Jacobean literature; notably in "Much Ado about Nothing."

IN consequence of the death of Arnold Glover, the publication of the first two volumes of the edition of the text of Beaumont and Fletcher, upon which he was at work for the syndics at Cambridge University Press, will be somewhat delayed. They will be issued as soon as possible, completed by A. R. Waller, who will be responsible for the remaining volumes of the edition.

WRITING in the "North American Review" Mr. William Roscoe Thayer makes as frank an appeal as we have seen for a return to the old view of history. Twenty years ago the writer who dared to hint that the great man was of any importance in the history of the world would have been held a bad philosopher. Now the pendulum is swinging back. We are all a little tired of the talk of tendencies, movements, and so forth, and the stiff, logical formulæ of the "scientific" historian; and are coming to see once more that the great men are not "negligible quantities," as some phlegmatic person declared of Napoleon, but the real, the vital forces at work on the world.

It is impossible, continues Mr. Thayer, to explain the great men, in Taine's fashion, so easily from the "moment" and the "environment." "The epoch of Romanticism of course produced Romanticists," writes Mr. Thayer; "Keats was so indisputably a product of his time and conditions—have we not every-day proof that the sons of stablemen take to reading 'The Faerie Queene' and classical mythology, and to writing exquisite poetry?" And again: these doctrinaires "pick out certain elements in Dante's time, let us say, and frame them into a machine which could not help making Dante; and then they triumphantly assure us that they have 'accounted for Dante.'" But, were their logic sound, the machine ought to have produced "nothing but Dantes, a whole population of Dantes."

MR. THAYER, therefore, prophesies. "We stand on the threshold of a new era, in which the individual shall be magnified as he never was before." What is the whole story of modern scientific and commercial progress but the story of the glorification of the individual? For the man of birth and position we have substituted, or are substituting, the man of brains and character. The future of biography is assured so far as material goes, for, as Mr. Thayer says, great men will be more frequent than of old; but what of the biographers? To judge from the specimens recently published (and they are many), the prospect is not so bright in that quarter.

It is never fair to judge a man by his after-dinner speeches, particularly when he is the guest of the evening; but Mr. Jerome K. Jerome's remarks at the Authors' Club this week showed both confusion of thought and a little humorous misstatement of fact. It is true, no doubt, that the drama is nowadays too exclusively concerned with Park Lane and Belgravia; but what is true of the drama is not true of modern fiction. More than ever before, our fiction is interested in the middle-classes; and to mention George Eliot and Dickens as examples of better things prevailing in the past is to overlook the fact that, were they living now, they would be far less exceptional in their choice of material than they were then.

WHEN Mr. Jerome indulges in the inevitable sneer of the popular author at the "superior critic" who had accused him of belonging to the middle classes, he clearly misses the point of that critic's remark. The middle classes to which he assigned Mr. Jerome were (if he had any right to the title of superior) not the social but the intellectual middle classes. The critic's quarrel with Mr. Jerome is that, being a man of great ability, he consistently prefers to appeal to a lower order of mind, to the middle-class intellect. And every critic who fails to prove himself "superior" by refusing to be put off with the second-best or third-best, is simply failing in his duty to literature and to the public, whose taste it is his privilege to aid, however humbly, in purifying.

THE second number of a new monthly magazine, "The Dickensian," which is published for the Dickens Fellowship, contains a notice of "Oliver Twist" that appeared in "The Monthly Review" for January, 1839. It is a piece of very sound criticism. The writer puts his finger gently on a number of weak spots. The tale, he says, consists rather of a succession of sketches than of a cunningly-conceived plot, "or a progressively arresting tale, where each chapter enchains the attention, not only with a sustained, but increasing power." There is too much in it of muscular agony, more of the horrible than the awful and grand.

Boz revels, continues the critic, "while painting low or degraded nature, among objects, which, unless merely subservient to finer and higher elements equally well drawn and finished, never can awaken our nobler sympathies, nor prime and invigorate the wings of these awakened sensibilities." There, and in a good deal more to the same effect, speak the thirties, with their quaint views of the relation of art to morals, and their rigid ideas of what was and was not proper material for the artist.

BUT the article is full of discriminating comment, of a kind that has been too little used by critics of Dickens. On the opposite page, for instance, of the same number, we find Mr. J. W. T. Ley, in an appreciative notice of Mr. Teignmouth Shore's excellent little book on Dickens, finding fault with him, as it seems, for being temperate in opinion, and daring to keep his head in the presence of the idol.

A VERY interesting article in the "Hampstead Annual for 1904-5" concerns Canon Ainger. Ainger was fond of Hampstead, where he had spent much of his childhood, and where he lived from 1876 to 1895. The writer of the article remembers his play, "Midas," which was performed at Carlton Hill in 1851, with Charles Dickens in the cast; and in 1868 Ainger began that long series of Shakespeare readings which won him even more renown among his friends than his literary successes. Each play took two or three evenings, the reading lasting about an hour and a half.

THE flexible beauty of Ainger's voice, his scholarship, and his vivid imagination made these readings a rare pleasure. Passion and grace, innocence and turpitude, the elfin gaiety of Oberon and the broad comedy of Bottom all seem to have come at will to Ainger's tongue. It is a little surprising to those who never heard him read to learn that his finest part of all was—Falstaff!

MR. DAVID NUTT has ceased to issue "The Modern Language Quarterly." The publication is to be split into two parts to meet two divergent streams of opinion in the Modern Language Association. The learned section is still to have its Quarterly under the editorship of Professor Robertson. The members who are schoolmasters—not, it is hoped, an unlearned section—are to have a paper issued eight or nine times a year under the title of "Modern Language Teaching," published by Messrs. Black and edited by Professor Rippmann. Every member of the Association will receive both publications.

MR. JAMES STEAD EDINGTON has left to his native town of North Shields his whole collection of engravings of the British and foreign schools. The Turners are stated to be exceptionally complete; and Cruikshank, Leech, Hogarth, Bewick, and Rowlandson are also well represented.

Bibliographical

THE "Original Letters, &c., of Sir James Falstaff and his Friends," which we reviewed in our issue of February 11, were first published anonymously in 1796 and reissued in 1797, and a reprint was published in 1877, that reprint and the present, too, perhaps, owing their existence rather to the association of the book with Elia than to its inherent value. Another book dealing with the fat knight that might be worth reprinting is "The Life of Sir John Falstaff," by Robert B. Brough (1857-8). This work has not the literary interest of White's "Falstaff Letters," but it has a specially attractive feature in twenty admirable etchings by George Cruikshank, illustrating the life and adventures of Sir John. Originally published in monthly parts, and as a volume on its completion, this work has never been reprinted.

It is announced, I notice, that Professor W. W. Skeat is to follow up his modernised versions of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales," in the King's Classics, with a modernised "Vision of Piers Plowman." If such works are to be "modernised," Professor Skeat is the man best fitted for the task, for he has for forty years been a student of Piers Plowman; he has already published "Parallel Extracts from Twenty-nine MSS. of Piers Plowman" — Early English Text Society — (1866); "Pierce the Ploughman's Creed" (1867); "The Vision of William concerning Piers the Plowman" — Clarendon Press Series — (1869, sixth edition 1891); and completed his series of "Parallel Texts" in 1886. Professor Skeat's new version will, I believe, be in the old metre; we already have a version of "Langland's Vision of Piers the Plowman" done into modern prose by Miss Kate M. Warren (1895, second edition 1899).

The success of the Temple Classics and the World's Classics seems to have inspired some publishers with a desire to keep on "going one better" in the pleasant game of cheapening good books. Each season sees new series entered upon, and now we are promised three competing series of "classics" at sixpence per volume. The latest announcement at this price is of the Cameo Classics, in which we are to be given cloth-bound books averaging 256 pages apiece, and in which, it seems, no classic is to be included that cannot be brought within the Procrustean compass of a single volume of that size. The new series is apparently to interpret the term "classics" in a wider sense than its competitors, for it is to include works to which some of us would scarcely feel inclined to give that honourable appellation, such as Lytton's "Eugene Aram," Griffin's "Colleen Bawn," and Ainsworth's "Miser's Daughter." Earlier series—the Temple Classics, the Thin Paper Classics, and others—maintain their high position by only including works to which the name may fitly be applied. Popular fiction might well be reissued under another series-title. A reader who studies the output of works in these series of reprints cannot but be amazed at the way in which certain works are reissued apparently with but very little regard to the number of editions of them already on the market.

A new edition of Edward FitzGerald's "Polonius: a Collection of Wise Saws and Modern Instances" has been published during the past week. First published anonymously in 1852, a separate reprint of this was issued by Messrs. Methuen in 1903, and it is also obtainable in a volume of FitzGerald's "Miscellanies," in Macmillan's Golden Treasury Series and in Routledge's Universal Library. "I doubt it will be but a losing affair," wrote the author just after the first publication of his little book. Yet little more than half a century after he wrote those words there are four cheap editions of it from which readers may make their choice.

The late General Lewis Wallace, or "Lew" Wallace as he abbreviated himself on his title-pages, in accordance with an American custom, was mainly known in England by one story. "Ben Hur: a Tale of the Christ" was published just a quarter of a century ago, and in those five and twenty years sixteen firms have published here two dozen issues of the story, representing a huge output. Lew Wallace's first story was hailed in England by the leading critical journals as one of the most powerful historical novels of its day, and it also has appeared in several English editions, though it cannot be said to have vied in popularity with "Ben Hur." The following is a list of his books: "The Fair God; or, the Last of the Tzins: a Tale of the Conquest of Mexico" (1873); "Ben Hur: a Tale of the Christ" (1880); "The Boyhood of Christ" (1888); "Life of General Benjamin Harrison" (1888); "The Prince of India; or, Why Constantinople Fell" (1895); "The Wooing of Malkatoon (a poem) and Commodus (a drama)" (1898).

WALTER JERROLD.

The Decay of Essay-writing.

THE spread of education and the necessity which haunts us to impart what we have acquired have led, and will lead still further, to some startling results. We read of the over-burdened British Museum—how even its appetite for printed matter flags, and the monster pleads that it can swallow no more. This public crisis has long been familiar in private houses. One member of the household is almost officially deputed to stand at the hall door with flaming sword and do battle with the invading armies. Tracts, pamphlets, advertisements, gratuitous copies of magazines, and the literary productions of friends come by post, by van, by messenger—come at all hours of the day and fall in the night, so that the morning breakfast-table is fairly snowed up with them.

This age has painted itself more faithfully than any other in a myriad of clever and conscientious though not supremely great works of fiction; it has tried seriously to liven the faded colours of bygone ages; it has delved industriously with spade and axe in the rubbish-heaps and ruins; and, so far, we can only applaud our use of pen and ink. But if you have a monster like the British public to feed, you will try to tickle its stale palate in new ways; fresh and amusing shapes must be given to the old commodities—for we really have nothing so new to say that it will not fit into one of the familiar forms. So we confine ourselves to no one literary medium; we try to be new by being old; we revive mystery-plays and affect an archaic accent; we deck ourselves in the fine raiment of an embroidered style; we cast off all clothing and disport ourselves nakedly. In short, there is no end to our devices, and at this very moment probably some ingenious youth is concocting a fresh one which, be it ever so new, will grow stale in its turn. If there are thus an infinite variety of fashions in the external shapes of our wares, there are a certain number—naturally not so many—of wares that are new in substance and in form which we have either invented or very much developed. Perhaps the most significant of these literary inventions is the invention of the personal essay. It is true that it is at least as old as Montaigne, but we may count him the first of the moderns. It has been used with considerable frequency since his day, but its popularity with us is so immense and so peculiar that we are justified in looking upon it as something of our own—typical, characteristic, a sign of the times which will strike the eye of our great-great-grandchildren. Its significance, indeed, lies not so much in the fact that we have attained any brilliant success in essay-writing—no one has approached the essays of Elia—but in the undoubted facility with which we write essays as though this were beyond all others our natural way of speaking. The peculiar form of an essay implies a peculiar substance; you can say in this shape what you cannot with equal fitness say in any other. A very wide definition obviously must be that which will include all the varieties of thought which are suitably enshrined in essays; but perhaps if you say that an essay is essentially egoistical you will not exclude many essays and you will certainly include a portentous number. Almost all essays begin with a capital I—"I think," "I feel"—and when you have said that, it is clear that you are not writing history or philosophy or biography or anything but an essay, which may be brilliant or profound, which may deal with the immortality of the soul, or the rheumatism in your left shoulder, but is primarily an expression of personal opinion.

We are not—there is, alas! no need to prove it—more subject to ideas than our ancestors; we are not, I hope, in the main more egoistical; but there is one thing in which we are more highly skilled than they are; and that is in manual dexterity with a pen. There can be no doubt that it is to the art of penmanship that we owe our present literature of essays. The very great of old—Homer and Æschylus—could dispense with a pen; they were not inspired by sheets of paper and gallons of ink; no fear that their harmonies, passed from lip to lip, should lose their cadence and die. But our essayists write because the gift of writing has been bestowed on them. Had they lacked writing-masters we should have lacked essayists. There are, of course, certain distinguished people who use this medium from genuine inspiration because it best embodies the soul of their thought. But, on the other hand, there is a very large number who make the fatal pause, and the mechanical act of writing is allowed to set the brain in motion which should only be accessible to a higher inspiration.

The essay, then, owes its popularity to the fact that its proper use is to express one's personal peculiarities, so that under the decent veil of print one can indulge one's egoism to the full. You need know nothing of music, art, or literature to have a certain interest in their productions, and the great burden of modern criticism is simply the expression of such individual likes and dislikes—the amiable garrulity of the tea-table—cast into the form of essays. If men and women must write, let them leave the great mysteries of art and literature unassailed; if they told us frankly not of the books that we can all read and the pictures which hang for us all to see, but of that single book to which they alone have the key and of that solitary picture whose face is shrouded to all but one gaze—if they would write of themselves—such writing would have its own permanent value. The simple words "I was born" have somehow a charm beside which all the splendours of romance and fairy-tale turn to moonshine and tinsel. But though it seems thus easy enough to write of one's self, it is, as we know, a feat but seldom accomplished. Of the multitude of autobiographies that are written, one or two alone are what they pretend to be. Confronted with the terrible spectre of themselves, the bravest are inclined to run away or shade their eyes. And thus, instead of the honest truth which we should all respect, we are given timid side-glances in the shape of essays, which, for the most part, fail in the cardinal virtue of sincerity. And those who do not sacrifice their beliefs to the turn of a phrase or the glitter of paradox think it beneath the dignity of the printed word to say simply what it means; in print they must pretend to an oracular and infallible nature. To say simply "I have a garden, and I will tell you what plants do best in my garden" possibly justifies its egoism; but to say "I have no sons, though I have six daughters, all unmarried, but I will tell you how I should have brought up my sons had I had any" is not interesting, cannot be useful, and is a specimen of the amazing and unclothed egoism for which first the art of penmanship and then the invention of essay-writing are responsible.

VIRGINIA STEPHEN.

The Clouds of Aristophanes

IN a few days the "Clouds" of Aristophanes will be played at Oxford—the first public performance of this play, it is said, before a modern audience.

The announcement sends us to our shelves to look up again our old friend Socrates, suspended in his clothes-basket, "treading the air," as he explains, and feeding his contempt for the gods on a more familiar contemplation of heavenly things. That is probably the picture which is most vividly recalled by any reader of the play, though it is a mere incident and one of no considerable duration. It will probably be the same even when we have seen the play acted, as it is by far the most grotesque touch in the piece. But before we have read more than a few lines, the rest comes back to us. Here is that hoary old sinner Strepsiades, an Athenian country squire, who has somehow been pushed into marrying into the great house of the Alcmaeonidæ, and so has seen his son Pheidippides pampered into a fast young blood who is always getting him into debt. One might feel some sympathy for the old man if it were not that stupidity is the only restraint upon his knavery. He is bent upon finding "a new way to pay old debts," or rather not to pay them at all, and he tries to induce his son to become a pupil in this newfangled school of Sophistry, which stands conveniently next door to his town-house, because he understands that Socrates professes to teach his pupils to make "the worse appear the better reason." Pheidippides is "blowed if he will": he is not going to give up horse-racing to become a "pale student" and the laughing-stock of his horsey "pals." So the old man trots round to the Thinking-School himself, and, after being fooled by the pupil who opens the door with some of the sheer nonsense which Aristophanes evidently enjoyed as much as we may imagine his "gallery" would, he is admitted to the afore-mentioned spectacle of Socrates in the familiar situation of the deus ex machina. Socrates shortly descends and initiates the neophyte in the new religion—natural religion, it may be called, for the deities of this theogony are Air and Ether and Chaos and the Clouds themselves—who accordingly make their appearance.

The entry of the Cloud-chorus is the opportunity for Aristophanes to swing off into the anapaests, trochaics, and choric metres, which he loves, and in which he moves with a marvellous rollicking abandon. It is also his first great opportunity for real poetry. In the "Acharnians" and the "Knights" he had given glimpses of it; and more than glimpses of his appreciation of it, in the ease and vividness of his constant parody of poetic diction. But in the chorus of Clouds we get a real foretaste of the supreme triumph of the "Birds," the poet's fancy and eloquence let loose and playing at ease in the midst of the mockery and roaring farce of the comic spirit. Translation can never give the glancing radiance of Greek lyrics; we have not the pellucid metres, the myriad-rippling laughter of the short syllables: but Mr. Godley's dexterity does all that can be done. The Clouds are invoked by Socrates, and Strepsiades in a fright exclaims:

"Wait a minute, let me wrap up tight before the rain begins.
Only think; I left my cap at home behind me, for my sins!"

Socrates continues his invocation, and the Clouds are heard singing in the distance:

"Clouds arise!
Loud resounding Ocean's daughters,
Blown of winds and born of waters,
Floating ever through the skies,
Rise we higher, till we rest
On the mountain leafy-tressed,
From that beacon-height espying
Holy earth before us lying,
Watered mead and fruitful hill,
Stream divine and murmuring rill,
Seas whose boisterous billows roar
Ever on the sounding shore.
Now that Ether's tireless eye
Flashes forth in brilliancy,
Let our bright eternal form
Doff its veil of rain and storm:
Earth is fair before our eyes—
Clouds arise!"

In the scene which follows, fine descriptive phrases and poetic epithets, which Aristophanes always has at call from his inexhaustible memory of other men's poetry, are jumbled up with the absurdest jests of Strepsiades as he receives his first lesson in natural philosophy. Similarly in the Parabasis the Clouds display a supreme indifference to the atheism of their convener and invoke the orthodox deities, Zeus, Poseidon, Phœbus and Artemis, Athena, Dionysus, along with the new god, "their father, the name of awe, holiest Ether, the life-giver to all": and mingle with this the usual political satire and appeal for the favour of the audience and for the dramatic prize. In the acting edition this latter part, which really comes first and forms the Parabasis proper, is cut; it could scarcely be made intelligible except to scholars, and even for them it is a well-known stone of stumbling. It contains, however, the interesting statement that the author considered the "Clouds" the cleverest of his comedies up to that date—a remark due to the fact that on its first presentation it was not successful; that it does not depend upon the grotesque and low buffoonery of the typical comedy, but on its own original ideas and its style. "Low comedy" is, no doubt, a relative term. There is some in the "Clouds" too low for modern representation;

but, compared with most of Aristophanes' own plays, the "Clouds" is rather quiet. The poet is supposed to have burnt his fingers a little with the flaming scurrility of his attack upon Cleon in the "Knights"; but such differences as these are between the two plays may safely be referred to difference of subject. Ridicule of sophistical subtleties is bound to take a somewhat intellectual tone; and, indeed, a good deal of the jesting in the "Clouds" would have been caviare to almost any popular audience except at Athens—where, in point of fact, it was clearly less relished than the broader humour of the "Acharnians" and the "Knights."

Well, that curious institution, the Parabasis, has done what it must do—withdraw our attention from the course of the play. Not that this matters much in the Old Comedy, in which plot was never of much account. In the "Clouds" the action is resumed in a second lesson given to Strepsiades, this time in pedantic quibbling, with which Socrates tries to inoculate the old man by means of flea-bites—scope, of course, for a good deal of comic business. Strepsiades, however, is a hopeless dunce, and has, after all, to induce Pheidippides to take his place as a pupil. "You'll be sorry for it some day," says the son, who is then left on the stage to listen to the famous dispute between the Just and the Unjust Arguments. What he is to do during this long altercation must tax the ingenuity of the actor or manager: unlike Dionysus in the otherwise very similar scene in the "Frogs," Pheidippides has not a word to say while the two Arguments spout their long lines. As far as the rest of us are concerned, however, the wit and the satire, the human nature, the national feeling, even the moral fervour, and the one touch of poetry, where the healthy young Athenian is pictured enjoying his manly exercises under the olives of the garden of Academus, carrying with him the breath of fresh flowers, of quivering poplars, and of a careless life,

"Happy in the joy of springtime, when the flowers are born again,
And the elm-tree gently whispers secrets to the list'ning plane":—

all this makes the episode of the Just and Unjust Arguments, at any rate to the reader, the cream of the whole play. It is followed by some short and funny fooling between Strepsiades and a couple of creditors, fat Pasion and fop Amynias; and then vengeance swiftly overtakes the old rascal, who comes running in unmercifully beaten by his son. Pheidippides has proved so apt a pupil that he can not only beat his father, but justify the proceeding too. This brings the old man to his senses, and the play is carried to a sudden conclusion by his attacking the Thinking-School with fire and hatchet, climbing on to the roof, hacking it to pieces, and mocking poor Socrates, who is apparently consumed in the conflagration.

We shut up the book, with what result? Probably with the resolve, if we have leisure, to look up another of these plays to-morrow evening. The "Wasps" comes next in the book. We remember there is some good fooling in that, too, a mock trial, and so forth. But both that and the "Peace," which follows, are something of the nature of an anti-climax after the "Clouds"; and the chances are that we travel on to the "Birds" before we give ourselves up again to this master of laughter and language and rhythm. But, stay! If we are going to see the "Clouds" next week, perhaps we shall do wisely not to read the "Birds" beforehand, for the "Clouds," though it was "the cleverest of my comedies" up to its own date, is not as the "Birds" nor even as the "Frogs."

Reviews

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF R. S. HAWKER

By C. E. Byles. (Lane, 21s. net.)

A MAN fascinates and interests his fellow-men not so much by the intellectual achievements of his genius as by the genius which finds its vent in the expression of personality. He attracts by the mystery which covers the springs of his actions or idiosyncrasies. The character that lies plainly mapped out before us never stirs the imagination. Mysterious explanations, perplexed questionings and guessings and probings feed the curiosity of human nature and deepen the fascination of the unknown. It is the undiscovered country that is everything. Pull down the veil and the wonder and glamour go. In love it is the love that recedes and baffles through a lifetime that keeps its charm—the love that retires into the inner temple and dreads the full light of reason and familiarity. It is noticeable that there are some men of genius whose personal attraction is very slight. Bacon was greater than Sidney, but the enthusiasm and imagination that Sidney awakens have never concerned themselves with Bacon. People will devour every atom about R. L. Stevenson, but how many will dig into the personal records of Herbert Spencer? The fact that the latter was a philosopher and appealed less to the romantic-loving public is not the solution. Sir Thomas Browne, from under the dust of centuries, still has an entity that fascinates. In the same way we could take the arm of Montaigne, but would stand apart and admire Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam passing by. So we can perhaps say, without further dissertation, that a man is attractive and glorious to his fellow-men because of some potent fire which informs his personality and actions and is fed from sources we can only wonder at and guess. The Reverend R. S. Hawker has left behind him no literary remains which point to the possession of any extraordinary genius, and yet a baffling and beautiful soul leads us to examine every record and study every poem for a key. There is such a thing as an intelligent and profitable curiosity, and to indulge it in this case is surely permissible. In "The Life and Letters of R. S. Hawker" just published we turn page after page and only manage to catch the flying skirts of the Vicar. He barricades himself behind the fortifications of some mediæval walled town, he buries himself beneath the long Atlantic rollers, he shuts his ears with the shout of their upheaval, he almost closes his eyes to aught but the splendour and wonder of their invasion. A visionary, a poet, a humourist, a priest, Hawker, Mr. Byles well says, might be termed our last Christian in the sense that St. Francis of Assisi, for example, understood Christianity. His love of fighting was perhaps the only quality in which he differed from the gentlest of the saints. There are still some who believe that modern science is a tool the devil has put into the hands of sinners, but Hawker's certainty of that is only equalled by his belief in witchcraft, charms, pixies, mermaids, evil eyes, the immediate answer of prayers, the damnable of dissent, and much else allied to these. But he made his parish of Morwenstow. He rescued and tended the shipwrecked, he consoled the wicked, he spent his income on charity, and his devotion allowed him to fall into lifelong monetary embarrassments. He was a very wild, naughty boy, and, as a youth, full of practical jokes and uncomfortable animal spirits. An incident, out of many similar in his boyhood, displays his "fun." "He tukt the ball o' twine out o' the cordwainer's shop and wounded up the whole town in twine, so as people passin' along was pitched on their noses without zactly knowin' why. Then dressin' up in seaweed and not much else and settin' on a rock down to Bude in the moonlight and combing his hair and zingin' till all the town went out to see un: they thought it was a merrymaid sure enough. An' ther he set an' zinged every night till a varmer tukt a gun an' tried to shut un." By a natural sequence the perpetrator of this prank and many others followed up his eccentric reputation by marrying, while an undergraduate at Oxford, a lady who was forty-one. That was in 1823, when Hawker was a month short of twenty. However, it was a very congenial marriage, and Hawker was broken-hearted when his wife died at Morwenstow in 1863. In 1834 he was ordained to the parish of Morwenstow, a lonely Cornish hamlet thirty miles from anywhere. Indeed, Hawker was only on a railway once or twice in his life, and from that we may draw some conclusions as to the mental condition resulting from his physical isolation. Hawker came among a primitive community at Morwenstow—primitive in two senses, for smugglers and wreckers were not yet extinguished. Stern, bigoted Churchman, superstitious and pious as an early saint, Hawker proves in his descriptions of his village and its inhabitants that he possessed, if ever a man did, the dual personality. Here is one of his sketches, full of sympathy and humour and a wide humanity: "Poor old Tristram Pentire! How he comes up before me as I pronounce his name! That light, active, half-stooping form, bent as though he had a brace of kegs upon his shoulders still, those thin, grey, rusty locks that fell upon a forehead seamed with the wrinkles of threescore years and five; the cunning glance that questioned in his eye, and that nose carried always at half-cock, with a red blaze along its ridge, scorched by the departing footstep of the fierce fiend Alcohol, when he fled before the reinforcements of the coastguard. He was the last of the smugglers. He had taken a bold part in every landing on the coast, man and boy, full forty years; throughout which time all kinds of men had largely trusted him with their brandy and their lives, and true and faithful had he been to them, as sheath to steel." When Hawker took him as "parson's man" he tried to point out occasionally that his former vocation was hardly desirable. The old man used to concede, "Well, sir, I do think, when I come to look back, and to consider what lives we used to live—drink all night and idle abed all day, cussing, swearing, fighting, gambling, lying, and always prepared to shet the gauger—I do really believe, sir, we surely was in sin." That and many other appreciations make us thankful to Hawker for saving us these records of the past.

If Hawker made Morwenstow, Morwenstow both developed and narrowed his character. He imbibed the superstitions, witness the extraordinary cures and charms he so trustfully inscribed in his notebook. He adopted the native practice of making certain curious movements with his fingers if he met any one who possessed an "evil eye." He saw visions, and there is often in his mental state, in his biblical atmosphere, and peculiar hallucinations, much that just falls short of the inspired madness of William Blake. He was a violent controversialist, and always believed Heaven fought on his side, that unseen witnesses and powers declared for him. It is no spirit of to-day in the English or Roman Church that we hear speaking. "Not long ago, on St. Lucy's Day, I desired to understand why Her eyes on a dish in her hand are always shown in the old frescoes. They were never pulled out, nor are the Fathers able to explain the origin of this representation. It was breathed into my mind that in Syracuse, as in Corinth, 'to pluck out the eyes for a friend' signifies to give the best and dearest thing we have. . . . I give you this instance because it could not have come to me from Books." When he speaks of the "young Men in white garments" who came to him we hear Blake, and then he writes: "I remember once I was earnest to be told in what manner and way The Great Change was wrought in chancels when The Mighty One descends. Deep in Thought I saw, not with eyes, but with my whole body, a grave, calm, noble form in white. He said or breathed this phrase, 'Ephphatha is good, but Amen is better still.'" It is necessary to touch on this side of Hawker to appreciate the strange mixture of elements that gave such colour and force to all he did; but the letter from which the foregoing quotation is taken also displays another Hawker who fought with the wild beasts of Morwenstow with delight. "The clergy around me—the wretched heretics, the spawn of that miscreant John Wesley—the rich and potent landlords—all these have assailed me, and I have scourged and beaten them all continually." It is impossible not to notice that the Cornish spirit he so stirringly sang in "Shall Trelawney die?" that song which took in so many good judges, was certainly very strong in its author.

Hawker's judgment in literary matters and in regard to some of his contemporaries is not to be depended on. One judgment on Gladstone is worth noting in regard to that statesman's eloquence: "It appears to my ear always like an incontinent flow of words which slip over the mind like so much verbal slush full of sound and echo but signifying little. I don't know one phrase of his utterance that has ever become a proverb in the English language or a catchword to embody and recall a great thought. . . . The flesh and skin of a speech is there, but there is neither blood nor bones." Hawker has defined certain qualities of Gladstone's mind, and the vital difference between him and his great rival is unconsciously formulated. Hawker once met Tennyson, and he leaves a memorable description:

"I found my guest, at his entrance, a tall, swarthy, Spanish-looking man, with an eye like a sword. I at once found myself with no common mind. All poetry, in particular, he seemed to use like household words; and, as chance led to the mention of Homer's picture of night, he gave at once a rendering simple and fine. 'When the Sky is broken up and the myriad Stars roll down, and the Shepherd's heart is glad . . . Seated on the brow of the cliff, with Dundagel full in sight, he revealed to me the purpose of his journey to the West. He is about to conceive a poem—the hero King Arthur, the scenery in part the vanished Land of Lyonesse, between the mainland and the Scilly Isles. Much converse then and there befel of Arthur and his Queen, his wound at Camlan, and his prophesied return. Legends were exchanged, books noted down and references given, quae hic perscribere longum. We talked about the times—old prophecies and new events. He gave me anecdotes of Guizot and his friends whom he intimately knows, of Hallam and the London scribes. He said he had nowhere a settled home, but wandered all the year. In early life he went through Spain with Torrejos, to incite the Revolution; 'and I remember,' he said, 'one day that Torrejos said to me, with one of the softest, sweetest smiles I ever saw, "As soon as we succeed I mean to cut the throats of all the clergy."' I questioned him about his mode of composition in this so wandering life. He said he usually made about ten lines every day, multitudes of which were never written down, and so were lost for ever. . . . I lent him books and MSS. about King Arthur, which he carried off and which I perhaps shall never see again. . . . He demanded a pipe, and produced a package of very common shag. By great good luck my sexton had about him his own short black dudheen, which accordingly the minstrel filled and fired. . . . The Bard is a handsome well-formed man and tall, more like a Spaniard than an Englishman—black, long elflocks all round his face, mid which his eyes not only shine, but glare. His garments loose and full, such as Bard beseems, and over all a large dark Spanish cloak. He speaks the languages, both old and new, and has manifestly a most bibliothec memory. His voice is very deep, tuneful and slow—an organ, not a breath. His temper, which I tried, seemed very calm—his spirits very low."

Of Hawker's own poems, his fragment of the "San Graal" is worthy to be compared with Tennyson's treatment of the subject, and his ballads earned the praise of Sir Walter Scott. The "vanished vase of Heaven" was a dear theme with Hawker. His mediæval mind, his unfaltering faith, give truth and reality to a tale which would appeal to Tennyson as a beautiful fairy-tale. In all Hawker's verse we feel the rough, strenuous Cornish life, the unending rhythm of the waves on a stormy coast, the pains and perils of those who live by the sea. In his blue jersey, his long waders, he was a real fisher of men, a shepherd to his flock, a friend, a comforter, a guide.

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF GENERAL SIR JAMES BROWNE ("BUSTER BROWNE")

By General J. J. Macleod Innes, R.E., V.C. (Murray, 18s. net.)

AN experienced littérateur like General Macleod Innes, whose two good books on the Mutiny and monograph on Sir Henry Lawrence in the "Rulers of India" series were very creditable performances, should not have neglected to scrutinise the proof of his title-page. The failure to observe the grades in the rank of general officer is a very trivial matter, but it is surely a positive inaccuracy to describe the subject of this biography as a K.C.B., his proper designation being, as on the tablet in Rochester Cathedral, Major-General Sir James Browne, R.E., K.C.S.I., C.B. Another slip, for which one fears that General Macleod Innes must be held entirely responsible, is the confused coupling of Sir James Browne's name with the Chitral Expedition. Any one would infer from the reference on page 281 that much of the actual preparation for that campaign devolved upon Browne as Quartermaster-General, the fact being, as General Innes himself recalls elsewhere, that the expedition was not despatched until Browne had been three years dissociated from military duty. Apart from this rather muddled allusion General Innes has produced a very worthy record of his distinguished brother-officer—one which incidentally affords scope for his own wide knowledge of Indian affairs, of engineering science, and of the military history of India. With an eye for effect he is not lacking, any more than the cheery "Buster" was, in the saving gift of humour. He is certainly to be thanked for reproducing, as an authentic case of Indian false witness, the story of the suit "in which one party produced deeds—pure forgeries—to authenticate his claim, and lo! the other party (having got scent of it) produced at once in response complete receipts—equally pure forgeries—for the sum involved."

"Buster Browne's" title to a detailed biographical memoir rests largely on his many-sidedness. He was a worker who left a real mark upon the records of the army, the political administration, and the material development of India. There will probably always be some who think that he was at his very best as an engineer. As Q.M.G. he was useful, but certainly not so brilliant as Roberts or Macgregor. As Governor-General's Agent in Baluchistan he consolidated and extended the work of his great predecessor, but he could hardly be termed the equal of that Frontier kinglet, Sandeman. As an engineer, on the other hand, he was one of the most extraordinarily strenuous and stimulating chiefs who have ever carried a gigantic enterprise, such as the Hurnai Railway undoubtedly was, to a triumphant conclusion in the teeth of physical and administrative obstacles.

As a soldier or soldier-political Browne took part in the Mahsud Waziri Expedition of 1860, the Umbeyla Campaign of 1863-64, the Afghan War, and the Egyptian Expedition of 1882. One of his most famous achievements was his astonishing "capture" of Khelat-i-Ghilzai at the head of an escort of eighteen sowars—a success partly due to the frontier illusion that he was identical with a certain notorious Englishman who had become a Mullah. The strange story of Browne's "double" and some interesting details of his various campaigns will be found pleasantly included in General Innes' book. The memoir, which is suitably illustrated, terminates with an impressive filial tribute to Sir James' deep religious convictions and parental kindness. It is interesting to learn, by the way, that the title "Buster" was inherited from an elder brother, afterwards killed in the Mutiny, who had been called "Buster" at Addiscombe, where he was noted for his strength and prowess at football. James, following him, displayed the same qualities, and was given the same nickname with the prefix "Young." To most he remained "Buster Browne" to the day he died in harness at Quetta in 1896, and the friendly appellation, quaintly significant of his buoyant, vigorous nature, will always cling to him wherever the man and his work are held in posthumous recollection.

There were times when the Royal Engineer officer was imperfectly understood, and it was a common belief that his talents were chiefly devoted to "a-digging up of holes, and a-sticking in of poles, and a-building of barracks for the soldiery." Sir James Browne was one of many—Chesney, Gerald Graham, Bindon Blood, Nicholson, and Kitchener have been others—whose careers have served to destroy this foolish misconception.

THE FRIENDSHIP OF ART

By Bliss Carman. (Murray, 5s.)

"It is only the man behind the book that makes the book worth reading. The book is the living image of the man. That is why real books have a power over us. It is the individuality that counts." And "the man behind the book," Mr. Carman warns us, in the essay so entitled, "is not easy to discover," even with the aid of a photograph, an autograph, a confession that he dislikes high collars and stuffiness, and enjoys plain living, high thinking and the poems of Richard Hovey in a house named "Moonshine" among purple hills, where seventy couples performed, on a memorable occasion, "the ceremonious Rite of the Cake."

We should not have wanted to discover "the man behind the book" any more than the man in the moon had not Mr. Carman expressly warned the critic that this was the first of his duties: this, and "to understand him with sympathy, intelligence and respect." It would have facilitated the critic's task if Mr. Carman had prefixed to his volume not only a photograph, an autograph and a rhapsody on his villeggiatura, but a brief autobiography on the lines of that which every graduate of a German university has to append to his doctor's thesis: "Natus sum A.B. in oppido Z. die . . . anno h.h. . . . Pio et grato veneror animo patrem C., matrem D. e gente E. Fidei addictus sum evangelicæ. Litterarum elementis imbutus sum Berolini, ubi frequentavi gymnasium quod appellatur 'Königliches Wilhelms-Gymnasium,'" and so forth. But this would have made it too easy for the critic "to discover the man behind the book." As it is, he contents himself with recording the discovery that humour is no marked characteristic of the author, and that the celebrated Cake-walk is the sole lapse from high seriousness admitted by Mr. Carman till he accuses himself in the concluding chapter of "a touch of the madness of the March hare." "Curiosity is the fundamental passion of the mind, and to satisfy curiosity with knowledge is one of the three great sources of happiness. At the same time it is forbidden to know everything. At least, this is so for the time being, whatever may be permitted to human investigation in some future age." It is forbidden; we submit, and if we are cut off from one of the three great sources of happiness, we will endeavour to make the best of the other two (whatever they may be) and envy posterity its fuller light.

Though baffled thus, and confessed incompetent when judged by the high standard set for critics, we have read the book and found much of it agreeable. There are thirty-seven short essays in it, on many topics, each embodying some morsel of a not very profound philosophy. Mr. Carman likes things in threes: there are three sources of knowledge, as we have seen, and there are body, mind and spirit, and the three vital forces of these, which have to be correlated. His ideal in every department of life—in education, in conduct, in art, in criticism—is "poise," the balance of three forces, the nice adjustment of the claims of muscle, intellect and soul. Mens sana in corpore sano partly expresses his ideal, but the statement savours too much of dualism to be adequate. He is an advocate of physical culture and the study of health as a condition of happiness and progress. The Art which gives its title to the book is art in no narrow sense, but it includes literature and conduct, the whole art of living. The morality of the essays is unexceptionable; their religion, as shown in "A Christmas Reverie," is tinged with agnosticism. The style, apart from some Americanisms, is refined, but somewhat monotonous and languid. We are reminded less of the vagaries of the hare than of the uninspired perseverance of the tortoise. Mr. Carman has hardly written one of the real books which have a power over us.

THE JEWISH ENCYCLOPÆDIA

Volume VIII. Leon—Moravia. (Funk and Wagnalls Company.)

The general scope of this volume is approximately indicated by its sub-title, "A Descriptive Record of the History, Religion, Literature and Customs of the Jewish People from the earliest times to the present day." It is however, not merely a Jewish Encyclopædia, but is also to a great extent a Dictionary of Jewish National Biography, dealing, at varying lengths, with all Jews who have ever exhibited the slightest pretensions to eminence. Gentiles, moreover, such as Lessing, Mirabeau, or M. Anatole Leroy-Beaulieu, who have come into contact with Jewish problems either in politics or in literature, find also a place in the volume, though in the case of lesser-known names a slight confusion is sometimes occasioned by the omission to state at the beginning of each article whether its subject is a Jew or a Gentile. Owing to the wide ground covered, the list of contributors is necessarily cosmopolitan, including men of American, English, German, Hungarian, French and Italian nationality. This cosmopolitanism, however, in itself a good thing, has its attendant evil when, as occasionally happens, an article written originally in some foreign tongue is defectively translated, and the reader is confronted with phrases so obviously foreign as "material condition" and "not original with him."

Of the longer articles by far the most interesting is that on London, by Mr. Joseph Jacobs, who traces the history of the Jewish community from the massacre of 1189 and the expulsion of 1290 down to the "restoration" of the small trading community of the Sephardim in the seventeenth century and the subsequent immigration into England of the Askenazim, or Spanish and Portuguese Jews, who eventually wrested from their brethren the hegemony of the community. In view of the present prominence of the alien question, it is interesting to see from Mr. Jacobs' statistics that in 1883 the Anglicised outnumbered the foreign element by 26,000 to 21,000, while in 1902 the tables were completely turned and the "native element" was outnumbered by the East-End element by 150,000 to 100,000.

With regard to the more important of the other articles, which include such subjects as the Mishnah, the Midrash, Marriage, the Liturgy, Professor Margoliouth has broken almost entirely fresh ground in his admirable essay on Manuscripts, which is accompanied by some excellent facsimile reproductions. The article on Literature is also interesting, but we would wish that the writer had not confined his attention to works written in the Hebrew and Yiddish languages, and had seen his way to treating collectively of works written by Jews in Gentile tongues; it would surely have proved instructive to have marked those characteristics which are common to Jewish authors writing in the most varied languages, and to have tested the truth of Mr. Bryce's theory that the Jewish literary genius manifests itself to best advantage in the departments of sarcasm and epigram.

In the department of biography the editors have perhaps laid themselves open to the charge of too wide a catholicity. We think, however, that their general principle is sound, and that the inclusion in the volume of men like Samuel Lewis, the money-lender, and Daniel Mendoza, the pugilist, who both held the highest position in their respective professions, is perfectly justifiable. On the other hand, many minor celebrities of quite subsidiary importance are considered worthy of articles, with the result that the space allotted to men of the first rank suffers by way of compensation. The treatment of Karl Marx, for instance, is most inadequate. A bare outline of his life is given, but there is no attempt to estimate either the influence or the validity of his doctrines.

The volume possesses upwards of three hundred illustrations, and, in spite of some minor defects, should prove a valuable work of reference to all interested in Jewish history.

THE BIRTH OF PARISVAL

By R. C. Trevelyan. (London: Longmans, 3s. 6d. net.) THIS may be described as a lyrical-dramatic fragment or interlude (since the subject is not complete), the theme of which is drawn from those Graal romances which furnished Wagner's great music-drama. It has the disadvantage that the theme is too unreal, too remote from all associations, historic or mythological, too unlocalised by any conceivable period, for ready appeal to the emotions. The whole burthen of emotion and interest falls upon the force of the poetry itself; and the more power, therefore, is exacted from the poet if he be to move us. Of course, a theme thus remote and abstracted would have its advantage, if the poet worked on the lines of Maeterlinck's shadowy mysteries. But Mr. Trevelyan attempts no such effect. He aims, apparently, at a somewhat Greek dignity of dramatic passion. There are suggestions of "Samson Agonistes," with a more modern intimacy of emotion. The writer's task is to make us feel the dread and impressiveness of a curse denounced by a power so ill-defined, so unfamiliar to our imagination, as the Graal and its vague priesthood or priestly knighthood; and to move us by the sorrows and interior struggles of the dim figures affected by that curse.

Under the immense and direct power of Wagner's music a similar feat was possible. To achieve it by poetry alone would require the gift of genius. Here Mr. Trevelyan falls short. He has ambition, he has artistic sense and certain original artistic aims in regard to technique. He essays certain novel and rather daring effects of unrhymed lyric metre, which to our thinking do not quite come off. In the one irregular rhymed lyric he attempts this is particularly plain; the result is broken and uncouth where it is meant to haunt and charm. Yet the idea is evident, and deserves praise at least as an endeavour to break fresh ground. Similarly, Mr. Trevelyan has poetic feeling and a measure of accomplishment. But his resources are not equal to the ambitious demands of poetic passion and imagination which he makes upon them. A certain way he goes; but his conception places on him too great a strain; and the final result is inadequate. He is lucid and he is dignified; but his faculty of imaginative execution does not correspond with his faculty of imaginative design. With less ambition he might conceivably do somewhat. As it is, we cannot judge him successful.

DREAM OF PROVENCE: ORGEAS AND MIRADON TO NANCY

By Frederick Wedmore. (Isbister, 1s. net each.) MR. WEDMORE has done well to reprint these two pieces, and to reprint them in this form. The slim little books, with their plain covers of delicate green and their beautiful rich paper, with deckled edges, promise good things, bonnes bouches, and the promise is not broken. Mr. Wedmore is not a robust writer, but he has at least the strength to disregard the critical clamour of the multitude, and to treat the possible accusation of "preciosity" with serene neglect. Words to him are beautiful things, which in combination can produce new beauties not inherent in themselves, beauties that cannot be measured nor analysed, can hardly be accounted for, because they have a strange and sudden separate existence of their own, independent of the words of which they are composed. As well try to explain the principle of life by the chemical elements of an organism, as a piece of beautiful art by the matter of which it is composed. Modern criticism is too apt to blame in our writers of prose what it demands of our painters. When it catches an author deliberately and unashamedly making the most beautiful thing he can out of his materials it likes to cry "I see you!" It cried so at Pater; it has cried so, if we are not mistaken, at Mr. Wedmore, who, were he so unwise as to reply at all, would probably answer, "Come, then, and, if you can, find out how I do it!"

Mr. Wedmore's glass is small, but he drinks in it. And these two little books, detached though they are from the literary development of the times, exotics both of southern origin, eminently un-English in their lucidity, their scrupulous nicety, their conscious and deliberate beauty, tempt us to dwell on them at length, because they are exquisite specimens of genuine belles lettres, of literature as an art. "Each year gained upon the last in bewitching merriment and the charm of an occasional and fitting gravity." The charm of an occasional and fitting gravity. "Her gay heart, that under her glistening eyes danced in its joy of living." "Or had some slim figure of Silenus put finger on lip in that enclosed place, wherein for long, amidst the wayward greenery, no step of man had stirred?" "Its shifting pattern of cool gold." We could multiply examples, for nearly every sentence not so much contains, as is, an instance of the same exquisite (we use the word in its original sense) expression. Each is beautiful and delightful in itself—vastly more beautiful and delightful in its application to a larger theme. The "Dream of Provence," from which we have chosen these quotations, tells of a girl who died and a father who believed that she would return on the ninth day after death. All the South is in it, and all the simple poetry of faith and devotion in the soul of the man whom we leave, in the reverent reticence of the close, waiting, at sunset on that ninth day—waiting. "To Nancy" is a letter from an old and famous painter to a young girl on the music-hall stage. It is modern enough: we know well the order of mind which will call it—and probably has called it, on its earlier appearance in "The Savoy"—decadent. That order of mind can only be pitied. "To Nancy" is a perfectly sweet and healthy thing; and the contrast between the man for whom life has no more success to offer and the brilliant budding girl of sixteen, whose unspoiled charm and freshness lie sweet on these pages, is used by Mr. Wedmore with consummate skill.

It is only human to rejoice a little at catching Mr. Wedmore tripping. We have detected two "blank verses," one in each little book. And at times, it must be admitted, he lays out his sentences with a thought too much decorous solemnity, losing his own note in an effort to catch that of a fuller voice.

THE YELLOW WAR

By "O." (Blackwood, 6s.)

From the reader's standpoint a single letter of the alphabet is an unsatisfactory pseudonym; almost indecent in its brevity, it stands, in the case of the author of "The Yellow War," defying with an air of surprise any attempt at inquisitiveness. Nor is there much internal evidence to afford any clue to the identity of "O," except that he was a person who had unusual facilities for getting about in the neighbourhood of the operations in the Far East. At Chinampo in April, at Tokio in July, at Yinkow in September, and so on—it is permissible to guess at the secret but not to reveal it. Most of the sketches which are contained in this book have already appeared in "Blackwood's Magazine," but they gain by being republished, for, although there is no connecting link to join them together, they form a series of word pictures of the war. It is not a gruesome book full of realistic details of wounds and other untidy things which are best kept behind the scenes, nor is it a profound study in psychology like the "Red Badge of Courage," but it is a book which gives an excellent idea of the actors in the war. One of the longest tales in the book, for instance, entitled "The path in the East is strange," gives in a new way some idea of the Japanese character. It tells of a Japanese man who is discovered in various circumstances, at a diplomatic soirée, as a Cambridge undergraduate, as a barber at Tientsin, and finally at the war. It is an allegory to show the persistence of the national character and the willingness of the individual to serve the State. Incidentally in the story there is a little bit of pedantry about University candidates for the army and education in general (nothing, thank Heaven, about compulsory Greek!), which recalls a trick displayed in "On the heels of De Wet," by "The Intelligence Officer."

SCANDINAVIA: A POLITICAL HISTORY OF DENMARK, NORWAY AND SWEDEN

By R. Nisbet Bain. (Cambridge Historical Series, 7s. 6d.)

SWEDEN: ITS PEOPLE AND ITS INDUSTRY

Edited by Gustav Sundbärg. (Stockholm.)

To begin in the natural order, that is to say with the future, Sweden, or, one may say, the Scandinavian Peninsula, is probably, along with Switzerland, destined to become one of the great industrial countries of Europe. For as the importance of coal in manufacture must, as time goes on, inevitably decrease along with the output of coal, and the importance of water as a generator of electricity increase, these three countries—Norway, Sweden, and Denmark—will one day find themselves very much in the advantageous position which Britain, Belgium, and North-West Germany, with their great supplies of fuel, hold at this moment. The too lucky United States may be beyond these fluctuations. For we know how the nil-admirans Yankee said, when challenged to appreciate Vesuvius in eruption ("At all events, you've not got a burning mountain in the States"), "No, but we've got a waterfall that could put it out in ten minutes." And Sweden is in a specially advantageous position on account of her great resources in iron, for the "whole complex," as Mr. Gustav Sundbärg puts it—that is the total iron ore deposit of Sweden—"can be regarded as the thickest and richest among the iron ores of the world." If only in the "present dispensation" the Swedes are restrained from cutting down their forests in order to smelt this same iron ore; for without doubt their use of charcoal instead of coal in that process gives a superior quality even to the pig iron of Sweden, which is already almost half steel.

Thus the future may see how history goes on its cyclic way. There is something specially recurrent in the history of the Scandinavian folk, which we may follow in perhaps as clear an outline as possible through the pages of Mr. Bain's book. That Scandinavian history should ever be presented as a single picture is not to be hoped: the mutual jealousies of the three Scandinavian folk—Norsemens, Swedes, and Danes—having always kept them far from union. Now one of the three peoples, now another—it is, of course, generally the Danes—gains the hegemony in Scandinavia. But its leadership rarely endures beyond one reign. Denmark was pre-eminent under Canute, pre-eminent again four and a half centuries later, under Christian III. In the interval it is rather the Norse kings that attract our attention. But after the time of Christian II. of Denmark begins the rise of Sweden under Gustavus Vasa, he whom Voltaire so mistakenly speaks of as having been drawn from among the peasants of Dalecarlia to become the ruler of Sweden. As a fact, Vasa belonged to the most distinguished of the Swedish nobility: he was a near relation to Sten Sture, the patriot, who for many years threw off Christian's yoke, and to Sten's wife, the not less heroic Christina Gyllenstjerne. There have been many "stars" in the firmament of Swedish history—Oxenstjerna, Avelstjerna, Rosenstjerna; but this Christina is the brightest of them all. Gustavus Vasa's fame has been obscured by that of his more renowned grandson, the hero of the Thirty Years' War. But it is interesting to remember that before the outbreak of that war, before what is known as the Catholic Reaction, the second act of the Reformation drama, the allied Protestant Princes of Europe had begun to look to Scandinavia for support. Christian II., indeed, though he was probably indifferent to Catholicism himself, and did, in fact, translate Luther's Bible into Danish, always as a politician plumped for the Catholic interest, which might among high potentates of those days count for what the "gentlemanly interest" was with Mr. Pecksniff; he allied himself with the German Emperor and the Pope. But Christian III. took the part of the Protestant Princes of Germany. Reformation, like spring, came slowly in these climes; but in this Danish King and in the Vasa family of Sweden it found its doughtiest champions. Then after the days of Gustavus Adolphus the interest which Scandinavia has in the eyes of Europe generally flickers out and dies. The meteorlike passage of Charles XII. is the last glow of a dying fire. All this is well told by Mr. Nisbet Bain, as clearly and consecutively as is consistent with two difficulties: first, that, as we have said, the history is in itself constantly broken up; the nations behave themselves like protozoa seen through a microscope; they unite, separate, break out into two, into three, re-unite to two, to one, then separate again unceasingly. And the second difficulty is that the nature of books such as the Cambridge Modern Histories, which are half school books, half for the general reader, precludes the sort of selection and concentration which a writer would make use of if he were engaged with a more individual and personal kind of work. Sometimes Mr. Bain "slings the bât" a little out of order, as where in one passage he seems to use "humanist" as if it were synonymous with humane man; elsewhere he talks of a man "retroceding" a province (by a confusion between cêdo and cêdo). When he employs protagonist as if it meant exactly the same as promachos he is only repeating an almost universal modern habit, which is not, however, countenanced by classical usage. These small defects do not take from the value of this Scandinavian history, the most comprehensive that has yet been written.

The statistical account of Sweden, which is edited by Mr. Gustav Sundbârg, is a voluminous work of over 1,100 pages, dealing with quidquid agunt homines and all that nature produces in the land in question. It has been rather late in appearing in its English dress; the French edition was published at the time of the Exhibition of 1900. Unless we forget, a very interesting work of the same sort on Norway or on Norway and Sweden, not so extensive in plan but beautifully got up, was issued by the Norse or Norse and Swedish Commissioners at the French Exhibition of 1889. That, it is to be presumed, suggested the present more official and much fuller account of Sweden. The business merely of translating the book into English must have been laborious enough. Naturally the translation leaves somewhat to be desired here and there. On the first page of his preface Mr. Sundbârg tells how the editorship came to be left "into my hands." Mr. Sundbârg has, of course, many collaborators. Beginning with the physical geography of Sweden, we pass through a rapid sketch of its history and its constitution and administration, then to its intellectual and moral culture (education, science, art, literature, and so forth), on to, in the second part, the occupations and industries of the land. If one may make a criticism it is that where so much compression was necessary the historical part in certain sections might best have been omitted. As only eleven pages were to be devoted to Swedish literature, we would rather have heard more of the living producers—Rydberg, Strindberg, Selma Lagerlöf, for instance—and have let the dead past bury its dead.

ALBERT DURER

By T. Sturge Moore. (Duckworth, 7s. 6d. net.)

THE announcement of a study by an artist of an artist, of a mystic by a poet, leads one to expect much, and those who read Mr. T. Sturge Moore's "Albert Durer," knowing, before they open its pages, that here they need not look for an orderly biography, but rather an original study, will not be disappointed. We learn from the preface that the work is an attempt at "an appreciation of this great artist in relation to general ideas," and the result is a very stimulating essay, with sufficient fact, date, and specific criticism attached, as is helpful to that study, but no more. The book is admirably illustrated, the half-tone reproductions especially being excellently printed. The fine portrait of Michael Wolgemut (pp. 224-5), for instance, gives an approximate idea of the life and vigour of the original—praise which cannot often be bestowed on process reproductions of oil-paintings. The four metal engravings are less successful, and this, we imagine, is not so much due to the process or to the printer as to the error of selecting for plate reproduction designs which do not benefit by that method. The "Melancholia," for example, would have had its essential qualities far more clearly shown in a copper plate than "Pilate Washing his Hands," "Saint Antony," or "Peter and John at the Beautiful Gate": as a process-block it is grey, uninspiring and ineffective. But the presence of the four plates in the volume is we learn, due to the kindness of the Durer Society, and it is sorry work to complain of added gifts. As an illustrated record of Durer's work, the book is a welcome supplement to the little volume by Lina Eckenstein, issued by the same publishers a year or two ago, though it will not replace that as an admirable and business-like summary of the artist's life and work. It must be admitted, first and foremost, that the volume is concerned with Mr. T. Sturge Moore's outlook on life and the arts; the author has not lost himself in his subject—it is possible he cannot, or does not wish to do so—and, consequently, the reader is constantly being led off into digressions, interesting enough in themselves, bearing on them the "stamp exclusive and professional" of the writer of "The Rout of the Amazons," "Pan's Prophecy" and "The Gazelles," wholly delightful, in fact, to admirers of Mr. T. Sturge Moore, among whom the present writer classes himself, but irritating to the last degree in the study of another craftsman's work, in a book to which one turns for interpretative criticism and for a clear, plain, lucid essay, the capacity for the writing of which seems to be the birthright of the French race solely. More than any book we have read of recent years, the present volume reminds us of Ruskin's "Fors Clavigera," in its "leaping from rock up to rock," with now and again the "cool silver shock of the plunge in a pool's living water," the flash of a disappearing garment the only guide for struggling followers. Readers of "The Centaur's Booty" will not have any difficulty in recognising the author of the following characteristic passage. We doubt whether any uninitiated admirer of Durer has ever connected the boyhood and the manhood in quite the same way. We quote it at length, as it shows better than any words of ours, better than almost any other passage in the volume, the kind of fresh light the Durer student will obtain in this book, and the prism through which, in Mr. T. Sturge Moore's hands, it is alone, apparently, permitted to come to him:

"We shall, I think, often do well, when considering the superb ostentation of Durer's workmanship, with its superabundance of curve and flourish, its delight in its ease and grace, to think of those young men among his ancestors who made their living from horses on the wind-swept plains of Hungary. The perfect control which it is the delight of lads brought up and developing under such conditions to obtain over the galloping steed is similar to the control which it gratified Durer to perfect over the dashing stroke of pen or brush, which, however swift and impulsive, is yet brought round and performs to a nicety a predetermined evolution. . . . And first, this life, with its free sweeping horizon, and the swallow-like curves of its gallops for the sake of galloping, or those which the long lashes of its whips trace in deploying, and which remind us of the lithe tendrils in which terminate Durer's ornamental flourishes; this life in which the eye is trained to watch the lasso, as with well-calculated address it swirls out and drops over the frightened head of an unbroken colt—this life is first pent up in a little goldsmith's shop, in a country even to-day famous for the beauty and originality of its peasant jewellery: and here it is trained to follow and answer the desire of the bright dark eyes of girls in love; in love, where love and the beauty that inspires it are the gifts of nature most guarded and most honoured, from which are expected the utmost that is conceived of delicacy in delight by a virile and healthy race."

In a second edition, which, we trust, will not be long in forthcoming, the conscientious reader would be saved a jar here and there if the author revised his numerous quotations from the Bible, and saw that they more nearly accorded with the text than, for example, do the well-known phrases on page 74; this at the risk of being accused as a payer of the tithe of mint and anise and cummin. The legend under the picture facing page 230 might be corrected, and readers have just cause of complaint in not being furnished with references to the abridged extracts Mr. T. Sturge Moore makes from Sir W. M. Conway's excellent but far too little-known "Literary Remains of Albrecht Dürer."

PORT ARTHUR: THREE MONTHS WITH THE BESIEGERS

By Frederic Villiers. (Longmans, 7s. 6d. net.)

A MODERN CAMPAIGN, OR WAR AND WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY IN THE FAR EAST

By D. Fraser, Special Correspondent to "The Times." (Methuen, 6s. net.)

It seems as though the remark attributed to Sir William Howard Russell, to the effect that he was present at the birth of newspaper war correspondence and had been permitted to live long enough to stand by its deathbed, will ultimately achieve more or less general acceptance. In both these volumes the identical and obviously inevitable fault, which arises from a cramped field of vision, is very strongly marked. Mr. Villiers' impressions of what he was permitted to see of the operations of the Third Japanese Army before Port Arthur under General Nogi form a series of word-pictures which, although at times they are somewhat disjointed, make interesting reading, and this, too, despite the irritating and frequently recurring fact that unimportant and somewhat egotistical information about the writer and his field companions is unnecessarily obtruded upon the attention of the reader.

The story of the efforts of "The Times" to serve its readers with information from the widespread seat of war by means of wireless telegraphy as an adjunct or ancillary to the cable services has already been well told by Captain Lionel James, who had charge of the arrangements. Captain James, "the Man Behind" of Mr. Fraser's book, had the author for his colleague, and Mr. Fraser it was who, under very trying and difficult circumstances, succeeded in equipping the land station of "The Times" wireless system on the Shantung Promontory. Thence he proceeded with the Japanese Field Armies, and for some months witnessed a good deal of the severe fighting carried on by the gallant Kuroki and his valorous troops.

Mr. Villiers has called his book a "Diurnal of Occurrents," an unlovely description against which it is somewhat surprising that his artistic taste did not rebel. Some of his entries are redolent of the charm and freshness of the ready writer who with a facile pen records thoughts or impressions as they are made or occur. Others are spoiled from having been laboriously touched-up and elaborated, and as presented smell strongly of the "midnight oil." The author did not by any means for the first time set foot in Manchuria in August last. Ten years earlier he had been present when Port Arthur was wrested from the Chinese. Much had happened in those ten years. Mr. Villiers thus describes the impression he formed of Port Arthur when it burst upon his view from Ho-o-shan, the highest peak of the range of surrounding hills:

" . . . Spread out in my immediate front lies the whole panorama of Port Arthur and its outlying defences, a ten-mile stretch from sea to sea. The scene at first is one of almost bewildering beauty, seemingly the fairest and gentlest of landscapes, composed of verdant hills and golden valleys, rich with ripening corn and millet. Hamlets nestle in the folds of the yellow fields, stately willows dapple the silver streams with the cobalt blue of the ocean. But for the dull grey battleships of Togo's blockading squadron, lying in grim rigid lines on the horizon, the scene suggests peace and plenty rather than the pinch of hunger and cruel war."

That picture must be contrasted with those of the night-fighting rounding Port Arthur, the colour of which was, Mr. Villiers asserts, "what Whistler would have revelled in." For the "old campaigning days," when "both armies usually ceased hostilities at some period between sundown and sunrise," the author has some regret. Mr. Villiers did not wait to witness the entry of the Japanese soldiers into the fallen fortress. He appears to have got on well with everybody, and has placed it upon record that he never left any army in the field with greater regret, nor had he ever been treated with more consideration and kindness than by the Third Imperial Army of Japan.

Mr. Villiers and Mr. Fraser are at one in testifying to the skill and bravery of the Japanese troops. Mr. Fraser's account of the battle of the Yalu is as admirable as any that has been written, and certainly the best thing in the volume. The word-picture of the Japanese advance to the attack following the artillery "preparation" is extremely interesting and vivid. The battle of the Yalu will long be remembered in the history of warfare as the first scientific general engagement ever fought between Oriental and Occidental, the result of which is all the more remarkable inasmuch as the Oriental had but just emerged from mediævalism. Incidentally one learns from Mr. Fraser's pages something of the enormous cost of campaign correspondence to newspapers.

Fiction

A STORY OF THE STAGE

By C. Ranger Gull. (F. V. White, 6s.) It is the end of the summer term and near midnight at Oxford. Trinity lies under moonlight, and in Basil Marriott's rooms incipient Bar and incipient Church, in the persons of Johnny Thompson and Pat Dundas, are at sorrowful grips with incipient Stage, as represented by their host and dearest crony. To Dundas, the budding barrister, keen and scornful, the idea that a man of refinement with a decent degree and a small independence should propose to go "blue-chinning about the country with all sorts of riff-raff" is obviously preposterous; while to "the Johnner," grave, sincere, and fluid, who looks upon "the body as the Temple of the Holy Spirit," it seems "at least rash and ill-advised to paint and bedizen it and make it a show for money." But with Marriott, forced to explain himself, Art is spelt with a very large A, and acting is the branch of Art that calls him. He has shone, too, in the O.U.D.S. Mr. Herbert Storm, highest and most finished of actors, has seen and approved his "Orlando," and has offered (not only himself, but possibly his sister, who shares his views) a small part in one of his touring companies. And really his friends are absurdly prejudiced, and fail to fathom his enthusiasms. And so good-bye to Oxford. There you have the prelude to a tale the actual trend of which is, after all, comparatively insignificant. There still lingers about it some trace of those literal greatnesses which Mr. Gull thrust upon readers of "The Serf." The "great, grey fan of latest night" is made to close. Shops in the morning open "like great gleaming flowers." Fountains (from a different category of similes) fall "like juice of diamonds" in Trafalgar Square, and eclecticism quite deserts him when he presents his heroine with that "flower-like face" which has become the property of so many others. These are quite unnecessary defects of certain vigorous and unusual capacities for observation and presentment. From Morley's to the clever little luncheon-party at the Storms' in Half Moon Street, hence by way of commissionaires into les coulisses of London mimeland, and so with "The Sportsman" B Company into the provinces, you may follow Basil step by step under the guidance of one who has read and thought and seen something for himself. There are shrewd and sharply-cut sketches of incident and character in plenty by the way. With regard to the stage itself, which is seen from many points of view, we think that he justifies his motto from Montaigne that "I speak truth, not my belly-full, but as much as I dare." He certainly dares too much, however, in continuing his old and justly decried practice of paraphrasing, if not caricaturing, well-known personalities. Mr. and Mrs. Herbert and Miss Vivien Storm, together with Mr. Augustus Storm, delicately persuasive of public opinion over the signature of "Gus," are not very hard to place. Mr. Ranger Gull has certainly enough talent to refrain from such adventitious aids. He has the knack of hitting many nails upon the head. As to the length of the nails and as to how hard he hits them, there are, no doubt, differences of opinion.

JEANNIE JEMIMA JONES

The Adventures of a Runaway Girl on a Desert Island. By the "Blunderland" Cartoonist. (Simpkin, Marshall, 3s. 6d.) The incidents that precede the running-away of Jeannie Jemima Jones justify the "hated grown-ups'" opinion that she was a very naughty girl, one who could have no reasonable expectation of being loved. Once started upon her adventures—which are undertaken in boy's clothes—she becomes an amusing little person with a happy gift for "inventing a dodge" to get herself out of every kind of scrape and danger. Few boys cast upon a desert island have met with such amazing experiences as Jeannie Jemima encountered, and none of them have shown more ingenuity and resource in such a variety of original situations and incidents. There is "no false note of conventionality" either in the life on the island or in the telling of the story, Jeannie Jemima's locutions, speaking generally, being much more expressive than correct. That, however, is a circumstance that will not count against the young lady's narrative in the estimation of the schoolroom; but whether it will be equally agreeable to parents and governesses is another matter. Many of Jeannie Jemima's dodges are likely to excite the sincerest form of admiration, in which case the family comfort will suffer. It is also necessary to observe that her views of domestic government have an anarchist tendency. "Oh! my goodness! how grown-ups do get on your nerves!" "If you don't watch them they will get you into trouble as sure as a gun." "No; I couldn't stand living at home any more," and other observations to this effect may suggest to the home authorities the desirability of adopting the methods of the Russian press censor before admitting Jeannie Jemima Jones into the schoolroom. There may be some difference of opinion, too, as to the merit of the illustrations, of which there are a hundred, in the earlier styles of the slate-and-pencil period. Though they have no pretensions to grace, drawings of this genre are often very funny either by accident or design. And so some of these might have been, but for the lack of distinction between the grotesque and exaggerated ugliness. Not that they all have that fault, and we can quite understand that where they do not frighten they will charm.

CUT LAURELS

By M. Hamilton. (Heinemann, 6s.) It is always refreshing to read novels which deal with the frailty of a man and the supreme nobility of a woman. An appeal is made to the chivalry latent in every one, so that we can sympathise even with the man's infirmity, recognising what scope it gives the heroine for the display of her true greatness; we see the meaning of evil, the necessary foil to good, and incidentally one view (and a useful one) of mere man's place in the universe. But in "Cut Laurels" this appeal is made almost too clamorously to gain the response which we long to give. Katherine Hamilton has been separated for eighteen years from her husband, who has been taken prisoner by the Arabs. They meet again at Cairo. She has been working and saving money all these years, as a dressmaker in Belfast, with her daughter Phyllis, born a few months after his departure. He returns, bringing with him an Arab woman and his two children, and asks his wife who her beautiful young companion is, not remembering he has a daughter. She forgives him that and everything else; in the end she wins back his love and they start life together afresh, Phyllis having married a rich lord in season. Miss Hamilton is not at her best in this book. She excels in her treatment of Irish peasant life and of children, about whom she writes with sympathy and humour. Umballah, the little Arab boy, is as charming as Pipette, the French child in her "Beyond the Boundary," and we wish there were more of him and less of the noble wife, whose devotion and difficulties are a little wearisome and unconvincing, resting as they do on the initial improbability of an eighteen years' complete disappearance.

THE ROOT

By Orme Agnus. (Ward, Lock, 6s.) Mr. Orme Agnus has done memorable work in the past, notably "Sarah Tuldon" and "Jane Oxber," tales of village life that are inimitable in their way; and in this, the latest novel from his pen, he more than maintains his reputation. There are other painters of life in our small English villages besides Mr. Orme Agnus who perhaps give us more startling and unusual plots, more thrilling details; but we know of no other writer who touches so sympathetically and tenderly the village tragedy which to the casual onlooker is commonplace, or has such a keen insight into the mind of the tiller of the soil. Mr. Orme Agnus has humour, too—fresh, clean, wholesome humour that is like a breath of the revivifying country air that sweeps over the village he depicts. In "The Root" the author sets forth to show the effect that money, the love of which is the root of all evil, may have on the bucolic character. Bereaved of his wife at the age of seventy-two and with the workhouse looming near, old Uncle Ezra, by a great stroke of cunning, leads his relations to believe that he has a large sum of money "up to Darchester Bank."

They are amazed; but their cupidity gets the better of their commonsense and causes them to accept his statement. Gossip busies herself with Ezra's banking account until it is surmised to be at least a thousand pounds or more. Then the struggle for the money begins, in the course of which tragedy is born. It is a powerful story, powerfully told. Sometimes the humour is more sardonic than playful, and occasionally Mr. Agnus succumbs to the temptation to moralise. There are several delightful character studies in the book, notably Miss Kildy, the tender-hearted spinster, Rupert, the crippled boy whose one desire is "to go to Lunnion to a great doctor to make these laigs straight," and old Ezra himself, with his shrewdness and cynicism. The story is told with great simplicity and directness, and is not overburdened with dialect. It bears the impress of truth in every line.

HEIRS OF REUBEN

By Chris Healy. (Chatto & Windus, 6s.) Once upon a time a clever magazine editor invented the "complete" story. Now "complete" stories differ from "short" stories in many other particulars, but especially in this, that completeness is the one quality which they essentially lack. Designed originally (before the days of the unspeakable "synopsis of foregoing chapters") for the convenience of busy people with a preference for episodic serials capable of being taken up anywhere, they resemble beads strung carelessly upon a thread, and though there may be pearls among them they are not easy to find. If they lack art, however, "complete" stories are invariably modest, for whereas your short story, good, bad, or indifferent, is ever ready to proclaim itself as such, the one ambition of your typical complete story seems to be to conceal itself as deftly and quickly as possible in "a book." We dare affirm that every man Jack of Mr. Chris Healy's "Heirs of Reuben" originally appeared "complete." Now each takes his place in a gallery of "rogues, wastrels, and broken men," under the convenient shelter of an inert chapter heading. And, indeed, as failure after failure tells the tale of the ups and downs which have led him to the squalor of an East End lodging-house, one becomes increasingly convinced that the sooner he is lost in the crowd again the better. We have rarely met with a more sordid collection of experiences. "Then I went to the devil," or "In the meanwhile I drink—drink—drink" is the burden of most of these "yarns." But was there no man among them all able to stand squarely up to his fate, in spite of the policeman ever ready round the corner and the benefactors who so persistently died? Stories and characters alike are clever enough for anything. "The Law and the Gospel," again, has a kind of nauseating pathos; while in "The Voice of the Open Road" at least we breathe comparatively fresh air. But in spite of all the skilful handling of the device which brings Johnson of the "Evening Hustler" into the midst of this crew and keeps the murderer who is to supply his "scoop" lurking, as it were, in the shadow of each reckless recital, we hope that Mr. Healy himself is "only a temporary 'ere." He can do better work than this.

STOLEN WATERS

By "Lucas Cleeve." (Fisher Unwin, 6s.) The Rev. Herbert Manners, well-born, rich, handsome, learned, eloquent, comes to the country town of Dillingham as its vicar or rector—Mrs. Kingscote seems on the whole to prefer the humbler title—and Dillingham congratulates itself. Alas! Mr. Manners has an imagination which, in Mrs. Kingscote's fascinating phrase, "had of late years been clouded by the haziness which came of a recurrent condition of imperfect sobriety"; or, in plain English, he was a drunkard within the meaning of the Act. You would think that there would be indications of his vice in his face at any rate. Nothing of the sort. His own mother, who comes to stay with him, merely accuses him of getting too puffy, too fat; and yet he is so far gone that a few months afterwards he has a bad attack of délirium tremens, through which he is nursed by Martha Parsons. Martha, who is the daughter of the Baptist minister, has been seduced by the Squire's son, and when her child dies she returns to Dillingham to the pretty cottage left her by her old father.

Between this woman and the vicar is a secret tie in the fact that each has a sin; a shame to bear, but hers has been openly acknowledged, while that of the man is hidden. Through scenes told in language of extraordinary gorgeousness, enlivened by much unconscious bathos and quotations from the Thirty-nine Articles, the story moves on to the inevitable open confession of Mr. Manners from his own pulpit. Unfortunately, Mrs. Kingscote is not a Nathaniel Hawthorne. The vicar has carefully made himself drunk enough to convince his congregation, yet not too drunk to explain his hypocrisy, to confess even that he has taken the bottles of Communion wine from the church. The Bishop is there, leaning, so Mrs. Kingscote tells us, with a vague suggestion of gymnastics, "his head on his muslin-trousered arm." The scene, which should have been conceived on the high note of tragedy, is merely unpleasant or farcical, according to the reader's mood. The figure of Martha, the woman purified by suffering, is impressive; and the society of the country town is described with some humour. But Mrs. Kingscote must learn to write English, and even to spell. "The adventure of life stood and beckoned in the darkness, and told of an illuminated vagabondage on the high-road of delight," is a perfectly fair specimen of her style. Often as she uses the word "coruscating," never once does she spell it right; and, unless she is the victim of the printer, she writes "principal" for "principle" and "tustle" for "tussle." The whole book leaves an impression of voluble haste, of having been shovelled together against time.

Short Notices

THE AWAKENING OF JAPAN

By Okakura-Kakura. (John Murray, 5s.) The English globe-trotter visiting Japan has discoursed to us of pretty toys and dancing girls and paper lanterns. We picture the Japanese gentleman arranging cherry-blossoms in vases, and when his honour demands it committing suicide with much dignity. Of his religion and his politics we have known little. His success in war has been demonstrated lately, and the West has been quite ready to take the credit. Mr. Okakura-Kakura hardly touches on the lighter side of his national life, and that in itself makes his book interesting. He tells us of the great political movements that have stirred his country, of the military despotism under which it slept for centuries, and of the great rebellion that abolished the Shoguns and gave back power to the Mikado. He writes in English, so his book is presumably addressed to the English public, and for this purpose his style is too allusive. He talks of Neo-Confucianism, Zen doctrines, and Oyomians as if he politely expected the average Englishman to know something about them. His history too hardly takes the ignorance of his readers into sufficient account. It is as if you button-holed the first Japanese you met and spoke to him of Martin Luther and the death of Charles I. But he gives you a picture of a warlike and devoted Japan, whose present greatness is not a mushroom growth, but built on the solid foundations of national character. He has something to say about the White Disaster as compared with the bogie of the Yellow Peril, and he denies the purely imitative character of Japanese progress. In one respect he is unjust to the West, or at any rate to England. He says that we preach the superiority of our "art." We may be a stupid nation, but surely none of us are stupid enough to do that.

Books Received

Biography and Memoirs

- Byles, C. E., The Life and Letters of R. S. Hawker. Lane, 21/0 net. (See Review, page 168.)
 Innes, General J. J. Macleod, R.E., V.C., Life and Times of General Sir James Browne ("Buster Browne"). Murray, 18/0 net. (See Review, page 169.)
 Laughlin, Clara E., Stories of Authors' Loves. Iabister, 6/0.
 Wright, The Poets Laureate of England. Jarrold, 1/6. (The story of the Laureates from the earliest times told for "young people." Wordsworth and Tennyson are dealt with at greater length than the rest, and there is a discriminating chapter on the present holder of the office.)
 Wilde, Oscar, De Profundis. Methuen, 5/0 net. (A long letter, written from prison, setting out the changes in the author's view of life, his new understanding of the meaning and use of sorrow, and his plans for the future. Edited, with a preface, by Mr. Robert Ross.)

Classics

Stewart, J. A., The Myths of Plato. Macmillan, 14/0 net.

Economics

Strangeland, Charles Emil, Ph.D., Pre-Malthusian Doctrines of Population. New York: The Columbia University Press; London: P. S. King & Son, 10/0 net. (A re-statement, as far as possible in the various authors' own words, of the theories and doctrines advanced prior to the publication of Malthus's "Essay" in 1798, with special reference to Economics. The theories include Greek and Roman, Oriental, Primitive Christian and Medieval, and all important modern views.)

Folklore

Fison, Lorimer, Tales from Old Fiji. The De la More Press, 7/6 net.

History and Archaeology

The Antiquary, Vol. XL., 1904. Elliot Stock.
Okey, Thomas, The Story of Venice. Dent, 4/6 net. (A new volume of the "Medieval Towns Series." Illustrated with six good reproductions of famous pictures, and some charming pen drawings by Nelly Erichsen.)

Law

Martin, William, The English Patent System. Dent, 1/0 net. (One of "The Temple Primers." An attempt to exhibit the English patent system as a whole, and free from unnecessary industrial and legal technicality.)

Military

Lads' Drill Association. Annual Report.

Miscellaneous

Clarke, A. L., Manual of Practical Indexing. Library Supply Co., 5/0 net.
Swan, Helena, Christian Names. Routledge, 1/0 net. ("Miniature Reference Library." The origin and meaning of all really common Christian names.)

Burn, John Henry, Children's Answers—Shrewd, Witty, Nonsensical, and Pathetic. Treherne, 2/0 net. (The collection of a quarter of a century. Some are capital; some feeble; but Mr. Burn wisely decided to include "chestnuts" rather than let his readers miss any good things that might be unknown to them.)

Natural History

Ward, John J., Peeps into Nature's Ways. Isbister, 7/6 net.

Poetry

Loveman, Robert, Songs from a Georgia Garden and Echoes from the Gates of Silence. Lippincott, 5/0. (Vivid and musical little lyrics by an American writer, sometimes lacking in distinction, but seldom in thought or passion.)

O'Sullivan, Seumas, The Twilight People. Dublin: Whalley & Co.; London: Bullen, 2/0 net. (Mr. Seumas O'Sullivan's verses have considerable charm. He belongs, clearly, to the young Irish school, and there is a haunting sadness and sweetness about most of his varied and often mystical lyrics.)

Reprints and New Editions

Wheatley, Henry B., The Diary of Samuel Pepys. Vols. V. and VI. Bell, 5/0 net each.

Fitzgerald, Edward, Polonius. The De la More Press, 1/0 net.

Palgrave, Francis Turner, The Golden Treasury. Routledge, 1/0 net.

Morris, Sir Lewis, Poema. Routledge, 1/0 net.

Crockett, S. R., The Stickit Minister. Unwin, 1/0 net.

Gorky, Maxim, Three of Them. Unwin, 1/0 net.

Wedmore, Frederick, Dream of Provence and To Nancy. Isbister, 1/0 net each. (See Review, page 171.)

Science

Geikie, Sir Archibald, Landscape in History and other Essays. Macmillan, 8/6 net.

Stocker, R. Dimadale, Soul-Culture. Fowler & Wells, 1/0 net. (I. Life's Inequalities: their Cause and Cure (Past); II. The Mystery of Being: the Remedy of "Yoga" (Present); III. The Predictive Art: the Rationale of Fortune-Telling (Future).)

Anderson, K. T., Mind-Concentration and how to Practise it. Fowler & Wells, 0/6 net. (Short and simple mental gymnastics for the increase of will-power and concentration of thought.)

Sport

Hodgson, W. Earle, Trout Fishing. Black, 7/6 net.

Theology

Thompson, the Rev. W. Halliday, LL.D., Professor Huxley and Religion. Allenson, 2/6 net. (Lectures delivered in Gresham College to a popular audience. The author's main question is "whether the application of the method of investigation and proof, illustrated by Huxley himself, to the problem of the origin of the universe, justifies . . . Agnosticism; or whether the hypothesis of a Personal Being, with attributes akin to those of man, is logically sounder and more reasonable.")

Periodicals

The Hampstead Annual, 1904-5. Edited by Greville E. Matheson and Sydney C. Mayle. Sydney C. Mayle, 2/6 net. (The new volume of this handsome annual contains recollections of Canon Ainger in his Hampstead days, and contributions from well-known writers like Beatrice Harraden, Grace Rhys, A. M. Buckton, and others. It is fully and excellently illustrated.) "New York Times Saturday Review," "Book News," "Atlantic Monthly," "T. P.'s Weekly," "University Correspondent," "University Record," "Dragon," "Good Health," "Cosmopolitan," "To-day," "Review of Reviews," "Nature," "Humanitarian Era," "Royal Magazine," "Isis," "Pall Mall," "Ulula," "Nottingham Library Bulletin," "Men and Women of India" (the first number of an illustrated monthly record of life and work in India, Rutoragur, Bombay, R1), "North American Review," "Publishers' Circular," "Twentieth Century Home," "Rand Ratepayers' Review," "Parsi."

Pamphlets

Skrine, F. H., British-Grown Tea and Taxation: a Plea for a Free Breakfast Table. Sidders.

Copping, A. E., Pictures of Poverty, being Studies of Distress in West Ham. Brorup, R. P., The Struggle for America. Fitzgerald, G. A., U.S.A., 25c.

Catalogues

Old English Pottery and Porcelain. Sotheby.
Books and Manuscripts. Sotheby.

Foreign

Educational

Cagnat, R., Cours d'Epigraphie Latine. (Supplement to the third edition.) Paris: Fontemoing.

Fiction

Andro, L., Die Augen des Hieronymus. Berlin: Frans Lederman.

Literary

le Breton, André, Balzac, l'Homme et l'Œuvre. Paris: Armand Colin, 3f.50.

Scartazzini, Dr. G. A., Enciclopedia Dantesca. Milan: Ulrico Hoepli, 8 lire.
Passerini, G. L., and Massi, C., Un decennio di Bibliografia Dantesca. Milan: Ulrico Hoepli, 12 lire.
Panzini, Alfredo, Dizionario Moderno. Supplemento ai Dizionari Italiani. Milan: Ulrico Hoepli, 6.50 lire.

Poetry

Bortoluzzi, Pio, Le Versioni da Orasio. Serie Metrica. Verona: Fratelli Drucker.

Reprints

La Divina Commedia di Dante Alighieri. Milan: Hoepli.

Science

The Fear of Death

By the fear of death I mean in the first place to indicate neither "the dread of something after death," nor the love of life; but the fear which has given rise to such a term as "death-agony."

It is apparently believed that the act of dying is a painful one, attended with a cup of mortal bitterness such as can be drained by no man twice: Death is the King of Terrors. It may be profitable to examine this belief and thereafter to consider certain of its concomitants.

In the first place I would have the reader take the word of one who has witnessed many and various deaths that the term "death-agony" does not correspond to any fact. Without concerning ourselves with the classification of the pathologists, who speak of death by coma, by asphyxia, by syncope and so forth, we may make the broad statement that the immediate cause of death, in all but very exceptional cases, such as accident, is the poisoning of the nervous centres by carbonic acid, which accumulates in the blood owing to the failure of the arrangements for its removal. This gas, let us mark, is an anæsthetic, and has indeed been employed as such, both locally and otherwise. This property of carbonic acid may be termed, without any philosophic criticism of the assumptions implied in the words, "a merciful provision of Nature." Normal death, if the phrase be permitted, is a painless occurrence, usually preceded by gradual loss of consciousness entailing no more suffering than going to sleep. The accumulation of this merciful gas often induces muscular contractions or spasms, which are preceded by loss of consciousness, but which may have suggested to uncritical observers that their moribund subject was in "agony." It is not merely that the pain of death is trifling as compared with the physical pain of a scald: it is non-existent. To this general assertion there are, of course, exceptions, as in the case of the agonising death by strychnine poisoning, in which the mind is clear to the last.

But before dismissing the simple question of physical pain, we may note the existence of a delusion lately exhibited in the public press, which referred to the Grand Duke Sergius driving to his doom, as "the unhappy man." The inference is that he was about to meet an undesirable, not to say "horrible" death. In point of fact, the last moments of his consciousness were in all probability as happy as those of such a man could be. Numerous and well-devised psychological experiments, supported by the testimony of thousands of cases in battle and elsewhere, have conclusively proved that in death by bullet or bomb the possibility of consciousness is annihilated before the consciousness either of pain or of imminent disaster can be aroused. The interval of time necessary to develop the feeling of pain is appreciable and measurable. The entry of a directly lethal bullet into the brain causes death in a shorter period than avails for any alteration of consciousness. Death in this form assumes its least painful shape. Obviously I speak of only one point of view. I do not refer to the need for preparation implied in the Churchman's petition to be delivered from "sudden death."

There remains for consideration a much more difficult question—the moral fear of death. It is, of course, obvious that this can exist only in a self-conscious being. It is only for those who can look before and after that the King has terrors.

Here I may perhaps be forgiven for reference to two recent works of art. At the recent Leeds Festival we heard Dr. Walford Davies' new cantata "Everyman," which is shortly to be produced in London. For my present purpose, and without pretence to be anything more than an amateur, I would compare this cantata with Elgar's inspired setting of Newman's "Dream of Gerontius": and of the five renderings I have heard of the latter, and the three tenors to whom I have listened, I will choose those in which the part of Gerontius was taken by Mr. Gervase Elwes. In both works the theme is death, the protagonist a dying man. In the cantata there is illustrated not the fear of death but the love of life which entails an unwillingness to die. This love of life might well be considered at length: but it is totally distinct from the fear of death. Of this I know no demonstration so poignant as Mr. Elwes' rendering of Elgar's setting of Newman's horrible poem. The Cardinal's conception of the ghastly visions of the dying man, when reinforced by the power of composer and executant, is an overwhelming and—save that Mr. Elwes is mortal—must surely be a perdurable and final illustration of the influence of certain religious beliefs upon the minds of those who accept them. Here, indeed, in the death of a pious and fortified believer, and not in that of an "unfortunate Grand Duke," is the veritable death-agony. No brilliantly-lit hall, no well-fed crowd, nor even the starched shirt-front of Mr. Elwes, can alleviate for me the horrors of what Cardinal Newman may be presumed to have regarded as the orthodox death-bed.

Beside this death of Gerontius, which I should like to hope is but the morbid imagining of an abnormal mind, without counterpart in human experience, the most fabulous tales of the horrors of the "infidel death-bed" seem anæmic and trivial. Indeed, they are mythical ex hypothesi, for only the believer in future retribution can fear to die, much though he may love to live or may sorrow for his loved ones' bereavement.

The fear of death, then, may thus be briefly analysed. In so far as it is a physical fear, it is baseless: the only peaceful and painless part of a fatal illness may be its termination.

In so far as it is a moral fear, it is conditioned by the mental power of anticipation. It follows that there is no horror in the contemplation of the countless millions of deaths that preceded the advent of man upon the earth, or those of the lower animals to-day. The death of a rose or a kitten may be sad, but neither is horrible.

Nor is it horrible "to cease upon the midnight with no pain." The fear of death, as death, is due only when it is believed that thereafter may or must be unhappiness—whether conditioned by the worm that dieth not, or by eternal alienation from the Deity.

I conclude that the fear of death is in full decline. The genius of that most illustrious priest Copernicus, nearly four centuries ago, dealt it a terrible blow, by destroying the geography of the Dantean Inferno. Since he made it impossible to believe that hell is a place, it must be concluded that it is a state. But meanwhile the unwithstood and unwithstandable development of "humanity" in human thinking has led to the displacement of the old belief by that of the Persian poet, "He's a good fellow, and all will be well."

C. W. SALEEBY.

Art

The Painter-Etchers—The Etchings of Maxime Lalanne

THE special feature of this year's exhibition is the group of etchings, dry-points, and mezzotints by the President, Sir Francis Seymour Haden, which are hung in three rows with a view to instruction, but also with admirable decorative effect. They are hors concours in every sense, for years have elapsed since the last of them was done, and their author has long been recognised as one of the greatest etchers of the nineteenth century. The dry-points include "Windmill Hill (No. 1)," "The Tank, Cintra," and "The Little Boat-House"; with the exception of "Sunset in Ireland," which is not exhibited, it would be hard to name more beautiful specimens of the President's work in this medium, and they illustrate its use with great variety. The value of dry-point as an addition to etching is exemplified by "Combe Bottom" and "On the Test." "Egham Lock" in pure etching may be compared with the same subject in pure mezzotint, and etching as a preparation for mezzotint is seen in No. 169, a proof of "Harlech" with etched outline washed with sepia to show what the effect would be if the plate were completed by the addition of a mezzotint ground. A number of such tinted etchings were included in a large exhibition of Sir Seymour Haden's work at Messrs. Colnaghi's gallery a few years ago, and the effect was sometimes so beautiful that it is surprising that etchers are not more often tempted to make such experiments. Sir Charles Holroyd has sometimes done so with success, and there is an old and laudable precedent in the work of Hercules Seghers. The President made a notable effort, a year or two back, to encourage the use of pure mezzotint for original work by exhibiting some rare examples of Turner. His own mezzotint landscapes in the lowest row this year are extremely beautiful; that may be said even of "The Test at Long Parish," an experiment on zinc, pronounced by the artist himself to be a failure, but it will be universally allowed in the case of "Salmon Pool on the Spey," a brilliant achievement in the rendering of atmospheric effect and the surface of water which even the best of the younger mezzotint engravers, such as Mr. Waterson, are far from rivalling. The most accomplished of them all, Mr. Short, uses mezzotint mainly for the reproduction of pictures, and this year he exhibits nothing.

Another of the veterans, Professor Legros, sends some of the latest numbers of his series, "Triomphe de la Mort," with a beautiful frontispiece. The uprooted tree makes a curious straight line half-way across the composition, but its position is fully explained by the boulders, hurled down by an avalanche, between which its trunk is jammed. Mr. Heseltine and Sir J. C. Robinson contribute landscapes in their characteristic and very different styles; the latter has a technique all his own, and his suggestions of vapour dispersing and penetrated by shafts of light are so beautiful as to deserve more attention than they have hitherto received. Sir Charles Holroyd exhibits "Nymphs by the Sea," the best etching of figures in the room; portraits of Professor Legros and Mr. Leonard Courtney, the first a fine example of pure line, the second rather marred by stippling; two pleasing Medway landscapes, and several Lake-country subjects, of which "Kidsty Pike" is the finest, though none are comparable to the large plates etched on a former visit to Borrowdale and the neighbouring hills. Mr. Brangwyn makes a fine display with three large, massive studies of light and shade, "The Storm," "A Turkish Cemetery," and an immense plate of the scaffolding that surrounds the new buildings of South Kensington Museum. Mr. East does somewhat similar work in pure landscape, and one of the new Associates, Mr. Sydney Lee, may be counted an adherent of the same school, aiming at vigour and broad decorative effect. Very different from this, and, indeed, from anything else ever exhibited by this Society, is the work of two young recruits, the brothers Edward and Maurice Detmold; this, again, is nothing if not decorative; but it is Oriental in its inspiration. The plumage of birds, delicately etched in extreme detail, is the motive of most of the plates exhibited by these two artists; they are not always so successful with other textures, the skin of "Prometheus" for example; the "Dragon" is not so satisfactory a creation as the "Phoenix"; but perhaps their most excellent plate is the smallest and slightest, a "Long-Eared Bat," etched with wonderful lightness and certainty of touch. It is difficult for the uninitiated to guess how a plate so harmonious in finish can be the work of more than one artist; but it is signed by both brothers, whereas the other etchings already mentioned are catalogued as the work either of Mr. Edward or Mr. Maurice Detmold singly.

One of the most charming things in the exhibition is Colonel Goff's study of Italian pines at Viareggio bending under the stress of a gale. Admirable, too, and full of the magic of Italy, is "A Florentine Villa," though both here and in "The Old Road to Fiesole" the dark tint left on the plate makes the effect needlessly sombre. Dr. Evershed has been fascinated by the arches that span narrow alleys in the old towns of the Italian Riviera. "Pulteney Bridge, Bath" is the best thing Mr. Hedley Fitton has exhibited; his "Rialto" is drawn from an unusual point of view, already discovered by a well-known contemporary etcher; and the comparison inevitably suggested is not to the advantage of Mr. Fitton. Mr. Spence continues the entertaining illustrations to "Fox's Journal," in which he most excels. Fox, in one of these, meets Cromwell at Hampton Court. "And as he rode at the head of his Lifeguard," the quotation runs, "I saw and felt a Waft (or Apparition) of Death go forth against him, and when I came to him he looked like a dead man": a weird subject which Mr. Spence has turned to good account.

Only a few of the notable things have been mentioned, but the experienced visitor will discover for himself, among much that is insignificant, many compositions of merit in the quieter work of Mr. Oliver Hall, Mr. Synge, Mr. Wright, Miss Sloane, and Miss Margaret Kemp-Welch. Three members who had not exhibited recently—Mr. Laing, Mr. Gascoyne, and Mr. Bryden—have returned this year, but we miss Mr. Hugh Fisher, who was largely represented in the last exhibition. Large and over-elaborate etchings are, happily, fewer than usual; the work of Mr. Lawrence Phillips, for example, gains much by the limitation imposed by the choice of a smaller plate. The contributions of the foreign members may be accused of sameness. M. Chahine is the most versatile, but he is not so well represented here as in the recent International Exhibition. M. Helleu's portrait of the Duchess of Marlborough will be much admired.

Lalanne, a native of Bordeaux who died in 1886, wrote one of the best practical treatises on the art of etching, and was himself an accomplished etcher. It would be exaggeration to call him a great artist; he lacked the unique gift, the touch of genius, which raises Méryon, Millet, and Legros to a place apart. But just as in literature the command of a clear and accurate style is the common inheritance of educated Frenchmen, so in the graphic arts good taste and a high degree of technical proficiency are shared by many French etchers of the second half of the nineteenth century who never rose to the highest rank. Among these skilful and tasteful etchers of landscape and architecture, Lalanne is eminent, and such an exhibition as Mr. Gutekunst has arranged, the most complete ever held, will certainly add to his reputation. The etchings exhibited, partly on the walls and partly in portfolios, are entirely from the artist's own collection and of the choicest quality, many subjects being represented by a series of states or trial proofs. The catalogue will be of permanent value as the most complete list of Lalanne's work that has been compiled; it follows the order of Beraldi, and adds a number of undescribed subjects at the end.

The general level of Lalanne's work is excellent, but he did not produce a masterpiece. He is at his best in coast scenes, views on the Seine, and subjects from the old streets of Paris, Rouen, and Amsterdam. A search through the portfolios will be rewarded by the discovery of many charming trifles, tiny landscapes, delicate etchings of a hare, and a sketch of the ever-fascinating Zaandam windmills. In addition to his original work, Lalanne occasionally reproduced pictures; and his renderings of Barbizon landscapes are especially good. The large "Coucher de Soleil" and "Clair de Lune" (after Daubigny), and "Mantes la Jolie" (after Corot), of which Mr. Gutekunst has acquired an interesting series of trial proofs, rank high as reproductive etchings. It is a matter of regret, in some ways, that so fine a collection of an etcher's whole work should be broken up; but the opportunity will be welcomed by collectors who wish to enrich their own portfolios. The exhibition closes on March 4.

C. D.

Drama

The Personality of the Actor

THOSE of us who, notwithstanding every disillusion, persist in regarding the drama—not, of course, the hebdomadal drama, but the ideal drama which has been and is yet to be—as a branch of literature are perhaps often tempted to be unjust to the players. Even more than unambitious playwrights and phlegmatic audiences, they appear to be the standing obstacle to the recognition of tragedy as anything more than sensational incident, or of comedy as anything more than the crackling of thorns under the pot. Of course, from their own point of view, the thing is intelligible enough. The actor, in his kind and degree, even though it be not a very exalted kind and degree, is an artist, and his aim, like that of every other artist, is self-expression. In the social relation, self-expression comes to mean the projection of the artist's personality

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS

OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti,
Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from FREDK. HOLLYER, 8 Pembroke Square, London, W.

Illustrated Catalogue 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

over the personalities of others. To bring souls into captivity; to herd them like sheep to the sound of his own piping; that is his art. Precisely similar is the aim of the dramatist; only that, while the personality of the dramatist finds its expression in the inwardness of the play, in the ultimate emotions it evokes and the ultimate ideas it shadows forth, the personality of the actor finds its expression in its immediate and external elements, in the shades of manner and the intonations of voice, in the grace or eccentricity of gesture and outward behaviour. It is obvious that collision may easily occur between the will that is steadily compelling the attention of the spectator to the central meaning and the will that is steadily alluring it to the polished and decorated surface. In a reasonable and normal organisation of the drama, the difficulty is naturally met by making the author, the greater and more creative artist, supreme, and reducing the actors to the position of his puppets, pulled by strings at his pleasure, to take the part designed for them in the shadow-dance which bodies forth his dominant conception. He is the maker; they are the interpreters. And, in fact, the greatest actors have, in the long run, been those who have realised this for themselves, and have renounced direct self-expression to attain to the more subtle self-expression which comes by faithful and patient following of the tracks and windings of master-minds. Unfortunately, renunciation implies genius, and genius is rare; and the organisation of the modern English drama is neither reasonable nor normal. For this there are, of course, economic reasons. The theatre-going public takes a good deal of interest in acting, and very little interest indeed in literature. What it takes an interest in it is prepared to pay for, with the result that, while successful actors can very well afford to employ a playwright, hardly any playwrights are in a position to employ a troop of actors. In such circumstances employment for the playwright inevitably means that, whatever else he does or does not do with his play, he at any rate affords opportunities of self-expression for the masters by whom his work was commissioned. That is why plays are neither right comedies nor right tragedies, but are written round this or that personality, and achieve such fame as a hundred nights can give before they are thrown upon the dust-heap, by providing Her with a fresh excuse for picturesque poses and modish drapery and Him with yet another entertaining character-part in his inimitable vein.

Time, however, has its revenges, and the irony of the gods is satisfied when some such play, in which literature has been flouted for a price, is plucked by a rash hand from its oblivion and promoted to a place of perilous honour amongst its author's works. Brought away from the friendly footlights, with the glamour of mimicry no longer upon it, it resembles nothing so much as yonder enamelled dowager when the cruel light of dawn begins to steal through the parted curtains of the ball-room. Eminent names will yield examples. Here, now, is Mr. Henry Arthur Jones. There have been worse playwrights and playwrights who have realised less and cared less for the conditions and ideals of their art. I might quote passages from the preface to Mr. Jones' "Saints and Sinners," written in 1891, which show the very clearest perception of the nature of that antagonism between the author and the actor to which I have referred, and of the weaknesses in dramatic writing for which that antagonism is responsible. "The Manœuvres of Jane" was produced by Mr. Jones at the Haymarket Theatre in 1898, and has now, in its turn, come to be printed. It has no preface by Mr. Jones in vindication of the ideals of dramatic literature. It has not even, like some other of Mr. Jones' works, an introductory essay by Mr. William Archer, calling attention to the place which it occupies in the dramatic renaissance of the nineteenth century. Nor has it any observations by Mr. A. B. Walkley. The play as I recall it was vastly entertaining. Miss Winifred Emery as the impulsive and headstrong Jane Nangle, Miss Gertrude Kingston as the cattish Constantia Gage, Miss Beatrice Ferrar as Pamela Beechinor, the marplot, were all funniness itself. I was convulsed with laughter when Mr. Cyril Maude, as Lord Bapchild, stood there with his affianced but unwelcome bride, plucking his new straw hat to pieces and twisting his feet in an agony of nervous indecision. But now that I read the thing in cold print, the humour of it seems to have evaporated entirely. I cannot raise a smile, and can only marvel that I should ever have been able to tolerate the triviality of the intrigue, the sketchiness of the characters, and the hopeless want of distinction in the dialogue. Was I hypnotised by Mr. Cyril Maude and his talented colleagues, since without them the whole piece seems to collapse like a pricked bladder? On second thoughts, I do not know why I should marvel so much after all. The actor's personality is a very real thing, and if entertainment is what you are after, you are just as likely to be entertained by it as by the personality of a dramatist. Only it expresses itself, not through dialogue, but through gesture and intonation and facial contortions; and when these are left out, as in a book they obviously must be, since the fullest stage directions cannot hold them, the dialogue which they have accompanied may prove inadequate by itself to constitute literature. Even so I am afraid it is with "The Manœuvres of Jane." E. K. CHAMBERS.

On Piano Music

AT Herr von Dohnányi's first pianoforte recital of this year several points, apart from the music and the player, struck me as significant. That the Æolian Hall is about half the size of the late St. James' Hall; that it was just sufficiently filled not to allow any great expanse of empty seats to be visible in any one place; that the programme frankly began with the most interesting item of the concert; that this fact did not induce the audience to come more punctually than usual; that the programme frankly ended with one of the most highly sensational and ear-tickling effusions which Liszt ever penned for the piano, but that even this obvious bait did not induce many of the audience to stay to the end.

When the music began, one realised again, what London audiences have had frequent opportunity of realising in former years, that Dohnányi is not only, like so many other brilliant young pianists, possessed of a splendid technique, but that he plays the great F Minor Sonata with the conviction of a genuine Brahms lover. Perhaps he has not quite fathomed the depths of the first movement; there was vigour and energy without the commanding force which belongs to the first subject; but, on the whole, his interpretation was so clear as to bring out the beauties of each movement in a way that compelled attention. The Andante and Intermezzo were particularly appealing; the Scherzo carried one away by its exuberant spirit.

Between each movement the audience trickled in, and when the Sonata and the two Beethoven pieces which followed were over, they began to gently trickle out again.

Why? one is inclined to ask impatiently. Why this half-hearted attitude? What more can they want than such music played in such a manner?

One is almost forced to the conclusion that people do not want to hear piano music at concerts nowadays, when two such extremes as Brahms and Liszt are included in one programme, and the audience comes in after the one and goes out before the other.

A glance at the history of the piano may throw some light on the situation. It must be remembered that the piano came into existence with the development of formal music; that is to say, both the instrument and the art of playing it are exactly coeval with the sonatas of Beethoven. His first sonata was written for an instrument differing but little from the harpsichord; his thirty-second was written for the piano, practically as we know it.

It is always a difficult matter to distinguish cause and effect in such cases; the genius of the composer seeking more and more far-reaching musical phrases improves the technique of the pianist, and the improved technique calls for fresh inventive power on the part of the instrument-maker. Again, as instruments improve and the technique of the player becomes more perfect, the composer is set free to indulge in a wider range of musical ideas. So the various departments of art react upon one another and develop concurrently.

In the case of Beethoven, the great need laid upon him was to develop the most marvellous form which music has yet taken—that of the sonata.

In saying this, one need not lose sight of the enormous means of expression underlying the form; but, nevertheless, in Beethoven these are controlled by formal necessities. The piano was ready to hand as a convenient vehicle for working out formal problems. As long as the minds of his audience were mainly occupied with the beauties of structure and balance, the lack of colour, even the grave limitations in means of expression, which the piano at first possessed, were comparatively immaterial.

It was, then, as a means of hearing sonatas that the piano first attained popularity; but it was only natural that, when it had achieved its position, its usefulness should be tested for every sort of musical utterance. The romantic school, of which Schumann was the apostle, claimed it as their own, and used it as a means both to devise new forms and to convey the more direct expression at which they aimed.

In certain of these directions they found it particularly successful. The piano works of Schumann, which we now love most, are the short lyrical pieces—the “Kreisleriana,” “Davidsbündler,” “Novelletten,” and the “Carnival” pieces; those of Chopin are undoubtedly the “Preludes” and “Nocturnes.” Where they failed was in their attempts at larger forms. Their so-called sonatas had not, as Beethoven’s had, that perfect symmetry of outline which the piano is so perfectly adequate to express; instead, they sought for a richness and variety of colour for which the piano was inadequate.

Short forms of descriptive music, not attempting to force the capacities of the instrument to extremes, proved to be not only possible but even delightful: amongst such are Schumann’s “Kinderszenen” and “Faschingswanck.” But when an elaborate programme was set up, it could only be illustrated by violent contrasts of light and shade in place of colour, brilliant passages of scale and arpeggio, grotesque harmonies and distorted melodies. The result became a lurid sensation, vulgar in the extreme, like the startling headlines of cheap journalism or the most excessive vagaries of the impressionist school of painting.

The composer who most attained this undesirable result was Liszt, four examples of whose work Herr von Dohnányi played at his recital. The piece with which he ended was a most striking instance of what I have described—his “Venezia e Napoli” Tarantella.

There has appeared one man able to gather up the great expressive results of the romantic movement and weld them together into a great sonata form, in the person of Brahms. He, like the late G. F. Watts in painting, stands apart from his contemporaries—a great modern classic. We cannot classify him, nor explain away his position; he is unique.

The F minor sonata, from which we started, contains the formal beauty of Beethoven, the poetic depth of Schumann, and something which neither of these had, and which is purely and only Brahms.

But what is the bearing of all this upon the question of the present apathy towards public performances of piano music? It is, I think, this: we are still engaged in probing the possibilities of direct musical expression rather than of form. The wave of “programme” is still sweeping over us; we have not yet quite made up our minds how far it is possible to express definite external ideas in music. For this particular kind of development the piano has been proved unsuitable; it must belong chiefly to the realm of so-called “absolute” music.

The more graphic scenery and rich colouring of the orchestra lends itself more naturally to such treatment, and, consequently, it is in orchestral music that the movement is at present going on and progress is being made. Not that it is by any means impossible that the thirst for realistic expression of extraneous ideas should lead to gross vulgarity and mistreatment of the orchestra, as of the piano. Experience has shown us many such results, and it is not necessary to point to instances, but even the unsuccessful experiments have led to widening the resources of the art in melody and harmony and so increasing its powers of expression.

Meantime, piano music is necessarily rather at a standstill. The lyric pieces of the romantic school still hold a high place in the hearts of the music-loving public, and there is always to be found an inner circle of worshippers at the shrines of the great classics. But the main body of the people are drawn to concerts mainly by that which is progressive; they may not understand wherein the progress lies or whither it tends, but the spirit is in them to see or to hear some new thing, so at present they crowd to orchestral concerts.

Let honest-hearted pianists continue to play their Brahms and their Beethoven, notwithstanding. We are always better for it, and shall progress the more surely for keeping a firm whole upon our classical music. Let them not be led to compete for the public ear by thundering the startling sensations of Liszt and his school at audiences who gradually slip away between the movements. No; such competition is worse than useless. In the first place, it is doomed to ill-success, for those who need such excitement can find it more satisfactorily than in piano music; and, secondly, it only tends to confuse the taste of those attentive ones who come to listen to the art of a great performer.

It is probable that we have another great formal period in music still before us, that, when all these resources have been fully developed, men will occupy themselves in using them to build up another great scheme of form, which will as far outreach sonata form as that outreached the contrapuntal forms of Handel and Bach. Whether the piano will have a part to play in this great work it would be impossible to predict, but it is probable that composers, sated with the sensuous effects of orchestral colouring, will set themselves to study once more at the keyboard; and it is certain that when that composer who has found in piano music a new message arrives, the public will not be slow to give him their attention, and a piano recital will once more draw a crowded audience.

H. C. COLLES.

The Consolations of Verse

Nor long ago the Jeremiah of a monthly magazine foretold the ultimate ruin of the United States because of the alleged fact that a materialised worship of the dollar is the consuming idolatry which is engrossing masculine energy there. The things of the spirit are neglected; and there are those who are resolved "to live by bread alone." But to the most materialistic must come at times a feeling that without "the light that never was" man's place would be one of ghastly sadness, dull fact, dull plodding business, worthless ambition, material pleasure, a stark and bare world unlit by a single glimmer of the imaginative light that glorifies it. Of course, all men are poets: though some are not aware of it, and many would scoff at the thought, as at an insult, connecting poets with dreamers and imbeciles, who do not look facts in the face; whereas they are only seers who behold more than the fact—and other facts—and are able to express what they have seen: only men who have lived and felt intensely and are able to express what they have felt. For poetry is the deepest utterance of life—of life's joy, of life's agony; and the time that has been most living in the nation's history has produced the greatest poets. Life and poetry are not separable. "By thine own tears thy song shall tears beget, O singer," is an incontrovertible truth, a test by which all poetry lives or dies; moreover the greatest quality in life is sincerity, and sincerity is the only soil from which a poem can grow to lasting beauty.

But many men pass through their days without a thought for poetry—with hardly a thought for beauty—many, but not so many as one sometimes imagines. Verse is but one ray from the large sun of beauty that lights the world, so bounteous is nature, the mother of life and of poetry, its manifestation; for nature would have all her children poets. Though the wren does not sing so sweetly as the thrush, or the blackbird as the nightingale and the starling is a rascal imitator of the songs of others; but the rook has his caw, the grouse his chuckle, and even the sparrow his incessant chirp. Some men could not face life without the aid of poetry, and now the word is clipped down to its trimmest meaning, and these thoughts strayed through the mind by way of excuse for enthusiasm, because the lover of poetry thinks in his heart that he to whom poetry means nothing has much to learn in life; and so his enthusiasm, which needs no apology, comes perilously near to conceit, for which no apology avails. Experience tends to show him that there is no petty nuisance in the play of circumstance, no great joy in life, and no great trouble, which poetry cannot smooth away or heighten, or make tolerable by investing the joy or the anguish with the beauty that lies in the depth of every human emotion. Take an instance how it lifts him from pettiness. He comes back tired with reality after riding on a slow tram or underground in metropolitan despair, and can see nothing but the crowd and the dirt and the weariness of life; then he turns to the splendid unreality of Spenser and paces with Artegall, knight of justice, and Talus, his page of iron mould, down the green glades of Faerieland, delivering lovely ladies from their cruel tyrants, slaying the Paynim, grappling with the "cursed cruell Sarrazin," or leaving all care for meaning, reads on, allured by the cadence of the verse, soothed and sustained by its sheer music, and the book droops in his hand and his mind gains a wider outlook and other lines come to him.

"Brightness falls from the air;
Queens have died young and fair;
Dust hath closed Helen's eye;"

and gradually the heart opens like a flower before the flooding light of Beauty and the conviction, that had faltered, becomes strong again and the whole soul echoes the great cry of Keats—

"... In spite of all
Some shape of beauty moves away the pall
From our dark spirits."

And the material side, which is only half, and the less important half, of life, gives place to the spiritual, which is life's true reality. "From link to link it circulates the soul of the world." Shelley was no mere dreamer when he finished that wonderful outburst of his in defence of poetry, written with the fire of inspiration in every sentence, with the words "poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the world." He uttered common sense, but common sense impassioned. Hard facts pave life's way like cobble-stones in a market town, but there's a starlit sky above our heads it is good to remember, for the memory and the sight of it do not weaken but rather strengthen us to press on our way with fresh bravery—"Back and breast as either should be." Well, well, the point of a wet pebble caught by the sunshine sparkles like a diamond. There is consolation in the thought, though the pebble is unconscious and silent.

Correspondence

Richard Croke

SIR,—In a recent notice of Erasmus you make reference to a "ready writer" as Richard Croke, an accomplished Greek scholar of that time. On turning to the "Dictionary of National Biography" for details, I find that his origin is treated as matter of doubt. He has stated that he was early impoverished by a family dispute which deprived him of his rightful inheritance, so he claimed to have come of a good origin, and he was described in the Leipsic records as equestris ordinis—i.e., of knightly origin; other writers have connected him with the ancient race of Blound alias Croke of Oxfordshire and Bucks. Turning, then, to my collectanea I find this abstract pedigree:—

Richard Croke of Easington Manor, Chilton.

Our Richard was probably named after his grandfather, supposed, as above; and, as he survived till 1558, he was contemporary with three knights [equestris ordinis]; this is a positive claim of relationship. He entered King's College, Cambridge, from Eton, in 1502, was of Christ Church, Oxford; D.D. in 1524, and died as Rector of Long Buckley, Northants, leaving a brother named Robert, also a beneficed clergyman.

I take it that a lad proceeding from Eton to a university would be of gentle blood, unless disqualified as "plebeian."
—Yours, &c. A. HALL.

"Religion for all Mankind"

SIR,—Your correspondent's complaint against the reviewer of this book is just; but those who, like myself, have read the work in question with thoughtful care have graver reason still to protest against the tone of half-contempt, half-indifference which marks the notice that appeared two weeks ago in your columns.

I have no personal interest whatever in "puffing" Mr. Voysey's book; nevertheless, as one not unacquainted with the apologetic literature of natural religion and to some extent conversant with the specious sophistries of the Agnostic and Atheistical schools, I can very heartily recommend to your impartial readers this modest but excellent little treatise on the elements of the Theistic Faith. It is an admirably clear, candid and persuasive statement of the grounds of rational belief; dealing, too, in a masterly way with the problem of the existence of Pain, Death and Sin in a world created and governed by a loving God.

Also—and this is indeed refreshing nowadays, when obscurantism is so prevalent—Mr. Voysey thinks clearly enough to dispense alike with the wretched jargon of the metaphysical cliques and the fog and haze of mysticism, magic, secrecy and esotericism. He writes with luminous common-sense: men of average intelligence can understand him.—Yours, &c. G. E. BIDDLE.

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 5 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper, which must bear the sender's full name and address, not necessarily for publication. The Editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archaeology, Folk-lore, Art, Music and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published.

Questions must not be such as can be answered from the ordinary works of reference.

COMPETITION.

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5/- each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to "Academy" Questions and Answers.

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The names and addresses of prize-winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk. Each prize will consist of 5/- worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5/-. No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

One of the four weekly prizes will be awarded, whenever possible, to a Shakespearean Question or Answer.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" carries disqualification.

Questions.

SHAKESPEARE.

* "HENRY FIFT."—In the first folio of Shakespeare, which was published in 1623, the title "Henry Fift," instead of "Henry Fifth," appeared. The Old English originals ended in "fa" and "ta," but the "fa" class finally swallowed up the "ta" class. When was this change finally established, and is "Henry Fift" the last survival of the old "ta" class?—I.L.D. (Hove).

LITERATURE.

ST. JOHNSTONE'S TIPPIT.—In "Old Mortality" Cuddie says to his mother: "It will be my lot to be shot down like a mawkin at some dike-side, or to be sent to heaven wi' a Saint Johnstone's tippit about my haune." We may compare with this the expression "Tyburn tippet" = a halter. What is the origin of the phrase "a Saint Johnstone's tippit"?—L. D. Dordall (Hove).

AUTHOR WANTED.—"Man will doch Rhodos sehen bevor man taust." Who said this, and on what occasion?—J.M.M.G.

MIXED METAPHORS.—Is there any representative collection of these? There seem to be many interesting examples worth perpetuating—e.g. Milton's "Sight so deform what heart of rock could long Dry-eyed behold?" ("Par. Lost," xi.)

I once heard the following from a speaker: "You wish to free these black sheep from their chains with a stroke of the pen." Perhaps your correspondents could supply others.—D. Davies.

GENERAL.

* DOTHBOYS HALL AND OTHER SCHOOLS.—The other day I came across a pamphlet entitled "The Baron of Grogswig Papers," which appears to be a defence of Shaw's school (Dotheboys Hall, of Dickens). The pamphlet also refers to another school at Bowes, kept by a man named Clarkson, and it is alleged that Richard Cobden was educated at this school. Will some reader inform me who the author of the pamphlet was, and corroborate, if possible, the statement regarding Cobden?—D.F. (South Shields).

F. AND H., OF OATLANDS.—In the "Greville Memoirs" Mr. Greville states that in December, 1835, Lord Melbourne told him that he had been down to Oatlands to consult F. and H. about Dr. Arnold, of Rugby, and to ascertain if he could properly make him a Bishop, but they did not encourage him. Who resided at Oatlands, where Lord Melbourne went, and who were "F. and H.," who probably prevented the broadest Churchman of his time being promoted to the Episcopal Bench?—Thomas Jones (Oldham).

"M" AND "N" TEMP. EDWARD VI.—I have a reprint of the second Prayer-book of Edward VI. I notice amongst other peculiarities of the quaint spelling of the period that the letters "m" and "n" are frequently omitted from words, and a hyphen or dash placed over the preceding letter, thus Jerusalē, mē, Abrahā, judgmēt. I should be glad of an explanation of this.—Thomas Jones (Oldham).

BRIGHTON.—Can any reader say in what book or paper the name Brighton first appears, instead of the old name Brighthelmston?—Charles H. M. Pennycook (Brighton).

"GALLEYFOIST" AND "BULLION."—In Massinger's "Fatal Dowry" (II. ii.) the following words, spoken of a fop, occur: "You shall see him in the morning in the Galleyfoist, at noon in the Bullion, in the evening in Quirpo." "Quirpo" means a state of undress (Spanish cuerpo), but what explanation is there of "Galleyfoist" and "Bullion"?—K.E.K. (Oxford).

Answers

LITERATURE.

EAGRE—EAGOR.—Some commentators connect these words, but, according to Murray, the etymology of eagre is unknown, the conjecture which derives it from eagor being untenable, since an O.E. g would have become y in Modern English. It seems evident from the sense that higre (higra, William of Malmesbury) is identical with eagre, though it is difficult to account for this phonologically. Higre is said to be identical with the Bavarian higl, hidl, the name applied to the rising of underground water level, resulting in floods, called hidl-waters. Since the spontaneous swelling or rising of water is a characteristic common to both phenomena, it has been suggested that the origin of both may be traced to the N. Frisian hieen, to rise or swell as water.—J.G.M. (Brighton).

* KIPLING'S NORNS.—The Scandinavian Norns were symbolical of Past, Present, and Future, and as such may be supposed to register, as well as to spin, the designs of fate. Undoubtedly Conchimarion is derived from Conch, a spirally formed shell, but the adjective-ending -marian is so far original. The tritons are represented blowing conchs, or, as we should say, trumpet-shaped shells; but the trumpet is an imitation of the conch. Derivatives of the word conch are fairly frequent, but Kipling's particular instance combines happily a sense of derision with the meaning "conchomio." Reboant is a compound of reboant=reverberant, from Greek rodos to shout. Possibly our vulgarism "to boo" comes from the same root. Mrs. Browning uses the form reboant (in her "Translations from the Greek"), but Kipling's variant introduces a touch of the ridiculous.—S.C.

"HOLY ASIA."—In "Prometheus Bound" Æschylus is not writing a drama of contemporary life, and has no remembrance of Asia as a "barbarian" or "foreign" land while he celebrates the great myth which had its origin there. Greek legend held that the continent was so named after Asia, the mother of Atlas and Prometheus; and at least it was the cradle of the race who treasured most profoundly their glorious mythic past.—S.C.

ROSEMARY.—The origin of the saying "Where rosemary flourishes mistress is master" was probably in the old idea that "rosemary" or "ros-marinus" (sea-dew) was "useful in love-making." The husband very much in love would allow his wife to rule him.—G. A. Jamieson (Cheltenham).

ROSEMARY.—"Where rosemary flourishes mistress is master." This saying is similar to one given by Timbs: "Where rosemary grows there woman reigns." This olden belief is thus explained in the "British Apollo" (fourth ed.), Vol. III., 1740: "Rosemary is held an extraordinary thing to fortify the brain, strengthen the nerve, and recover lost speech, and since woman governs through the power of her tongue, it is no wonder she takes care to cherish that herb . . . in case of a failure."—K.S. (Bristol).

AN ARMY OF "BROWNEBILL" MEN.—The "brown-bill" was formerly used as an offensive weapon (similar to the halberd) by the English foot soldiers in the reign of Charles II., called broon from its being generally kept rusty, thus distinguished from the black-bill, which was painted black. The brown-bill men were therefore akin to the "halberdiers."—K.S. (Bristol).

"RECALL" AND "RECAL."—Mr. Newall seems to found his general principle upon one-sided instances. There is one obvious difference between (1) annul, rebel, expel, control, extol, excel, instil, distil, propel, enthal, appal, fulfil, (2) recall, befall, refill, unroll, enwall, forestall, forestall, unspell. The latter are naturally associated in our minds with familiar simple words; to save a letter would be to break a tie; hence the general tendency to economy is counteracted. Of the former even "fulfil" has strayed too far, in respect of meaning, from "fill" to be influenced by its spelling. We have "enrol" side by side with "enroll"; the former is due, perhaps, to the influence of enroller. As for the Elizabethan "recall," mistaken etymology—in reference to kalais—may be suspected. Is it not probable, by the way, that the unfamiliar spelling of Mr. Newall's own name is due to the influence of those familiar words "all" and "wall"?—B.M.G.

"LAVENGRO."—In Browne's "Religio Medici" I find the following passage: "To speak nothing of the sin against the Holy Ghost, whose cure not only, but whose nature is unknown."—C. Fox Smith (Bolton).

"LAVENGRO."—The sin against the Holy Ghost committed by Peter, the Welsh preacher, is given in Chapter lxxv. of "Lavengro": "I murmured out words of horror—words not to be repeated—and in this manner I committed the sin against the Holy Ghost." Compare with Mark iii. 29; Luke xii. 10. The sin is not denial of non-existence, but blasphemy against the Holy Ghost.—T.H.A.

"LAVENGRO."—The sin against the Holy Ghost committed by Peter, the Welsh preacher, is stated in "Lavengro," Chapter lxxv.: "Awakening in the night, I determined that nothing should prevent my committing the sin. Arising from my bed, I went out upon the wooden gallery; and having stood for a few moments looking at the stars, with which the heavens were thickly strewn, I laid myself down, and, supporting my face with my hands, I murmured out words of horror—words not to be repeated—and in this manner I committed the sin against the Holy Ghost." Compare his father's conversation with one of his neighbours, in the same chapter, with Mark iii. 29, Luke xii. 10.—T.H.A.

NATURE'S SIMILES.—An example of the use of a manufactured article to supply a figure for Nature is found in Scott's poem "Rokeby," iv. 2:

The velvet grass seems carpet meet
For the light fairies' lively feet.—F.G.F.

LONG AND SHORT "O."—M. (Carlisle) inquires why the "o" in progress and process is sounded short. I am surprised to hear that it is so sounded. I always sound it long myself, and I am under the impression that I generally hear other people do the same. I have no doubt that the "o" ought to be long.—H. B. Foyster (Hastings).

A SOUL.—There does not seem to me to be any obscurity, either in grammar or construction, in this quotation. Paraphrased it would run thus: "I count myself to be happy in nothing so much as in [the possession of] a soul, which remembers my good friends." The omission of "the possession of" is common enough. Cp. "She is happy in . . . a dutiful son, obeying her in everything." This is exactly the same construction, and it would present no difficulties.—K.K. (Belfast).

A SOUL.—It is not easy to see any difficulty in the lines quoted. Perhaps their meaning may be made more plain by this paraphrase: "I count myself in nothing else so happy as in [the possession of] a soul, which remembers my good friends."—G.C.

SHAKESPEARE AND SCOTLAND.—No records exist which directly prove that Shakespeare visited Scotland, but as King James VI. of Scotland had granted to the company of players who visited Scotland in 1601 a royal licence to perform "stage plays," and had renewed the licence in 1603, when he ascended the British throne, to the same company of players, which consisted of "Lawrence Fletcher, William Shakespeare, Richard Burbage," and others, it is inferred when this company visited Aberdeen in 1601 that Shakespeare was among them. In the Burgh Records of Aberdeen it is recorded on October 9, 1601, that the Provost, Bailies, and Council ordained the sum of 32 merks to be given to the "King's servandis presentlie in this burght, quha plays, comedies, and staige playes, be reasonn thay ar recommendit be his majesties speciall letter, and hee played sum of thair comedies in this burght, and ordains the said sowme to be payit." And then on October 26, 1601, amongst a number of noblemen and Frenchmen, the honour of the freedom of the Burgh was duly conferred on "Lawrence Fletcher comediane to his Majestie."—D. R. Clark (Glasgow).

STELLA'S BIBLICAL KNOWLEDGE.—Other allusions in the famous "Journal to Stella" may throw some light on this subject. On April 28, 1711, the Dean writes: "Yes, Stella shall have a large printed Bible; I have put it down among my commissions for MD. I am glad to hear you have taken the fancy of intending to read the Bible." November 3, 1711: "Ah, Stella, faith, you leaned upon your Bible to think what to say when you writ that." (Stella or Dingley—perhaps both—had evidently compared him with the "unfortunate steward.") July 17, 1712: "Ppt. (Stella) shall have a great Bible. I have put it down in my memorandum (memorandum) just now." Although Dingley has been described by Roscoe as "a woman of narrow income and limited understanding" ("Life and Works of Jonathan Swift," H. G. Bohn, 1853, p. xxiii), it is possible that her knowledge of the Bible was greater than Stella's. The Dean knew the value of the Bible as "literature," and doubtless wished Stella to know it also. That would seem to be the object of his teasing remarks in Letter XXVII.—George Goodburn (Homerton).

GENERAL.

TIB'S EVE.—There was a St. Tibba, temp. Penda, King of Mercia (615-626); she was commemorated on March 6, conjointly with, but subordinate to, two female relatives; but "Tib" is a low-caste corruption of Elizabeth, and is used freely for the female cat. Shakespeare has the term "tibe-rush."—Pertinax.

JUDGE'S WHITE GLOVES.—The origin of this custom is that in ancient times judges were not allowed to wear gloves on the bench; to give a judge a pair of gloves therefore symbolised that he need not come to the bench.—M. Maclean Dobrée.

UPWARDS OF.—This term, as applied to a certain sum—say, £2,000—according to Webster and other authorities means more than that amount; certainly not less, rather above than below. "Chambers's Cyclopaedia," however, speaks of "upward of, or upwards of, as about the sum named."—K.S. (Bristol).

KILLIGREWS OF FALMOUTH.—In 1663 Drury Lane Theatre was rebuilt, and opened by Thomas Killigrew, the second son of Sir Robert Killigrew, of Hanworth, Middlesex, who had two other sons, William and Henry, these two being dramatic authors of some repute. Thomas, sometimes called the "wit," became page to Charles I., wrote nine plays, but excelled more in conversation than writing. William, the eldest son, was made Governor of Falmouth and Pendennis Castle. The Killigrews of Ardwinick, near Falmouth, were known in the fifteenth century. The Middlesex family of that name were possibly connected with the Cornishmen.—K.S. (Bristol).

* POOLAR.—"Poolar," being coupled with "robber," seems to mean "dishonest." Can it be connected with "pool," the money played for in certain games, and mean one who secures the pool by cheating or unfair play? Afterwards it would be applied to dishonest persons in general in the same manner as "cozener," "jockey," &c. "Pooler" would be derived directly from the "pool" of liquid in the vat.—G. A. Jamieson (Cheltenham).

"THE DEVIL LOOKING OVER LINCOLN."—Many years ago the present writer was looking at the west-front of Lincoln Cathedral, in company with a relation (himself a native of that city), and well remembers his attention being drawn to a grotesque carving there, and the remark, "There, my boy, is the devil looking over Lincoln." Interesting allusions to this saying may be found in "Notes and Queries," Fifth Series, Vol. V., June 24, 1876; Seventh Series, Vol. XII., October 24, 1891; "The Gentleman's Magazine," Vol. I., September 15, 1731; and Fuller's "Worthies." A footnote on page 161 of "The History of Lincoln," published by John Saunders, 1834, has the following: "An alto-relievo over the niche adjoining the entrance to the north aisle is less rude in execution . . . yet in design and treatment is pre-eminently barbarous, being a reproduction of several human figures hurried by demons to the place of everlasting torment, a subject, one would suppose, better suited to the celebrated gate of Dante than the entrance to a Christian Church" (Wild's "Lincoln," p. 17).—George Goodburn (Homerton).

"THE DEVIL LOOKING OVER LINCOLN."—The allusion in this phrase is to a grotesque gargoye, representing his satanic majesty, which projects from the south porch of Lincoln Cathedral. As the cathedral stands on a fairly high hill, the figure seems to be looking down on the city at its foot. The phrase occurs either in Thos. Fuller's "Church History," 1656, or in the same writer's "Worthies of England," 1662.—Jessie Douglas Montgomery (Exeter).

[Replies also received from F.H.W.B. (Hove); M. Tupman; Richard Smith (Bolton); A.W.G. (Oxford); L.L. (Lincoln); M.S.; S.T.J.; and E. T. Quinn (Dublin).]

GUBBINS'S.—One of your correspondents asked for the meaning of this term a short time since. I find Webster describes them as a half-savage race in Devonshire, but cannot trace how they came to be called by this name, nor the true meaning of it.—K.S. (Bristol).

BRICK.—"A regular brick," a jolly good fellow (compare τετραγωνος ανθρωπος "square," and "foursquare to all the winds that blew"). "A fellow like nobody else, and, in fine, a brick" (George Eliot, "Daniel Deronda," Book ii. Chap. 16); "He's a dear little brick" (Thackeray).—M. Maclean Dobrée.

"A BRICK."—The origin of this phrase and the story in reply thereto in THE ACADEMY of January 21—the reference to which is incorrect—is from Plutarch's "Life of Lycurgus." In reply to the question whether they should enclose Sparta with walls, Lycurgus replied: "That city is well fortified which has a wall of men instead of brick."—T.H.A.

THE JUDGE'S WHITE GLOVES.—This custom appears to have its origin in the limitations as to the use of gloves which prevailed in ancient times. The glove, as the symbol of the hand, was accepted as a pledge of good faith; gloves might not be worn in the presence of royalty, nor by persons officiating in a court of law. The former, because undignified purity of intention was supposed to be shown by the bare head and uncovered hands; the latter, because the administration of justice with openness and integrity was implied. Hence the presentation of a pair of white gloves on the occasions when there are no criminal cases signified that the judge was free to vacate the bench and assume the conditions of ordinary life.—S.C. (Hove).

KING ALFRED AND THE CAKES.—Most historians are agreed on this point, that it was on the Isle of Athelney, or "Ethelengay," Isle of Nobles, where King Alfred took refuge after his retreat from his villa at Chippenham, A.D. 876, which was seized by Guthrum, the Danish King. Here Alfred hid from his enemies, and founded an abbey, A.D. 888. Many relics have been found. One, known as King Alfred's Jewel, now at Oxford, was found in the Isle of Athelney. In a herdsman's cottage, not being recognised as the king in disguise, he let the cakes burn before the cottage fire, and an old Somersetshire rhyme runs—

Carn thee mind the keaks, man, and doosen see em burn!
I'm boun thee's eat 'em vast enough az soon as teez thee turn!
—K.S. (Bristol).

ALFRED AND THE CAKES.—The adventure of the cakes certainly took place, if at all, on the Island of Athelney in Somersetshire. Here Alfred hid for quite a year in 878, and ten years later built a Benedictine Abbey in gratitude for his escape. The story of the cakes is given with detail, and the surroundings carefully described, by Asser, Alfred's personal friend; and it also occurs in the Saxon life of St. Neot, written before the Conquest, and in other early MSS.—B.C.H.

SIR WM. DAVENANT.—The germ of the tradition in question may perhaps be found in the "Athenae Oxonienses" of Antony Wood, who was born in Oxford in 1632. He does not allude to any relationship between the two poets, but records that Shakespeare, in his journeys between Stratford and London, was wont to stay at the Crown Inn at Oxford, kept by John Davenant, whose wife "was a very beautiful woman of a good wit and conversation, in which she was imitated by none of her children but by this William." The best-known form of the story is that given by Oldys, the antiquary, who relates the jest made by a citizen of Oxford on the fact that Shakespeare was Davenant's godfather, and adds: "This story Mr. Pope told me . . . and he quoted Mr. Betterton, the player, for his authority." We know that Betterton was industrious in collecting facts and anecdotes about Shakespeare's life, and visited Warwickshire for the purpose. The story was commonly accepted during Davenant's lifetime, for his contemporary, John Aubrey, notes that he was wont, when in a good humour, to hint at some connection between Shakespeare and himself, "and seemed contented enough to be thought his son."—G.C.

ROBINSON CRUSOE.—The ascription of authorship to an Earl of Oxford who died in 1724 needs confirmation; we are not told that the Earl ever claimed it personally, the report being repeated at second-hand. De Foe has left some colour thereto by stating that he had received the MS. from another party, but that was necessary in a personal narrative which he could not have acted himself; and it was part of his mystifications, having written many personal narratives as works of imagination; look, for instance, at his vivid description of the Great Plague of London, 1664-5, while he was an infant born in 1663! Then he assumed the name of Dreinecourt to palm off an unsuccessful book on "Death." He wrote politically pro and con, taking money from both parties. The original authority, a Lord Sunderland, died in 1722; the book appeared first in 1719, and in the interval this Reverend Mr. Holloway often heard the claim from Lord Sunderland, and from him only at "second-hand"; now there was an interval of two years—1722 to 1724—during which he could have tested the report by application to Lord Oxford. But nothing came of it till 1759, a whole generation of time having elapsed.—A. Hall.

"THE DEVIL LOOKING OVER LINCOLN."—In many Lincoln shops may be seen plaster figures of a quaint little demon, the stone original of which is to be found over the "Angel Choir" in the Minster. The story connected with it runs somewhat as follows. The wind and the devil, being good friends, were out on a jaunt together, and came to Lincoln Minster. The Evil One went in to hear the music, while the wind promised to wait outside—and there he still waits, for the devil was so enraptured by the singing that he sat listening until at last he stiffened into stone. If any one doubts this story let him climb up to the cathedral and hear for himself how the wind howls round it.—A.H. (Sheffield).

PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain, on application at the following booksellers, Five Shillings' worth of books. Notices have been dispatched to the several winners and to the following booksellers:

Mr. J. Walser, 36 Western Road, Hove, Sussex.
Mr. Boynton, 21 Hudson Street, Tyne Dock, South Shields.
Mr. E. North, 30 Church Road, Hove, Sussex.
Mr. J. J. Banks, Imperial Library, Cheltenham.

Under the General Editorship of Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON.

"FISHING."

Now Ready. In Two Volumes. Price 25s. net. 12s. 6d. net per Volume.

THESE New Volumes (on "Fishing") of the "Country Life" Library of Sport are offered to the public in the full confidence that nothing so complete of their kind have yet been published. The names of the experts whom the editor has been fortunate enough to enlist in his service are a guarantee in themselves of the treatment of the various subjects. The illustrations are very numerous. There are over two hundred and fifty full-page illustrations from photographs, in addition to the reproduction of a very large number of famous old prints, and especial notice may be claimed for the finely coloured and finely reproduced representations of Salmon and Trout Flies.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME I.

The Salmon Family (Salmonidae): Classification and Distribution. By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
 Salmon: Their Food and Feeding. By Dr. J. Kingston Barton.
 The Natural and Artificial Reproduction of Salmon and Trout. By J. B. Fielding, F.L.S., F.Z.S., &c.
 Salmon Flies. By John James Hardy.
 Salmon Fishing: Hooks and Knots. By John James Hardy.
 On the Make and Choice of Salmon Rods, Reels, &c. By John James Hardy.
 Casting the Salmon Fly. By John James Hardy.
 The Spey Throw. From Notes by Lord Walter Gordon-Lennox.
 Salmon Fishing: Playing the Fish. By John James Hardy.
 Spinning, Prawning, &c., for Salmon. By John James Hardy.
 The Making of Salmon Passes. By the Editor.
 Norwegian Angling. By Captain C. E. Radclyffe.
 Salmon Fishing in the Estuaries. By J. W. Willis Bund.
 The Trout (Salmo Trutta): Classification. By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
 The Breeding of Trout. From Notes by Mr. E. V. Corrie, of the Itchen River Trout-Breeding Establishment, Chiland, near Winchester.
 How to Make a Trout Stream. By E. Valentine Corrie.
 Fishing with the Floating Fly: Definition. By Frederic M. Halford.
 Fishing with the Floating Fly: Patterns of Flies. By Frederic M. Halford.
 Fishing with the Floating Fly: The Rod and Tackle. By Frederic M. Halford.
 Fishing with the Floating Fly: Throwing the Fly. By Frederic M. Halford.
 Fishing with the Floating Fly: Fishing the Fly. By Frederic M. Halford.
 Fishing with the Floating Fly: Killing the Fish. By Frederic M. Halford.
 A Typical Day on the Test. By Martin Smith.
 Fishing with the Wet Fly. By the Editor.
 Angling for Sea Trout. By the Hon. A. E. Gathorne Hardy.
 Some Recollections of Sea Trout Fishing. By the Hon. A. E. Gathorne Hardy.
 The Charr (Salmo alpinus) and Allies. By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
 Angling for Charr (Salmo alpinus). By R. B. Marston.
 The Grayling and Whitefish. By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
 Angling for Grayling. By R. B. Marston.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME II.

The Tarpoons and the Gar-Fish. By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S.
 Tarpon and other Big Fishes of Florida. By J. Turner-Turner.
 The Mahseer and the Bala: Natural History and Classification. By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
 Mahseer Fishing. By Hercules Ross.
 Fishing Rods and Tackle for Mahseer. By John James Hardy.
 The Pike (Esox). By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
 Fishing for Pike: The Quarry. By A. Jardine.
 Fishing for Pike: History and Habits. By A. Jardine.
 Fishing for Pike: Fables and Records. By A. Jardine.
 Fishing for Pike: Rods and Tackle. By A. Jardine.
 Fishing for Pike: "Spinning," "Live Baiting," and "Paternostering." By A. Jardine.
 The Perches (Percide). By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
 Perch: "Paternoster" and "Float Fishing." By A. Jardine.
 The Carp Family (Cyprinide). By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
 Angling for Carp. By R. B. Marston.
 Angling for Barbel. By R. B. Marston.
 Angling for Roach and Rudd. By R. B. Marston.
 Angling for Chub and Dace. By R. B. Marston.
 Angling for Tench. By R. B. Marston.
 Angling for Bream. By R. B. Marston.
 The Eels (Anguillide). By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
 Angling for Eels, &c. By R. B. Marston.
 Eel Trapping. By J. W. Willis Bund.
 British Sea Fish. By G. A. Boulenger, F.R.S., V.P.Z.S., &c.
 Sea Fishing: Introductory. By F. G. Adalo.
 Sea Fishing from Boats: Mackerel Fishing. By F. G. Adalo.
 Sea Fishing from Boats: Pollack Fishing. By F. G. Adalo.
 Sea Fishing from Boats: Whiting and other Fish. By F. G. Adalo.
 Sea Fishing from Boats: Bass Fishing. By F. G. Adalo.
 Sea Fishing from Boats: General Remarks. By F. G. Adalo.
 Sea Fishing from Fixed Positions. By F. G. Adalo.
 Sea Fishing from Fixed Positions: Fishing from Rocks. By F. G. Adalo.
 Sea Fishing from Fixed Positions: Fishing from Sandy Shores. By F. G. Adalo.
 Sea Fishing from Fixed Positions: Fishing from Piers and Harbours. By F. G. Adalo.
 Some Notes on Baits. By F. G. Adalo.
 Fishery Laws. By J. W. Willis Bund.

Published by GEO. NEWNES & CO., LIMITED, Southampton Street, Strand, London, W.C.

PRUDENTIAL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LTD.

Chief Office—HOLBORN BARS, LONDON.

Invested Funds exceed £55,000,000.Summary of the Report presented at the Fifty-Sixth Annual Meeting, held on 2nd March, 1905.

ORDINARY BRANCH.—The number of Policies issued during the year was 71,874, assuring the sum of £8,954,650, and producing a New Annual Premium Income of £377,587.

The Premiums received during the year were £3,969,016, being an increase of £154,160 over the year 1903.

The Claims of the year amounted to £1,654,753. The number of Deaths was 7,139, and 6,259 Endowment Assurances matured.

The number of Policies in force at the end of the year was 742,147.

INDUSTRIAL BRANCH.—The Premiums received during the year were £5,979,335, being an increase of £132,781.

The Claims of the year amounted to £2,230,180. The number of Deaths was 233,015, and 3,066 Endowment Assurances matured.

The number of Free Policies granted during the year to those Policyholders of five years' standing who desired to discontinue their payments was 112,606, the number in force being 1,003,377. The number of Free Policies which became Claims during the year was 22,211.

The total number of Policies in force at the end of the year was 15,577,161; their average duration is ten and three quarter years.

The Assets of the Company, in both branches, as shown in the Balance Sheet, are £55,359,505, being an increase of £4,142,128 over those of 1903.

The Staff Provident Fund, which was founded in 1898 for the benefit of the outdoor staff, shows a satisfactory increase for the year, the total amount standing to the credit of the Fund being £138,280.

Messrs. Deloitte, Dever, Griffiths & Co. have examined the Securities, and their certificate is appended to the Balance Sheets.

FREDERICK SCHOOLING, Actuary.
 D. W. STABLE, Secretary.
 THOS. C. DEWEY, General Manager.

The full Report and Balance Sheet can be obtained upon application.

FOR THE

PROMPT and MOST ABLE CRITICISM .

OF

CURRENT LITERATURE

SEE THE

"Manchester Courier,"

Which commands the services of a large and distinguished

STAFF OF REVIEWERS.

THE

"Manchester Courier,"

PUBLISHES THE

BEST SPECIAL ARTICLES

On Literary and Social Topics of any Daily Paper outside London.

Cassell & Co.'s New List.

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE LANTERN.

By Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., K.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., &c.
With Photogravure Frontispiece, and 39 Full-page Plates, from Photographs by the Author. 12s. net.

Three large impressions were rapidly exhausted, and a fourth is now on sale.

New Fine Art Work uniform with "The Old French Faience" and "English Porcelain."

FRENCH PORCELAIN.

By E. S. AUSCHER (formerly Chef de Fabrication at Sèvres). Translated and Edited by WILLIAM BURTON, Author of "English Earthenware," &c.,

Containing 24 Plates in Colours, and 48 in Black and White, with numerous reproductions of the various marks.
30s. net.

This Edition is limited to 1,250 copies.
[Ready shortly.]

RUSSIA.

By Sir DONALD MACKENZIE WALLACE, K.C.I.E., K.C.V.O.

Entirely new Revised and Enlarged Edition, re-set, and in great part re-written. 2 vols., with Maps. 24s. net.

CANADA AS IT IS.

By JOHN FOSTER FRASER.

With about 40 Full-page Illustrations. 6s.

KING LEOPOLD II.

His Rule in Belgium and the Congo.

By JOHN DE COURCY MACDONNELL.

With 48 Full-page Plates. 21s. net.

REMINISCENCES OF A RADICAL PARSON.

By Rev. W. TUCKWELL, M.A.

With Photogravure Portrait. 9s. net.

New Six Shilling Novels.THE ONE WHO SAW.

By HEADON HILL,

Author of "The Duke Decides," &c.
[Now ready.]

THE ADVENTURES OF AN EQUERRY.

From the Memoirs of Mr. Francis Lesterne, Equerry to his Grace the Great Duke of Marlboro'. Set forth by

MORICE GERARD,

Author of "A Lieutenant of the King," &c.
[Now ready.]

THE GOLDEN POOL:

The Story of a Forgotten Mine.

By RICHARD AUSTIN FREEMAN.

[Ready shortly.]

CASSELL & COMPANY, LTD., LONDON.
AND ALL BOOKSELLERS.

"BLACKWOOD"

For MARCH

CONTAINS

The Sultan of Morocco in Private Life.

By WALTER B. HARRIS.

THE MYSTICS.

By the Author of "John Chilcote, M.P."

A Plea for the Abolition of all Learning.

By MERCATOR ANGLICANUS.

A STUDY OF THE RUSSO-JAPANESE WAR.

By CHASSEUR.

PEREUNT ET IMPUTANTUR.

AT THE UNIVERSITY.

THE EXPEDITION TO TIBET.

With Map.

THE VROUW GROBELAAR'S LEADING CASES.

CLAVERHOUSE IN LITERATURE.

RICHARD HARTLEY, PROSPECTOR.

By DOUGLAS BLACKBURN.

Tales of a Forest.

By GILFRID W. HARTLEY.

Musings Without Method.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS,
Edinburgh and London.

The Journal de Luxe of Scottish Country Life.

THE SCOTTISH FIELD (MONTHLY).

Contents for MARCH, 1905.

Portrait of the Duke of Richmond and Gordon.

Gordon Castle. (Illustrated.)

A Wester Ross Forest. (Illustrated.)

Some Shots I would rather Forget.

By River and Loch. (Illustrated.)

The Returning Salmon,
The Opening Day,
Casts and Conditions, &c.

Country House and Club.

Natural Science in the Poets.

Great Ship and Yacht Builders. (Illustrated.)

On Tintock Tap. (With Photo.)

Motoring, Golf, Bowling.

Moor and Gamekeepers' Notes.

Garden and Orchard.

On the Farm.

Ladies' and Gents' Fashions, &c.

Price 6d.; by post, 7½d.

(From Head Office only).

From all Booksellers, Bookstalls, or direct from

SCOTTISH FIELD,
11 BOTHWELL STREET, GLASGOW.

Smith, Elder & Co.'s List.

Mrs. Humphry Ward's
New Novel,

THE MARRIAGE OF WILLIAM ASHE,

WILL BE READY AT ALL
BOOKSELLERS' AND LIBRARIES
ON THE

9th of MARCH.

With Illustrations by ALBERT STERNER.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

Mrs. Henry de la Pasture's
New Novel.

PETER'S MOTHER.

By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE, Author of "Deborah of Tod's," "Adam Grigson,"
"Cornelius," &c.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

Daily Telegraph.—"Peter's Mother" is as delightful a character as the imagination of a novel writer ever figured forth.... a better novel the reader could not desire."

Guardian.—"This is a novel which ought to have a very marked success. The story is admirably told and the characters are all living and distinct.... As for Lady Mary, she is a triumph. Mrs. de la Pasture is sincerely to be congratulated upon having created so attractive a heroine for so pleasant a book."

THE CORNHILL MAGAZINE

For MARCH. Price One Shilling.

CONTENTS:

Rose of the World. Book II. Chaps. 19-21. By AGNES and EGEERTON CASTLE.

The Noble Lady's Tale. By THOMAS HARDY.

The Art of Conversation. By the late Canon AINGER.

The Home-coming of Vincent Brooke. By HUGH CLIFFORD, C.M.G.

The Nile Fens. By D. G. HOGARTH.

The Frankfort Fleet. By the Rev. A. T. S. GOODRICK.

The Soldier and the Plague. By WALTER FRITH.

Barbados the Loyal. By FRANK T. BULLEN.

The Deserted Village. By PALAMEDES.

The King's Revoke. Chaps. 6-7. By Mrs. MARGARET L. WOODS.

LONDON:

SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15 Waterloo Place

The Academy and Literature

No. 1713. Established 1869.

London: 4 March 1905.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17s. 6d. a year.]

Notes

THERE is never an important proposal made in the England of to-day that does not give rise to discussion, and the movement to provide a Shakespeare memorial is no exception to this rule. A number of eminent men conceived the idea of forming some kind of Shakespeare institute with a library, a museum, lecture-rooms and the other apparatus with which use has made us familiar. But immediately an opposition was started, and a number of men, at least equally eminent with the proposers, objected, first, that a new Shakespeare museum could only be "a rubbish heap of trivialities"; second, that a Shakespeare library must be hopelessly inferior to that in the British Museum; third, that accommodation exists on every hand for all the lecturing that can be desired and for much that is of doubtful utility.

THE disinterested and indifferent reader will probably be inclined to weigh the one set of authorities against the other and perhaps he will not deem it altogether insignificant that the meeting which was to give a send-off to the movement was held in the Mansion House at the invitation of no less a person than the Lord Mayor. Thus it has, at least, the authority of the City magnates. The Lord Mayor was backed up by Lord Reay, Lord Avebury, Sir E. Maunde Thompson, Sir Harry Johnson, Sir Lewis Morris of Penbryn, Dr. Furnivall, the Chief Rabbi, Mr. Bram Stoker, Mr. Beerbohm Tree, Professor Israel Gollancz and other representatives of that admirable class of society which colours business with a tincture of letters. On the other hand, the signatories to the objection were for the most part of the family of scribes. They included Mr. Barrie, Mr. Bradley, Mr. Edmund Gosse and Mr. Maurice Hewlett, Mr. Gilbert Murray and Mr. Aldis Wright, Mr. Walkley and Sir Frederick Pollock. It is no wonder that with such a division of talent before it "The Times" on the morning after the meeting maintained a judicious silence; unless, indeed, an indication of the Editor's opinion is the insertion, after the report, of a letter from the Editor of "Punch," telling the would-be memorialists to "look round at the specimens we already possess and—beware."

BUT the question is not one to be decided by the weight of names. It resolves itself really into a matter of taste and common-sense. If a memorial worthy of the fame of Shakespeare could be devised, there is not one of us but would willingly lend a hand towards carrying it through. But for three hundred years his fame has survived and grown without any such aid and it seems somewhat late in the day now to set up what appears to be, as far as we can gather from the description of it, a sort of glorified mechanics' institute to his memory. Nor do we think that the supporters of the idea did their cause much good by describing the ideal scheme as that of a great Shakespeare Temple which should be erected in London to do for humane learning what Burlington House did for natural science. If it be necessary to erect another university, by all means let it be done, but this business of appointing general and local committees, and working up a memorial on the plan adopted at Queen Victoria's Jubilee, will never commend itself, to the literary intellect at any rate.

Two well-known writers have died during the past week. Sir Wemyss Reid had the qualities rather of a good journalist than an author of enduring repute; but his life of his friend W. E. Forster remains an invaluable book of reference to students of mid-Victorian politics, and his monograph on Charlotte Brontë was a sound piece of work. To judge Mr. Guy Boothby's work by the canons of literature would be to submit it to a test which the author never pretended to challenge. Mr. Boothby, a man of exuberant vitality, found story-writing not only easy and pleasant, but a rapid means of providing for the hobbies of a country gentleman. No doubt he felt that vicarious adventure was better than none at all; but the vein of invention which, in the days of "Dr. Nikola," promised to be rich, had been worked out some time before his early death.

A FRIEND of Stevenson and of Henley, a translator of Shakespeare and a contributor to English reviews, M. Marcel Schwob, who died on Sunday last of pneumonia, was better known in England than most French men of letters. Quite recently a young English novelist, Mr. Arnold Bennett, has dedicated his "Tales of the Five Towns" to M. Schwob, his "literary godfather in France." It was a common love of Villon that drew M. Schwob and Stevenson together. The French critic's article on Stevenson in the "New Review," just ten years ago, was widely read, and since then the publication of the Stevenson letters has shown how much each admired and was interested in the other. With Henley M. Schwob shared a love of slang, which was, indeed, the chief study of the author of the "Jargon des Coquillards" and part author of the "Etude sur l'Argot Français," and his knowledge of all kinds of obscure dialects and phrases was wide and exact. He will be remembered as the author of the version of "Hamlet" which Mme. Sarah Bernhardt played in this country and her own, and had recently finished a translation of "Macbeth." M. Schwob was only thirty-seven, and by his death the Société de Linguistique de Paris loses a distinguished member, and English literature a keen and appreciative student.

M. SCHWOB was equally well up in ancient and modern English literature. "Spicilège," a book of miscellaneous papers, which he published in 1896, contains, besides an article on Stevenson, a very pleasant little chat about Mr. George Meredith, whom he visited at Dorking. He knew his Defoe too, and translated "Moll Flanders." It is now an open secret (the book, indeed, is now catalogued under his name) that he was the "Loyson-Bridet" who wrote the very satirical traité de journalisme called "Mœurs de Diurnales," some two years ago. The book was pretty widely read in England, and the French Press, it is hardly necessary to say, took the joke in the spirit in which it was meant.

We are interested to see that Messrs. Methuen & Co. advertise the appearance of a new edition of the poems of Keats. It will be of peculiar value, as certain MSS. of the poet have lately been discovered, notably an early MS. of "Hyperion." This has been published quite recently by the Clarendon Press in a beautiful but necessarily costly facsimile, under the editorship of Mr. Ernest de Sélincourt, who is also editing the complete poetical works, which will be of immense interest to all lovers of Keats who have been unable to obtain the facsimile. "For we are, as it were, admitted to the poet's confidence; we are at his side as he reviews his rougher work, and share some of his excitement as passages of haunting beauty evolve from a form in which they had failed to express to the full the force of his imaginative conception." We quote from the editor's introduction to the Autograph MS.

It is exciting to think what treasures are hidden away in the cupboards of old libraries and may any moment come to light; we cannot refrain from quoting (from the same source) the history of this latest discovery: "The MS. seems to have been given by Keats to Leigh Hunt, and after his death in 1859 Thornton Hunt presented it to Miss Bird, the sister of Dr. George Bird, a distinguished physician who had been both the medical adviser and intimate friend of his father. Miss Bird learnt only quite recently that the MS. was in the handwriting of Keats, and immediately gave the Trustees of the British Museum the opportunity of purchasing it for the nation." If every cupboard and secret drawer in the kingdom were turned out by experts, what priceless things might not be forthcoming!

THE new Treaty of Commerce between Russia and Germany indirectly raises the question of International Copyright. Russia engages, within three years, to "open pour-porlers with a view to the conclusion of a Convention for the reciprocal protection of the rights of authors"; and some facts published in a French paper show that the matter is one in which the Empire of the Tsar badly needs to be brought into line with other civilised communities. Of nine novels published in Russia, only three are Russian, the rest being translated—chiefly from the French. Of 2,800 plays produced at Russian theatres in 1904 only 500 were Russian. The German repertory supplied 218, and the balance came from France. The only theatre in Russia which ever pays anything to a foreign author is the Michael Theatre at St. Petersburg; and the honorarium in which its munificence expresses itself is only calculated at the modest rate of 32s. an act.

THE question "What is an 8vo?" has just been raised in the Westminster County Court. The facts of the case are rather interesting. In one of the trade papers a librarian advertised for Johnson's "British Poisonous Plants" and in reply received a report from the plaintiffs, a firm of booksellers, offering an 8vo edition for six shillings. The book was ordered, but on reaching the purchaser it was discovered to be not a real 8vo, as the term is understood among book-buyers and booksellers, but a crown 8vo, measuring $7\frac{1}{2}$ inches by 5 inches. The book was therefore returned and hence the reason for the action. However, the Judge refused to see the difference between an 8vo and a crown 8vo, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs. It would seem, therefore, that in the eye of the law the word 8vo has not a fixed and definite meaning.

JAMES McNEILL WHISTLER for the greater part of his life lived so much outside official patronage that it gives one an odd feeling to find the Board of Education taking him under its wing. It does not seem quite in the nature of things that from South Kensington should come a little pamphlet entitled "J. A. McNeill Whistler, Etchings, &c., in the National Art Library, Victoria and Albert Museum. With a bibliography." The last mentioned is quite a curiosity. It contains "The Times" report of the libel action, Whistler v. Ruskin, and the leading article which followed on the succeeding day, letters in reference to the case and cuttings from various weekly and daily publications. Thus, when one goes to study the etchings, lithographs, and wood-engravings of the great painter—which any one can do on Mondays, Tuesdays and Saturdays, free, from 10 A.M. to 10 P.M.—it is pleasant to know that the mind can at the same time be refreshed with a re-perusal of the newspapers in which he at one time cut such a prominent figure.

THE Treasury has revealed a sense of humour in the conditions of its proposed grant for a Welsh National Museum and Library. The grant is dependent upon "sufficient local support being forthcoming." That amounts to putting the privilege up to auction, and instantly Carnarvon, Cardiff, Swansea, and Aberystwith are bidding against each other in honourable rivalry, while the Committee of the Privy Council sit waiting to see who makes the highest bid. Carnarvon offers its historic and beautiful castle—no bad bid; the other three are generous in offers of sites, building grants and rates. The results should be worthy of Wales and the Treasury's stroke of humour, which will have answered well if only the generous rivalry now aroused does not degenerate, when the choice has been made, into jealousy.

MR. J. P. MORGAN has bought the manuscript of "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table" for four thousand dollars. No particulars are to hand yet, but we should like to know whether this is the actual "copy" that went to the printer of "The Atlantic Monthly" in 1858, or some full-dress transcript made by the little doctor for his own use. His handwriting, an example of which we remember to have seen reproduced somewhere, was very fine, neat and sloping, and, for a physician's hand, easily legible. But his prescriptions, if any are still in existence, might tell another story.

THE controversy that is being carried on in one of the daily papers about a man being too old at forty is really somewhat idle, in spite of anything it can claim from having been originated by Dr. Osler. Ernest Renan held an exactly contrary opinion—namely, that no man had any business whatever to write until he was forty. And if we look at the history of authorship we seem to find that each had his or her own time to begin. Jane Austen wrote “Pride and Prejudice” before she was much out of her teens, while Fielding did not embark on “Joseph Andrews” until he was over forty. Dickens began as a youth, Scott did not write novels until middle age. It is a matter of temperament, purely and simply, and while we think the probabilities are against any one committing a masterpiece, to use My Uncle Toby’s fine phrase, ere he come to his majority, it would not by any means be wise to bid him wait until the autumn of his life before dipping his pen seriously in the ink.

SIR CHARLES ELIOT, whose authorship of the important work on the Near East, “Turkey in Europe,” by “Odysseus,” is now an open secret, has produced in “The East Africa Protectorate,” to be published by Mr. Edward Arnold on March 8, a very complete and interesting account of the country of which he recently resigned the Commissionership. The book contains a wealth of valuable and authoritative information on British East Africa, its problems and its prospects, and is illustrated with a number of exceptional photographs and two maps.

WHILE Cambridge has been celebrating the year of jubilee of its A.D.C., the Oxford O.U.D.S. has produced “The Clouds” of Aristophanes, which we discussed in our last number. It was Cambridge that began trying Aristophanes on modern audiences with “The Birds”; since then “The Wasps” at Cambridge and “The Frogs” and now “The Clouds” at Oxford have proved that Aristophanes is a genuine classic; that he has, that is, the power of amusing or interesting all ages, our own, his own, and the age of Molière, who borrowed freely from “The Clouds” for his “Bourgeois Gentilhomme.” The performance at Oxford has been a complete success. Mr. A. D. Godley, who combines a sense of humour with the necessary scholarship, has acted as stage-manager with the happiest results, and the acting of Mr. C. W. Mercer as Strepsiades, Mr. E. L. Scott as Socrates, and, indeed, of all concerned, brought out the delicious and still perfectly fresh fun of the thing to the full. Sir Hubert Parry’s genius for the comic in music, which was delightfully obvious in the performance of “The Frogs” twelve years ago, has only ripened with time, and his score for “The Clouds” will rank as a masterpiece among musical jeux d’esprit.

Bibliographical

EDMUND WALLER was born three hundred years ago, on March 3, 1605; he enjoyed considerable repute as a poet during the mid-part of the seventeenth century, and—judging by the many reissues of his works—his writings continued to command some measure of popularity throughout the eighteenth century. Seeing the nature of those writings, and the poetical temper of the nineteenth century, it is not surprising that there was a falling off of interest during the past hundred years. Yet in various collected editions of the poets Waller’s works found their place in 1806

(Park), 1810 (Chalmers), 1822, 1854 (Bell), 1857 (Gillilan), and 1893 (Muses’ Library, re-issued 1905). In addition his “Select Poems” were issued in 1819 and “Songs and Verses selected from the Works of Edmund Waller” as recently as 1902. He is also sufficiently represented in the principal anthologies, so that no reader desirous of making his acquaintance by way of celebrating his tercentenary need have any difficulty over doing so. Waller is best remembered by two or three lyrics, by two or three witty retorts, and, perhaps, by one familiar quotation:

“The soul’s dark cottage, battered and decayed,
Lets in new light through chinks which time has made.”

It is announced that we are to have a new edition—prepared by Mr. Charles Whibley—of Disraeli’s “Lord George Bentinck: a Political Biography,” a work which was very favourably received on its first appearance in 1852; and of which an eighth edition was published in 1872. Bentinck was more widely known to his immediate contemporaries as a prominent figure on the Turf than as a notable politician, which accounts for the subtitle of Disraeli’s work. At the time of writing this biography Disraeli was greatly embarrassed by old debts and, according to Froude, that embarrassment was considerably lessened by his receiving “a large sum from a private hand for his ‘Life of Lord George Bentinck.’”

I notice that one of the popular series of “classics” is to give us a reprint of Dodd’s “Beauties of Shakespeare,” a work with which those who already know their Shakespeare can have but little sympathy, yet one which must have served as introduction for thousands of readers to the complete series of plays. Is it not recorded that it was through Dodd’s “Beauties” that Goethe first acquired a knowledge of Shakespeare? It is to be feared, however, that many people read the “beauties” of an author as a substitute for rather than as introduction to that author’s works, and that Charles Lamb’s gibe was justified: “You have seen Beauties of Shakespeare? so have many people who never saw beauties in Shakespeare.” Any way, Dodd appears to have an increasing popularity. The “Beauties of Shakespeare” were first published in 1752—twenty-five years before his execution for forgery—and reprinted in 1757 and 1780. Belonging to the first half of the nineteenth century, I know of five, and to the second half eleven reprints of the book; the latest having been issued in 1893.

Robert Greene, the author of the “Groat’s-worth of Wit” and stigmatiser of Shakespeare as “the only Shakespeare in a country,” has not been altogether neglected by modern editors and reprinters, but there should nevertheless be a ready welcome for the complete edition of his plays and poems, which Mr. Churton Collins has in hand. The late Dr. Grosart, it is true, edited “The Life and Complete Works of Robert Greene” (1881-86); but that was in the limited editions of the Huth Library. Other reprints during recent years have been limited to separate works. In 1887 the late Henry Morley added “Pandosto: or the Triumph of Time” to the “Winter’s Tale” in Cassell’s National Library; in 1889 there was a reprint of the “Groat’s-worth of Wit,” in 1892 the “Honourable History of Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay,” edited by Professor A. W. Ward, was added to the Clarendon Press series; and in 1898 Dr. Grosart edited “The Tragical Reign of Selimus” in the Temple Dramatists. Dr. Grosart also compiled in his little Elizabethan Library a volume of selections from Greene under the punning title of “Green Pastures” (1894) and the same scholar discussed the subject “Was Robert Greene substantially the author of ‘Titus Andronicus’?” (1896).

WALTER JERROLD.

Bernardin de Saint-Pierre

To recall the life of Bernardin de Saint-Pierre is like turning over the pages of some old illustrated book full of delicate, formal French drawings—innumerable little vignettes of romantic tropical landscapes; of smiling ladies and gallant adventurers with epaulettes; of raging tempests; and gardens; and shipwrecks; and scenes of family affection; and garlands and love knots; and hundreds, thousands of the most complicated Moral Emblems. For whether we read of him in one of his many biographies, or consult his own copious and most admirable letters, it is impossible not to be struck with the definite, anecdotic, pictorial quality of all Bernardin's experience. He is like our own Pepys of the Diary in that respect: whatever he is doing we can always see him at it. Eagerness about everything which struck him as either noble or curious or beautiful; the sense of entertainment; a lively interest in life; an ardent preoccupation with his temporary environment, were gifts which lasted him for seventy-seven years. He tasted many of the joys of the artist, and all the pangs and raptures of the sentimentalist—and like all sentimentalists he had a very sensitive perception of what was due to him from others.

He was a native of Havre, in Normandy. His family was without pretension: an excellent example of the provincial French family of the upper middle class; but it is characteristic of Bernardin that he clung, all his life long, and with that smiling and impassioned obstinacy which was so much a part of him, to the very doubtful legend of his descent from the famous Eustache de Saint-Pierre of Calais. For a time, indeed, he tried to claim and use the arms and title of chevalier; and got into trouble for doing so; and mightily indignant he was at the officious friend who rescued him from his difficulties by demonstrating the absurdity of his pretension, instead of recognising that here again he was merely striking that romantic attitude before the facts of existence which was to be his consolation for nearly three-quarters of a century; to feed his genius, and help him to produce one masterpiece.

He was born, then, on January 19, 1737, and we soon catch glimpses of him, the quaintest of small French figures, "loving all animals," consciously and virtuously "compassionate to his playmates," but finding his chief solace in building a hut among the honeysuckles and the beehives of his father's garden, in order that he might lead "the life of an Anchorite," far from the temptations of Havre. It was here that he read "Robinson Crusoe," and so, speedily, found his vocation. For, not to the boy Heine, reading of Don Quixote under the whispering German lindens in the old Hof garden at Bonn, did there come, through that same medium of an immortal story-book, a more imperative revelation of the inner meanings of life. From the hour he discovered "Robinson Crusoe" Bernardin de Saint-Pierre realised what was, to him, the ideal and purpose of existence. And it is significant that he never forgot his ideal; never wearied of it; never lost his first rapturous belief in the merit of islands as a panacea for all human perplexities. Forty, fifty years later, he was still beguiling and thrilling all the sentimentalists of France with a scheme for leading the Moral Life upon a "desert island" in the Seine, where, under blossoming tropical trees (induced to blossom, apparently, from the highest motives) a burial-ground "for the Benevolent" was to adjoin a banqueting hall "for the Marriage Festivities of the Virtuous Poor," and those "Fathers of Families who had inadvertently run into debt" were to sit "in absolute Security" and contemplate "an artificial Meadow." All this to the accompaniment of flutes, and without detriment to the sacred companionship "of the Muses." All this "near Paris" and some ten years, or less, before the outbreak of the French Revolution.

In his earliest years, however, the Fortunate Isles of his dreaming, though equally moral in their chosen inhabitants, were by no means so easy to get at. With the amazing good faith of the born romantic, and with a curious touch too of the practicality of the artist, Bernardin had no sooner finished some rather desultory mathematical studies than he made a futile attempt to enter the corps of engineers, considering that in that direction lay his best chance of realising his secret arrière-pensée of becoming "a half mythological coloniser; a sort of second Orpheus or Amphion." For, notwithstanding Jean-Jacques and all the Rights of Man, it was ever Bernardin's burning desire "to wear the King's uniform." He succeeded in so far that, in 1760, he was actually present, though on a somewhat dubious and uncomfortable footing, during a short campaign in Germany. He appears to have quarrelled on this occasion with all his superior officers; and, when he subsequently set sail for Malta—his first Island!—he found no better luck. Seeing no prospect of quick advancement in France, it occurred to him to place his services and his schemes for the betterment of mankind at the service of the Empress Catherine of Russia. He was then about twenty-four or twenty-five years of age; so exceedingly handsome, of such engaging manners and with such a radiant genius for friendship, that the account of his long journey northward, through Holland, and Lubeck, and Poland, sounds like the story of the progress of an impecunious fairy prince. In Poland especially (where he lingered for a couple of years or more) his life becomes more "illustrated" than ever. We see him at Warsaw, the irresistible lover of a beautiful Polish princess, returning home from his feasts and balls in the early morning, to dream (he says) "only of Arcady." We see him "as Achilles" in a tragedy, where all the other players are princes and princesses, "the daughters and nieces of kings." But he has only a little room of his own amongst all these splendours; "a small place for which he pays five ducats"; and after all there must be a certain lack of islands, deserted or otherwise, in Poland. Presently we find our Bernardin in St. Petersburg, with an ardent project for a moral and humanitarian colony on the shores of the Caspian Sea which probably amused, though it failed to convince, the great Catherine.

By this time he was twenty-eight years of age. He had no profession; no private means of his own; no reasonable prospect of any sort of advancement. When he returns to France (in 1766) it is chiefly with the vague hope of obtaining some lucrative post from the King's ministers. Bernardin was always full of these hopes: for ever compiling petitions to men in power, and fervently expecting that miracle which shines before the eyes of the improvident. It was almost by accident, apparently, in the intervals of waiting upon great men's leisure, that Bernardin, who was then living in the little house of a curé in a Parisian suburb, began to think of writing as a means of livelihood. His first effort was, naturally enough, a volume of his travels; and the moment it was begun behold! his imagination was afire. In a trice his old dreams of bettering the human race are all awake with a shout. He has plans for regenerating, revising, re-edifying the entire universe. "I have invented a system to account for the movement of the Earth" (he writes) "so daring, so new, and so probable that I dare confide it to no one." And it was in the lively midst of such preoccupations that the Government appointment came which sent him, as a civil engineer, to the island of Mauritius. He was then thirty-one years of age, and it is one of the curious facts in the history of imaginative literature that twenty years were to pass before his experiences and emotions of that journey took shape in a simple little story of immortal beauty and significance. Bernardin was past fifty when he wrote "Paul et Virginie." In the interval he had published a "Voyage à l'Ile de France"—a book as thick and overgrown as a jungle, and as full of unexpected blossoms—he had made the acquaintance of some of the literary men of Paris; he had friends among the Encyclopedists; he had a close friend and comrade in Jean-Jacques Rousseau. One of Bernardin's chief pleasures at that time was to go botanising with Jean-Jacques among the lanes and waste places of the Parisian banlieue. He was so poor that if he were asked out to dinner he was obliged to walk, "even though it be five leagues." He lived in a garret, high up, overlooking Paris, and still he spent half his days imploring every possible and impossible personage for assistance—but always, be it observed, with a punctilio. It is said that when the King granted him at last a small pension, Bernardin refused to receive it because the communication had reached him through a subordinate. Unknown, disappointed, baffled at every turn, nothing could rob this incorrigible dreamer of his Dream. In his own eyes he was always, and only, beginning. "Enfin j'ai cherché de l'eau dans mon puits," he writes at over fifty. And this time he had found his "Paul et Virginie."

The enthusiasm which this simplest of little masterpieces awoke in the public can only be compared with the popular excitement awakened by "Clarissa." In a few weeks Bernardin de Saint-Pierre found himself the most distinguished literary man of his day. Everyone was reading him: from the Queen, Marie Antoinette, to the little sewing-girl in her attic, there was not a woman in France but wept floods of enchanted tears over the fate of the two island lovers. Everything had come to Bernardin at the same moment: glory, applause, a fortune, and the unbounded admiration of his greatest contemporaries. When Napoleon met him, he is reported to have said: "Monsieur Bernardin, you should give us a new 'Paul et Virginie' every six months." At fifty-five his own publisher's daughter insisted upon marrying the celebrated writer; and after her death, another girl of seventeen, Mademoiselle Désirée de Pelleporc, felt herself honoured to become the bride of this hero of sixty-three. This was a particularly happy marriage. "I am an old tree," he writes somewhere, "but I bear green young branches." And we find him addressing his young wife as "my Delight, my Month of May."

He died the year before Waterloo, in 1814, leaving behind him some seven or eight lengthy works besides a collection of letters which may be classed with those of Cowper. He was the first of modern writers to feel the charm and call of alien countries; he was the first romantic explorer: the first to seek for sentiment in landscape: the first to fall under the spell of "that distance where lives joy." And his influence has been incalculable. Chateaubriand, Alfred de Musset, Leconte de Lisle, Fromentin—"cet homme qui aimait passionnément le bleu"—and in our own day Pierre Loti, are only a few out of the long and splendid line of his spiritual children. Despite all his senti-mentalities, his intricate moralities, his weaknesses, his palpable affectations, his bankrupt Fathers, and his islands, Bernardin de Saint-Pierre remains one of the great writers: an Innovator: a genius: one of the world's Torchbearers. For he wrote one small immortal book—a book to be classed with the story of Daphnis and Chloé. A thing all compact with youth and beauty and tenderness. A book as simple as a flower—and with the impeccable perfection of a flower.

Matthew Arnold

LOOKED at from one point of view, Matthew Arnold's request, that he should not be made the subject of a formal biography, takes on a spice of malicious humour. Was he conscious, when he uttered it, that he might thus perhaps stave off the evil day which sooner or later overtakes every distinguished man—his day of judgment, his final summing up? For there is little doubt that Arnold was, from time to time, gravely concerned about what posterity would think of him. Glancing through his works generally we find him, while he sits in judgment upon others and sets people in their places, dwelling insistently on words like "fame," "glory," "reputation," "posterity," and their real meaning for literature. Especially in his letters does he reveal a wholesome consciousness, quite the reverse of morbid, that the same judgment which he measured out so freely to others would one day inevitably be meted out to him.

Yet, although he will have been dead just seventeen years on April 15, and although he had ceased to produce really important work for some years before his death, it cannot even at this late date be said that he is finally judged. The process of literary disintegration which got to work so quickly on reputations greater than his, like those of Carlyle and Ruskin, has not yet had any appreciable effect upon him. The way in which that process works he has himself described in the essay on Joubert:

"The tastes and ideas of one generation are not those of the next. The next generation in its turn arrives—first its sharpshooters, its quick-witted audacious light troops; then the elephantine main body. The imposing array of its predecessors it confidently assails, riddles it with bullets, passes over its body. It goes hard then with many once popular reputations, with many authorities once oracular. . . . As Lord Macaulay's own generation dies out, as a new generation arises, without those ideas and tendencies of its predecessor which Lord Macaulay so deeply shared and so happily satisfied, will he give the same pleasure? And if he cease to give that, has he enough light in him to make him last? . . ."

This was written in 1864, five years after Macaulay's death. Even then the reputation of Macaulay, so great in its day, was beginning to suffer by the disenchanting process here described. Macaulay has long since been definitely judged; his books either stand on our shelves, stripped of much of their original glory and just for what they are, or have been removed from them altogether. Carlyle, who died in 1881, and Ruskin, gone as recently as 1900, have also suffered, all too quickly for their admirers, in a similarly definite way. Matthew Arnold, after seventeen years, still eludes his critics, friends, and enemies alike. He even eludes that most dangerous of critics, the friendly enemy. The most eager literary sportsman, the keenest hunter-down of inflated reputations, has, however grudgingly, to admit that he stands; that the only really serious punishment up to the present administered to him has been the gentle and inevitable one which time itself inflicts. His books are rapidly falling out of copyright; he has been published in an édition de luxe—last solemn rite that attends the falling-in of the literary monopoly; he has been made the subject of copious bibliographies (from which we learn how much, alas! of his stray work has never been reprinted at all); and he has been for some years now coming out—as he himself would have been glad to know—in quite inexpensive editions. Most of these things are not signs of decay but rather of a more vigorous life. He stands. But for what precisely does he stand? We might—for all the answer we have got from his critics—summon from the shades a vision of his amiable countenance, mocking but urbane—"the affable archangel"—cheerfully bidding us proceed once more to the solution as best we may.

In the first place the whole body of his reprinted works, as collected in the fifteen volumes recently published by Messrs. Macmillan, is extraordinarily various, embraces so much as regards mere subject-matter: poetry, literary criticism, religion, education, and sociology. In the second place—and this is where the main difficulty comes in—it is, as regards its spirit, full of perplexing contradictions and paradoxes. You perhaps admire the poet who unlocks his heart in verses touched with who can say how much of delicate melancholy, religious and philosophic gentleness, resignation, and calm? But you turn to the essays "On Translating Homer" and are amazed to find a terrible and remorseless critic, annihilating to his adversary in the reply. As a hater of fussy people, you perhaps agree that nothing can be more delectable than the cheerful, killing banter he administered to doctors of sociology and would-be reformers of mankind? But it is distinctly disconcerting when you find elsewhere the same cheerful insouciant style doing yeoman service against your own religion and the doctors of your established church. Or you are yourself a reformer, cherishing "Literature and Dogma" as a fighting masterpiece? What can you make of this man's weak and washy poetry, or of his studies in obscure and exiguous temperaments like the De Guérins? You are a Liberal?—he attacks your want of fairness, clearness, balance: and praises Tories. You are a Tory?—he dines with you, shoots with you, fishes in your trout streams, and then shamelessly satirises the whole barbarous constitution of the society of which you are an important pillar. Last, you insist upon admiring absolutely and without fear of contradiction that wonderful style, compact of simplicity, rapidity, balance, cheerfulness, gaiety, wit. Greatest wonder of all—the author of it was no careless free-liver, as one might imagine, but a mere hard-driven school-inspector, whose official life was a perpetual round of inconspicuous and unremunerative drudgery!

How to resolve this elusive personality into its elements; how to fix and make its meaning plain so that the student, coming after, should make no mistake about it—that is the task which many persons since his death have essayed in vain. In the face of it, his request that he should not be made the subject of a "formal biography" takes on a new and amusing aspect, only this time the humour is distinctly sardonic. At least four excellently-accomplished literary men have offered us informal biographies (not to speak of the hosts of authors who have given us minor studies). Professor Saintsbury gave one to the world in 1899; Mr. Herbert Paul published one in 1902; Mr. G. W. E. Russell and Mr. W. H. Dawson both published a "Life" last year. Of these the best-reasoned, though not the most readable, was Mr. Dawson's. If a definite judicial summing-up of Matthew Arnold's work were to be done, it would be difficult to choose a more able man for the work than any one of these writers, all of whom have especial weight and authority in speaking for him. Yet that each book has been more or less of a failure stands almost confessed by the rapidity with which these "lives" have followed each other. High as may be the praise which a reader of them will be ready to give to their ability and literary excellence, he is obliged to confess that the subject of them still resists all these attempts to resolve, fix, and explain him. Commenting upon these books came then the brilliant essay, recently published in the "Quarterly Review," by the President of Magdalen College, Oxford. No one has more right to speak for Matthew Arnold than Mr. Warren. And what does he accomplish in the way of summing-up? The essay had a curious and unexpected effect upon at least one pleased reader of it. He could not agree with Mr. Warren that the full and formal biography of Matthew Arnold was now almost within hailing distance. He could not agree that Matthew Arnold's poetry had suffered by reason of his ignorance of physical science, by reason of the "Origin of Species" having left no effect upon it, as it left its effect on Tennyson's "In Memoriam." Nor could he agree that Matthew Arnold as a poet was in about the same class "with Collins." That least of all. Further, he almost despaired when he read the categorical statement that Matthew Arnold accomplished least by his religious writing, something more by his political, most by his educational work—unless "educational" were taken to mean his complete general effect. And that, in literary criticism, Matthew Arnold was more of an artist than a scholar, made him wonder if the essays on Homer had ever been written. To none of these things, in fact, could he give a moment's assent. But of one delightful result of reading Mr. Warren's article he fully and freely acknowledges the benefit.

Most of Matthew Arnold's critics and biographers have striven to pin him down—as vainly as Mr. Warren here and there throughout his essay tries to pin him down—to a definite body of doctrines, to assess his various "values," as if the important thing were to lay him out, stark and stiff, as representative of this, that, or the other point of view in the different departments of his literary activity. Mr. Warren, by virtue of his intimate knowledge of his subject, coupled with his own abounding brilliancy, accomplishes—strange to say—exactly the opposite result! The final effect of his essay on one reader of it was to set free once more that wonderful elusive spirit and personality which others had vainly striven to bind with chains; to send him back not to the biographies of Arnold and the criticisms of his work, but to Arnold himself once more in all his fifteen volumes, gladly to find renewal and refreshment in the light and happiness which they afford. After seventeen years it is something in a man that he can still do this: that, after so long a time his work still remains un-"classified" and unassailed: nay, that his very personality has not even yet been entombed nor its influence forgotten. Mr. Warren's essay should be an object lesson to every one ambitious of entombing Matthew Arnold in that terrible "formal biography," if the figure which he has drawn for us is all that can be accomplished even by the President of Magdalen. "In that amiable figure we seem to see the fulfilment of Arnold's 'Resurgam'—the aspiring soul of Arnold himself, in freedom and effective at last."

Reviews

LANDSCAPE IN HISTORY

By Sir Archibald Geikie. (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. net.)

THERE are few subjects of more speculative interest than the connection which exists between man and his physical surroundings. We have on one side the somewhat arrogant desire of the human spirit to exist of itself and to soar beyond any environment; on the other, the knowledge that the human animal tied over to the earth still longs for rest. Man has been somewhere defined as a vegetable with powers of locomotion, and in that respect his position is analogous to that of the creatures which run or fly or swim. They may not be, like the tree or flower, "fast rooted to the fruitful soil," but their power of movement is circumscribed and to some extent illusory. Every creature seems to be bound by invisible bonds to its own habitat. The birds, that might appear to have illimitable space for their country, in all but a very few instances choose a particular haunt and seldom depart far from it. It is not extraordinary in fact to find a species of bird like the St. Kilda wren, which is confined to one small island, and those which make long journeys are like balls at the end of an indiarubber string flying out of one spot and returning to it. The swallow, which one day is hawking about the Pyramids feeling the mating instinct, fares across the sea, not to any vague and ill-defined region, but to the few inches of territory which it has been accustomed to use for its nest. Even fish in their migrations, as far as we have learned, keep the appointed path and return to it again and again. Thus it would appear certain that the lower animal life is dominated by physical conformation, and with all his superiority man has not been enfranchised from the working of this law of nature. Roughly speaking we know that he is what climate and surroundings make him. In the hottest portions of the world we find him black and unintellectual; in the temperate regions fair of complexion and energetic in mind and body; in the extremely cold regions he deteriorates as much as in the extremely hot, though in a different direction, and it would therefore be madness to argue that man can rise above his physical surroundings. In the book before us Sir Archibald Geikie is dealing with a small department of a great subject. The volume is composed of independent essays, but so far as they have a general purpose it is to show that the intellectual development of mankind in Great Britain has been to a large extent dependent on geological formation. Even history has been affected by it, because man in his restless desire for improvement has utterly changed the aspect of the country in many districts, and events of national and almost world-wide import have been decided by accidents of landscape. The most striking example adduced by the writer is the Battle of Bannockburn, which for a long time decided the positions to be held relatively by Scotland and England. There are very patriotic Scotsmen who attribute to Robert Bruce and the army he led powers that were almost supernatural. They, according to this theory, thought of hearth and home and king and country, and summoning all their energy fought as men never fought before. Sir Archibald Geikie as a man of science gives a less heroic but more cogent reason:

"The true explanation of the difficulty seems to me to be supplied by some almost casual references in Barbour's account of the operations. He makes Bruce, in addressing his followers, allude to the advantage they would gain should the enemy attempt to pass by the morass beneath them. The poet further narrates how the carse—that is, the low flat land on the left—was dotted with pools of water; how the English, in order to effect a passage, broke down houses and tried to bridge over these pools with doors, windows and thatch from the cottage roofs; and how, with the assistance of their compatriots in Stirling Castle, they were so far successful that Clifford's troop of horse and, possibly, some more of the English army, got safely over to the hard ground beyond. We thus learn that Bruce's famous device of the 'pots' was only an extension of the kind of defence that nature had already provided for him. The ground on his left, now so dry and richly cultivated, was then covered with impassable bogs and sheets of water; and the huge army of Edward was consequently compelled to crowd its attack into the narrow space between these bogs and the higher ground on Bruce's right."

It is no doubt true that the arable land around the field of Bannockburn was then no better than a morass sprinkled with pools and ditches. Analogous changes to this have taken place in other parts of the island. The great fen that stretched from Ely to the shores of the Wash of old, bred a particular type of fenmen who occupied a position unique among their countrymen. But the drainage of the fens, just as it has produced an important change in the flora and fauna of the district, has also altered the nature of its human inhabitants. In the time of Hereward the Wake they held their own distinctive place. In our own day it would be difficult to distinguish them from the inhabitants of any other part of rural England. Apart from these accidental changes it seems beyond question that physical environment has to a large extent moulded the character and even the appearance of men. If we go to the mountainous districts of Wales, Scotland, or Ireland we shall always find men with a kind of wild poetry in them mingled with a certain melancholy of disposition which has come to be regarded as the characteristic of the Celt. Probably romance has flung a halo that was not quite deserved over the Highlander. Sir Archibald Geikie very properly takes Ossian as a typical example of Highland poetry, speaking without prejudice as to the authenticity of Macpherson's discovery. Whether the following fragment be authentic or not, it embodies the genius of the mountain race:

"Morna, most lovely among women,
Why by thyself in the circle of stones,
In the hollow of the rock on the hill alone?
Rivers are sounding around thee;
The aged tree is moaning in the wind;
Turmoil is on yonder loch;
Clouds darken round the tops of Cairns;
Thyself art like snow on the hill—
Thy waving hair, like mist of Cromla,
Curling upward on the Ben,
'Neath gleaming of the sun from the west;
Thy soft bosom, like the white rock
On bank of Brano of white streams."

And it is very hard indeed to distinguish between very fine poetry and the description of the gentle wind which

"Chases round and round
The hoary beard of thistle old,
Dark-moving over grassy mounds."

But if we move down to the plains we find quite a different type of genius prevailing. Even Burns, who lived so close to the mountains, was not Highland in the true sense of the term. The following passage does not differ essentially from that of Wordsworth's picture of the poet who "murmurs by the running brooks a music sweeter than their own." The verse of Burns has a quality that belongs to the Lowlander:

"The Muse, nae Poet ever fand her,
Till by himsel he learn'd to wander
Adown some trottin' burn's meander,
An' no think lang;
O sweet to stray, an' pensive ponder
A heartfelt sang."

This quality might be described as that of dream or meditation. It is most strongly developed in our greatest poets, Shakespeare, for instance, who was for ever looking before and after; Wordsworth, whose finest poems might be called meditations; Tennyson, Milton, Chaucer, all whom we hold great in the annals of poetry developed this Anglo-Saxon dreaminess which distinguishes our literature from every other in the world. It may seem almost materialistic to trace it to geological formation, but surely there was truth in the contention so often urged by Carlyle, that the natural and the supernatural are one, and in working out the connection between what we call mind and its highest development and the matter which is the rose-mesh that holds it we are really endeavouring to explain and lay bare part of the divine harmony which grows with every attempt to elucidate it. Sir Archibald Geikie in those thoughtful essays has done something towards elucidating the dependence of man's intellectual achievement on his physical environment.

MATILDA, COUNTESS OF TUSCANY.

By Mrs. Mary E. Huddy. (Long, 12s. net.)

Mrs. Huddy does not write history in the grand style. Dealing with a period which calls for Gibbon's pomp and Gibbon's perception of the ironies, she treats it in the tone of a sentimental novelist turning out stories to be read in girls' schools. The effect is not so much impressive as "bizarre." An early-Victorian heroine—a model and pattern of the early-Victorian virtues—appears to be parading, and looking good, among the shameless iniquities of the Dark Ages, and is made to figure as a protagonist in a drama with which her connection, though considerable, was subsidiary. One is reminded, from time to time, of the hero of the old song who had nothing to say of his association with one of the great events in the world's history except that he "was there all the while at the battle of the Nile." For, in the drama which Mrs. Huddy relates, the rôle of the "great Countess"—whose greatness is generally admitted, though Mrs. Huddy hardly proves it—was, at many stages, no more than that of a sympathetic spectator. The real hero of the book is the monk Hildebrand, who became Pope Gregory VII. Its real theme is the struggle for the emancipation of the Papacy from the control of the Holy Roman Empire, and the bringing of Henry IV. to Canossa. Matilda Countess of Tuscany was on the Pope's side throughout that struggle. She "was there all the while" in one useful capacity or another. But it is not her personality that dominates the scene. The attempt to make it do so, and to depict her at the same time as a sort of early-Victorian heroine, only results in throwing the whole picture out of proportion, and investing the whole narrative with an air of unreality. The pity is the greater because the story was so well worth telling.

The period—the eleventh century of our era—was indeed a wicked one: so wicked that it is much more profitable to study than to denounce it. Christianity and licentiousness walked hand in hand, and simony was the besetting sin. There was open traffic not only in benefices but in episcopal Sees. The State cajoled, bullied, and exploited the Church. The Emperors set up their creatures as anti-Popes, and licensed their followers to plunder pilgrims on their way to Rome. On the other hand, there were certain holy men in Benedictine monasteries, and some of the holy men were also strong men. In their view, if there was any exploiting to be done, the Church must exploit the State. Theocracy must be supreme, and not a mere pendant and instrument of autocracy. They were not, according to our modern notions, very scrupulous as to the means to be employed to gain their end. They regarded the chair of Saint Peter as something worth fighting for. They persuaded Matilda of Tuscany to marry a husband whom she disliked, and with whom she never lived, because there was a chance that a fresh army might thus be enlisted in the service of the Church. But they were, on the whole, better men than their enemies. Though they confused the cause of religion with the claims of the Roman Church to paramountcy, they were, at any rate, reformers of abuses within that Church, and consequently command our sympathies.

Hildebrand was the greatest of them. He was the son of a carpenter, and of precocious talent. The monks discovered this and undertook to educate him. From Rome he passed to France, to the convent of Cluny. A Pope took him for his chaplain, and he controlled the election of four successive Pontiffs. He became a missionary, and, in the course of a great evangelical journey through France, not only denounced the prevalent simony, but also crushed the heresy of Berengarius, which denied the Real Presence in the Eucharist. Ultimately his own turn for the highest preferment came. He was preaching the funeral sermon at Pope Alexander's death, and, overcome by his emotions, he broke down and wept. "Suddenly the stillness of the crowd was broken by a voice saying, 'Hildebrand for Pope! Hildebrand for Pope! Saint Peter has chosen him,'" and this informal election was confirmed by the College of Cardinals. He took the name of Gregory VII., and almost immediately the great duel began. The new German monarch was a notorious evil liver, especially addicted to simoniacal practices. "We will," said Gregory, "send to him some wise person who will give him wholesome advice, and exhort him to return to his duty." He did so, and sent Legate after Legate, calling upon Henry "to give satisfactory explanations concerning the disorders of his clergy," threatening excommunication as the alternative. Henry's reply was to connive at the kidnapping of the Pontiff by a noble named Cenci, who locked him up in the Castle of Saint Angelo. The Roman populace rose and fetched him out, and then he launched his excommunication. Henry rejoined by calling upon the Pope to renounce the throne of Saint Peter, and sending to Rome an ambassador, who thus addressed the panic-stricken clergy: "My brethren, I have to announce to you that you must present yourselves before the King at the approaching feast of Pentecost to receive a Pope from his appointment, as this one is now known to be not a Pope but a devouring wolf." The listeners were so wroth that they would have slain the ambassador where he stood had not the Pope intervened to save him. And then the Pope summoned Henry to his presence to ask his pardon. "If the sun should go down on the 23rd of February, 1077, and he were not forgiven, his crown was to be transferred to another." And Henry, with whom things had been faring badly in his own realm, humbled himself and came.

Truly it was a memorable journey. The season was winter, and in the heart of a winter of unexampled severity Henry crossed the great Saint Bernard Pass:

"Again and again were this miserable party in danger of being buried in the snow; again and again they had to toil up precipices as slippery as glass, where one false step would have plunged them into a yawning abyss. Sometimes a solid wall of ice rose up before them, and the guides with their hatchets cut steps for their feet. When the men had reached the summit the Queen and her child were tied up in hides and dragged to the top with ropes, and let down in a similar manner over the other side. Some of the attendants lost their lives in this dreadful route, and others lost their limbs from excessive cold. . . . It is impossible to conceive the sufferings which the travellers, especially the women and child, endured during their transit. The wonder is that they ever survived the horrors of an expedition so terrible and so useless."

After the horrors, however, the humiliation was to follow. The Pontiff went as far as Tuscany to meet the King, and awaited him in Matilda's Castle of Canossa. His followers were detained in the outer court, while he was admitted to the inner enclosure, where he divested himself of the emblems of his rank, not only placing his crown on the earth, but laying aside his ordinary dress, and assuming a white woollen garb: and there he stood, humbly attending the Pontiff's pleasure.

"The shades of night fell softly over the castle and its wakeful inmates, and the pale moon looked down upon the figure of the King maintaining his lonely watch, his eyes fixed upon the window of the apartment within which the Pontiff also kept solitary vigil. . . . Every hour he expected a summons or message from Gregory, and every hour he was doomed to disappointment. To his expectant ears every unwonted stir within the limits from which he was excluded heralded his release from his intolerable position. His hopes, raised again and again by approaching footsteps, were again and again dashed to the ground, as the sounds retreated and died away in the distance behind the gates. For three days did he remain in isolation, with no other companions than his own reflections. He refused food, and fasted from morning till night."

Not until the expiration of the third day was Henry admitted to the precincts of the castle. "Pardon me, Father, pardon me," he then cried, casting himself on the ground, with arms outstretched; and Gregory was moved to tears. "It is enough, it is enough," he said, and raised the monarch from his lowly posture, promising that the ban should be withdrawn if he would mend his ways.

That is the Canossa story, which is now the weapon of all journalists who debate ecclesiastical affairs. What one thinks of it depends upon the point of view from which one approaches it. To some it signalises the emancipation of the Church from the trammels of secular control; to others the rivetting of the chains of the Church upon the body politic. On the whole, perhaps, the calm historical view of the occurrence is the one which it is most profitable to take. Then we shall see in it merely an illustration of a strange state of things which has passed away, and is not likely to recur—a conflict between claims which still, indeed, collide, but are no longer pushed so far by either party to the collision; a striking monument of the extreme position alike of the Erastians and the ecclesiastics. It certainly is not for the sake of any inferences that she draws from it that Mrs. Huddy's narrative is valuable. She is equally lacking in the historic and the philosophic sense. The possession of either gift would have prevented her from making Matilda of Tuscany the central figure of such a story. But she has strung a good many interesting facts together, and done something towards popularising a period of history with which the general reader is not too well acquainted. The few pictures which she gives are good, but the omission to provide an index is a fault which calls for censure.

THE LETTERS OF HORACE WALPOLE

Chronologically arranged and Edited by Mrs. Paget Toynbee. Vols. IX.—XII. (Clarendon Press.)

THE late Sir Leslie Stephen explained Horace Walpole's femininity and dilettantism by the fact that he could not mix among the two-bottle men. "When you can only join in male society on pain of drinking yourself under the table, the safest plan is to retire to tea-tables and small talk." This is what Walpole did, yet tea-tables and small talk did not save him from gout. Not that the popular association of gout with wine-bibbing deserves much endorsement. The uncertainties of the law are not more splendid than those of a complaint whose literary interest is as old as Lucian. Some men are born to gout, others thrust it upon themselves. Horace Walpole was born to it. At twenty-five he knew it as his own familiar enemy. But it never was wholly his enemy. It became an instrument of his communicativeness and wit, and it offered him, at a cheap rate, the flattery of recurrent martyrdom. There is an old book, which he might have read, called "The Honours of the Gout, plainly demonstrating that the Gout is one of the greatest Blessings that can befall Mortal Man." At the age of fifty-two he wrote to the Countess of Upper Ossory: "It reconciles me to the gout that it has no occasion for James's powders. There is a little dignity, too, in it that consoles me; an insignificant man that grows old wants something to give him importance; and with my meagre figure, what with it being a little respectable, and what with it being a little comical, I find the gout does not at all succeed ill with me."

The gout, in short, made Walpole a dowager among the dowagers, and he was not unwilling to pay the price. The remedies he tried interested him, and he made them interesting to others. Principally, he took the prescription of Dr. Cadogan, which so puzzled Boswell—good humour. Hannah More testifies to his patience. To her he wrote: "Since all my fingers are useless, and that I have only six hairs left, I am not very much grieved at not being able to comb my head." Gradually, the gout became the rallying place of his favourite infirmities and his precocious senilities. In what precise year he took upon himself the honours of old age it would be difficult, without exhaustive research, to say. Often in turning his letters backwards you find him growing older. It was perhaps in his forty-ninth year that he began sedulously to ape Methuselah. He then wrote: "I am tired of the world, its politics, its pursuits and its pleasures." This letter is numbered 1038 in Mrs. Paget Toynbee's edition. But the 2135th letter in the same edition is as full of the world, and four volumes are still needed to complete the sixteen promised in this budget of worldliness. At forty-eight Horace settles down to be "a gay shadow." His gout and age give him a battery of elegant, unruffling appeal. The new Opposition has stabbed the liberty of the press, and, as for politics, in renouncing them he feels "the sort of pleasure that Christian heroes did formerly in abstaining from their virgin brides and embracing the life of hermits." But to write this gives him a pain in his wrist; travelling, he thinks, is the only medicine for his "shattered frame." At fifty-three, with a quarter of a century to live, his plan is "to pass away calmly," amusing himself with the rising generation, but taking care not to bore them or be bored by them. One of his notions of passing away calmly is to gibe at Gibbon to his face. It is to Mason that he writes:—

"You will be diverted to hear that Mr. Gibbon has quarrelled with me. He lent me his second volume in the middle of November. I returned it with a most civil panegyric. He came for more incense; I gave it, but alas! with too much sincerity. I added: 'Mr. Gibbon, I am sorry you should have pitched on so disgusting a subject as the Constantinopolitan history. There is so much of the Arians and Eunomians and semi-Pelagians; and there is such a strange contrast between Roman and Gothic manners, and so little harmony between a Consul Sabinus and a Ricimer, Duke of the palace, that though you have written the story as well as it could be written, I fear few will have the patience to read it.' He coloured; all his round features squeezed themselves into sharp angles; he screwed up his button-mouth, and rapping his snuff-box, said, 'It had never been put together before'—so well, he meant to add—but gulped it."

The vivacity and malice of this are pretty good for a man who had long protested that he was "done with the world," was "old and indifferent" and was grateful if such as he were "excused for being out of their coffins." Sometimes it seems as if with Walpole a parade of his infirmities was the equivalent of ceremony and deference. Writing to the Earl Stafford, he concludes by a series of suave self-oblitative statements: he does not pretend to send his lordship news, for he hears not a little, nor inquires. As for private news, he has outlived his friends (he is sixty-six) and has no more curiosity about the next generation "than about the twentieth century." He cannot wait on his Lordship, for he walks no better than a tortoise, and makes a conscience of not incommoding people. His hands and feet are lame, and he is altogether "antiquated and insipid," and he is his Lordship's most devoted humble servant.

It is very noticeable how as Walpole grows old—and he does grow old at Nature's pace—he appears to be a little uneasy lest his letters will be taken too much as the work of a gentleman-gazetteer. As he realised their prodigious volume and continuity, he may well have feared that in the Niagara of his own topics his individuality might fade on the eye and be lost on the ear. He must have known that there was something a little inhuman in his easy brilliance of report and comment, maintained for sixty years. The gout did, at least, proclaim him a man and a sufferer. It linked his personality to the most accepted and recurrent of topics, the weather. And we, for whom Walpole's weather has no interest, must admit that the gout makes him more pictorial. But it does not greatly advance him in our sympathies. No man wrote so much, or so agreeably; for so little love. He is everything but lovable; perhaps the feeling he evokes may be expressed in a bull: you do not love him, yet you love him too well to ask why?

A GARDEN OF PLEASANT FLOWERS

From John Parkinson. Chosen and arrayed by Alfred Hyatt.

MR. HYATT has made an exceptional collection. Parkinson's first chapter deals with "the ordering of the garden of pleasure," its graceful knots, arbours, walks and squares and the English as well as "Outlandish" flowers that have to adorn them. His descriptions of the flowers are all delicately exact and loving, and we are loth to believe that even when in his charge, for he is always a little more—the little more that means so much more—than a herbalist or botanist. His knowledge of gardening is evidently a pride and delight. He is so true to nature that his language is beautiful, for it reveals the correctness of his vision which never is obscured by poetic fallacies about flowers. Unfortunately, to the common garden-lover many of his flowers are unknown. We would give something to meet that Persian Flower de luce "of a pale blew russetish colour," or the Sultan's flower lately obtained from Constantinople, "where the great Turke as we call him, saw it abroad, liked it, and wore it himself," whose circling leaves are of "a fine delayed purple or blush colour." The artist's pencil was surely the gift of John Parkinson. The white lupine he says is "of a very bleake blew tending to white." Perhaps the white Lilly Convally (lily of the valley) affected him to a small degree as the daffodils did Wordsworth, for he finishes his picture of it as having "a very strong sweet sent and comfortable for the memory and senses." He is most generous in the flowers that he would steal from field and woodland for his pleasant garden. He leaves the honeysuckle in the hedge "to serve their senses that travell by it, or have no garden." The primroses and cowslips, however, have been transplanted into gardens "to be nourished for the delight of their lovers." We feel rather pained when he banishes the fairest of June's roses thus: "being wilde and of no beautie or smell we leave to their wilde habitations." One would think from this that crags and cliffs and lonely moors were the home of those beauties of "flaunting summer." His realism in the descriptions of the various roses is noticeable. The damask rose is "neyther heady nor too strong, not stuffing or unpleasant sweet, as many other flowers"; of the York and Lancaster rose he ascribes the stripes to the fact that "nature listeth to play with varieties." His accounts, of course, throw an unfamiliar light on London, strange to us and pathetic also if we pine for the days when the "country green" was not barricaded out. He has to be "very tender" with the double yellow rose in London which was brought by Master Nicholas Lete from Constantinople. It perished with him, and then another merchant, Master John de Franqueville, managed to make it thrive. Those who walk down Mitcham Lane to-day will look sadly and vainly for the Trefoile Ladies smocks which flourished there. Master Cole, in his garden at Highgate, kept his bay Cherry tree from the bitterness of the winter weather "by casting a blanket over the toppe thereof."

"White privet dies withouten pitying"

Parkinson has many references to ancient writers and their opinions, and is really very learned. Galen, Pliny, Dioscorides, Cortusus, Camerarius and Theophrastus—much learned and unknown to the ordinary student. In regard to potions of herbs and flowers recommended by them he says: "This delicate age of ours, which is not pleased with any thing almost, be it meat or medicine, that is not pleasant to the palate, doth wholly refuse these almost, and therefore cannot be partaker of the benefit of them." So much for "this present age" in all time! Surely he of all writers, ancient and modern, is most grateful for all that ministers to mind and body diseased, all that gladdens the heart and induces simple piety. The wine made from pears, perry, inspires him to "admire the goodnesse of God, that hath given such facility to so wilde fruits, altogether thought useless, to become usefull, and apply the benefit thereof both to the comfort of our soules and bodies." He seems to address himself largely to gentlewomen. In his day it was part of a lady's education to know how to use every plant of the garden. Snailles, or Barbary buttons, he calls

"pretty toys for gentlewomen." Sweet Johns, the speckled kind, are termed "by our English gentlewomen London pride." Argycome, or Indian cotton-weed, has also been "called by our English gentlewomen, Live long and Life everlasting." It will be noticed that Parkinson is very particular in his sense of colour and of the words he uses to convey colours that are so often beyond the reach of words. Of cornflowers he says: "Some are wholly blew, or white, or blush, or of a sad, or light, purple, or of a light or dead red, or of an overworne purple colour." He is always afraid of becoming tedious in his descriptions, or of repeating what he is sure everyone knows. We may give a few plants which are surely as necessary to-day as three hundred years ago for the gardens of those who are "curious," or who aspire to "any curiosity." Gentians we name first, for a flower that can cure "the violence of a mad dogges tooth" is not to be disregarded. Rose Bay is a remedy against the poison of serpents, especially if rue be added to it. Of the virtues of rosemary "you might bee as well tyred in the reading as I in the writing, if I should set down all that might be said of it." Arbor vitæ, the tree of life, is recommended for divers. The leaves, chewed in the morning, fasting, help to cure shortness of breath. Others beside divers may benefit by this. The uses of lavender we are at least not unacquainted with, but it is not known that the dried flowers "comfort and dry up the moisture of a cold braine." Basil procures a cheerful and merry heart. Balm is an "excellent help to comfort the heart, as the very smell may induce any so to beleve." A few leaves of burnet put in a cup of claret "is accounted a helpe to make the heart merrie." And so on. The cures for diseases, accidents, &c., we read indifferently, but we bestow wistful and longing thoughts on the ingredients which will combine to produce that joy which seems so mockingly near us as we read the simple words "a merrie heart." We fear that the flowers to which he so lovingly ascribes so much benefit must be dismissed by his own words: "The chief and onely use thereof is to be an ornament for the gardens of the curious lovers of these delights, and to be worne of them abroad, which for the gallant beauty of many of them, deserveth their courteous entertainment, among many other the like pleasures." Among his gentle flowers in his old garden grown full of pleasant thoughts we leave John Parkinson; "the judicious and courteous I onely respect, let Momus bite his lips, and eate his heart, and so Farewell."

WHITEFIELD'S JOURNALS:

To which are prefixed his "Short Account" and "Further Account." Edited by William Wale. (Drane, 3s. 6d. net.) A FAMILIARITY with Wesley's journals is essential, it has been said, to a complete understanding of eighteenth-century England. Those of George Whitefield, his fellow-preacher, have now been reprinted after the lapse of a century and a half, and it is natural to ask what is the cause of their protracted eclipse. The reason is soon discovered: Whitefield's journals are the mirror of a man, and not of an age. They throw little light upon his times, though much upon his personality: and, weighty as that personality was, extensive as was its influence, it depended so largely on the voice, gestures, and amazing energy of its owner, that when these emanations were stilled in death there remained indeed the record of a remarkable career, but the magnetic power which had moved and melted hosts of listeners had to be taken on trust. Whitefield's contemporaries were doubtless almost as eager to read his journals as they were to hear his sermons; but in succeeding generations there has not been much call for either.

The psychological thirst of our own age is, however, insatiable. We never weary of seeking to fathom the mental processes of famous individuals, be they saints or criminals. This reprint, therefore, issued at a moment when Revivalism is in the air, will probably attract many curious readers, beside those who are in sympathy with Whitefield's particular interpretation of Christianity. What manner of man is it that these journals reveal? A man absolutely single-hearted and self-denying, willing to die for his convictions, and living only to disseminate them; an apostolic man, who braved perils upon land and sea with a Pauline constancy; a man whose tireless activity must wring praise even from modern Laodiceans. To borrow the phraseology which he affected, Whitefield fell upon the self-satisfaction of the eighteenth century with the sword of the Spirit, and smote the godless and the indifferent hip and thigh. Whether he preached in London churches, or to Kingswood colliers, to Georgian colonists, or to negroes, thousands flocked to hear him, and hundreds professed themselves converted. The crew of the "Whitaker" and the soldiers at Gibraltar alike heard him gladly. On his second visit to Bristol "multitudes came on foot," he writes, "and many in coaches a mile without the city, to meet me; and almost all saluted and blessed me as I went along the street." Similar scenes were everywhere enacted; and his preaching was attended by those ecstatic and hysterical demonstrations on the part of his auditors which are among the usual incidents of revivalism.

No doubt the extreme youth of the preacher had something to do with his success. Whitefield was admitted to Holy Orders when only twenty-one years of age. Born at Gloucester in 1714, the son of a hotel-keeper, he was educated at the Crypt Grammar School in that city, whence he passed as a servitor to Pembroke College, Oxford, where Samuel Johnson had sojourned a few years before. At Oxford his religious leanings attracted him to the Wesleys, and he became a Methodist. The term had only recently been coined, and it is instructive to remember that it signified one who lived his life by method, and that the chief practices which earned for Wesley and his friends the ridicule of their coevals were weekly attendance at the Holy Communion, fasting, visiting the prisoners in Oxford Gaol, and meeting for devotional purposes. During his residence at Oxford Whitefield was often very miserable, oppressed with the sense of sin and with bodily weakness; but, once ordained, he felt his burdens lighter. He undertook clerical work in Georgia, but before sailing preached a series of sermons which made him immediately famous. Henceforth his life was wholly filled by his ministerial labours in the United Kingdom and in America. The least monotonous part of his narrative is that in which he describes his first voyage to America and his return journey. During the latter he underwent great privations, and came near shipwreck.

The character of his religion left no room for secular diversions, and he waged war against cudgelling, wrestling, dancing, and the wearing of jewels, as well as against notorious sins. His natural austerity may be seen in his forcing upon its knees, and then striking, a child of four, who knew, but refused to repeat, the Lord's Prayer. "He then said his prayer as well as could be expected, and I gave him some figs as a reward." Whitefield's action is in keeping with his assent at Oxford to the theory of one who declared that "every gownsman's name is legion." His religion inevitably had its harsh side. On the other hand, while his first object was the saving of souls from eternal wrath, he was conspicuously humane and liberal to the poor and suffering. In Georgia he did an excellent work in rescuing orphan children from ignorance and destitution.

To be schismatic was no part of his intention. "What infinite mischief have needless divisions occasioned in the Christian Church!" he writes. "'Divide et impera' is the Devil's motto." He did not take to preaching in the fields until the use of the churches was denied him. The orthodox Bishops and comfortable clergy of the day were made uneasy by his enthusiasm; he seemed to them to trouble Israel. We may think what we will of his methods; but the eighteenth century needed a White-field, whatever be the wants of our own.

Fiction

MRS. GALER'S BUSINESS

By W. Pett-Ridge. (Methuen, 6s.) It is always a pleasure to see Mr. Pett-Ridge's name upon the cover of a new volume, for it is an assurance that we shall find within a sound, wholesome story informed with strong human interest, skilful, humorous and kindly. He understands as few writers have done the life of the dwellers in mean streets, their temptations, limitations and substantially good qualities; he finds the gold where other seekers discover only the dross, and he has the rare gift of describing vulgar scenes and people without vulgarity: nowhere is he guilty of an objectionable or a deliberately ugly picture. All these admirable points are noticeable in the present tale, which, as a whole, is up to the mark of "Mord Em'ly" and "Erb." The chapters are not equally good, however; while there is not a line too much about the Galer household, there are pages concerning other characters that border on tediousness. The chorus of matrons upon their neighbours' shortcomings is too shrill and insistent, and at least one of their tea-and-scandal parties might have been omitted with advantage. So, also, might a few of the intrusions of the sentimental Miss Jeffrey. As for Mrs. Galer herself, her courage and sunny temper, her charity towards all the world—a man nor critic can find fault in her. One grateful reader at least must avow that she is the sweetest-hearted, most delightful woman he has come across for a long time, either in fiction or out of it.

TO WINDWARD

The Story of a Stormy Course. By Henry C. Rowland. (David Nutt, 6s.) This is a very good story, and it has a real man for hero. Amos Knapp is a tall grim New Englander of good birth but no money, who has consequently had to shift for himself. His native gift for construction has made him a capital shipwright, and we first meet him, clad in the cap and gown of an M.D., summa cum laude, and waving his diploma, as he directs the stepping of a schooner's mainmast. For his ambition has long been medicine; and American undergraduates frequently "get there," as they call it, by paths strange to those noblest of their species on the Isis and the Cam. Thanks to Dr. Couteau, a great surgeon, who takes a fancy to him, Knapp is fairly launched in New York, but not before he has served as captain of a yacht, and has set the leg of a young lady on board who had broken it in a gale. She is Amos' "fate," but is unfortunately engaged to a brilliant young literary man of no moral principle. However, it all comes right in the end. Old Couteau is excellently drawn. Here is one of his stories; he is talking of the Sandringham-Smythes. "A gang of parvenues; money sticking out all over until you can't rest. Give you about twenty forks, then take half of them away again. That's all right, only they ought to keep on and take away the other half and bring a trough. I had them to dinner not long ago, and just for fun had my man Peter lay out a cartilage knife by every plate for the entrée. Well, sir, the next dinner they gave, they had the nearest thing they could get to those cartilage knives for the entrée. Morris, the laparotomy man, was there, and he almost had a fit. Looked to see them serve an autopsy knife with the canvas-back."

THE HOUSE OF MERRILEES

By Archibald Marshall. (Alston Rivers, 6s.) Mr. Marshall has conceived a sufficiently ingenious plot for his novel of mystery; but he does not succeed in gripping the attention and holding it from the start to the gasp of satisfied excitement at the finish. He does not weave the web of mystery closely and more closely so that the most trivial occurrence sends a shudder through the reader and a cat stepping across the lawn makes him creep. There are long chapters that are homely which make the sensational incidents seem impossible; and they, in their turn, by reaction, cause the homely pages to seem dull. And so two quite good things are spoiled. Of the two elements the sensational is so much the better that we are chiefly disappointed at the loss of the thrill, and in our disappointment our hearts go out in sympathy to the young man in Grimm's fairy tale who went about whispering, "Ah, if I could but shiver!" for the desire for that sensation is roused and not satisfied. We are the more annoyed because our sympathies are unnecessarily turned away from George Greenfield as a man, from the moment when he takes his people round Cambridge, the morning he is playing for the 'Varsity eleven against a famous county, and strolls in after a "buck" lunch in his own rooms to take his place on the field. And George Greenfield is not the villain, he is the hero. Surely the author of "Peter Binney" can write a cleverer book than this.

Short Notices

PEEPS INTO NATURE'S WAYS

By J. J. Ward. (Isbister, 7s. 6d.) Mr. Ward has peeped into Nature's ways with an observant eye, a sympathetic soul, adequate knowledge of natural history, an admirable skill in taking photographs and micro-photographs, and a happy knack of knowing the right objects on which to employ those means of reproduction. As a consequence he has given us a book of which the pedant may say that it has popularity as a flagrant vice, but for which many a busy man, woman and child, who have not the time to be pedants or to appreciate the pedant's labours, will be very grateful. Nature study is so much the fashion of the day that the book makes its appearance very aptly. It is no discredit to Mr. Ward's letterpress to say that it is mainly useful here in the description of his admirable micro-photographs, that is to say photographs of tiny objects microscopically enlarged and so presented in a dimension easy to be seen and comprehended. Thus a gnat is shown sufficiently magnified by four diameters, the eggs of a flea and various details of the gnat and of the flea very much more largely. The habits of the ant lion, of some of the sphinx moths, of the lappet moth, of the fly-eating plants, are among some of the many objects of interest in the illustrations. "The teeth of a snail," "the digestive organs of a pitcher plant," are titles that give some idea of the subjects, which number in all over a hundred and fifty. And always Mr. Ward's letterpress adequately indicates the points of interest and the purpose of the wonderful organic mechanisms which his enlargements of the small things reveal. It is a book that deserves a place in the library of every amateur of Nature's ways, and few will be so versed in them that some of Mr. Ward's "peeps" will not show something new.

TROUT FISHING

By W. Earl Hodgson. (Black, 7s. 6d. net.) Mr. Earl Hodgson's book on "Trout Fishing" is pleasant reading, but its title is a little misleading. The novice who is allured by the name into the notion that the book will teach him the arcana of the art will rise to the fly in vain. The book consists really of some gossip sketches and a little pleasant debate on the standard questions with regard to fishing the wet fly. Have trout a colour-sense? (In this regard the author answers, in our opinion, rightly, and in contradiction to Sir Herbert Maxwell—"Yes.") Is dyed or undyed gut the least conspicuous? Here he gives his verdict in favour of undyed—a conclusion in which we are not so confidently agreed. The effect on the fish of the light, the temperature, and the wind are all discussed; and there is a little anecdotal flavour introduced in one or two chapters. It is all of lake and stream fishing. Mr. Hodgson does not seem to be at all an amateur of the dry fly fishing. Far the most valuable feature of the book, from the angler's point of view, is the collection of coloured pictures of flies at the commencement. They are excellently painted and excellently reproduced—quite works of art, and true to the scientific uses of the angler also. But here, again, the dry flies are not touched. They all are flies of the stream, of the broken water, and of the lake. The writing is very agreeable, as Mr. Hodgson knows how to make it, but we cannot go with him in one or two attacks that he essays on the dry fly method, arguing that flies are taken below the water, half drowned, rather than on the surface. On the broken streams—yes, perhaps; but on the Hampshire chalk streams how many are taken under water in comparison with those sucked down from the surface? A very small percentage.

THE DIARY OF SAMUEL PEPYS

Edited by Henry B. Wheatley. Vols. V. and VI. (Bell, 5s. each.)

Two more volumes only remain yet to come of this admirable and handy reprint, for we regret to note that the publishers do not intend to include the volume of Pepysiana, a decision which we hold to be a mistake. As we read again this extraordinary record of a somewhat ordinary life, we cannot help noticing that, minute and intimate as are the details and revelations that Pepys gives us, the portrait as a whole is indistinct. A diary can never quite replace a biography, any more than a photograph can eclipse a portrait by a painter of insight; which is a truism, but is too often forgotten. So much so that it is often said and written that Pepys has left us a complete picture of himself, which is not the case; he has shown himself as he saw himself; to complete the portrait we must know what others saw in him. The Diary is a profound revelation of the height to which self-conceit and the depth to which self-out-of-conceit—if we may coin a word—can attain in one and the same person. To the lover of London and the ways of the town it is, of course, a sheer delight, and to read it in this edition adds to our pride in English scholarship.

Reprints and New Editions

Although Crockett's THE STICKIT MINISTER is so popular and has already had such a large sale, there are no doubt many who will find a spare shilling for Mr. Fisher Unwin's new edition. Those who dislike paper-covered novels—which so soon are soiled and ragged—and can afford to pay something more than sixpence and less than four and sixpence will probably avail themselves of this admirable shilling edition of well-known novels. No one need hesitate to buy "The Stickit Minister," for it is a neat, pleasant reprint that will not fall to pieces with much handling or spoil good eyesight by bad print. This series is characterised by great tastefulness throughout. Mr. Crockett has written many books since "The Stickit Minister," but he has written nothing better worth a place on our bookshelves. It is one of those books, too, that can be picked up and enjoyed at any time.—In strong contrast to it is Maxim Gorky's THREE OF THEM, in the same edition. Where Crockett depicts tenderly and sympathetically the poverty of the Scots country, Maxim Gorky gives savagely brutal accounts of the squalid poverty of Russia. The recent rumours and paragraphs respecting M. Gorky will no doubt awake fresh interest in his writings, and "Three of Them" may come in for its share. Gorky depicts life as he sees it, but he is at heart a pessimist, just as Crockett is an optimist. There is a much larger public for "The Stickit Minister" than for "Three of Them," with its painful realism. An essayist recently said that all great writers are optimists; but perhaps it would be as reasonable to ask a man under sentence of life imprisonment to be cheerful and hopeful as to expect such things in Russia.—It is almost startling to receive Palgrave's THE GOLDEN TREASURY with the imprint of Messrs. Routledge (New Universal Library, 1s. net). The type is as good as ever, but I do not like meeting my old book friends in strange dresses, and the only favourable comparison to be made between this and the well-known editions of Messrs. Macmillan is in the matter of price. By the way, I wonder has the question of copyright in selections ever been tested; for, if the pieces selected are out of copyright, I do not see why every publisher is not at liberty to reprint them, avoiding, of course, notes and introductions provided by the selector.—In the same series, also, comes an authorised selection of the POEMS BY SIR LEWIS MORRIS. It is a good many years now since the "Songs of Two Worlds" and "The Epic of Hades" achieved popularity, but I venture to doubt whether Morris' poems have foundations sufficiently deep in thought and sentiment to attain lasting fame.—A nicely bound, very well printed new edition is published of R. L. Stevenson's EDINBURGH (Seeley). There is no need to speak of its merits, though it is, of course, a slight and modern picture of Edinburgh written with the imaginative charm of the author. The deep black history of Edinburgh is only touched on, but the book is pleasant and much appreciated, and such a serviceable edition will be welcomed.—DON QUIXOTE is naturally to the front just now. He appears in two volumes (George Bell), in the translation of Peter Anthony Motteux, with the memoir and notes of John Gibson Lockhart. They are in a light and pretty form.—Two new volumes in the miniature edition of Shakespeare have arrived, with introductions and footnotes by W. J. Craig (Methuen). They are so small that we opened them with misgivings about the print. However, they turned out clear and pleasant, quite wonderful in such a featherweight.—Wilkie Collins is always popular. Those who followed breathlessly the pursuit of "The Moonstone" will be pleased to have NO NAME (Collins) so handsomely enshrined, with eight illustrations and the softest red back.

Books Received

Art

Hayden, Arthur, Chats on Old Furniture. Unwin, 5/0 net.
Macfall, Haldane, Whistler: Butterfly, Waap, Wit, Master of the Arts, Enigma. Foulis, 0/6 net. (No. 1 of the "Spirits of the Age" series.)
Moore, H. L., Analysis of Drawing, Painting, and Composing. 12/6. (Published by the author.)

Biography and Memoirs

Huddy, Mary E., Matilda, Countess of Tuscany. Long, 12/0 net. (See Review, page 194.)
Serjeant, Philip W., The Courtships of Catherine the Great. 10/6 net.
Atkinson, C. M., Jeremy Bentham: his Life and Work. Methuen, 5/0 net.
Anderson-Morhead, A. E. M., A Pioneer and Founder: Reminiscences of Robert Gray, D.D., First Bishop of Cape Town and Metropolitan of South Africa. With Preface by the Right Rev. Allan B. Webb, D.D., Dean of Salisbury. Skeffington, 5/0 net. (Miss Anderson-Morhead worked with Bishop Gray from 1868 onwards, and her volume will be of interest to many to whom the larger "Life of Bishop Gray," by his son, Canon Gray, is inaccessible.)

Drama

The Trojan Women of Euripides. Translated into English rhyming verse, with explanatory notes, by Gilbert Murray, M.A., LL.D. Allen, 2/0 net.

Educational

Molière, Les Femmes Savantes. Edited by G. H. Clarke, M.A. Blackie's Little French Classics, 0/10.
Guizot, La Révolution en Angleterre. Edited by W. G. Hartog, B.A. Blackie's Little French Classics.
Gautier, Théophile, Voyage en Espagne. Oxford Modern French Series, Clarendon Press, 2/6.
Wallis, James, Asia. (Round the World.) Jack, 1/6. Crook, Charles W., Weston, W. H., and Mingard, W. Vere, The British Isles. (Round the World.) Jack, 1/4. Bailey, C. W., Africa. (Round the World.) Jack, 1/6.
Hayward, Charles F., Our Island's Story. Step One: Simple Stories Simply Told. (Jack Concentric Histories.) Jack, 1/0.
The Anabasis of Xenophon. Book III. Edited by A. C. Liddell, M.A. Blackie's Illustrated Greek Series, 2/0.
Tennyson, The Princess. With Introduction and Notes by Ethel Fry, M.A. Blackie, 0/8.
Wakefield, H. Rowland, Lessons on Living. A reading-book in physiology and hygiene. Blackie's Science Readers, 1/6.
Scott, E. H., and Jones, Frank, A Second Latin Course. Blackie, 2/6.

Fiction

Gorky, Maxim, Creatures that once were Men. Translated from the Russian by J. K. M. Shirazi. With Introductory by G. K. Chesterton. Alston Rivers, 1/6 net.
Doyle, A. Conan, The Return of Sherlock Holmes. Newnes, 6/0.
Stevenson, Philip L., A Gendarme of the King. Hurst & Blackett, 6/0.
Chambers, Robert W., In Search of the Unknown. Constable, 6/0.
Funshon, E. R., Constance West. Lane, 6/0.

- Marshall, Archibald, The House of Merrilees. Alston Rivers, 6/0. (See Review, page 198.)
- Swift, Benjamin, Gossip. Duckworth, 6/0.
- Twain, Mark, A Dog's Tale. Harper, 2/0. (A reprint of a story first published in 1904. Illustrated by W. T. Smedley.)
- The Mirror of Kong Ho. Chapman & Hall, 6/0.
- Dixon, Thomas, jun., The Clansman. Heinemann, 6/0.
- Ridge, W. Pett, Mrs. Galer's Business. Methuen, 6/0. (See Review, page 198.)
- Williamson, Mrs. C. N., The Castle of the Shadows. Methuen, 6/0. (The heir to the Castle, which lies between Mentone and Ventimiglia, had been convicted of murder, and was imprisoned in Noumea, New Caledonia. How an American heiress and her friends rescued him, and the wicked Marchese, who was responsible for his imprisonment, died. Sensational and melodramatic.)
- Magnus, Leonard Arthur, A Japanese Utopia. Routledge, 1/0. (A dream of society and polity as carried on in "The Land of Pe-oh," "Ko-dran," and other islands off the coast of Corea, described by Banosi, a Japanese seaman.)
- Hill, Headon, The One Who Saw. Cassell, 6/0. (The villain changes two phials on a doctor's shelf, and when a patient is poisoned, tries to terrify the doctor's daughter into marrying him. He is foiled.)
- Barr, Robert, The Tempestuous Petticoat. Methuen, 6/0. (The Emperor of Korea in love with the daughter of a Chicago millionaire who is yachting in the East with his secretary, late of the Diplomatic Service.)
- Gladys, Evelyn, Thoughts of a Fool. Rosenthal.
- Boothby, Guy, A Crime of the Under Seas. Ward, Lock, 5/0. (Contains ten stories, the first being considerably the longest.)
- Tytler, Sarah, His Reverence the Rector. Long, 6/0. (A quiet and well-written story of life in an old-fashioned county family, with some sensible talk on social and political matters.)
- Cameron, Mrs. Lovett, Rosamond Grant. Long, 6/0.
- Methley, Alice, The Identity of Jane. Long, 6/0. (Jane is an heiress, and her real name is Jocelyne; but she has many experiences in the nineteen years that elapse between her discovery in the Australian bush and the establishment of her identity.)
- Griffith, George, The World Masters. Long, 0/6.
- Norris, H. L., Rice Papers. Longmans, 6/0.
- Myers, Albert Cook (edited by), Hannah Logan's Courtship. Philadelphia: Ferris & Leach, $2. ("A True Narrative: the Wooing of the Daughter of James Logan, Colonial Governor of Pennsylvania, and divers other matters, as related in the diary of her lover, the Honorable John Smith, Assemblyman of Pennsylvania and King's Councillor of New Jersey, 1736-1752." Profusely and well illustrated with portraits, reproductions of MSS., &c., of interest to American archaeologists.)
- Keays, H. A. Mitchell, It was a Boy. Arrowsmith, 3/6. (The birth of a son to the Reverend Douglas and Mrs. Bell, of somewhere in the United States, and how, as he grew to boyhood, he caused the reconciliation of rich Mrs. Bradney and her daughter, who had married a poor man. Mild, but amusing.)
- Jones, Constance Evan, Caprice. Nisbet, 6/0. ("A Study in Emotions." Mr. Charteris is run over by a cab just when his jealousy of his wife is at its height. Mrs. Charteris's emotions ultimately land her in a pond—by accident, although she went there intending to commit suicide.)
- Hauff's Tales. Translated by Sybil Thesiger, with illustrations by Dorothy Morris. Finch, 6/0.
- Bryant, M., The Adventures of Louis Dural. Brown, Langham, 6/0.
- Vorst, Marie Van, Amanda of the Mill. Heinemann, 6/0.

History and Archaeology

- McKechnie, William Sharp, Magna Carta. Maclehose, 14/0 net. (Mr. McKechnie claims that his work is the first attempt to comment upon Magna Carta in the light of modern research. Coke's and Thomson's works being now "hopelessly out of date.") Historical Introduction, Text, Translation, and full Commentary.)
- Duignan, W. H., Worcestershire Place Names. Frowde, 6/0. (Mr. Duignan's book on Staffordshire place names is already well known. An immense amount of study, especially of Saxon chronicles, goes to the making of these notes, which are most interesting from an historical and philological point of view.)
- Purchas, Samuel, B.D., Hakluytus Posthumus. Vols. I. and II. MacLehose, 12/6 net.
- Knox, George William, Imperial Japan: the Country and its People. Newnes, 7/6 net.

Logic

- Wolf, A., The Essential Import of Categorical Predication: Studies in Logic. Cambridge University Press. (Amplified from a dissertation for which the Special Board for Moral Science of Cambridge University awarded the author a Certificate of Research, certifying the work to be "of distinction as an original contribution to learning." Dedicated to "My Teacher, Professor James Sully.")

Literary

- Perry, Bliss, The Amateur Spirit. Gay & Bird, 6/0 net. (Essays by an American author.)
- Catalogue of Japanese Printed Books and Manuscripts in the British Museum acquired during the years 1899-1903. By Sir Robert Kennaway Douglas. (Includes the Anderson collection.)
- Downey, Edmund, Twenty Years Ago. A book of anecdote illustrating literary life in London. Hurst & Blackett, 6/0 net.

Natural History

- Bullen, Frank T., F.R.G.S., Creatures of the Sea, being the life stories of some sea birds, beasts, and fishes. The Religious Tract Society, 7/6.

Reprints and New Editions

- Stevenson, Robert Louis, Edinburgh. Seeley & Co., 2/0 net.
- Wheatley, H. B., Literary Blunders. Elliot Stock. The Book Lover's Library. (Popular Edition.)
- Bacon, G. W., Cold Catching: Cause and Cure. Bacon & Co., 0/6 net. (Second edition, revised by W. T. Fernie, M.D. The index is a summary of the book in the form of "Golden Rules.")
- Greg, W. R., The Creed of Christendom. Rationalist Press Association: Watts & Co., 0/6. (Preface by Dr. Washington Sullivan.)
- Gould, F. J., Children's Book of Moral Lessons. Rationalist Press Association: Watts & Co., 0/6. (First Series: Self-control and Truthfulness.)
- Draper, John William, LL.D., A History of the Intellectual Development of Europe. 2 vols. Bell. The York Library. Cloth, 2/0 net each volume.
- Carlyle, The French Revolution. 3 vols. Bell. Bohn's Historical Series.

Theology

- McCabe, Joseph, The Religion of Woman: an Historical Study. Rationalist Press Association: Watts & Co.
- Peyton, William Wynne, The Three Greatest Forces in the World, and the Making of Western Civilisation. Part I.: The Incarnation. Black, 5/6 net. (The "three greatest forces" are the Incarnation, the Crucifixion, and the Resurrection. This volume is concerned with the Incarnation as "an evolutionary force in the making of European history." Book I.: the Universe a System of Social Forces. Book II.: the Incarnation as an evolutionary force.)

- Caulfield, S. F. A., The Voice of the Fathers: their Erudition and Unanimity. Brown, Langham & Co. (Short Lives of the Fathers bearing on their doctrinal testimony. With a preface by Lord Halifax, to whom the book is dedicated.)
- Biggs, the Rev. C. R. Davey, D.D., Lay Hold on Eternal Life. Brown, Langham, 1/6. (Or "What we may learn from a Penny." A series of addresses given to children during a parochial mission in All Hallows Barking—which is near the Mint. Practical, vivid, and imaginative.)
- Sanday, W., D.D., Outlines of the Life of Christ. T. & T. Clark, 5/0 net. (A reprint of Dr. Sanday's article on Jesus Christ in Hastings's "Dictionary of the Bible," which was written before 1899. The map shows, among other things, that his views on the site of Capernaum have altered.)

Works of Reference

- Mitchell's Newspaper Press Directory. "Diamond Jubilee Issue," 1905.

Poetry

- Twigg, Lizzie, Songs and Poems. Longmans, 1/6. (With a Preface by Canon Sheehan, who praises the verse, not only for its quality, but for its patriotism. "Its great merit is, that it is one of the thousand voices that are calling, calling to our countrymen . . . to understand the greatness of their heritage." The writer hopes soon to be able to sing her Irish songs in the Irish tongue, into which she has already learned to translate her own name.)
- Thaw, Alexander Blair, An Inaugural Ode. The Monadnock Press, Nelson, N.H. (For the inauguration of President Roosevelt, March 4, 1905.)

Military

- Cassell's History of the Russo-Japanese War. Part XX. Cassell, 0/6 net.

Science

- Black, F. A., Terrestrial Magnetism. Gall & Inglis, 6/0 net. (See page 200.)

Topography and Travel

- Goff, Mrs. Florence. Illustrated by Colonel Goff. Black, 20/0 net.
- Oakley, E. Sherman, M.A., Holy Himalaya. Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier, 5/0 net. (The religion, traditions, and scenery of a Himalayan province, Kumaon and Garwhal. By a member of the London Missionary Society. Illustrated.)

Periodicals

- "Arts and Crafts," "Educational Times," "Empire Review," "Scribner's Magazine," "T. P.'s Weekly," "Bible in the World," "All the World," "Harper's Weekly," "The Garden City" (the second number of the new official organ of the Garden City Association. Garden City Press: Hitchin. Simpkin, Marshall, 0/3). "Motorist and Traveller," "Leisure Hour," "Girl's Own Paper," "Boy's Own Paper," "Sunday at Home," "Friendly Greetings," "Cambridge University Reporter," "Nature," "Longman's Magazine," "Today," "Notes and Queries," "The Connoisseur," "The Fortnightly Review," "Erin" (Journal of the School of Irish Learning, Dublin), "Cassell's Magazine," "Bible Society Gleanings," "Chambers's Journal," "Publishers' Circular," "Isis," "Rand Ratepayers' Review," "Bookbuyer," "Home Magazine of Fiction," "Pearson's Magazine," "Century," "Macmillan's Magazine," "Temple Bar," "St. Nicholas."

Pamphlets

- Does Determinism Destroy Responsibility? by C. Callaway. Rationalist Press Association. Watts & Co.
- Proclamation by H.M. Victor Emmanuel III., King of Italy, proposing an International Chamber of Agriculture, and documents relating to the same. Rome: Bertero.
- The Association of Charles Dickens with Liverpool, by C. C. Bower. Liverpool: The Lyceum Press, 1/0. (Dickens Fellowship: Introduction by Edgar A. Browne.)
- The Inflection of the English Present Plural Indicative, with special reference to the Northern dialect, by John David Rodeffer. Baltimore: Murphy.
- Socialism in Christianity, with reference to the Woman Question, by Mrs. Caroline Fairfield Corbin, Chicago.
- Report for 1904 of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds.
- The Early Period of Reconstruction in South Carolina, by John Porter Hollis, Ph.D. Johns Hopkins University Studies.
- Heinrich, P., Die Namen der Hamlettragödie. Haberland, 2m.50. (See page 206.)

Catalogues

- R. Hall, H. Gray, T. Thorp.
- Catalogue of Autograph Letters and Historical Documents for sale on March 2, 3, and 4. Sotheby, Wilkinson & Hodge.
- Catalogue of Publications. The University Press, Chicago and New York.

Foreign

Periodicals

- "L'Occident," "Repertorium für Kunstwissenschaft," "La Bibliofilia," "La Vérité sur le Congo."

Poetry

- Lirica Italiana antica, edited by Eugenia Levi. Leo S. Olschki, 1905.

Science

The Place of Imagination

THE process of verbal degeneration, so undesirably familiar, is illustrated in the common use of the word amateur, which to many of us signifies rather an incompetent than a lover. Your average man of science—who is simply an average man, of science—uses the term in polite vilification: the assumption being that no one who has not enjoyed his special advantages can possibly produce anything worthy of his consideration. The average priest, or official of any kind in all times and places, is of the same way of thinking: and so is the young doctor who is above taking a hint from a nurse with fifty times his experience. The professional's scorn of the amateur, in religion or billiards or anything else, is, of course, simply an expression of the universal egoist principle.

Nevertheless, to take the instance of science alone, the amateur has always played a greater part than the professional who, like most professionals of all orders, is not literally an amateur to boot. Notably has this been the case in astronomy, as the names of Olbers, the discoverer of the first asteroid, William and Caroline Herschel, and the late Dr. Isaac Roberts suffice to attest. Discipline and training, priceless though they often are, can no more make a man love truth than love a given woman: the real Lover or Amator of either is born and not made.

These reflections, doubtless sufficiently trite—yet, like other trite truths, the most salient and ignored—are suggested by a modest little volume, "Terrestrial Magnetism," which has just been written by Mr. F. A. Black of Inverness. Its production must have entailed an enormous amount of disinterested labour: for the author has not merely had an idea, but has taken the trouble to work it out: and the nature of his subject has ensured that the task was no easy one.

It is not proposed here to pay Mr. Black the poor compliment of accepting or rejecting his theory out-of-hand. That sort of criticism, in any sphere, is as easy as it is arrogant and vain. Nor is it proposed to fix upon certain lacunæ and discrepancies in the argument, so as to suggest the great superiority of a volume on this subject by the critic, had he inclined to write one. On the contrary, we may endeavour to indicate the problem and Mr. Black's proposed solution of it.

As every one knows, a needle of suitable material will always tend to lie in a certain direction: and those who think that words are explanations—like Molière's physician, who explained the hypnotic power of opium on the score of its vis dormitiva—will be content to refer this phenomenon to the "fact" that the needle is a magnet: as the woman who, asked her reason for a certain course, says "Because—." But a moment's consideration will show that the magnetic needle depends for its behaviour upon a magnetic quality of the earth, and no one has yet explained what this quality really is. Furthermore, though we all know that the earth is a huge magnet, no one knows why it is so: and though the facts of magnetic "dip" and so forth have been exhaustively described, no one has hitherto explained their causation.

Here Mr. Black intervenes with a theory which has the merits of simplicity and what I may perhaps be forgiven for calling a certain beauty.

It has long been known that the occurrence of disturbances in the atmosphere of the sun—such as the astronomers are preparing to study during the three and a half feverish minutes of the total eclipse in August next—coincides with disturbances of the magnetic needle. Is there a storm in the sun? The compass at your watch-chain thrills thereto. The movements of the compass-needle indicate changes in the magnetic state of the earth its master: and the question is why a crop of sun-spots should alter the magnetic state of the earth? Now it is well known that if a wire be coiled around and along a bar of soft iron, and an electric current be passed along the coil, the iron core is magnetised: and such electro-magnets are, of course, the most powerful known. They are used for a thousand purposes, as, for instance, the extraction of a needle from the eyeball, with a safety and facility which no surgeon can emulate. Now Mr. Black's thesis is that the earth is precisely such an electro-magnet, produced in precisely analogous fashion.

We have long passed the stage when men thought that the sun merely sent us heat and light. We know that the rays which affect our cutaneous and optic nerves are not a tithe of those which the sun emits: and, indeed, light itself, according to the received theory, is only one variety of electro-magnetic disturbance. We are, indeed, in constant receipt of electric currents from the sun. But as the earth revolves around the source of all her life and nearly all her activity, she rotates: and it needs but little thought to see—Mr. Black having first seen it for us—that this rotatory journey of the earth around a source of electricity, reproduces the conditions of a magnetisable bar around which wire conveying an electric current is coiled. Mr. Black believes that the earth is a magnet because, as it rotates on its journey round the sun, it is practically coiled round with a spiral electric current, just like the soft iron core of an ordinary electro-magnet. The known facts of the earth's rotation, of sun-spot storms, of the aurora borealis, and of the earth's magnetic poles, appear to bear out Mr. Black's contention. Right or wrong, it is as pleasant an hypothesis as we have met for some time: and on the Baconian opinion that truth is more easily extracted from error than from confusion, we are free to congratulate Mr. Black without further inquiry.

But we have yet to name the consideration which perhaps alone justifies one in discussing the outlines of so complex and technical a subject as this in THE ACADEMY. I claim for Mr. Black that his theory is a typical instance of the scientific use of the imagination. This is a quality which no man will deny to that which he admires: I have heard it claimed, on the score of his technique, for a contemporary portrait-painter and gourmet whom no gleam of it has ever visited. But as imagination is the crowning and also the one essential glory of the creative forms of art, so it is the prerogative of the higher order of scientist. There are to-day thousands of men at work upon scientific problems whose fidelity and industry are beyond all praise: but to whom more has been denied. They have been called the hodmen of science: but I conceive of them rather as the makers than as the layers of the bricks. But whilst their labours are of the utmost value, since it is no more possible to frame a theory or doctrine or divine a law without facts than to build without materials, it is the architect of science whom chiefly we admire. A mere mass of unco-ordinated data bears to the same data seen in the light of a true theory, the relation of a heap of stones to a Gothic minster. It is imagination that makes the architect: but the possession of this faculty is not all. Any one can imagine an orchestral or tonal combination, but the result may not be euphony or harmony. Any one can liken the setting sun to a red-blooded insect squashed against a wall: but the result is not true poetry. Any one can frame a scientific theory, but some are true and some false: or a novel kind of building, yet not all will withstand the wind. In art and science alike the imagination, soar it never so boldly, is ultimately judged by an unalterable criterion against which all imaginings are vain, and that is Truth: which was before our time and will be hereafter. And as Truth is a whole, of which no fragment is inconsistent, even infinitesimally, with any other, so scientific and artistic truth are neither antithetic, as the foolish aver, nor parallel, but finally identical: all forms of imagination, whether the poet's dream or the student's hypothesis, being thus ultimately subject to the same august tribunal.

C. W. SALEEBY.

A Triplet of Plays

THREE plays in one afternoon is rather a large order, but this was the bill of fare offered at the Vedrenne-Barker Matinée on Tuesday last, though each play might, perhaps, be more properly described as a scene only. The first one "The Pot of Broth," by W. B. Yeats, was extremely slight in construction. The dramatis personæ consisted of three people, John Coneely, Sibby Coneely and a tramp, who among them represented, by pantomime, a story which probably had an origin in folk-lore, although it has become frightfully hackneyed by figuring so frequently and prominently in the humorous columns of the provincial papers. The story is a very simple tale. An Irish beggar, who is very hungry and very hard up, entering a cottage whose mistress has the reputation of being a miser, hits upon an ingenious device for obtaining a meal. He has in his pocket a stone, originally picked up to be thrown at a yelping dog, and it suddenly dawns upon him that he might try to pass it off as possessing the magical properties of being able to turn water into broth, or even potheen at a pinch. Adroitly enough he persuades the woman that it possesses this magical power, and with much ceremony places the pot on the fire. By stealing a piece of ham, cajoling the woman out of herbs and condiments, and finally inducing her to drop a chicken into the hot water, he succeeds in making a pot full of broth to the wonder and admiration of the simple peasant woman. She begs the stone from him and he bestows it on her as a present, only accepting the whisky-bottle as a token of goodwill. and the curtain drops on her ecstatic face as, with the stone at the bottom of the pot, she sits down by the fire-side to await the coming of the broth. The thing is a trifle, light as air, and is enlivened by one or two good songs, and not badly played by Mr. George F. Tully, Miss Amy Lamborn, Mr. Robert Pateman.

The second piece, "In the Hospital," raises a very serious question. It is translated by Christopher Horne from the German of Arthur Schnitzler and is the most loathsome piece of realism which the present writer has ever witnessed on any stage. The scene is a ward in hospital where an old man is dying and is an unconscionable long time about it. To the actor who played the part, Mr. J. D. Beveridge, must be accorded whatever credit is due for having studied the facial expressions, the contortions, the cough and the agony of a man whose mind is in a state of dissolution as well as his body. His fitting companion is a young lad with a hacking cough, who also has only a few days to live and is ignorant of his fate. If the word indecency is not to be exclusively devoted to one kind of outrage, it certainly applies to this scene. At all events the limbs, against whose exhibition the puritanical members of the County Council have taken such exception, are healthy and natural, but to bring people together to watch a representation of the grim fifth act which closes each of our lives is not only indecent, but utterly repugnant to our notions of humanity, and we were more than surprised that a crowded audience, which was supposed to consist of some of the most select and cultivated people of London, applauded such a performance. After this morbid and gruesome exhibition Mr. Bernard Shaw's travesty of his own "Candida" came like a gleam of sunlight. The poet whom he has introduced into it is certainly a most impossible personage, a darling boy, as somebody calls him, who at eighteen indites the most sorrowful ballads to the eyebrow of his mistress, a married woman, of course, and yet, when occasion serves, shows that he can "scrap" like a professional pugilist, and is very willing to reduce the husband to complacency by what Friar Tuck called "the carnal weapon." But it would be unjust to Mr. Bernard Shaw to allow the impression to go abroad that this was the best of his jokes. He is really playing with two of his favourite postulates. His Charlotte of West Kensington, otherwise Mrs. Bumpus, when she finds that her young lover means thumping her Teddy immediately shakes off the show of infatuation which she had for him and is concerned only to keep the peace. She belongs, in fact, to the suburban type which Mr. Bernard Shaw, in the serious intervals of his buffoonery, loves to scarify. And he has worked up quite a delightful husband also. Mr. Bumpus is a something in the City with a rasping voice and the manners and feelings of a commercial traveller. Far from being angry with the young poet, he is rather proud of having a wife whom they all run after, and only approaches a state of serious quarrel when the poet declares that the relations between him and Mrs. Bumpus have been cold. This he considers to be a downright insult and it does actually lead to a brief bout at fisticuffs in which, as far as we could see, neither has any advantage. So, as is the way of Mr. Bernard Shaw, it is all very fine fooling, witty and clever and bright to any extent, yet such a thing as would become an utter weariness after two or three representations. And why? The answer, we think, is a simple one. In himself are all the resources of the author. He is witty and clever without the shadow of a doubt. His gift for smart sayings and amusing paradox is unmistakable. So alas! is also his absolute and utter ignorance of human nature and his complete inability to portray a man as an authentic living, breathing, laughing, sorrowing human creature. The most delightful of skittles, Mr. Bernard Shaw, but not the real game.

Art

Fantin-Latour

THE latest exhibition of French painting held in London attracted visitors by thousands and aroused in some of them a sincere, in others a feigned, enthusiasm. It aroused antagonism also, and that not only among the prejudiced who acquiesce gladly in routine and give impressionism a bad name before they understand what it means. Whatever may be said of the quality of the show, it can hardly be denied that in quantity the Grafton Galleries were too liberally furnished. There was no repose for the eye as it travelled along the walls from yard to yard of paint, separated only by gilt frames and never by the interval of dull, unobtrusive background which was urgently needed as a foil to the brightness of the pictures. How much greater would the half have been than the whole! Half a dozen Monets would have gladdened the eye sufficiently with sunshine, in those dark days of February, in the space where a dozen, set end to end, dazzled it too much and left it weary.

Any one who shares this opinion may be recommended to visit, in search of a more restful experience, Messrs. Obach's gallery, in which forty-five pictures, by Fantin-Latour, with few exceptions small, are hung on the line with decent intervals. With one unimportant exception the exhibition fairly represents all sides of the artist's work. There are none of the famous portrait groups in which Fantin painted himself and his literary and artistic associates. Few of these have been seen in London, but they made a great impression at the Paris Exhibition of 1900. One picture of this class, the portrait of Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Edwards, has recently been added to the National Gallery. There are single portraits, however, at Messrs. Obach's and two of them are beautiful examples of Fantin's early style, the portrait of his sister, and a charming head of a girl (No. 26), of the year 1870. The larger portraits are much less satisfactory in colour.

The paintings of flowers and still life are far more numerous, and are so carefully chosen as to show Fantin's art at its best. It is generally agreed that in his later years his sense of colour declined and he no longer left the same beautiful surface of paint as in his pictures of the 'sixties and 'seventies. The flower-pieces here are, with few exceptions, of the earlier time. The "Bunch of Autumn Flowers," of 1864 (No. 25), shows a wonderful power of toning down hues which, in less discreet hands, might be hard to reconcile, without any sacrifice of truth. The "Yellow Roses," "Hollyhocks," and "White Peonies," offer a simpler problem as regards colour; but the beautiful texture of their petals and leaves has never been surpassed in flower-painting. Two little pieces of still life in the first room, "Apples on a Plate" and "Cup and Saucer," are worthy of Chardin, whom Fantin resembles in his mastery over white.

In his treatment of allegory and myth Fantin was less uniformly successful, and he rarely achieved in oil-painting the success which he rarely missed when he attempted such subjects in black-and-white. His lithographs, inspired by the music of Wagner, Schumann, and Berlioz, show him at his best, and it is easy to forgive some faults of drawing for the sake of those shimmering trees, rich shadows, and quivering wings, that atmosphere of dreamland. Fantin, as a lithographer, was a great master of technique and a poet withal. The "Tentation de St.-Antoine" and large "Manfred et Astarte" (No. 64) should be noticed as especially beautiful impressions among the thirty shown on the present occasion. The exhibition also includes, as a loan from Mr. Edwin Edwards, the rare etching, "Un Morceau de Schumann," which seems to have been Fantin's only experiment with a copper-plate.

C. D.

Auguste Rodin

AMAN of intensely individual personality and truly unique genius, August Rodin has perhaps been subjected to a greater variety of criticism than any other master of modern times. It would, indeed, appear almost impossible to approach the much-discussed subject of the great French sculptor's work from an original point of view or to say anything on it that has not already been said again and again. Yet this task has been successfully achieved by M. Camille Mauclair in the interesting study first published in Paris and well translated into English by Clementina Black (Duckworths). M. Mauclair is well known to be one of the ablest living European critics, the author of many an incisive essay in which he has proved himself to be thoroughly in touch with the latest phases of the development of modern art, and able to judge of them from within as well as from without and in every case, as in his remarkable "Idées Vivantes," to go to the very root of the matter.

In his brief preface to what will rank as a classic of art criticism, M. Mauclair clearly defines his present aim. "It seems to me," he says, "that after having told the reader all that he ought to know about a man, a critic should then try to make a closer and deeper study of him; come into contact with his soul, form an original judgment of him and, in short, pass from the iconographic or biographic side of his work to the artistic and psychological. I have tried, therefore," he adds, "to begin where my fellow-workers have left off and to say exactly what they do not appear to have said."

In the opinion of M. Mauclair, there is no need at this late day to eulogise the sculptures of Rodin; for, in spite of the prolongation of his early struggles, the result of the slow recognition of his exceptional genius, his fame was fully established many years ago. Everyone now knows that his work is great, but few are able to define in what that greatness consists, and it is here that the critic breaks comparatively new ground; comparatively only, however, for, as he himself generously admits, several predecessors have shown no little acumen in their judgment of the idiosyncrasies that set Rodin apart from all his contemporaries. Mademoiselle Judith Cladel, for instance, in her delightful volume of personal recollections that deserves to be more widely known than it is, brings the personality of the master vividly before her readers, reproducing with rare skill the very atmosphere of his studies; and the painter, Eugène Carrière, considered by some few the greatest living interpreter of motherhood and childhood, who is a true kindred spirit and close friend of Rodin, has defined the characteristics of his work in a Preface to the Exhibition held in Paris in 1900, in language that seems almost to throb with intensity. "Rodin's art," he says, "comes from the earth and returns to it, like those giant blocks which mark deserts and in the heroic grandeur of which man recognises himself. The transmission of thought by art, like the transmission of life, is the work of passion and of love. Passion," he continues, "whose obedient servant Rodin is"—and here he places his finger upon the very essence of the truth—"makes him discover the laws that serve to express it"; and he concludes with the suggestive words: "his desire of humanity links him to the eternal laws of nature."

In the opinion of M. Mauclair, Eugène Carrière is the one master who has any real affinity with Rodin, and not the least original portion of his book is that in which he analyses the likeness between them. The painter, he says, reduces his art to essentials, to the main lines and the deliberate amplification of surfaces. Thus his figures, bathed in shadow, are akin to Rodin's statues, while the latter, bathed with dewy light, seem to be pictures by Carrière, a comparison the truth of which will be recognised by all who have seen the "Sick Child," and the group of the artist's own wife and children, in which the figures seem to be part of the atmosphere from which they emerge, so entirely is all line eliminated.

Passing rapidly over the main facts of Rodin's early life and education, which are now familiar to everyone, M. Mauclair proceeds to analyse with masterly hand the distinctive qualities of his chief works, fine reproductions of many of which supplement his text. He relates anew the remarkable incident that redounds so little to the credit of the Salon Jury of 1877, and, though it at first seemed likely to have fatal results for Rodin, was really the initial step in his successful career. Encouraged by the acceptance in 1876 of his "Man with the broken nose," a marble figure full of virile force and expression, Rodin submitted in 1877 an essay in bronze, the now world-famous "Age of Brass," and, to his indignant surprise, he presently received an intimation that he was accused of having sent a cast from life as an original work. Too dismayed to recognise what was in reality an extraordinary testimony to his powers, the young sculptor indignantly protested, declaring that a Belgian soldier had posed for him and sending photographs of his model to prove that he was speaking the truth. It was all in vain, the accusation was repeated; and though three sculptors, Desbois, Fagel, and Lefèvre, whose names deserve to be remembered, espoused Rodin's cause, the jury retained their attitude of hostility. The "Age of Brass" was, however, bought by the Fine Arts Society, but Rodin, proudly sensitive, withdrew for a time from any attempt to justify himself, and it was not until 1880, after the exhibition of the virile St. John the Baptist, that the tide turned in his favour. Struck with the genius displayed in the interpretation of the Hebrew prophet, the sculptor Boucher commissioned its author to execute a group of children for him, and, anxious to find out how he obtained his results, watched him at work. To his astonishment Rodin composed the work in a few hours, and as soon as it was completed Boucher rushed off to spread the news amongst his friends, declaring that the man who could do what he had seen could certainly also have created the Man of Brass. The victory for Rodin was absolutely complete and from that time forward, says M. Maclair, Rodin was what he is to-day; he had emerged once for all from obscurity: he knew his path, his method, his field of thought, and his work from the "Age of Brass" to the "Balzac" is a visible development of the hidden period during which he had by unknown persistent labour been ripening his individuality. In the opinion of this astute critic, and also, it would seem, of Rodin himself, later productions are the outcome of a new theory shadowed forth in the "Balzac" and perfected in the "Thinker": the final results of which are possibly not even yet fully manifest.

To the earlier of the two periods of Rodin's art development belongs the exquisite "Eve," one of its author's most beautiful creations, in which he has realised, with painful and haunting intensity, all the anguish of the future mother mourning over the cruel fate she has brought upon her unborn children. With it may be classed the less beautiful but equally impressive "Ugolino and his Children," whilst the "Burghers of Calais," and the "Gate of Hell," especially the latter, may be quoted as typical examples of Rodin's inexhaustible imagination and unrivalled facility in giving expression to his ideas. The "Gate of Hell," originally a Government commission for a gate with designs in high relief intended for the "Musée des Arts Décoratifs," has already been worked upon at intervals for more than twenty years; the various groups reflect the ever-growing technical skill of their creator, and would seem to have served as a kind of safety-valve for his overflowing energies during the intervals of repose between his other undertakings.

To the "Thinker," intended to form the culminating portion of the "Gate of Hell," with the fine group of the Shades below it, and to the "Balzac," in which the note of transition is struck, M. Maclair devotes, as is fitting, considerable space, passing on from them to describe what he defines as Rodin's line of advance, quoting largely from the master's own words and revealing some of his inmost thoughts on many subjects such as the true use of symbolism and the right attitude of the modern artist to the antique.

Of the works produced since the "Balzac" M. Maclair has not much to say, possibly because he feels as all true judges must, that the end is not yet. He contents himself with defining, in a few masterly sentences, deeply penetrated with the truest appreciation, the exact position at the present moment of the man whom he claims to be the greatest living French artist, and one of the most complex and powerful movers of thought in modern art, whose psychological and tragic genius conquers the admiration even of those who oppose his material execution. He does not, he adds, "found a school, but he influences the soul of a generation."

Symphonia Domestica

A GREAT change has passed over the much talked of "almighty critic." The fact is that he is in reality no longer the strong man, able to kill the struggling composer at a single blow. He knows it, but he does not wish the public to know it. He dare not aim a blow at the new comer lest his weapon be broken in his hand, his adversary pass on unscathed, and his weakness be known to all. Nearly a hundred years have passed since this was the fate of his predecessors, who, in vain, aimed their darts at a certain symphony in C minor by a young and revolutionary composer, and the rebuff, which those who fought against Wagner suffered, is still alive in his memory. So, for the most part, the critic comes to the conclusion that it is well to agree with his adversary quickly, and this he does to such good purpose that there is now little fear that an aspiring composer will meet with any check from conservative and pedantic criticism. Nay rather, the more viciously the composer shows his teeth, and the wilder his frenzied gesticulations, the more likely is he to meet with a polite reception and gentle handling from the critic. This state of things is scarcely more healthy than the former one, and the critic who merely swims with the stream of public opinion is no more useful, and certainly cuts a poorer figure, than he who formerly struggled to no purpose against it. It is the critic's duty to say what he thinks, even at the risk of being ultimately found to be in the wrong, and it is from this point of view that I think it worth while to record the scattered impressions derived from a first hearing of Herr Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica."

Not only was the first English performance on Saturday a first hearing, as far as I was concerned, but I did not even glance at the elaborately prepared analytical programme until after the concert, and although I had a score in front of me during the performance, I had no opportunity of reading it beforehand. So I came to it with an entirely unprepared mind, unless the vague rumours of the baby having its bath at seven p.m., and again at seven a.m., be counted as preparation! The result was that the music seemed to me to be an extraordinary patchwork of passages so simple as to be almost obvious, and others so complex as to be well nigh unintelligible. Further, a suspicion was aroused that the much spoken of novelty of Strauss is after all rather a mannerism than a spontaneous expression of feeling.

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS

OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti,
Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from FREDK. HOLLYER, 8 Pembroke Square, London, W.
Illustrated Catalogue 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

That novelty consists chiefly of hitherto unheard of combinations of notes, the result of a wild independence of part writing which can hardly be called counterpoint. Still the method is akin to that by which all widening of harmonic resource has been achieved, the contrapuntal method, and we all welcome such experiments, even if they sometimes strike so crudely on the ear as to make one hold tightly to the arms of one's chair and wait anxiously for the moment of relief. That moment always comes sooner or later, and generally does so in the form of a fragment of simple melody, often beautiful, but sometimes too simple by contrast. It is this violence of contrast which makes me suspect the new harmonies to be affected rather than genuine. There seems to be no logical sequence of ideas leading from the statement of the composer's simple themes to their complex presentment, but rather he toys with such themes until in danger of becoming commonplace, when suddenly he plunges into the wildest vagaries of what even his admirers describe as "freakishness," and again, as I have said, relieves the situation by a return to simplicity at the moment when the most attentive listener is at the point of being baffled. The audience is alternately insulted and patronised.

From the formal point of view there is very little on which to comment. The outline scheme of the "Symphonia Domestica" is quite unoriginal. There is an introduction which merely states the principal themes to be dealt with, and three movements, labelled conventionally "Scherzo," "Adagio," and "Finale," follow, in which these themes, and many other subsidiary ones, are dealt with. In choosing such a scheme Strauss deliberately courts comparison with the classics. Either he must show himself a fulfiller of the law or else his work be written down a failure. He leaves himself no loophole for escape. It is as though he were pulled in two diametrically opposed directions by two influences. On the one hand considerations of "programme," backed up by his own "freakishness," lead him into the illogical method of procedure I have spoken of; on the other, the scheme of form which he sets himself, supported by a deep-rooted sense of the need for definite construction, prompts him towards the one formal feature of his work which is most apparent—that is, the feeling for tonality. Throughout the whole work he is careful to establish the tonality at certain fixed points by long passages of dominant and tonic harmonies, a device which looks almost childlike in its simplicity amongst so much ill-arranged complexity, but is extraordinarily powerful as a means of summing up the situation and replacing vagueness and uncertainty by a feeling of order and arrangement. Yet no single device can be strong enough to act as a substitute for the sense of balance which must permeate the whole of an artistic work in order to fulfil the fundamental laws of form. This sense of balance, I am inclined to think, Strauss lacks, or, if he has it, it has been overshadowed by other considerations. Add to these points that throughout the work there are moments of great beauty of tone and some lovely orchestral colouring, and that the whole is knit together by an exhilarating feeling of physical energy, and my first impressions may be said to be fairly represented.

It is impossible, however, not to say a word with regard to the "programme," although at the time I tried to follow the composer's directions, and to listen to it as abstract music. But what does he mean by supplying us with a number of trivial incidents which at once provoke a smile and give his adversaries a chance for the exercise of cheap sarcasm and small wit, and, worst of all, so entirely distract the attention of the unlearned listener that he cannot, if he would, listen to the work simply as music? The writer of the analytical notes says with regard to the "child theme": "The music irresistibly suggests something of broader import than the commonplace happenings of an ordinary day." Surely this is the only rational explanation of the whole work. If we are really intended to hear the clock strike, and the baby struggle as it is plunged into a bath too cold for it, to listen to the fatuous remarks of the uncles and aunts and the discussions of the parents, the whole work is a piece of gross buffoonery unworthy of any serious consideration. But the sensible, one is inclined to say the charitable, explanation is that the details of his daily life have suggested to the composer certain deeper thoughts which he wishes to give to the world, and for these the natural medium to him is music. By a fatal mistake which bids fair to ruin his intention he has not seen that to explain to his audience the nature of the incidents which prompted the thoughts, is to place those incidents as a well nigh insuperable barrier between his thoughts expressed in music and those to whom he wishes to convey them. Whether he has expressed his thoughts sufficiently well in music to convey the impression he intended is doubtful; all the shortcomings of form and construction militate against it, and only a perfectly composed piece could do so. In some moments, though, he has certainly succeeded. One of the simplest instances is the opening of the whole work. Listening to it without any knowledge of the programme, one was almost oppressed by a certain sense of vague and disturbed thought, finding its ultimate solution in clear and vigorous action, expressed in an exhilarating arpeggio figure in the key of E. Referring afterwards to the programme I read that this was the "husband theme," first meditative, then "sulky," a phrase "which always suggests the unwelcome intrusion of everyday troubles upon the composer's train of thoughts," and finally that "he soon shakes off his annoyance," &c. Now it is evident that the impression created is not only nothing bettered by such an explanation, but is actually narrowed down in its application. The circumstances which gave rise to the composer's thought, if known to me, hinder, if they do not entirely destroy, my thought, by supplying me with a substitute for it. The majority of unlearned listeners to music are only too ready to accept anything which saves them the trouble of thinking, and the "programme" becomes to the public what the crib is to the schoolboy, a method of translating which gives them no insight into the real mind of the author or composer. If for nothing else, we have cause to be thankful to Strauss for this, that by a process of reductio ad absurdum he has shown us the hopelessly illogical position of a composer who, while claiming that his music is to be regarded as abstract music, supplies his audience with a programme which makes it almost impossible for them so to regard it. For my own part I believe that we have much besides to thank him for; that the "Symphonia Domestica" shows us more clearly than any earlier work both the good and the evil that are in him and his teaching. We must hear it many times to learn all we can from it. Probably Mr. Wood, who so successfully carried through the bold enterprise of producing it in England, will not be slow to repeat it. This first performance adds one more item to the large debt which London music lovers already owe to him and to the Queen's Hall orchestra. That England no longer deserves the reproach of being behind the times in music was sufficiently shown by Dr. Mackenzie's lecture on Dvorak a few weeks ago, and no one has done more to keep us up to date than Mr. Wood. H. C. COLLES.

The Nameless in Literature

"THE iniquity of oblivion blindly scattered her poppy and deals with the memory of men without distinction to merit of perpetuity," wrote Sir Thomas Browne, and to any one who has studied the annals of literature, however cursorily, it is an oft-recurring reflection how completely oblivion has swallowed the names and doings of many whose thoughts and words still delight the world.

It is a significant fact that in the beginning of literary history the personal element is absolutely wanting. Concerning the authorship of the Vedic hymns, the poems (so called) of Homer and Hesiod, the Nibelungenlied, the chansons de gestes, not only do we know nothing, but we know that nothing ever can be known. Modern research has not succeeded in bringing to light a single fact concerning the author of any of the great epics, while it has thrown discredit upon a thousand theories which were once held by all. Nothing has been done to dispel the gloom.

The darkness is, indeed, so complete that the mind is scarcely tempted to speculate upon what it conceals. There is a mystery more stimulating, a more homely pathos about those slighter pieces which circumstances have preserved to us, yet preserved solitary and nameless; pieces whose surpassing excellence proclaim the hand of the master, but of what master none can tell. The mystery of these poems is enhanced by the very fact of their smallness and isolation; for the question inevitably presents itself: Why so much and no more; surely the poet who wrote this must have written much beside, and if so, why do we know nothing of it?

Of Latin poems of this kind the most notable is the celebrated "Pervigilium Veneris," with its haunting refrain:

"Cras amet qui nunquam amavit quique amavit cras amet."
 "Let those love now who never loved before,
 Let those who always loved now love the more."

There is nothing quite so beautiful in all Latin poetry, nothing, at least, so beautiful of its kind; yet it is written in a metre and in a kind of Latin which differ from all other poetry that has come down to us, and we are indebted for its preservation to the ignorance of a scribe who mistook it for the work of Catullus.

In French literature there is, among a hundred other anonymous gems, that exquisite Provençal aubade, so wonderfully paraphrased by Swinburne in his "Poems and Ballads" under the title of "In an Orchard":

"En un vergier, sotz fuelha d'albespi,
 Tenc la dompna son amic costa si,
 Tro la Gayta crida que l'alba vi.
 Oy Dieus! oy Dieus! de l'alba tan tost ve!"

Our own literature is peculiarly rich in anonymous poetry. The ballads of "The Nutbrown Maid," "Chevy Chase," "Sir Patrick Spens," "Burd Helen," to name but a few, are justly considered among the glories of our literature; whilst for a sparkling lyric, full of the joy of life, it would be difficult to match the mid-thirteenth century "Cuckoo Song," so neatly parodied by the Wise Youth in "Richard Feverel," or the rushing melody of:

"Over the mountains
 And over the waves,
 Under the fountains
 And under the graves,
 Under floods that are deepest
 Which Neptune obey,
 Over rocks that are steepest,
 Love will find out his way . . ."

There are, in fact, some literatures of which it could be safely affirmed that an anthology of the anonymous poetry would make a finer show than the work of any single poet. Nor need we look far for the explanation of these facts. The reason why so much of the best poetry has come down to us nameless is undoubtedly that, in earlier times, the idea of literary proprietorship did not exist. As no child cares a jot who wrote the book he is reading, so the public demanded no more of the poet or dramatist than that his work should be good. The bard sang not to make himself but others famous. Even at the present day, in backward states such as Montenegro, the great doings of the race are committed to poetry which becomes the common property of the nation; and the name of the hero lives while the name of the poet perishes. This is the epic period, which in other countries produced the Homeric poems, the "Chanson de Roland," "Gudrun," and many other masterpieces. With the advance of civilisation the sense of literary proprietorship begins to develop; the personality of the author becomes more prominent, yet only in the case of the greatest authors, and even then with no great definiteness; the boundary line between one poet's work and that of another is not strongly defined in the mind of the public; hence scholars are unable to decide whether an anonymous poem is to be attributed to Chaucer, to Villon, to Wolfram von Eschenbach. It is to this intermediate period that most of our own anonymous poetry belongs.

The feeling, then, of literary proprietorship is by no means coeval with the rise of a literature; the idea is evolved very slowly. We are now in a period remarkable for the prominence of the author and the literary name. Whether this development is an advantage to literature on the whole may be gravely questioned. When a work of art was cast upon the waters to sink or swim upon its own merits, none but the best work was likely to survive. In ancient times the public argued "This work is good, therefore it must have been written by Homer"; now the public argues, "This work was written by X.Y.Z., therefore it must be good." The former, if an error, is a harmless one; the latter, if an error, a noxious one. For how often does it happen that by the time a writer has made himself a name and gained a secure market, the quality of his work has begun to decline? At first he had to write his best to compete against the prejudice in favour of men of made reputation; now that he has entered the ranks of the successful, he is often past his prime; yet it is now that the public reads him most readily.

In the past, oblivion has swallowed many great names "without distinction to merit of perpetuity"; now, if it were not that posterity is the sanest of critics, the danger would be that much good work would be forgotten, whilst much that is worthless were allowed to live on.

JOHN RIVERS.

Ingenuity Run Mad

HERR HEINRICH, the author of "Die Namen Hamlettragödie" (Leipzig: Haberland. 2.50m.), is a very ingenious person. He devotes ninety pages of fairly close type to demonstrating his belief that all the characters in Shakespeare's "Hamlet" were intended to be representations of the various sides of the temperament of the Prince of Denmark. And this he does by tracing the names of the characters to their source. His book makes amusing reading, whether his views be accepted or no. The name "Hamlet" itself he traces to a most original source. In Belleforest's novel as in the "Historia Danica" of Saxo Grammaticus, the name is given as Amleth. In the only existing edition of the English translation of the novel it is spelled both Hamblet and Hamlet, and this Herr Heinrich considers to be due to the translation being the work of two persons. But he considers also that Shakespeare's play is older than the English translation of the book, and that the name Hamlet was in those days common enough. The name of Shakespeare's son, born in 1585, Hamnet, is only a variant. And further, he sets forth that Hamlet was derived from the old English "hamelian," to halt, to be lame (cf. to hamble, and hamble-shanked), and that the name therefore is intended to be symbolical of the halting, the indecisive side of Hamlet's character.

Claudius, again, it is noteworthy, has the same meaning, the limping one, and is marked out as being the only Latin name in the cast. Gertrude is traced back by Herr Heinrich through the Geruthe of Belleforest to the "gery" Venus of Chaucer's "Knight's Tale," and he makes the name mean "the inconstant." Polonius, he considers, stands for Hamlet's lack of youth, his premature ageing, if one may phrase it so. Horatio stands for the philosophical and sceptical sides of Hamlet's character, Laertes (through "leo," and "heart") for his bravery, Rosencrantz and Guildenstern for craftiness and lack of will-power, and Osric (through the Latin "os" = mouth and German "reich" = full of) the love of self-communing. But his gem is his derivation of Ophelia from (1) Mephistopheles, or (2) ofal (cf. "a good kissing carrion"). We have numerous instances in Shakespeare of his poor opinion of woman as man's helpmate. But even granting that he depicts in Ophelia the womanish side of Hamlet's character, it is hardly probable that he could have made so ingenious use of a name which had but lately become known through Marlowe's "Faustus," and which was then far from being so universally used as it is now to indicate the Prince of the Powers of Darkness. Herr Heinrich must not, in fact, be taken too seriously as a Shakespearean commentator. For he revives the ancient myth, of which we had thought long since to have heard the last, that in the history of Mary, Queen of Scots, Darnley, and Bothwell, we have the germ of the tragedy of "Hamlet," with James I. as the Prince. To support his contention, Herr Heinrich finds it necessary to make Shakespeare a wholesale punster and anagrammatist, and a very deep one at that. He finds in the lines "For thou dost know, O Damon dear, this realm dismantled was of Jove himself; and now reigns here a very, very pajock," a subtle reference to Jacob—i.e. James, which he considers quite conclusive—since not only is "pajock" a comprehensible anagram for Jacob, but, forsooth, it is a Scotch word! Apart from the fact that Shakespeare wrote "Hamlet" a century before Jacobites came into public notice, and that therefore Jacob as a synonym for James was only known to the cultured few, Herr Heinrich appears also to have been misled by the earlier reference "Drink of this potion is thy union here," which he takes to refer to the union of the English and Scottish crowns in 1603. But in the authorised version of 1604 we have onyx for union, and "union" only occurs in the pirated edition of 1603, which was probably taken down by a shorthand writer of the day during a performance, and which abounds in errors both of spelling and actual words.

As an example of ingenuity and painstaking research in quest of nothingness (we have in mind the German word "kleinigkeiten") Herr Heinrich's book is not to be passed over.

"Academy" Questions & Answers

Questions and Answers for this column must be addressed to THE EDITOR, THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 5 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C. The envelope to be marked in the top left-hand corner "A.Q.A." Each Question or Answer must be written on a separate sheet of paper and on only one side of the paper, which must bear the sender's full name and address, not necessarily for publication. The Editor will not undertake the forwarding of any correspondence. Questions must be confined to matters of Literature, History, Archæology, Folk-lore, Art, Music and the Drama. The Editor reserves the right of deciding whether or not any Question or Answer is of sufficient interest to be published.

Questions must not be such as can be answered from the ordinary works of reference.

COMPETITION.

Until further notice, four prizes, of the value of 5/- each, will be awarded weekly for the two best Questions and the two best Answers contributed to "Academy" Questions and Answers.

The Editor's decision must be considered absolutely final and no correspondence whatever will be entered upon with regard to the awards. The names and addresses of prize-winners will not be published, but the winning Questions and Answers will be indicated by an asterisk. Each prize will consist of 5/- worth of books to be chosen by the several prize-winners. The name and address of the booksellers where the book or books can be obtained will be given. Winners outside the United Kingdom will receive a cheque for 5/-. No competitor can win a prize more than once in three months.

One of the four weekly prizes will be awarded, whenever possible, to a Shakespearean Question or Answer.

Non-adherence to the rules and regulations of "Questions and Answers" carries disqualification.

Questions.

SHAKESPEARE.

* WARWICKSHIRE.—H. McC. contends that because there are no peculiarly Warwickshire words in the Shakespeare plays this does not disprove their Shakespearean authorship. Nobody would ever maintain this position, but surely the use of words not confined to Warwickshire, but found in the dialect of many other counties, can scarcely be cited in favour of that authorship. The "English Dialect Dictionary," now completed, proves this conclusively, although Mr. George Morley, in his "Shakespeare's Greenwood," held that certain words in the plays were peculiarly Warwickshire, in a certain sense, such as fend, blench, cade, mother, othergates, colly, lace, dony, faggot, hussey, call, ballet, and bolter. These words, with exactly a similar meaning, are found in use in many other English counties, and even Scottish counties as far north as Orkney and Shetland; "lace," with its supposed peculiar Shakespearean signification, in twenty-three counties other than Warwickshire. It is rather strange that while St. Albans, from which Bacon took his title, is mentioned twenty-three times in the plays, Stratford-on-the-Avon is not once introduced, with Warwickshire named just three times. It cannot be decided if Wincot is Wilmeccote or the Woncot of "Henry VI.," which, according to the context, must have been in Gloucestershire, where Shallow resided, with Visor as his tenant. Few can identify the Forest of Arden, with its purely foreign cast of characters and its possession of a lion and serpent, with the forest of the same name in Warwickshire.—E.S. (Edinburgh).

MONARCH OF THE NORTH.—In the first part of "Henry VI." V. iii., La Pucelle is made to call up familiar fiends in the words—

You speedy helpers, that are substitutes
Under the lordly monarch of the north, &c.

Can any one tell me why the devil—for I suppose it is he to whom allusion is made—should be known as the "Monarch of the North"? Or is it true, as I believe I once heard, that in the Middle Ages there were held to be four devils from the four quarters of the globe, and under them an entire aristocracy of devilhood? Is there any book in which these are enumerated? B.C.H.

ELDER.—Is there a popularly received legend that Judas hanged himself on an elder tree? It was evidently current in Shakespeare's time, for in "Love's Labour's Lost" V. ii. there occurs the passage:

Hol. Begin, sir: you are my elder.
Biron. Well follow'd. Judas was hanged on an elder.

And in "Cymbeline" IV. ii. the elder is used as a symbol of grief:

Arr. And let the stinking elder, grief, untwine
His perishing root with the increasing vine!

The elder does not seem to be mentioned in the Bible. Was it indigenous to Palestine?—L.G.M. (Brighton).

LITERATURE.

JOHN PARKINSON.—Can any reader say if there is a book setting forth the life of the author of "Paradisus in Sole"? Parkinson tells us in his "Theatrum Botanicum" that his garden in Long Acre was "well stored with rarities." The "D.N.B." says that he died August 1650, and was buried in St. Martin's-in-the-Fields.—H.H.

"BRITTON HALL."—Can any reader give me any information about a poem called "Britton Hall," describing the absence of a man from his wife for twenty years? When he returns, his wife is on the point of marrying another man.—J. C. Langton (Bradford).

THE PILGRIM FATHERS.—Can any one give me the author and title of a poem in which it is said that the Pilgrim Fathers

First fell upon their knees,
And then upon the Aborigines?—A.W.

"SPLENDIDIS LONGUM VALEDICO NUGIS."—Mr. Quiller Couch, in the "Oxford Book of Verse," places this quotation above Sir Philip Sidney's sonnet, "Leave me, O Love, which reachest but to dust." I am told that the short o in valedico shows it is from some late Latin author. Can any one trace the quotation for me?—E. W. Hendy (Wilmalaw).

ELIU LORO.—What is the meaning of the refrain Eliu loru in the page's song in "Marmion" ("Where shall the lover rest?")? Is it Gaelic? If so, perhaps it would be questioning too nicely to ask how the English Constance of Beverley came to be acquainted with it.—A.W.

* SIR WALTER SCOTT AND CAMPBELL.—Can any one refer me to author, book, and passage where I may find the following? "If novelists and poets were schoolboys, Sir Walter Scott's mistakes would keep him always at the bottom of his class, while Campbell would be expelled for inveterate cribbing."—N.S. (Morpeh).

CUMBER.—I have never seen an explanation of the word "cumber," in Scott's Coronach ("Lady of the Lake"):

Fleet foot on the correi,
Sage counsel in cumber,
Red hand in the foray,
How sound is thy slumber!

It does not seem like Scott to have arbitrarily coined a form of "chamber" to rhyme with "slumber." Does the word occur elsewhere?—A.W.

ENGRAVING.—In Thomas Bewick's "History of British Birds," published by Longmans in 1832, Vol. I. (Land Birds), page 124, is a curious steel-plate engraving (a tail-piece), consisting of (1) an elopement on horseback, and (2) a hawthorn leaf, apparently superimposed on (1). This is no mere case of double printing, as one cannot see (1) through the white spaces in (2). Can any reader of THE ACADEMY explain the teleology of this curiosity?—John Osbourne.

AUTHOR WANTED.—"Give me twenty-four hours of health [youth?] and I will make the pomp of Emperors seem ridiculous." I believe that it is attributable to Emerson, but a search has so far failed to trace it.—J.C. (Liverpool).

AUTHOR WANTED.—It is more than fifty years ago that I read in some book, of no great value in itself, the following German stanzas, of which I should very much like to know the author:

Wer Furcht vor keinem hegt, Furcht keinem auch erregt,
Sieht den furchtbaren Tod von keiner Furcht erwegt.
Wer keine Lust verstört, wen keine Lust bethört,
Erlangt die höchste Lust, wo alle Lust aufhört.
Wem hoch und niedrig gleich, gleichviel ist hart und weich,
Gleichgültig reich und arm, der ist in Armuth reich.
Wer Lieb mit Lieb umfasst, und Selbst den Hass nicht hasst
Der ist zu Hause dort, hier auf der Welt ein Gast.—J.G. (Pinner).

AUTHOR WANTED.—The following passage, which seems to be a favourite with Bishop Gore, I have been unable to trace:

Never did any public misery
Rise of itself; God's plagues are grounded still
On common stains of our humanity.
And to the flame that ruineth mankind
Man gives the matter—or at least gives wind.—A.S.L.

"TWO WORDS OF FRENCH."—In Scott's "Waverley" (Chap. xx.) "the Chieftain, in two words of French, explained to Waverley that the Baron had shot this old man's son, in a fray near Tully-Veolan, about seven years before." Surely the comprehensiveness of no language (French included) is such as to express all this meaning "in two words"; perhaps "two" should be "a few," but what "two words" had Sir Walter in his mind when he wrote it?—C.R.W.

SOCIOLOGY.—May I ask whether the word "sociology," which is associated with the late Mr. Herbert Spenser, was invented by him? It is badly formed, being partly Latin and partly Greek, though I admit that it is difficult to suggest a substitute. I do not know whether Mr. Spenser was a classical scholar; I imagine he was not.—H. B. Foyster (Hastings).

GENERAL.

"SERENDIBITY."—I have waited to see whether any one would contest the explanation of "Serendibity" (such is the form in which I have always heard the word) given in THE ACADEMY a few weeks ago. An old friend, now deceased, frequently used it to signify, not the collector's luck, but the happy intuition which enables some people, in giving presents, to divine what will be most acceptable to their friends. This lady, too, attributed the word to Horace Walpole, but derived it from a story about a prince of Serendib (the name will be familiar from the "Arabian Nights"), who gave to his departing guests precisely what each one most wished for.—A.W.

MUFFI.—Why is an officer in private clothes said to be in muffi? Is there any connection between this word and the name of the Mahomedan doctor of law? If so, one might suppose that the term originated in some way among our soldiers in India. In "The Newcomes" Thackeray says: "He has no muffi-coat, except one sent him out by Messrs. Stultz to India in the year 1821."—L.G.M. (Brighton).

"THE SPORT OF KINGS."—Can any one tell me who it was who so described war? I have an idea that it is a French quotation, and was used by a medieval French King, but I am unable to verify this.—H.F.H. (Maznyo, Upper Burma).

ENGLAND'S FIRST FOREIGN TREATY.—In Green's "History" it is said that the first foreign treaty between England and any other country was between Offa, of Mercia, and Charlemagne, about 794, which secured protection for English merchants and pilgrims who were going to Rome. I have seen other treaties mentioned as being the first earlier than this. Which, then, was "the first foreign treaty" between England and any other country?—Charles H. M. Pennycook (Brighton).

Answers

SHAKESPEARE

"A SOUL REMEMBERING."—"Richard II." II. ii. Percy offers his service, "raw and young, which elder clay shall ripen." Bolingbroke accepts, and as a reward declares that he rejoices that he is not ungrateful; he is happy that he has "a soul remembering his good friends."—Edward T. Quinn.

SIR WM. DAVENANT.—There were very slight and groundless reasons for the story: merely that Shakespeare often, when passing through Oxford, stopped at the Crown Inn, where Sir W. Davenant was born, and from his known or rumoured admiration for his hostess, there sprang this scandalous tale.—M. Maclean Dobrée.

LITERATURE.

* KIPLING NORNS. Kipling took his "Conchimarian horns" and "reboantic Norns" from the eccentric American writer, Chivers. The refrain of "The Poet's Vocation," in Chivers's volume called "Conchs of Ruby," runs, if I remember rightly:

In the music of the morns,
Blown through the Conchimarian horns,
Down the dark vistas of the reboantic Norns,
To the Genius of Eternity
Crying, Come to me! Come to me!

It is quoted in Bayard Taylor's "Divisions of the Echo Club," where Kipling probably made acquaintance with it. As for Kipling's exact meaning—well, one might as well ask for a prose paraphrase of Browning's "June will consider" or his "If 'twere proper, Scirocco should vanish in black from the skies."—H. Davey (Brighton).
[Replies also from A.B. (Tonbridge) and J.F.S.]

DICKENS'S POEMS.—"The Poems and Verses of Charles Dickens," collected and edited, with bibliographical notes, by F. G. Kitton. London: Chapman & Hall, 1903.—Edith Philip.

EAGER—EAGOR.—There seems little doubt that this word (also written akar, agar, &c.) is from agir=ocean (Icel.), meaning the bore in a river, the commotion and high wave produced by the influx of the water of the ocean into the mouth of a river at the flow of the tide. An old poet, in commending the skill of mariners in judging of the signs of the weather, says:

Wel knowe they the reume yf it aryse,
An akar is it clept, I understonde,
Whose myght there may no shippe or wynd wythatand.
This reume in th' ocean of propre kynde
Wyt oute wynde hathe his commotioun;
The maryneer thereof may not be blynde,
But when and where in every regioun
It regnethe, he moste haue inspeccion,
For in viage it may bothe hate and tary,
And vnayised thereof, al mys cary.
Knighthode and Batayle, Cott. MS.—M. Maclean Dobrée.

GENERAL.

* "GALLEYFOIST" AND "BULLION."—The first is an obsolete word, meaning a State barge, especially that of the Lord Mayor. It occurs in a passage in Ben Jonson's "Silent Woman" IV. ii., where the context makes the meaning less obscure: "When the Galley-foist is a-floate to Westminster!" Foist is itself an obsolete substantive, denoting a light galley. Bullion, or bullion-hose in full, was a name given to trunk-hose that were puffed out at the upper part in several folds. The word probably owes its origin to Lat. bulia, a bubble.—L.G.M. (Brighton).

"HOLY ASIA."—The term "holy" might well be applied to Asia Minor, so deeply interesting from its religious and classical associations; The Seven Churches, with Galatia, to which St. Paul addressed an Epistle; and Cappadocia, so frequently mentioned in the New Testament, were within its limits. Asia also includes the Holy Lands of the New Testament—during the lifetime of our Lord—besides the four holy cities of the Jews, Tiberias being one, as described in the Jewish Talmud.—K.S. (Bristol).

THE DEVIL LOOKING OVER LINCOLN.—Scott alludes to a famous gargoyle outside Lincoln Cathedral. It is known as the Devil on the Witch's Back, looking over Lincoln; and the Devil is represented as a little furry animal with a human, placid, and rather ecclesiastical face; while the witch is a winking old woman, with her tongue hanging out. This is not to be confounded with the famous "Imp of Lincoln," which is inside the Cathedral.—B.C.H.

BROWNEBILL MEN.—A billman was a foot soldier of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, armed with a kind of halbert. Grose describes the weapon thus: "The black—or, as it was sometimes called, the brown—bill was a kind of halbert, the cutting part hooked like a woodman's bill, from the back of which projected a spike, and another from the head." In the Imperial Dictionary it is described as "an ancient military weapon, consisting of a broad hook-shaped blade, having a short pike at the back and another at the summit; attached to this was a long handle. It was used by the English infantry, especially in defending themselves against cavalry, down to the fifteenth century, and by civic guards or watchmen to the end of the seventeenth." In "Much Ado About Nothing" Dogberry says to the watchman: "Why, you speak like an ancient and most quiet watchman; for I cannot see how sleeping should offend; only have a care your bills be not stolen."—Henry Scannell (Lewisham).

BEAN-FEASTS.—The origin of bean feasts is of much greater antiquity than the ways-goose. The bean-feast was a Druidic institution, and the probable forerunner of the harvest festival of our own day. The custom is mentioned by Taliesin, a Welshman and "Chief of the Bards" in the sixth century, and by Rhys, another Cymric chieftain. The custom survives in almost pure form in the "Carling Sunday" of the North of England. On that day, the second Sunday before Easter, almost every housewife prepares a huge dish of "carlings," or dried peas. Formerly (and within the writer's own time) dried peas were a common dish at the now obsolete "corn-suppers," which were, I think, a very near approach to the ancient bean-feast. This is further supported by the fact that in the New England States, where so many old English customs are still kept up, "corn-feasts" and "bean-feasts" are common institutions.—R.S. (Sunderland).

ST. BRENDAN.—St. Brendan was born 483, at Armagh, co. Kerry. He is patron saint of Ardfer and Clonfert; also of the Island of Bute. Many churches were dedicated to him in the Islands of Mull, St. Kilda's, at Eassey, Forfarshire, other parts of Scotland, and at Branspeth, Durham. He went to Wales to the Monastery of Llancarvan, Glamorganshire. Served there or in Brittany under St. Gildas. Had for disciple St. Fursey, whose life is given by Bede and whose "vision of hell" gave much material to Dante for the "Divina Commedia." St. Brendan's "Voyage" was known all over Europe. In the eleventh century it was translated from the Irish or Latin into English, French, German, Flemish, Spanish, Italian. In the "Paradise of Birds" he found the catiff choir of angels, who said to him: "We are of the ruin caused by the old enemy, yet not by sinning nor by full consent have we fallen." I translate from Latin.—Edward T. Quinn.

PRIZES.—The asterisks denote the two questions and two answers to which prizes have been awarded. The winners can obtain, on application at the following booksellers, Five Shillings' worth of books. Notices have been dispatched to the several winners and to the following booksellers:

Mr. J. James, 8 Newgate Street, Morpeth.
Mr. I. Alexander, 28 Broughton Street, Edinburgh.
Messrs. Beal & Son, 55 East Street, Brighton.
Mr. W. Junor, 72 Queen's Road, Brighton.

THE fifty-sixth annual report of the Prudential Assurance Company shows assets £55,359,505—an increase of £4,142,128 over those of 1903. The total surplus is £2,064,514—disposed of by adding £150,000 to the Investments Reserve Fund of the Ordinary Branch and £150,000 to the Reserve Fund of the Industrial Branch: £1,202,867 is distributed amongst the participating policy and share holders, leaving £176,249 to be carried forward in the Ordinary Branch and £385,398 in the Industrial Branch.

MAR 23 1905

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1714

MARCH 11, 1905

PRICE THREEPENCE

The Small Advertisements on this page are inserted at 6d. per line, in the readable type shown (minimum 5 lines).
The Displayed Advertisements are charged at 5s. per inch.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

EDUCATION ACTS, 1870 to 1903.

THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL invites applications for the following appointments in the Education Department.

Four Divisional Inspectors, who will have the general superintendence of large districts and give special attention to the co-ordination of education within their areas. Their chief duties will be to inspect pupil teachers' centres, secondary schools, training colleges, science and commercial centres, polytechnics, and all institutions for higher education aided by the Council. Candidates will be required to possess special qualifications in one of the following subjects:—(1) English language and literature. (2) Modern languages. (3) Mathematics and science. (4) Technology (including mechanical and electrical engineering). The salary will be in each case £600 a year, rising by annual increments of £25 to a maximum salary of £800 a year.

One Art Inspector, whose chief duties will be to inspect the art teaching in elementary and secondary schools, art schools, and polytechnics. The salary will be £400 a year, rising by annual increments of £20 to a maximum salary of £500 a year.

One Inspector of Wood and Metal Work, whose chief duties will be to inspect the teaching in wood and metal work in manual training centres and elementary and secondary schools. He will also be required to inspect certain classes at polytechnics. The salary will be £400 a year, rising by annual increments of £20 to a maximum salary of £500 a year.

One Inspector of Women's Technical Classes, whose chief duties will be to inspect technical classes for women (including upholstery, flower making, needlework, millinery, dressmaking, and dress-cutting), in evening schools, girls' clubs, and polytechnics. The salary will be £300 a year, rising by annual increments of £20 to a maximum salary of £400 a year.

The persons appointed will be under the control of the Chief Inspector, and will be required to give their whole time to the duties of the office, and will in other respects be subject to the usual conditions attached to the Council's service, particulars of which are given in the form of application.

In connection with the appointments there is no restriction with regard to sex.

Applications should be made on the official form, to be obtained from the Clerk of the London County Council, at the County Hall, Spring Gardens, S.W., or at the Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C. The applications must be sent in not later than 10 A.M. on Saturday, the 1st day of April, 1905, addressed to the Education Offices as above, and accompanied by copies of not more than three recent testimonials.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for appointment.

G. L. GOMME,
Clerk of the London County Council.

Spring Gardens, S.W.
2nd March, 1905.

Educational

TRAINING FOR PRIVATE SECRETARIAL WORK AND INDEXING.

Apply Miss PETHERBRIDGE (Nat. Sci. Tripos), 52A Conduit Street, Bond Street, London, W. Employed by the India office as:—Indexer of the East India Company's Records; Dutch and Portuguese Translator. Cataloguer of the Drapers' Company's Records. Warrington Town Records Indexed. Miss PETHERBRIDGE trains from three to six pupils every year for private Secretarial and special Indexing work. The training consists of Indexing—which includes research work and précis writing—Shorthand, Typewriting, special French and German Correspondence, and Business Training. Technique of Indexing, post free, 5s. 3d.

SOUTHPORT PHYSICAL TRAINING COLLEGE.

President: Lord CHARLES BERESFORD, R.N. Principals: A. ALEXANDER, F.R.G.S. (late Director Liverpool Gymnasium), Mrs. ALEXANDER, with Lecturers and Assistants. Objects—To train Educated Ladies as Scientific Teachers of Physical Education. All branches and systems taught, including Outdoor Games, Swimming, Fencing, and Medical Gymnastics, Physiology, Hygiene, Anatomy, and Sick Nursing. Gold and Silver Medals, with Diplomas, awarded to successful students. Schools and Colleges supplied with qualified teachers.

HEALTH STUDENTS.—Ladies who do not desire to adopt Physical Training as a profession are received as Health Students for a special course of instruction in Hygiene, Sick Nursing, Deportment, Riding, Fencing, Swimming, Beneficial Exercises and Outdoor Games. Finishing Lessons can also be arranged for in all branches of education. References permitted to Lord Kinnaid, Dean of Norwich, Rt. Hon. H. J. Gladstone, M.P., Hon. and Rev. E. Lyttelton, D.D. —Further Particulars from the SECRETARY

LING'S SWEDISH SYSTEM.

THE BEDFORD PHYSICAL TRAINING COLLEGE, 37 Lansdowne Road, Bedford. Principal, Miss STANSFELD. Students are trained in this College to become Teachers of Gymnastics in Colleges and Schools. The course of training extends over 2 years, and includes Educational and Medical Gymnastics on the Swedish System, Massage, Anatomy, Physiology and Hygiene, Dancing, Fencing, Hockey, Lacrosse, Cricket, Tennis, &c.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS., Sermons, &c., accurately, neatly and promptly executed at 8d. per 1000 words. Unsolicited Testimonials. —A. MASSIE, "Strathairly," New Barn, Longfield, Kent.

INDEXING. Manual of Practical Indexing. By A. L. CLARKE. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"It is as complete and thorough a treatise on indexing as any one could possibly desire."—Scotsman.

CLASSIFICATION. Manual of Library Classification. By J. D. BROWN. Crown 8vo, 4s. net.

CATALOGUING. Manual of Library Cataloguing. By J. H. QUINN. Crown 8vo, 5s. net. Library Supply Co., 181 Queen Victoria St., E.C.

UNIVERSITY MAN (young), with knowledge of Anglo-Saxon, &c., and of Oriental subjects, desires, in May, appointment as Reader, or in other suitable capacity, to firm publishing Educational or similar works.—Address, X. Y. Z., care of 10 Oat Lane, Wood Street, E.C.

THE INTERNATIONAL BOOK CIRCULAR, No. 139.

Containing a special article, entitled: "SOME CONTEMPORARY FOREIGN CHEMISTS."

By Dr. M. O. FORSTER, together with an exact bibliography of their publications and a double plate of their portraits.—Specimen copies gratis. WILLIAMS & NORGATE, Book Importers, 14 Henrietta St., Covent Garden, W.C.

THOMAS THORP, Secondhand Bookseller, 100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND 4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

READY NEXT WEEK.

CATALOGUE of the Second Portion of the Library of the late Prof. YORK POWELL, comprising History and Biography, Antiquarian Works, European and Oriental Literature and Philology, &c.—B. H. BLACKWELL, 50 & 51 Broad Street, Oxford.

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

AUTHORS' MSS., Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, &c., carefully typed at home (Remington), 9d. per 1000 words. Orders promptly executed.—M. M. L., 7 Vernon Road, Clapham, S.W.

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. from 10d. per 1000 words; qualified proof reader; testimonials; accuracy; promptitude, Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS., Novels, Plays, Reviews, Sermons, &c., typewritten with promptness and accuracy, at 7d. per 1000 words; specimens and testimonials on application. —Miss ALDERSON, 56 Boroughgate, Appleby, Westmorland.

TYPEWRITING (Smith Premier).—Scientific, Legal MSS., Plays, Translations, Duplicates, Novels, 9d. 1000.—Miss HANDLEY, Berkhamsted, Herts.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, &c. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

For Books Wanted and For Sale and For Exchange see page 255

1s. net,
cloth. ROUTLEDGE'S 2s. net,
leather.
NEW UNIVERSAL LIBRARY

OF STANDARD WORKS OF LITERATURE, BRITISH AND FOREIGN; printed from accurate texts, entirely unabridged, and where necessary annotated and indexed.

Pott 8vo, olive green cloth extra, full gilt back, 1s. net: olive-green lambskin gilt, gilt tops, silk register, 2s. net.

The following are now ready, or will be ready during March:

Jeffrey's Essays from the Edinburgh Review.

I—English Poets and Poetry.

Matthew Arnold's On Translating Homer, with F. W. Newman's "Homeric Translation in Theory and Practice," and Arnold's Reply thereto.

George Brimley's Essays (Tennyson, Wordsworth, Poetry and Criticism, Carlyle, Thackeray, &c.). Edited by W. G. CLARK, M.A.

Coleridge's Aids to Reflection. Edited by THOMAS FENBY. With a copious Index.

Lessing's Laocoon. Translated with Notes by Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE, Bart.

J. S. Mill's Dissertations and Discussions. Series I.

„ On Liberty. With an Index (now first added).

„ Representative Government. With an Index (now first added).

„ Utilitarianism. With an Index (now first added).

Palgrave's Golden Treasury of Songs and Lyrics.

Sir Lewis Morris's Poems (Authorised Selection).

Mrs. Gaskell's Life of Charlotte Brontë.

„ Cranford.

Grimm's Fairy Tales.

Andersen's Fairy Tales.

Marryat's The King's Own.

Hughes' Tom Brown's School Days.

Holmes' Poet at the Breakfast Table.

Full Prospectus on application.

THE PHOTOGRAVURE SERIES.

Square 8vo, decorated cloth, gilt top, each with 12 PHOTOGRAVURES, text on JAPON PAPER, 3s. 6d. net.

Omar Khayyam. With 12 Photogravures by GILBERT JAMES.

„ Mr. James must be ranked very high among artists."—Guardian.

„ A very elegant reprint."—Academy.

„ Decidedly effective."—Athenæum.

Milton's Paradise Lost. With 12 Photogravures after etchings by WILLIAM STRANG. [This Day.]

Aucassin and Nicolette. Translated by ANDREW LANG; with 12 Photogravures by GILBERT JAMES. [Shortly.]

Several others to follow at once.

THE FOURTH VOLUME OF A. H. MILES'

Poets and Poetry of the XIXth Century

(Containing the Tennysons, Brownings, Ruskin, Clough, and others, 688 pp.) is now ready; and Vol. V. (Kingsley to Thomson), with a new section on George Meredith, with copious selections, is in the press. Each 1s. 6d. net cloth; 2s. 6d. net lambskin.

The remaining seven volumes to follow shortly.

DICTIONARY OF SLANG AND COLLOQUIAL ENGLISH. By J. S. FARMER and the late W. E. HENLEY. Abridged from the seven-volume work. 542 pp., half morocco, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

DICTIONARY OF ARCHAIC AND PROVINCIAL WORDS, OBSOLETE PHRASES, &c. By J. O. HALLIWELL. 998 pp., half-morocco, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

GLOSSARY OF WORDS, PHRASES, NAMES AND ALLUSIONS. By Archdeacon NARES. Edited by J. O. HALLIWELL and T. WRIGHT. 992 pp. half-morocco, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.

RANKE'S HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION IN GERMANY. Translated with the Author's Notes, by SARAH AUSTIN; edited, with additional Notes and an Introduction, by R. A. JOHNSON, M.A., and a copious Index. 816 pp., 5s. [Library of Historical Literature.]

Ninth Annual Issue

THE LITERARY YEAR BOOK, 1905.

928 pp., cr. 8vo., cloth, 5s. net. "A very workmanlike production, essential to every worker with the pen. . . . thoroughly handy and practical."—Academy.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, LTD., LONDON.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS.

The Cambridge Modern History.

Planned by the late Lord ACTON. Edited by Dr. A. W. WARD, Dr. G. W. PROTHERO, and STANLEY LEATHES, M.A. To be completed in Twelve Volumes. Royal 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 16s. net each.

The Times on Vol. I.—"The opening volume of what promises to be one of the most important books of our time."

The Times on Vol. III.—"As this great work advances it attracts more and more attention."

NOW READY.

Vol. II. THE WARS OF RELIGION. Price 16s. net.

The following Volumes are also ready:—

Vol. I.—THE RENAISSANCE. Fourth Impression. 16s. net. Vol. VII.—THE UNITED STATES. Second Impression. 16s. net.

Vol. II.—THE REFORMATION. Second Impression. 16s. net. Vol. VIII.—THE FRENCH REVOLUTION. 16s. net.

Terms to Subscribers:—Subscriptions will be received for the Complete Work at £7 10s. net, which may be either paid in advance or by payments of 12s. 6d. net for each Volume on publication.

A Prospectus will be sent on application.

A COMPANION TO GREEK STUDIES. Edited by LEONARD WHIBLEY, M.A., Fellow of Pembroke College, and University Lecturer in Ancient History. With 141 Illustrations and 5 Maps. Demy 8vo, 18s. net.

The contents include Chapters on Geography, Fauna and Flora; History; Literature, Philosophy, and Science; Art, Mythology, and Religion; Public Antiquities; Private Antiquities; Criticism and Interpretation, contributed by H. F. Tozer, Canon Tristram, R. D. Hicks, Sir R. Jebb, Dr. Henry Jackson, Dr. Gow, Dr. F. C. Penrose, Prof. E. A. Gardner, Dr. Waldstein, F. R. Earp, A. H. Smith, Prof. Ridgeway, Dr. Archer-Hind, L. Whibley, W. Wyse, R. J. G. Mayor, H. J. Edwards, Prof. Oman, A. B. Cook, Miss Harrison, Dr. Wilkins, Dr. M. R. James, F. Warre Cornish, Lady Evans, Prof. Allbutt, R. A. Neil, P. Giles, E. S. Roberts, J. Rendel Harris, Dr. Verrall, and Dr. Sandys. A Prospectus will be sent on application.

Glasgow Herald.—"It is practically an extremely convenient encyclopædia of what readers of Greek books want, presenting as it does, in a handy and concise form, what would otherwise require to be sought in many volumes."

NOW READY. FOURTH EDITION.

THE GROWTH OF ENGLISH INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE DURING THE EARLY AND MIDDLE AGES. By W. CUNNINGHAM, F.B.A., D.D., Fellow and Lecturer of Trinity College, and Vicar of Great St. Mary's, Cambridge. Fourth Edition. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE CAMBRIDGE HISTORICAL SERIES.—New Volume.

General Editor: G. W. PROTHERO, Litt.D.

SCANDINAVIA: A Political History of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, from 1513 to 1900. By R. NISBET BAIN, Author of "The Daughter of Peter the Great," "Charles XII. and the Collapse of the Swedish Empire," &c. Crown 8vo, with 5 Maps, 7s. 6d.

CAMBRIDGE ENGLISH CLASSICS.—New Volumes.

A Series of Editions of Classical English Writers, based upon a Uniform Plan, and giving faithful Reproductions of the Original Texts. Prospectus, with Specimen Pages, will be sent on application.

ROGER ASCHAM.—English Works.—Toxophilus; Report of the Affaires and State of Germany; The Scholemaster. The Text edited by W. ALDIS WRIGHT, M.A. Large Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

Athenæum.—"No better edition of Ascham's text is ever likely to be printed."

SAMUEL BUTLER.—Hudibras.—Written in the time of the late wars. The Text edited by A. R. WALLER. Large crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

LONDON: CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE, AVE MARIA LANE. C. F. CLAY, MANAGER.

A NEW BOOK

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"On the Heels of De Wet"

THE YELLOW WAR

6s. BY "O" 6s.

Whose Pictures of Incidents witnessed during the War in the Far East have been appearing in Blackwood's Magazine and attracting wide attention.

"A brilliant war book."—Daily Mail.

"This remarkable book."—World.

"A book to be read, and not merely to taste."
Standard.

"We cannot hope for any work which will be more graphic and convincing."—Manchester Courier.

"The sounds of battle and sudden death ring in the reader's ears."—St. James's Gazette.

"It would be difficult to find a parallel in literature of this kind."—Daily Telegraph.

WM. BLACKWOOD AND SONS,
Edinburgh and London.

Macmillan & Co.'s List

BY SIR ARCHIBALD GEIKIE

LANDSCAPE IN HISTORY, and other Essays. By Sir ARCHIBALD GEIKIE, D.C.L., F.R.S. 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

Daily Telegraph.—"In a sense Sir Archibald Geikie's 'Landscape in History' may be said to open up an entirely new branch of study for us. And most attractively has the learned author done this. To those who have shared the current notion that geology and its sister science physiography is necessarily dull, the book before us will come as a revelation. They will find the study of the earth's surface in relation to man, his history and his civilisation, made realistic, as vivid and entrancing as any historic romance."

VOLUME IV. READY NEXT TUESDAY.

DIARY AND LETTERS OF MADAME D'ARBLAY (1778-1840), as Edited by her Niece, CHARLOTTE BARRETT. With Preface and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON. With Photogravure Portraits and other Sketches. In Six Vols. 8vo. Vol. I., 1778 to June 1781. Vol. II., 1781-1786. Vol. III., August 1786 to June 1788. Vol. IV., 1788-1791. 10s. 6d. net each.

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS.—New Series.

Crown 8vo, gilt top, flat backs. 2s. net each.

EDWARD FITZGERALD. By A. C. BENSON.*Shortly.SYDNEY SMITH. By GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL.TWELVE ENGLISH STATESMEN.—Concluding Volume.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. each.

CHATHAM.

By FREDERIC HARRISON.

Daily Chronicle.—"Mr. Harrison's brilliant powers of political interpretation have never been more effectively employed than in this, the latest of the series of Twelve English Statesmen."

PREVIOUSLY PUBLISHED.

William the Conqueror. By Edward A. Freeman, D.C.L., LL.D.Henry II. By Mrs. J. R. Green.Edward I. By Prof. T. F. Tout.Henry VII. By Dr. James Gairdner.Cardinal Wolsey. By Bishop Creighton.Elizabeth. By Prof. E. S. Beesly.Oliver Cromwell. By Frederic Harrison.William III. By H. D. Traill.Walpole. By John Morley.Pitt. By Lord Rosebery.Peel. By J. S. Thursfield.

SECOND EDITION JUST PUBLISHED.

ROMAN SOCIETY FROM NERO TO MARCUS AURELIUS.

By Professor SAMUEL DILL, M.A., Hon. Lit. D., Dublin; Hon. LL.D., Edinburgh. 8vo, 15s. net.

Guardian.—"The success of Professor Dill's 'Roman Society in the Last Century of the Western Empire,' published six years ago, excited a general hope that he would give us something more of the same kind. His new volume will be found to be not less interesting than the former one."

THE BRITISH ARMY (1783-1802). Four Lectures delivered at the Staff College and Cavalry School. By the Hon. J. W. FORTESCUE, Author of "A History of the British Army," 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. [Tuesday].

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS SERIES.—New Volume.

DERBYSHIRE. By J. B. FIRTH. With Illustrations by NELLY ERICHSEN. Extra crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s. [Shortly].

SECOND AND CHEAPER EDITION.

FREE TRADE. By the Right Hon. LORD AVEBURY. Demy 8vo, 2s. 6d.

MACMILLAN'S GUIDE-BOOKS.

ITALY AND SICILY. With 19 Maps and 36 Plans. Fifth Edition. 10s. net.

EASTERN MEDITERRANEAN, including GREECE AND THE GREEK ISLANDS, CONSTANTINOPLE, SMYRNA, EPHESUS, &c. Second Edition. With 27 Maps and Plans. 9s. net.

PALESTINE AND SYRIA. With 13 Maps and 5 Plans. Third Edition. 5s. net.

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.

THE DIARY OF A CHURCH-GOER. Crown 8vo, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN'S NEW NOVELS.

Crown 8vo, 6s. each.

MAURICE HEWLETT. Fond Adventures. Tales of the Youth of the World. [Shortly].

RHODA BROUGHTON. A Waif's Progress. [Shortly].

GERTRUDE ATHERTON. The Bell in the Fog, and other Stories.

ARTHUR TRESIDDER SHEPPARD. The Red Cravat.

CYRUS T. BRADY. The Two Captains. A Romance of Bonaparte and Nelson.

L. H. HAMMOND. The Master-Word. A Story of the South of To-day.

MACMILLAN AND CO., LIMITED, LONDON.

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW BOOKS.

Tastefully printed with broad margins, in large 4to size, with over 150 Photographic Illustrations, handsomely bound, with gilt top, 21s. net.

NORMAN TYMPANA AND LINTELS, with Figures of Symbolical Sculpture, still, or till recently, existing in the Churches of Great Britain, with an extended Introduction and Description, and 150 Phototype Illustrations, By CHARLES EDWARD KEYSER, M.A., F.S.A.

"The volume is produced with an elaborate detail which suits the subject, and establishes itself at once as a work of reference."—Reading Gazette.
"The illustrations are all of good size, and very clearly depict the sculptured figures and ornaments."—City Press.

In crown 4to, cloth, fully Illustrated with Portraits, &c., 21s. net.
THE GARRICK CLUB. By PERCY FITZGERALD, F.S.A., Author of "The Life of Garrick," "Lives of the Kembles," &c.

"Full of good stories, well illustrated, and especially rich in reminiscences of Thackeray." Weekly Times.
"A volume full of delightful chat about notable people, while the numerous illustrations have an historical value."—Graphic.

In demy 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 7s. 6d. net.
THE COLLECTOR'S ANNUAL FOR 1904. Edited by GEORGE E. EAST. "The Collector's Annual" is a Guide and book of Reference for Connoisseurs, Collectors, and others, of the prices which Pictures (Oil and Watercolour), Engravings (mezzotint and colour prints), Old China (English and Foreign), Antique Furniture, Antique Silver and Plate, Medals and Decorations, Miniatures and Objects of Art, have realised at Auction during the Season of 1903-4. Full details are given of each item with the catalogue numbers, date of sale, and from whose collection the object is taken.

New Volume of the CHEAP EDITION of the BOOKLOVER'S LIBRARY. In foolscap 8vo, printed on antique paper, and tastefully bound, price 1s. 6d. net.

LITERARY BLUNDERS. A Chapter in the "History of Human Error." By HENRY B. WHEATLEY, F.S.A.

VOLUMES ALREADY PUBLISHED UNIFORM WITH THE ABOVE.
WHEATLEY'S HOW TO FORM A LIBRARY
HAZLITT'S OLD COOKERY BOOKS AND ANCIENT CUISINE
BLADE'S ENEMIES OF BOOKS
DITCHFIELD'S BOOKS FATAL TO THEIR AUTHORS
HAZLITT'S STUDIES IN JOCLAR LITERATURE
FARRER'S BOOKS CONDEMNED TO BE BURNT
CLOUSTON'S BOOK OF NOODLES
MARSTON'S WALTON AND SOME EARLIER WRITERS ON FISH AND FISHING
HAZLITT'S GLEANINGS IN OLD GARDEN LITERATURE

* Complete Lists of the Series for Distribution can be had on application.

A NEW WORK ON THE CASTLES OF IRELAND.
In handsome demy 8vo, printed in tasteful manner, suitably bound and fully Illustrated, 10s. 6d. net.

THE ANCIENT CASTLES OF IRELAND. By C. L. ADAMS.

"To piece together with the aid of the scattered ruins with which the length and breadth of Ireland is strewn, a history of the castles those ruins represent, must indeed have been a difficult task; but that it has been successfully performed by Mr. Adams no one will deny."—Academy.
"In all cases the descriptive sketch is clear and succinct, and the salient historical events are carefully set forth. A very interesting and informative book."—Northern Whig (Belfast).

In demy 8vo, appropriately bound, 10s. 6d. net.

THE CITY OF YORK: the Story of its Walls, Bars, and Castles. Being a Complete History and Pictorial Record of the Defences of the City, from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. By T. P. COOPER, Author of "The Old Inns and Signs of York."

"Mr. T. P. Cooper, who is known in Yorkshire as the author of a careful book on the city inns and signs, has discovered a good deal of new and entertaining matter; his work is sure to be appreciated."—Saturday Review.

"It deals more exhaustively with the subject than any work yet published. It is written in interesting style, and contains many excellent illustrations."—York Diocesan Magazine.

NEW NOVELS.

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

THE SCHOOL OF LIFE. A Study in the Discipline of Circumstance. By SIBYLL M. ILES.

"The story is an excellent piece of work; the interest is sustained from the first page to the last, and when the end is reached the reader feels the better for having read it."—Leicester Mercury.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 6s.

THE PAINS OF HAPPINESS. A Novel. By RASSAC TORRIANI.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 6s.

LIFE'S PHASES. A Domestic Study. By MARY ADAMS COLLINGS.

"Vividly written and full of human interest."—Record.
"There is some excellent character: the incidents are well described, and the interest is maintained to the conclusion."—Leicester Mercury.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

HODDER & STOUGHTON'S

NEW PUBLICATIONS

THE FIRST ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF

WOMEN PAINTERS OF THE WORLD

WOMEN PAINTERS OF THE WORLD, the new volume in the now famous ART AND LIFE LIBRARY, edited by WALTER SHAW SPARROW, dedicated by Gracious Permission to Her Majesty Queen Alexandra, is even more luxurious than its predecessors, "The British Home of To-Day," and "The Gospels in Art." It is published in four different styles of binding, at respectively 5s. net, 7s. 6d. net, 10s. 6d. net, 21s. net, and contains in addition to the text, 6 Rembrandt photogravures, 7 pictures in colour-facsimile, 34 plates in monochrome, 4 duplex plates, and more than 280 illustrations in half-tone, representing the work of over 200 lady artists.

COMPLETE PROSPECTUS ON APPLICATION

SHINING FERRY

By "Q" (A. T. QUILLER COUCH)

FIRST EDITION exhausted before publication. SECOND EDITION nearly ready Among living novelists, Mr. Quiller Couch, by general consent, holds a foremost place both for his mastery of the story-telling craft and for the brilliance and charm of his style. "Shining Ferry" will be doubly welcome, for it is written with the old delightful crispness and ease, and the scene is laid in no other place than the familiar Troy Town of the Delectable Duchy.

With Frontispiece.

6s.

BEVERLY OF GRAUSTARK

By GEORGE BARR McCUTCHEON, Author of "Graustark," &c.

THE MOST POPULAR BOOK IN AMERICA

The CRITICS say it is: "Fascinating, engrossing, and picturesque"—"Charming"—"Interesting"—"Thoroughly enjoyable."

Illustrated in Colours.

6s.

COVENTRY PATMORE

By EDMUND GOSSE

A New Volume of "Literary Lives." Edited by W. Robertson Nicoll. With Photogravure Frontispiece and numerous Illustrations. 3s. 6d.

Volumes previously published

1. JOHN BUNYAN. By the Author of "MARK RUTHERFORD"
2. MATTHEW ARNOLD. By G. W. E. RUSSELL. Second Edition.
3. NEWMAN. By WILLIAM BARRY. Second Edition.

Illustrated. 3s. 6d. each

THE MOUNTAINS

By STEWART EDWARD WHITE, Author of "The Silent Places," &c.

"This readable and delightful book."—SCOTSMAN.
"Is interesting and racy from cover to cover."—KING.
"Will be read with joy by every true lover of the mountains."—OUTLOOK.

With 17 Illustrations.

7s. 6d.

THE WHITE TERROR AND THE RED

A NOVEL OF REVOLUTIONARY RUSSIA. By ABRAHAM CAHAN

Mr. Cahan's inside knowledge of the Nihilist conspiracies, his acquaintance at first hand with the scenes and the victims of the riots, and his literary grasp on character, all are evident in "The White Terror and The Red." It is a novel of the most sensational episodes treated with absolute realism, and gives an accurate picture of Russia in the throes of two terrorisms, the above-ground as well as the underground Russia, the Russian official, the Russian political dreamer, the moujik, the soldier, the Jew, all exactly as they are.

Ready Shortly.

6s.

THE DOWNFALL OF RUSSIA

By HUGO GANZ

"This is an excellent volume greatly to be commended to the general reader. The author has produced a series of most vivid pictures, and the result is more like Russia than anything we have seen."—ATHENÆUM.

Fourth Edition.

6s.

NERVES IN ORDER

OR THE MAINTENANCE OF HEALTH. By A. T. SCHOFIELD, M.D.

"Dr. Schofield, who has done much work as lecturer and examiner of the National Health Society . . . gives a great deal of sound, lucid, and practical advice on the maintenance of health in the widest sense."—TIMES.

Uniform with "Nerves in Disorder."

3s. 6d.

HODDER & STOUGHTON, 27 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON

A DIFFICULTY SOLVED

The difficulty of compressing a COMPLETE STANDARD NOVEL into a volume $4\frac{1}{2}$ by $6\frac{1}{2}$ inches, and only $\frac{1}{4}$ inch in thickness, and yet retain the same CLEAR, large type, has been solved by the introduction of ROYAL INDIA PAPER as used in

NELSON'S NEW CENTURY LIBRARY

OLD STYLE,
2 Vols.

NEW STYLE.
Complete in 1 Volume.
Same type.

These Volumes are as handsome as they are convenient, and make a CHOICE LIBRARY SET. The following works are included in the series.

Cloth, gilt top, 2s. net. Leather, limp, gilt edges, 2s. 6d. net; leather, boards, gilt edges, 3s. net per volume.

THACKERAY'S WORKS. 14 vols.

DICKENS'S WORKS. 14 vols.

SCOTT'S WORKS. 25 vols.

WESTWARD HO! KINGSLEY.

BRONTE'S WORKS. Complete in 5 vols.

JANE AUSTEN'S WORKS. Complete in 2 vols.

CHARLES LEVER'S WORKS. 4 vols.

LYTTON'S WORKS. 4 vols.

Cloth extra, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net. Leather, limp, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

BURNS'S POETICAL WORKS.

TENNYSON.

CERVANTES' DON QUIXOTE.

FRENCH REVOLUTION. CARLYLE.

BUNYAN'S WORKS.

SCOTT'S ROMANTIC POEMS.

THE SKETCH BOOK AND BRACEBRIDGE HALL,
WASHINGTON IRVING.

ON SALE AT ALL BOOKSELLERS THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY
ASK FOR

"NELSON'S NEW CENTURY LIBRARY"

* Apply for New Coloured Descriptive Catalogue.

THOMAS NELSON & SONS,
35 and 36 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.; Edinburgh, Dublin, and
New York

Smith, Elder and Co.'s List

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S NEW NOVEL THE MARRIAGE OF WILLIAM ASHE

IS NOW READY AT ALL BOOKSELLERS AND LIBRARIES

With Illustrations by ALBERT STERNER
Crown 8vo, 6s.

Shortly. With a Portrait Frontispiece. Small demy 8vo,
10s. 6d. net.

TRACKS OF A ROLLING STONE. By the Honble. HENRY J. COKE.

Author of "A Ride Over the Rocky Mountains," "Creeds of the Day," &c.

Shortly. With 20 Full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE STORY OF AN INDIAN UPLAND. By F. B. BRADLEY-BIRT, F.R.G.S., I.C.S.

With an Introduction by the Hon. H. H. RISLEY, C.S.I., C.I.E., Home Secretary to the Government of India.

SPRING IN A SHROPSHIRE ABBEY. By Lady CATHERINE MILNES GASKELL.

With 16 Full-page Illustrations. Small demy 8vo, 9s. net.
[Shortly.]

TO LHASA AT LAST. By POWELL MILLINGTON,
Author of "In Cantonments," &c. SECOND EDITION. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo,
3s. 6d. net.
SPECTATOR.—"Major Millington has accomplished a difficult task with much success.
... He has aimed at producing a light-hearted, slangy chronicle of the road. His jokes are nearly always good, and they are very numerous."

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITIONS OF TWO POPULAR BOOKS. SHORTLY. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

THE TRAGEDY OF THE "KOROSKO." By A. CONAN
DOYLE. With 40 Full-page Illustrations.
DAILY NEWS.—"A fine story, the interest of which arrests the reader's attention at the start, and holds it to the close."

THE GREEN FLAG, and other Stories of War and Sport.
By A. CONAN DOYLE. With a Frontispiece.
DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"The battle picture is perfect of its kind. Altogether the volume is admirable."

A VAGRANT ENGLISHWOMAN. By CATHERINE I. DODD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

[In March.]

THE MARQUIS'S EYE. By G. F. FRADBY, Author of "Joshua Newings, or the Love Bacillus," Crown 8vo, 6s.
[In the Press.]

PETER'S MOTHER. By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE.

Third Impression in the Press. Crown 8vo, 6s.

GUARDIAN.—"This is a novel which ought to have a very marked success. The story is admirably told and the characters are all living and distinct. ... As for Lady Mary, she is a triumph."
DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"Peter's Mother is as delightful a character as the imagination of a novel writer ever figured forth. ... A better novel the reader could not desire."

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

BLACKIE AND SON'S LIST.

THE CELTIC REVIVAL.

JUST READY.

THE MYTHOLOGY OF THE BRITISH ISLANDS.

An Introduction to the Celtic Myth, Legend, Poetry, and Romance.

By CHARLES SQUIRE.

Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 12s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Squire's exposition is very clear, judicious and interesting . . . the book is replete with curious information."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE LITERATURE OF THE CELTS.

Its History and Romance.

By MAGNUS MACLEAN, M.A., D.Sc.

416 pp., demy 8vo, cloth boards, 7s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Maclean is an enthusiastic Celt. . . . He has a wide acquaintance with the critical and other literatures which that has called forth. We cannot overpraise his account of the MSS., their writers, their discoverers, and their editors."—Daily Chronicle.

The LITERATURE of the HIGHLANDS.

By MAGNUS MACLEAN, M.A., D.Sc.,

Author of "The Literature of the Celts."

Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 7s. 6d. net.

CONTENTS: Highland Literature—Alexander Macdonald and the Jacobite Bards—Duncan Ban Macintyre and the Poets of Nature—Macpherson and his Ossian—Robb Donn and the Elegiac, Amatory, and Satiric Poets—Dugald Buchanan and the Religious Poets and Hymn Writers—Gaelic Proverbs—English Renderings of Gaelic Poetry and their Authors—the Gaelic Bards of the Nineteenth Century—The Literature of Travel and of History—Index of Names. "All things considered, this work, which is bright, well-written, and well-arranged, is an admirable and trustworthy text-book of its subject."—Spectator.

A NEW AND IMPORTANT WORK ON JAPAN.

DAI NIPPON:

The Britain of the East.

A STUDY IN NATIONAL EVOLUTION.

By Dr. HENRY DYER.

Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

"An intelligent description of some of the most marked features in the political and economic conditions of the Empire of Japan as it now is."—Times.
"The many topics on which Dr. Dyer learnedly discourses. We recommend every one who desires to gain a just view of the present position and future prospects of Japan to read his most instructive and interesting work."—Academy and Literature.

The Red Letter Library.

A SERIES OF SELECTIONS FROM THE GREAT MASTERS OF ENGLISH LITERATURE.

Limp leather, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; cloth, gilt top, 1s. 6d. net.

Messrs. BLACKIE and SON, Ltd., have much pleasure in announcing that they have made a number of important additions to the Red Letter Library. Price 1s. 6d. net, cloth, gilt top; 2s. 6d. net, leather, gilt top.

LORD TENNYSON.—In Memoriam. Introduction by ALICE MEYNELL.
LORD BYRON.—Select Poems. Introduction by ARTHUR SYMONS.
GEORGE HERBERT.—Select Poems. Introduction by his Grace the ARCHBISHOP OF ARMAGH.

BOSWELL.—Johnson's Table Talk (Selections from the Life of Johnson). Edited, with an Introduction, by W. A. LEWIS BETTANY.

S. T. COLERIDGE.—Select Poems. Introduction by Mrs. MEYNELL.
WILLIAM CARLETON.—Select Stories. Introduction by TIGHE HOPKINS.

THACKERAY.—Roundabout Papers. Introduction by CHARLES WHIBLEY.

MILTON.—Select Poems. Introduction by Professor WALTER RALEIGH.

Other Volumes in Preparation. Complete List on Application.

The Red Letter Shakespeare

Edited by EDMUND K. CHAMBERS.

A New Edition of Shakespeare's Plays, in Single Volumes, for the general reader. Text printed in Red and Black.

The following Volumes Now Ready:

THE MERCHANT OF VENICE.

THE TEMPEST.

A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

ROMEO AND JULIET.

Other Volumes to be issued immediately. In cloth, 1s. net; in limp leather, 2s. 6d. net.

Messrs. BLACKIE and SON, Ltd., will be pleased to send a set of their Illustrated Catalogues, containing particulars of "The Red Letter Library," "Great Novelist Standard Two-Shilling Library," Children's Books, and General Literature, POST-

BLACKIE & SON, LTD., 50 OLD BAILEY, E.C.

DAVID NUTT, 57-59 Long Acre, w.c.

LATEST PUBLICATIONS.

Bloomsbury: A Story of Modern London. By C. F. KEARY. Author of "The Two Lancrofts," "Herbert Vanlennert," "Un Mariage de Convenience," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

ATHENEUM.—"The scene is laid almost exclusively in the quarter of London indicated by the title. But for contrast this microcosm is peopled with a great variety of intellectual types, suggestive of the sects and 'isms' among which almost all societies are nowadays partitioned."

Divorce. By PAUL BOURGET, Member of the French Academy. Translated by E. L. CHARLWOOD. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

REVIEW OF REVIEWS.—"There is no more powerful and illuminating presentation of the French Catholic view of marriage than that given in M. Paul Bourget's latest and strongest novel. It has now been translated into English, and will doubtless find many readers. It is a novel of very unusual power and dignity, and it does not contain a passage that would justify the most prudish in applying to it the epithet 'unclean.'"

To Windward. The Story of a Stormy Course. A Novel of Modern New York. By H. C. ROWLAND, Author of "Sea Scamps." Frontispiece in Colour by CHARLOTTE WEBER. Crown 8vo, 359 pp., cloth, 6s.

•• A remarkably strong and dramatic novel, in part a story of the sea in part the story of a man's battle in New York.

The House in the Woods. By ARTHUR HENRY. Crown 8vo, 323 pp., and numerous full-page Illustrations. Art linen, 4s. net.

•• The story of a real experiment—of a young couple, disciples of Thoreau and Ruskin, who turned their backs on city life, and built their own house in a mountain woodland with the sole aid of their village neighbours.

"MUNCHAUSEN REINCARNATED IN THOMPSON SETON."

Fergy the Guide and his Moral and Instructive Lies about Beasts, Birds, and Fishes. By H. S. CANFIELD. With Illustrations by A. J. BLASHFIELD. Square 8vo, 242 pp., cloth, 6s. net.

•• A most amusing collection of backwoodsman's yarns of the fullest description about hunting and fishing exploits. An American critic has wittily and truthfully described Fergy, the "veracious" guide as "Munchausen reincarnated in Ernest Thompson-Seton."

SCOTSMAN.—"Based on a first-hand knowledge of natural history. . . . Has a freshness and vigour that make the book interesting and stimulating from first to last."

Second Revised and Enlarged Edition.

The Spoken Arabic of Egypt: Grammar, Exercises, Vocabularies. By J. SELDEN WILLMORE, M.A., Judge of the Native Court of Appeal at Cairo. Demy 8vo, xxviii-458 pp., limp roan. Net 10s. 6d.

Also KEY to the Exercises in above. Net 3s. 6d.

•• The second edition of what the Athenaeum has described as "much the best book on the subject that has so far appeared" has been thoroughly revised and enlarged by nearly one-fourth.

Second Revised and Enlarged Edition.

The Mabinogion: Mediæval Welsh Romances. Translated by Lady CHARLOTTE GUEST. With Historical and Literary Notes by ALFRED NUTT. 16mo. (Temple Classics format.) 384 pp., cloth, top gilt, marker, 2s. 6d.

•• The Mabinogion is the finest collection extant of mediæval romance, and one of the half a dozen finest story-books in all literature. The present edition contains a full list of the Welsh Place and Personal Names, with English meanings and other elucidations, and is the only one which serves the purposes of the student of Celtic literature.

ANNOUNCEMENTS.

The English and Scottish Popular Ballads. Edited by FRANCIS JAMES CHILD. With Introduction by G. L. KITTEDGE. Demy 8vo, xxi-722 pp. (double columns), cloth, 12s. 6d. net. [Ready March 18.]

The Three-Cornered Hat. (El Sombrero de los Picos.) By PEDRO ALARCON. Translated from the Spanish by Lady GOODENOUGH. [Ready April.]

•• One of the most vivacious and characteristic examples of the art of Alarcon, the gayest and liveliest Spanish story-teller of the last half century.

Gubbio: History, Legend, and Archaeology. By LAURA MCCracken. With Photogravure Frontispiece, Maps, Plans, and numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, upwards of 350 pp. [Ready April.]

•• Gubbio, the town of the Procession of the Ceri and of St. Ubaldo, the scene of the Compact between St. Francis and the Wolf, the resting-place of the Eugubine Tables, is one of the most picturesque of the hill towns of Umbria, and its mediæval history is romantic and varied even beyond the wont of Italian cities. The illustrations, reproductions for the most part of Miss McCracken's drawings, give a vivid idea of the little town and the neighbouring country. A full description is given both of the Procession of the Ceri and of the celebrated Eugubine Tables.

India and the Apostle Thomas. By the Right Rev. A. E. MEDLYCOTT, late Bishop of Trichur. With Map and numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, upwards of 350 pp., cloth. [Ready May.]

•• An elaborate investigation vindicating the authenticity of the traditions concerning the Indian Apostolate of St. Thomas, with a critical study of the "Acta Thomas."

DENT'S COMPLETE TOLSTOY. TOLSTOY.

SPECIAL NOTE.—Not only will Dent's "TOLSTOY" be completed in 12 months, but it will contain everything written by the great Russian author up to 1905, including a Thought-Index to all the important thoughts and ideas in the works, together with a Biography, Bibliography, and Critical Analysis.

Large crown 8vo, illustrated, 3s. 6d. per vol. (sold separately). Edited and translated by Prof. LEO WIENER, Professor of Slavic Languages and Literature at Harvard University, and Author of "An Anthology of Russian Literature," "Yiddish Literature in the Nineteenth Century," &c.

First Four Volumes Now Ready.

Vol. I. CHILDHOOD, BOYHOOD, YOUTH. 1852-1857.

Vol. II. THE COSSACKS, SEVASTOPOL, &c. 1852-1856.

Vol. III. A MOSCOW ACQUAINTANCE, THE SNOWSTORM, DOMESTIC HAPPINESS, &c. 1856-1859.

Vol. IV. PEDAGOGICAL ARTICLES, THE LINEN MEASURE, 1861-1862.

NOW READY.

WAR AND PEACE. 4 vols.

Also Large Paper Edition. Sold in Sets only, ros. 6d. net per vol.

The MORNING POST says: "An excellent edition, well bound and clearly printed. . . . Professor Wiener is an accomplished Russian scholar, and we are grateful for his clear and unpretentiously worded translations of Tolstoy's life-work."

The ACADEMY says: "We are extremely glad to welcome the first two volumes of a new translation of Tolstoy's works. . . . The volumes at 3s. 6d. net each are extremely cheap and well printed."

The ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE says: "The Translator appears to have produced a good, serviceable translation, devoid of affectation and the obtrusion of Russian words—the latter a rock on which certain of his predecessors have split—and faithful, as he claims, to the author's rugged strength."

PLEASE WRITE FOR A PROSPECTUS.

THE TEMPLE AUTOBIOGRAPHIES.

New Volume

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

Edited, with a Sketch of his Later Life, by
W. MACDONALD

Illustrated. Long fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net

The ATHENEUM says: "The latest edition of Benjamin Franklin's Autobiography deserves special regard, for it is 'now first printed in England from the full and authentic text,' the curious history of which is told in a spirited bibliographical preface. . . . What, however, gives this edition, an unusual interest is 'An Historical Account of Franklin's Later Life.' . . . It is a condensed history of the period, of over 100 pages, exhibiting the multifarious energies of Franklin in two continents. It is evident that Mr. Macdonald has soaked himself, if the phrase be permissible, in his subject."

THE TEMPLE BIOGRAPHIES.

New Volume

MAJOR-GENERAL HARRISON

By the

Rev. C. H. SIMPKINSON

Illustrated

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net

The PALL MALL GAZETTE says: "A useful and vividly interesting volume."

The SCOTSMAN says: "The book itself gives a well-studied and interesting biographical portrait of a revolutionary leader second in importance only to Cromwell."

The WESTMINSTER GAZETTE says "A biographical volume of value and importance."

MEDIÆVAL TOWNS

Now Ready. NEW VOLUME

Venice. Venice. Venice.

By THOMAS OKEY

Illustrated by NELLIE ERICKSEN

PUNCH says: "The letterpress is contributed by Mr. Thomas Okey, and the illustrations by Miss Nellie Erickson. Both are admirable. . . . INDISPENSABLE TO THOSE ABOUT TO VISIT VENICE."

The SPECTATOR says: "He has had no easy task in compressing into the limits of even the larger volumes of this series so great a mass of material; and he has performed it with skill and success."

Assist.* By LINA DUFF GORDON.
Bruges.† By ERNEST GILLIATT-SMITH.

Cairo.† By STANLEY LANE-POOLE.
Chartres.† By CECIL HEADLAM.
Constantinople.* By W. H. HUTTON.
Ferrara.† By ELLA NOYES.
Florence.† By EDMUND G. GARDNER.
London.† By H. B. WHEATLEY.
Moscow.* By WIRT GERRARE.

Nuremberg.* By CECIL HEADLAM.
Perugia.* By MARGARET SYMONDS and LINA DUFF GORDON.
Prague.* By COUNT LUTZOW.
Rome.† By NORWOOD YOUNG.
Rouen.† By THEODORE A. COOK.
Seville.† By WALTER M. GALLICHAH.
Siena.† By EDMUND G. GARDNER.
Toledo.* By HANNAH LYNCH.
Verona.† By ALETHEA WELLS.

Pocketable, * cloth, 3s. 6d. net; † roan, 4s. 6d. net; roan, 5s. 6d. net.

Prospectuses and Lists Post Free on Application

NEW VOLUME OF THE TEMPLE CLASSICS

With Photogravure Frontispiece, bound in blue cloth, 1s. 6d. net; in green lambskin, 2s. net

The ATHENEUM says: "This wonderful series of little books is now extending to the byways of literature and the paths of the scholar, having long since given us the standard volumes which interest the ordinary reader."

TRUTH says: "A large and varied library of the best literature. It includes many books not obtainable in any other series, and the dainty and tasteful 'get-up' of the volumes gives them a unique attractiveness."

THE GULS HORNEBOOKE. By THOMAS DEKKER. Including also "The Belman of London," and "Lanthorn and Candle Light." Edited, with Notes and Marginalia, by OLIPHANT SMEATON.

Write for Specimen Copy of the TEMPLE CLASSICS MAGAZINE, and List of the TEMPLE CLASSICS

LONDON: J. M. DENT & CO., 29 & 30 BEDFORD STREET, W.C.

MR. HEINEMANN'S LIST OF BOOKS.

A BELLE OF THE FIFTIES

Memoirs of Mrs. Clay of Alabama, covering Social and Political Life in Washington and the South, 1853-66. Edited by ADA STERLING. With contemporary Portraits. 10/6 net.

"That section of society which met in Washington before the Civil War could compare in cultivation, taste, and intelligence with the Courts of Europe. Mrs. Clay describes it with great spirit and vivacity. . . . She herself was a fascinating and brilliant figure, a clever and high-spirited beauty."—TIMES.

The observations and reflections of a well-educated and witty Frenchman who records his impressions of many visits to England and to Gibraltar, Egypt, and India. His book is as sensible as it is amusing, and in his criticisms there is no trace of malice.

THROUGH ISLE AND EMPIRE

By VICOMTE D'HUMIÈRES
With a Prefatory Letter by RUDYARD KIPLING. 6/-

FRENCH PROFILES

STUDIES IN THE LITERATURE
OF FRANCE.

By EDMUND GOSSE. 7/6

"There is no book of recent English criticism which bears so clearly the impress alike of the scholar and the man of the world, and which combines so wide a tolerance and so genial a humanity with so much earnestness and a real enthusiasm for literary excellence."

STANDARD.

"A collection of personal impressions which make delightful reading and which suggest intelligence and artistic sensibility. . . . A brilliant piece of work touched with much of the colour and light of the delightful land. . . . full of vivid writing, as readers are cordially recommended to prove for themselves."

STANDARD.

THE LAND OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN

Impressions and Sketches in Andalusia. By
W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM. 6/- net

THE COUNTRY DAY BY DAY

By E. KAY ROBINSON.

With 24 full-page Illustrations.
6/-.

"Those who love the country will find delight of a very rare quality in this book. . . . It is delightful to follow the course of the year, day by day, each entry showing some fresh wonder, some fresh interest."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE PRODIGAL SON	Hall Caine
AN ACT IN A BACKWATER	E. F. Benson
AMANDA OF THE MILL	Marie van Vorst
CUT LAURELS	M. Hamilton
THE CLANSMAN	Thomas Dixon, Jr.
PAM	Baroness von Hutten
NANCY STAIR	Elinor M. Lane
BACCARAT	Frank Danby
THE HEART OF PENELOPE	Mrs. Belloc Lowndes
DIANE	Katharine H. Brown
ROBERT CAVELIER	W. D. Orcutt

LONDON: WM. HEINEMANN, 21 Bedford Street, W.C.

GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED

New and Forthcoming Books. Spring 1905

Country Life Library.

THE GARDENS OF ITALY. By C. LATHAM. 2 Vols., £3 3s. net.

Country Life Library of Sport.

BIG GAME SHOOTING. 2 Vols. 25s. net.

POLO. 12s. 6d. net.

Newnes' Library of the Applied Arts. 7s. 6d. net.

ENGLISH EMBROIDERY. A. F. KENDRICK.

SHEFFIELD PLATE B. WYLLIE.

ENGLISH TABLE GLASS. PERCY BATE.

FRENCH POTTERY AND PORCELAIN. HENRI FRANTZ

ENGLISH PEWTER. MALCOLM BELL.

Drawings of Great Masters. 7s. 6d. net.

DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI. T. MARTIN WOOD.

REMBRANDT. MALCOLM BELL.

DAVID COX. T. MARTIN WOOD.

In preparation, uniform with the above :

DRAWINGS BY SIR E. J. POYNTER, P.R.A.

LATER PEEPS AT PARLIAMENT. H. W. LUCY. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

C. B. FRY'S MAGAZINE, Vol. 2, Oct. 1904-March 1905. 6s. net.

IMPERIAL JAPAN. GEORGE WILLIAM KNOX. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE RETURN OF SHERLOCK HOLMES. A. CONAN DOYLE. Crown 8vo. Illustrated. 6s.

WIDE WORLD MAGAZINE, Vol. 14. Oct. 1904-March 1905. 6s. 6d.

THE OUTDOOR HANDY BOOK ("Library of Recreations"). 6s. net.

CAPTAIN, Vol. 12. Oct. 1904-March 1905. 6s.

Our Empire Series. 3s. 6d. net.

CANADIAN LIFE IN TOWN AND COUNTRY. H. J. MORGAN.

AUSTRALIAN LIFE IN TOWN AND COUNTRY. E. C. BULEY.

NEW ZEALAND LIFE IN TOWN AND COUNTRY. R. A. LONGHNAN.

Newnes' Art Library. 3s. 6d. net.

THE EARLY WORK OF TITIAN. MALCOLM BELL.

FILIPPINO LIPPI. P. J. KONODY.

PUVIS DE CHAVANNES. ARSÈNE ALEXANDRE.

DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI. ERNEST RADFORD.

FRA ANGELICO. EDGCUMBE STALEY.

THE SPORTSMAN'S YEAR-BOOK. Edited by A. WALLIS MYERS. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Newnes' Thin Paper Classics. Leather, 3s. 6d. net; cloth, 3s. net.

MUNGO PARK'S TRAVELS.

PLAYS AND POEMS OF CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE.

MISCELLANEOUS WORKS OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

THE FAERIE QUEEN. By EDMUND SPENSER. 2 vols.

THE NOVELS OF LAURENCE STERNE.

HERRICK'S POEMS.

Newnes' Pocket Classics. Leather, 2s. 6d. net; cloth, 2s. net.

THE POEMS OF THOMAS GRAY AND WILLIAM COLLINS.

SONGS FROM THE DRAMATISTS.

POEMS OF MICHAEL DRAYTON.

A New Series of Religious Classics.

NEWNES' LIBRARY OF DEVOTION.

Uniform with Newnes' Pocket Classics. 2s. 6d. net, leather; 2s. net, cloth. Two Volumes will be published before Easter.

LYRA GERMANICA.

THE IMITATION OF CHRIST. By THOMAS À KEMPIS.

HOW WE RECOVERED THE ASHES. P. F. WARNER. With an Introduction by C. B. FRY. Cheap Edition. 1s. net.

REPTILE LIFE. W. P. PYCRAFT ("Library of Useful Stories"). 1s.

Newnes' Sixpenny Copyright Novels (Illustrated).

FOR GOD AND THE CZAR. J. E. MUDDOCK. 6d.

THE LADY PARAMOUNT. HENRY HARLAND. 6d.

A DEAL WITH THE DEVIL. EDEN PHILLPOTTS. 6d.

THE WORLDLINGS. LEONARD MERRICK. 6d.

THE SOWERS. H. S. MERRIMAN. 6d.

ELEANOR. Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD. 6d.

PUBLISHED BY
T. & T. CLARK, Edinburgh

By Prof. W. SANDAY, D.D., Oxford. Post 8vo, 5s. net.

OUTLINES OF THE LIFE OF CHRIST. With New Large Map of Palestine.

All interested in Theology will be glad to have Dr. Sanday's Article, "Jesus Christ," which was originally prepared for Hastings' "Dictionary of the Bible" in this convenient form. The Guardian said that this treatise would "take rank as of the first importance for students of theology;" and another leading Review stated that "Dr. Sanday could have printed this article in a half-guinea volume, and we should all have had to buy it." Here, then, is the article, revised throughout, divided into chapters and sections, with an important new Map of Palestine added, and issued in handsome form for less than half that amount.

By Prof. MARCUS DODS, D.D., Edinburgh. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

THE BIBLE: ITS ORIGIN AND NATURE.

CONTENTS:—The Bible and Other Sacred Books—The Canon—Revelation—Inspiration—Infallibility of Scripture—Trustworthiness of the Gospels—Miraculous Element in the Gospels.

THE LIFE EVERLASTING. Studies in the Subject of the Future. By Rev DAVID PURVES, D.D., Belfast. Now ready. Crown 8vo. 4s. net.

CONTENTS:—The Life Everlasting—The Resurrection—The Future Life—Immortality in Literature. Index.

New Volume: "INTERNATIONAL CRITICAL COMMENTARY."

AMOS AND HOSEA. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary. By President W. R. HARPER, Ph.D., Chicago. Post 8vo, 12s.

THE CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE OF THE LORD'S SUPPER. By Rev. R. M. ADAMSON, M.A., Ardrossan. Imperial 16mo. 4s. 6d. net.

BABYLONIAN AND ASSYRIAN LAWS, CONTRACTS, AND LETTERS. By Rev. C. H. W. JOHNS, M.A. Cambridge. In one large volume 12s. net.

"In Mr. Johns' 'Babylonian and Assyrian Laws, Contracts, and Letters,' that book which has given so promising a start to the 'Library of Ancient Inscriptions,' there is more matter for the interpretation of the early books of the Bible than in any commentary that has been issued for many a day—apart perhaps from a Gunkel or a Driver—and sometimes the interpretation is quite direct."—Expository Times.

Detailed Prospectus of the Series free.

EDINBURGH: T. & T. CLARK, 38 George Street.

LONDON: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & CO. LTD.

OLIPHANT, ANDERSON & FERRIER

THE GREAT RELIGIONS OF INDIA.

By the late J. MURRAY MITCHELL, M.A., LL.D. With Map and Portrait, 7s. net

DR. ALEX. WHYTE'S NEW BOOK.

THE WALK, CONVERSATION AND CHARACTER OF OUR LORD AND SAVIOUR JESUS CHRIST.

A Series of Discourses on the Character of our Lord. By ALEXANDER WHYTE, D.D. Author of "Bible Characters," &c. Price 6s. [Nearly Ready.]

HELPFUL WORDS FOR DAILY LIFE.

By Prof. S. LAW WATSON, M.A., D.D. Price 3s. 6d. net. Scripture Readings for a year, founded upon the less observed passages of Holy Scripture.

HOLY HIMALAYA:

The Religion, Traditions, and Scenery of a Himalayan Province. By E. SHERMAN OAKLEY, M.A., of the London Missionary Society. With 16 Illustrations, 5s. net.

ETERNAL ELEMENTS IN THE CHRISTIAN FAITH.

By the Rev. D. BUTLER, M.A., Minister of the Tron Kirk, Edinburgh, Author of "Life and Letters of Archbishop Leighton," &c. Price 2s. 6d. net.

SECOND EDITION, WITH NEW PREFACE, OF

THE FAITH OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

By JOHN KELMAN, Jun., M.A. Price 6s. net, Half Vellum Cloth, Gilt Top. "An attempt to figure the man forth in all his qualities. The attempt is astonishingly successful."—Athenaeum.

STARTING-POINTS.

For Speakers, Preachers, Writers, and Other Thinkers.

Sentences sifted from Authors of To-day and Yesterday. By JOHN HORNE. 2s. 6d. net (postage 3d.). "A busy man can turn to it for hints, and having got his text, can go ahead. It is like grace before meat."—Sheffield Telegraph.

THE GIST OF JAPAN: The Islands and their People.

By R. B. PERRY, A.M., Ph.D. With 8 full-page Illustrations. 5s. "By far the most authoritative statement on the subject that we have met with."—Athenaeum.

FAVOURITE NOVELS BY ADELINE SERGEANT.

SEVENTY TIMES SEVEN.
Fourth Edition. 2s. 6d.

NO AMBITION.
Second Edition. 3s. 6d.

THE LUCK OF THE HOUSE.
Fifth Edition. 3s. 6d., gilt edges.

21 PATERNOSTER SQUARE, LONDON, E.C. and 100 PRINCES STREET, EDINBURGH.

SPRING 1905

A Literary History of the English People.

Vol. II. By J. J. JUSSERAND, French Ambassador to the United States. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. net.

Travels of a Naturalist in Northern Europe.

By J. A. HARVIE-BROWN, F.R.S.E., F.Z.S., Author of "Fauna of the Moray Basin," "A Vertebrate Fauna of Orkney," &c. With 4 Maps and many Illustrations. 2 vols., royal 8vo, cloth. Limited Edition, uniform with "Fauna of the Moray Basin." Prices on application.

Siberia: a Record of Travel, Climbing and Exploration.

By SAMUEL TURNER. With 100 Illustrations and 2 Maps. Demy 8vo, cloth, 21s. net.

International Law and the North Sea Crisis.

By F. E. SMITH, B.C.L., Fellow of Merton College, Oxford, and Vinerian Scholar in the University of Oxford, and N. W. SIBLEY, LL.M., Trin. H.Cant., Barristers-at-Law. Royal 8vo, cloth, 21s. net.

Russia Under the Great Shadow.

By LUIGI VILLARI, Author of "Giovanni Segantini," "Italian Life in Town and Country," &c. With 60 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

The Age of the Earth, and other Geological Studies.

By W. J. SOLLAS, LL.D., D.Sc., F.R.S., Professor of Geology in the University of Oxford. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

NOTABLE NEW NOVELS

THE FLUTE OF PAN	John Oliver Hebbes	(6s.)
YARN OF OLD HARBOUR TOWN	W. Clark Russell	(6s.)
BY BEACH AND BOGLAND (Ready)	Jane Barlow	(6s.)
CONSTANTINE DIX	Barry Pain	(3s. 6d.)
LUCIE AND I	Honrietta Corkran	(6s.)
TOM GERRARD	Louis Becke	(6s.)
GRAND RELATIONS	J. S. Fletcher	(6s.)
THE HOUSE BY THE RIVER	Florence Warden	(6s.)
A PAGAN'S LOVE (First Novel)	Constance Clyde	(6s.)
THE SIREN'S NET	Florence Roosevelt	(6s.)
A SPECIMEN SPINSTER	Kate Westlake Yelgh	(6s.)
STOLEN WATERS (Ready)	Lucas Cleeve	(6s.)
THREE DUKES (Ready)	G. Ystridde	(6s.)
A SONG OF A SINGLE NOTE (Ready)	Amelia E. Barr	(6s.)
THE INTERPRETERS	Margaretta Byrde	(6s.)
STARS OF DESTINY	L. Parry Truscott	(6s.)
THREE OF THEM	Maxim Gorky	(1s. net)

Bygones Worth Remembering.

By GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 18 other Portraits. 2 vols. demy 8vo, cloth, 21s.

Lady Jean: the Romance of the Great Douglas Cause.

By PERCY FITZGERALD, F.S.A. With Photogravure Frontispiece, and 12 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

The Personal Story of the Upper House.

By KOSMO WILKINSON. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth, 16s.

The Westminster Cathedral: a Criticism.

By PERCY FITZGERALD, F.S.A. With 3 Plates. Crown folio, 5s. net.

In Peril of Change: Essays Written in Time of Tranquillity.

By C. F. G. MASTERMAN, Fellow of Christ's College, Cambridge. Author of "From the Abyss," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

Chats on Old Furniture.

By ARTHUR HAYDEN, Author of "Chats on English China." With over 100 Illustrations. 5s.

T. FISHER UNWIN, PATERNOSTER SQUARE.

GEORGE ALLEN'S LIST.

A Country Diary

By Mrs. ALFRED COCK. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"The book has a pleasant and sympathetic air, and is not without its romance."—TIMES. [Just out.

The Trojan Women of Euripides

Translated into English Rhyming Verse by Professor GILBERT MURRAY. With Preface and Notes. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net. [Just out.

THE FIRST ISSUE IN CROWN 8vo FORM.

The Poetry of Architecture

By JOHN RUSKIN. The Architecture of the Nations of Europe considered in its association with Natural Scenery and National Character. With 29 Illustrations, including Coloured Frontispiece, and 6 Photogravure Plates from Drawings by the AUTHOR. Cloth, gilt top, 6s. net. [Just out.

The Art of Creation

By EDWARD CARPENTER, Author of "Towards Democracy," &c. 268 pp. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN—"The book is written with great simplicity and charm, and no thoughtful reader will fail to find interest and profit in it."

The Giamour of The Earth

By G. A. B. DEWAR. Illustrated with 4 Full-page Drawings in Photogravure and 10 Chapter Headings. 264 pp. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

"The book shows a keen, æsthetic sense, always alive to physical beauty . . . it has the large perspective view which can give the meaning of the life of a whole country-side; and it has the gift of presenting the human element which in English scenery at least is almost always an inseparable part of the charm."—SATURDAY REVIEW.

In Pursuit of Dulcinea

A Quixotic Journey in Spain. By HENRY BERNARD. With 15 Illustrations by H. C. BREWER. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH—"Sprightly and clever sketches of an out-of-the-way region of Spain."

The Double Garden

Sixteen Essays by MAURICE MAETERLINCK. Translated by TEIXEIRA DE MATTOS and ALFRED SUTRO. [Second Edition.

Euripides

Hippolytus; Bacchæ; Aristophanes' "Frogs." By Professor GILBERT MURRAY. With an Appendix on "The Lost Tragedies of Euripides," and an Introduction on "The Significance of the Bacchæ in Athenian History"; and 12 Illustrations. [Second Edition.

Walks in Rome

Revised by the AUTHOR and W. ST. CLAIR BADDELEY. With Illustrations and 3 Plans. 2 vols., fcap. 8vo, cloth limp, 10s. 6d.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE says of the Sixteenth Edition that it is "The best handbook of the City of Rome ever published."

RUSKIN REPRINTS FOR THE POCKET.

27 Volumes already Published.

VOLUMES JUST ISSUED.

The Harbours of England

With 13 Illustrations and facsimile. Cloth, limp, 2s. 6d. net; Leather, limp, 3s. 6d. net.

Giotto and his Works in Padua

With 56 Illustrations. Cloth, 3s. 6d. net; Leather, 4s. 6d. net.

London: GEORGE ALLEN, 156 Charing Cross Road.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

THE CRISIS OF THE CONFEDERACY:

A History of Gettysburg and the Wilderness.

By CECIL BATTINE, Captain 15th King's Hussars.

With Coloured Frontispiece (Battle Flags of the Confederacy), and 6 Maps. 8vo. 16s. net.

SOUTH AFRICA:

A Glance at Current Conditions and Politics.

By J. H. BALFOUR-BROWNE, K.C.

8vo. 7s. 6d. net.

* * This book contains some descriptions of the Voyage from England to Cape Town, and notes of the Author's journey from Cape Town to Johannesburg and Pretoria. It deals, too, with some of the social and political questions which are before the public of South Africa at the present time, and in a guarded way refers to some aspects of Johannesburg society. It touches such matters as Chinese Labour, the future form of government, and land settlement.

ADVENTURES AMONG BOOKS. By ANDREW LANG. With Photogravure Portrait. Crown 8vo, 6s. 6d. net.

[In a few days.

CONTENTS. — Adventures among Books — Recollections of Robert Louis Stevenson — Rab's Friend — Oliver Wendell Holmes — Mr. Morris's Poems — Mrs. Radcliffe's Novels — A Scottish Romanticist of 1830 — The Confessions of Saint Augustine — Smollett — Nathaniel Hawthorne — The Paradise of Poets — Paris and Helen — Enchanted Cigarettes — Stories and Story-telling — The Supernatural in Fiction — An Old Scotch Psychological Researcher — The Boy.

WORKS BY WALTER BAGEHOT.

BIOGRAPHICAL STUDIES. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

LITERARY STUDIES. Three vols., crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

ECONOMIC STUDIES. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

MORAL DISCIPLINE IN THE CHRISTIAN

CHURCH, being Lectures delivered during Lent 1904 in Westminster Abbey. By H. HENSLEY HENSON, B.D., Canon of Westminster and Rector of St. Margaret's, Westminster, sometime Fellow of All Souls College, Oxford. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

RICE PAPERS: Stories and Sketches of Life in China. By H. L. NORRIS. Crown 8vo, 6s.

PREFATORY NOTE.—"These stories possess the merit of not being true, nor are they necessarily founded on fact; they were written during three years' service in China, and their conception served to more or less pleasantly while away many hours. If they afford the reader as many minutes, they will have well fulfilled their purpose. To those whose ideas of a Chinaman are gathered from the good-natured, doddering idiot as he is so often represented on the stage, he is here shown in a different form, however inadequate the portrayal may be."

THE BIRTH OF PARSHAL: a Drama. By R. C. TREVELYAN, Author of "Cecilia Gonzaga," and "Polyphemus and Other Poems." Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"It is always gracefully invented and musically written."—SCOTSMAN.

"A noble and effective dramatic poem. Mr. Trevelyan has aspired boldly; his theme is an exacting and ambitious one, yet has he happily succeeded."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"The verse is vigorous, and the action considering the subject, well sustained."—NOTTINGHAM DAILY GUARDIAN.

MISS BADSWORTH, M.F.H.

A NOVEL

By EYRE HUSSEY.

WITH SIX ILLUSTRATIONS BY G. D. ARMOUR.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

* * This work sets forth the troubles of an advanced and philanthropic lady who finds herself confronted by the management of an estate, farm, and pack of foxhounds. They are peculiar conditions which attach to the latter, and these, with the methods adopted to carry out the provisions of her brother's will, form the story.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.,

39 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.; NEW YORK AND BOMBAY.

CHAPMAN & HALL'S First List of Spring Books, 1905.

RUSSIA IN REVOLUTION. By G. H. PERRIS. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This striking and impressive book, founded upon close personal observation of all sides of subterranean life in the country of the Tsar appears at a peculiarly appropriate time. It sets forth in graphic language and with absolute fidelity to fact the causes that have led to the present reign of terror, gives vivid word-pictures of the leaders of the revolution, and lets the reader into many suppressed stories of tyranny and oppression. A number of pictures, from photographs taken on the spot, add to the convincing quality of the narrative.

THE PROBLEM OF THE IMMIGRANT. By J. D. WHELPLEY. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This book deals with the uses and abuses of the immigration system, and compares very elaborately the immigration laws in all the principal countries in the world. It is both statistical and critical, and contains a vast amount of information not hitherto accessible even to careful students of the subject.

A MODERN UTOPIA. By H. G. WELLS. With numerous Illustrations by E. J. SULLIVAN. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

This is the last of the three books which contain Mr. Wells's views on the society of the future. It is lighter and more picturesque than "Anticipations" or "Mankind in the Making," and is being illustrated with imaginative drawings by E. J. Sullivan, whose pictures to "Sartor Resartus" were such a success.

WILHELMINA, MARGRAVINE OF BAYREUTH. By EDITH E. CUTHELL. With numerous Portraits. Demy 8vo, 16s. net.

This is a romantic story from real history, dealing with a highly talented woman of the eighteenth century who moved in Continental Courts and founded the fortunes of the town of Bayreuth. It is constructed entirely from fresh material gathered from documents hitherto unknown, and gives a bright and spirited picture of Court life on the Continent one hundred years ago.

THE PRINCIPLES OF HEREDITY. By G. ARCHDALL REID, Author of "Alcoholism: Its Cause and Cure." Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

This is a highly important scientific work throwing fresh light on the problem of heredity. It is anticipated that it will have a genuine effect upon modern thought.

SHAKESPEARE'S MARRIAGE AND DEPARTURE FROM STRATFORD. By J. W. GRAY. With Reproductions of Shakespearean Manuscript and other documents. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This book claims to throw new light on several important events in Shakespeare's life, and to correct various mistakes made by other biographers.

FIGURE COMPOSITION. By RICHARD G. HATTON. With a large number of Illustrations from Ancient and Modern Sources. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

This book is a companion to "Figure Drawing," Mr. Hatton's well-known and authoritative study.

BY THE IONIAN SEA. By GEORGE GISSING. A New Edition, uniform with "The Fields of France." Crown 8vo, 5s. net. With Illustrations and a Map.

It is felt that this book of Gissing's should appear not only in its large library form, but also in a handy shape for the ordinary bookshelf. At the time of Gissing's death it was generally said that this was one of the best of his books, and that it would be very popular in a cheaper form.

SYNOPSIS OF DICKENS'S NOVELS. By J. WALKER McSPADDEN. 12mo, 2s. 6d. net.

This is a handy little desk-book, giving details of Dickens's stories.

THE MOST SUCCESSFUL NOVEL OF THE NEW YEAR IS THE APPLE OF EDEN. By E. TEMPLE THURSTON, which has already run into Four Large Editions.

It is a strong book dealing with the question of the Celibacy of the Priesthood, and has been highly praised by the critics.

The Speaker said:—"The Apple of Eden" is a conscientious and searching piece of work."

The St. James's Gazette said:—"It is an able, outspoken, extremely human study—it is a book to read."

The King said:—"It is a book which grown men and women may read and admire for its courage and serious aim."

A NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHORS OF "THE SHULAMITE." EVE—AND THE LAW. By ALICE and CLAUDE ASKEW, Authors of "The Shulamite." Crown 8vo, 6s.

A highly exciting story dealing with some aspects of the marriage question.

OTHER NOVELS JUST READY.

THE MIRROR OF KONG HO. By ERNEST BRAMAH, Author of "The Wallet of Kai-Lung." Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE SILVER KEY. By NELLIE K. BLISSETT, Author of "Bindweed," etc. Crown 8vo, 6s.

London: CHAPMAN & HALL, LIMITED,
11 Henrietta Street, W.C.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS.

HYPERION.

A Facsimile of Keats's Autograph MS. With a Transliteration of the MS. of "THE FALL OF HYPERION: a Dream." With Introductions and Notes by ERNEST de SELINCOURT. Limited Edition, printed on pure Linen Paper, Subscription prices, £2 12s. 6d. in boards, and £3 13s. 6d. in leather.

THE COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS OF SHELLEY, including Materials never before printed in any Edition of the Poems Edited, with Textual Notes, by THOMAS HUTCHINSON, M.A. With the Bodleian Portrait and two Collotype Facsimiles of Handwriting. Demy 8vo, cloth boards, uncut, paper label or gilt lettered, 7s. 6d. net; vellum back, cloth sides, gilt top, medallion on side, 10s. 6d. net.

JOWETT'S TRANSLATION OF ARISTOTLE'S POLITICS, with Introduction, Analysis, and Full Index added by H. W. C. DAVIS, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d.

DANTE'S DIVINA COMMEDIA.

Translated into English Prose by H. F. TOZER, M.A. Extra fcap. 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

SELECT DOCUMENTS ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE HISTORY OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION

(May 1789—September 1791). Edited by L. G. WICKHAM LEGG, M.A. Two vols., crown 8vo, cloth. [Immediately.]

OXFORD MODERN FRENCH SERIES.

Edited by LEON DELBOS, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth.

THREE NEW VOLUMES.

LES NORMANDS EN ANGLETERRE ET EN FRANCE.

By THIERRY. Edited by A. H. SMITH. 160 pp., 2s. 6d.

LE SERMENT.

By JULES DAVID. Edited by CECILE HUGON. 96 pp., 1s. 6d.

VOYAGE EN ESPAGNE.

By GAUTIER. Edited by GERALD GOODRIDGE. With a Map., 152 pp., 2s. 6d.

THE CHURCH'S TASK UNDER THE ROMAN EMPIRE.

By the Rev. C. BIGG, D.D. 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

THE PARALLEL PSALTER:

being the Prayer-Book Version of the Psalms. PRINTED PARALLEL WITH A NEW VERSION by S. R. DRIVER, D.D. Second Edition. Extra fcap. 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

CANTONESE LOVE-SONGS.

In Two vols. Vol. I. Chinese Text, with a Glossary. Vol. II. Translation, with Introduction and Notes, by CECIL CLEMENTI, M.A. Imperial 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net per vol.

THE OXFORD HISTORY OF MUSIC.

Vol. V. THE VIENNESE PERIOD. By W. H. HADOW. 8vo, cloth, 15s. net.

THE FACE OF THE EARTH.

(Das Antlitz der Erde.) By EDUARD SUESS, Professor of Geology in the University of Vienna. Translated by HERTHA B. C. SOLLAS, Ph.D. Heidelberg. Under the direction of W. J. SOLLAS, Professor of Geology in the University of Oxford. With a special preface for the English Translation by Prof. SUESS. Vol. I., with 4 maps and 50 other illustrations. Royal 8vo, cloth, 25s. net.

THE ANCIENT RACES OF THE THEBAID.

Being an Anthropometrical Study of the Inhabitants of Upper Egypt from the Earliest Pre-historic Times to the Mohammedan Conquest based upon the Examination of over 1500 Crania. By ARTHUR THOMSON, M.A. (Oxon.), M.B. (Edin.), and D. RANDALL-MACIVER, M.A. Imperial 4to, boards with buckram back, with six Collotypes, six Lithographic Charts and other illustrations, £2 2s. net.

Also published by Henry Frowde.

WORCESTERSHIRE PLACE-NAMES.

By W. H. DUIGNAN. Crown 8vo, cloth, bevelled boards, 6s. net.

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON.

In one volume on Oxford India paper, extra fcap. 8vo, 1416 pp., cloth, 5s. net; or in leather bindings from 6s. 6d. net. In two volumes, on Oxford India paper, extra fcap. 8vo, 1416 pp., cloth, 3s. net per volume; or in leather bindings from 4s. net per volume.

LONDON:
HENRY FROWDE, OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS WARHOUSE, AMEN CORNER

From Williams and Norgate's List.

Just Issued. Royal 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

THE AMERICANS.

By HUGO MÜNSTERBERG.

Professor of Psychology at Harvard University. Translated by EDWIN B. HOLT, Ph.D.

Now Ready. Cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE EARLY CHRISTIAN CONCEPTION OF CHRIST: Its Value and Significance in the History of Religion.

By OTTO PFLEIDERER, D.D.

Professor of Practical Theology in the University, Berlin.

Now Ready. 1 vol., 10s. 6d.

CHRISTIAN LIFE IN THE PRIMITIVE CHURCH.

By ERNST VON DOBSCHÜTZ, D.D.,

Professor of New Testament Theology in the University of Strasburg.

Dr. Marcus Dods in the British Weekly: "Some may think that the author's finding is too favourable to the early Churches, but at any rate there is no volume in which material for forming a judgment is so fully collected or so attractively presented."

Number II. Now Ready. 1s. net; 1s. 2d. post free. 4s. per annum, post free

THE LIBERAL CHURCHMAN.

A Quarterly Review.

NOTES.

CONTENTS.

Poetry and Truth in Our Religion. By Professor Paul Lobstein, Professor of Dogmatics at Strasburg University.

Religious Training of the School Boy. By H. Bompas Smith, Headmaster, St. Mary's School, Walsall.

The Physical and the Spiritual. By Rev. C. H. Perez, Vicar of Mentmore, Leighton Buzzard.

Reviews: Henson's Value of the Bible—Sabatier's Religions of Authority and the Religion of the Spirit—Hutton's Ecclesia Disceus—Diary of a churchgoer—Faith of a Christian.

Complete Catalogue and List of Recent Works post free on Application.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

EDWARD STANFORD'S LIST

STANFORD'S GEOLOGICAL ATLAS OF GREAT BRITAIN

With Plates of Characteristic Fossils

By HORACE B. WOODWARD, F.R.S., F.G.S.

Comprising 34 Coloured Maps and 16 Double-page Plates of Fossils, with 149 pages of text. Illustrated by 17 Sections and Views

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 12s. 6d. net (postage 4d.)

"Crammed full of information of the best quality."—Geological Magazine.

THE SEA-FISHING INDUSTRY OF ENGLAND AND WALES

A Popular Account of the Sea Fisheries and Fishing Ports of those Countries

By F. G. AFLALO, F.R.G.S., F.Z.S.

With a Fisheries Map of England and Wales, and 77 Illustrations from Photographs by the Author and others

406 pages, demy 8vo, cloth, price 16s. net (postage 6d.)

"Each chapter teems with interesting information."—Standard.

STANFORD'S COMPENDIUM OF GEOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL SUPPLEMENTARY VOLUME GLOSSARY OF GEOGRAPHICAL AND TOPOGRAPHICAL TERMS

And of Words of frequent occurrence in the composition of such Terms and of Place Names

By ALEXANDER KNOX, B.A., F.R.G.S.

472 pages, large crown 8vo, price 15s. (postage 5d.)

"A valuable addition to the excellent series."—Field.

STANFORD'S COMPENDIUM OF GEOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL NEW AND REVISED EDITION

AFRICA, VOL. II.: SOUTH AFRICA

By A. H. KEANE, LL.D., F.R.G.S.

682 pages, with 11 Maps and 94 Illustrations, large crown 8vo, cloth, price 15s. (Postage 5d.)

Illustrated List of Compendium Series on application

Prospectus of any of the above gratis on application

LONDON: EDWARD STANFORD, 12, 13, & 14 LONG ACRE, W.C.

FROM MR. ANDREW MELROSE'S LIST SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS.

New Novel by the Author of "Splendid Mourning."

SHOD WITH WOOL: a Tale of Dartmoor.

By CRANSTOUN METCALFE, Author of "Splendid Mourning," "Peaceable Fruit," &c.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

Important New Theological Work.

THE NATIVITY AND YOUTH OF JESUS.

By the Rev. A. MORRIS STUART, M.A., Author of "The Crown of Science," "The Temptation of Jesus," &c.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

New Edition of a Religious Classic.

THE HEAVENLY HORIZONS.

By Madame DE GASPARIN. With an Introduction by ALEXANDER SMELLIE, M.A., and a specially designed title-page.

Royal 18mo, cloth, 2s. net.

An Historical Romance.

THE SPURS OF GOLD: a Romance of England in Lollard Days.

By J. BROWN MORGAN and J. ROGERS FREEMAN
With Illustrations by E. TRAVERS POPE.

Imperial 16mo, cloth, 5s.

The Study of Child Nature.

THE POWER OF PLAY: a Study of the Place and Power of Play in Child Training.

By GEORGE HAMILTON ARCHIBALD. With Illustrative Diagrams, &c.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE QUATER-CENTURY OF JOHN KNOX.

Important Issues.

JOHN KNOX: a Biography.

By the Rev. DONALD MACMILLAN, B.C., with an Appreciation of the Reformer by the Very Rev. Principal STORY, D.D. Illustrated with Special Drawings by THOMAS SMELLIE, F.S.A. (Scot.).

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

JOHN KNOX: The Hero of the Scottish Reformation. A Biographical Sketch.

By the Rev. EDWARD MILLER, M.A. With numerous Illustrations.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 1s.

KNOX'S "HISTORY OF THE REFORMATION OF RELIGION IN SCOTLAND.

With which are included Knox's "Confession," and "The Book of Discipline." A Twentieth-Century Edition, revised and edited by CUTHBERT LENNOX. With Frontispiece Portrait. (A New Edition of Knox's famous History, in which the Editor has endeavoured to minimise the difficulties which English readers find in the original text.)

Royal 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

LONDON: ANDREW MELROSE, 16 PILGRIM STREET, E.C.

DUCKWORTH & CO.

AUGUSTE RODIN.

By CAMILLE MAUCLAIR

Author of "The Great French Painters," "French Impressionists."

With 40 Illustrations. Photogravure Frontispiece. Crown 4to, 10s. 6d. net. [Just out.

Messrs. Duckworth announce the publication of a volume dealing with the life, ideas, and work of M. Auguste Rodin, the great French sculptor, who has succeeded Whistler as President of the International Society. The author, M. Camille Maclair, knows Rodin intimately, and he has dealt with his personality as well as his work, with the psychological as well as the artistic side.

"The most complete and authoritative account. M. Maclair has the advantage of being an intimate friend. . . . Many photographs of unusual excellence."

Daily Chronicle.

"M. Rodin is now on one of his visits to London, and the public interest in the Michael Angelo of our time is more than ordinarily acute. We could have no better guide than M. Maclair. . . . Giving us this illuminating study of a genius."

Daily News.

"What M. Rodin really is, his aims, and his theories, have been admirably explained."—Daily Mail.

ALBERT DÜRER. By T. STURGE MOORE. 4 Copper-plates and 50 Half-tone Engravings. Pott 4to, 7s. 6d. net.

VERROCCHIO. By MAUD CRUTTWELL. 48 Illustrations. Pott 4to, 7s. 6d. net.

MEDIAEVAL ART. From the Peace of the Church to the Eve of the Renaissance, 312-1350. By W. R. LETHABY. With 66 Full-page Illustrations and upwards of 120 Diagrams, Plans, and Drawings. 8s. 6d. net.

The book illustrates the art and architecture of Damascus, Constantinople, Rome, Ravenna, Florence, Paris, Rouen, Chartres, Amiens, Reims, Strasbourg, Bruges, &c. The diagrams, plans, and drawings help the reader to follow the main currents of Mediaeval Art from the time of Constantine to the eve of the Italian Renaissance.

CRITICAL ESSAYS AND FRAGMENTS. By the late S. ARTHUR STRONG. With Memoir by LORD BALCARRES. Royal 8vo, with 22 Illustrations, 16s. net. [Ready shortly.

METAPSYCHICAL PHENOMENA. By Dr. JOSEPH MAXWELL. Translated by Mrs. FINCH. With Prefaces by Sir OLIVER LODGE and Prof. CH. RICHET. Large crown 8vo, 10s. net. [In the press.

This book is probably the most important contribution of recent years in the way of a scientific and methodical examination of the phenomena variously known as "spiritistic," "occult," or, to use the term now suggested by M. Richet, "metapsychical."

IDEALS AND REALITIES IN RUSSIAN LITERATURE. By PRINCE KROPOTKIN. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [Ready end of March.

By the Author of "The Visits of Elizabeth."

THE VICISSITUDES OF EVANGELINE.

By ELINOR GLYN.

With Coloured Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, 6s.

GOSSIP. By BENJAMIN SWIFT, Author of "In Piccadilly." Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE DISCIPLE'S WIFE. By VINCENT BROWN, Author of "A Magdalen's Husband." Crown 8vo, 6s. [In the press.

THE GREY BRETHREN. By MICHAEL FAIRLESS, Author of "The Roadmender." Uniform with "The Roadmender." Cloth, 2s. 6d. net.; leather, 3s. 6d. net. [Just out.

"A MAGNIFICENT BOOK," says the World.

PROGRESS. By R. B. CUNNINGHAME GRAHAM. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Rich in observation. Everywhere he is in search of the true. . . . To unmask those who succeed and to mask with his fierce and eloquent compassion those who fail. Briefly, he is in this volume a master of the sublime, the showy, the pathetic, the picturesque."—See the World.

BOOKS AND THINGS. A Volume of Essays. By G. S. STREET. Crown 8vo, 6s.

VELAZQUEZ. By AUGUSTE BRÉAL, Author of "Rembrandt." With 45 Illustrations. Cloth, 2s. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net. (In the "Popular Library of Art.") [Immediately.

Ask your Bookseller to show you all the Volumes issued in

DUCKWORTH'S POPULAR LIBRARY OF ART.

Cloth, 2s. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

REMBRANDT.	WATTS.	GAINSBOROUGH.
DÜRER.	LEONARDO.	FRED. WALKER.
ROSSETTI.	MILLET.	BOTTICELLI.
FRENCH IMPRESSIONISTS.

DUCKWORTH & CO., 3 HENRIETTA ST., COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

Some Volumes from Cassell & Company's Spring List

Notice.—A copy of Cassell & Company's Catalogue of Spring Books will be sent on application. The following are a few of the books that will be found described in it.

FIFTH IMPRESSION

The Other Side of the Lantern. By Sir FREDERICK TREVES, Bart., K.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., Sergeant-Surgeon to H.M. the King, &c. &c. With Photogravure Frontispiece and 39 Full-page Plates from Photographs by the Author. 12s. net.

French Porcelain. By E. S. AUSCHER, formerly Chef de Fabrication at Sévres. Translated and Edited by WILLIAM BURTON, Author of 'English Earthenware,' &c. Containing 24 Plates in Colours, and 48 in Black and White, with numerous reproductions of the various marks. Royal 8vo. cloth gilt, gilt top, 30s. net.

This Edition is limited to 1250 Copies.

Russia. By SIR DONALD MACKENZIE WALLACE, K.C.I.E., K.C.V.O. Entirely new Revised and Enlarged Edition, reset, and in great part re-written. Two Vols., with Maps. 24s. net.

Canada as it is. By JOHN FOSTER FRASER, Author of 'The Real Siberia,' 'America at Work,' &c. With about 40 Full-page Illustrations. 6s.

King Leopold II.; his Rule in Belgium and the Congo. By JOHN DE COURCY MACDONNELL. With 48 Full-page Plates. 21s. net.

Reminiscences of a Radical Parson. By REV. W. TUCKWELL, M.A. With Photogravure Portrait. 9s. net.

NEW SIX SHILLING NOVELS

The One Who Saw. By HEADON HILL.

The Adventures of an Equerry. From the Memoirs of Mr. Francis Lesterne, Equerry to his Grace the Great Duke of Marlboro'. Set forth by MORICE GERARD.

The Golden Pool; the Story of a Forgotten Mine. By RICHARD AUSTIN FREEMAN.

IMPORTANT NEW FINE ART WORK In Fortnightly Parts, price 7d. net

The National Gallery of British Art (The Tate Gallery)

Illustrated with Reproductions of the Principal Works, a number of which will be

EXQUISITE REMBRANDT PHOTOGRAVURES

And containing an Introduction by

SIR CHARLES HOLROYD,
the Keeper of the Gallery.

The Text will deal with the history of the Gallery, the various collections of works it contains, and interesting Biographical Notes of the Artists represented.

Part I, will be ready March 28.

To be completed in about 24 Parts.

Orders for Part I now received by all Booksellers and at the Bookstalls

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, La Belle Sauvage,
London, E.C.

The "Country Life" Library

PREPARING FOR PUBLICATION

To be issued in Two Volumes, PRICE THREE GUINEAS Net the Two Volumes. A sumptuous work, handsomely bound in cloth, containing about 300 plates

Being a Series of Illustrations from Photographs of the most Famous Examples of

THE GARDENS OF ITALY

BY

CHARLES LATHAM

Descriptive Text by E. March Phillipps

Dedicated by Special Permission to his MAJESTY THE KING OF ITALY

MESSRS. BELL'S LIST.

Complete Catalogue Post Free on Application.

NOW READY, COMPLETE.

A CHEAPER EDITION OF WHEATLEY'S PEPYS.

The Diary of Samuel Pepys, M.A., F.R.S. Transcribed from the Shorthand MS. in the Pepysian Library, Magdalene College, Cambridge, by the Rev. MYNOS BRIGHT, M.A. With LORD BRAYBROOKE'S Notes. Edited, with Additions, by HENRY B. WHEATLEY, F.S.A. In 8 vols. post 8vo, 5s. net each.

* This reprint contains the whole of the text of the Diary, and the Notes and Index, as given in the ten-volume edition, the volume entitled "Pepysiana" only being omitted.

"Mr. Wheatley has easily distanced all previous editors, both in the completeness of his matter and his annotations, and there is little doubt that this new classic edition of a classic will be a great success."—Athenæum.

A CHEAPER EDITION OF ROSE'S "LIFE OF NAPOLEON."

Life of Napoleon I. By JOHN HOLLAND ROSE, Litt.D., Late Scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge. Largely compiled from new materials taken from the British Official Records. In 2 vols. post 8vo. With Maps and Plans. Fourth Edition. 10s. net.

ORIGINAL EDITION, with numerous Illustrations. 2 vols., large post 8vo, 18s. net.

"To say that Mr. J. H. ROSE has written the best life of Napoleon yet published is but faint praise, far less than he deserves, often as the task has been attempted."—The Times.

Napoleonic Studies. By JOHN HOLLAND ROSE, Litt.D., Author of "The Life of Napoleon I." Post 8vo, with Maps, 7s. 6d. net.

"Whatever may be the side of Napoleon's career in which the reader may be interested, we make bold to say that he will find something new to him within the four hundred pages of this modest little volume. Dr. Rose is to be congratulated on his mastery of a difficult and complicated subject."—Athenæum.

BOHN'S STANDARD LIBRARY.

NEW VOLUME.

Post 8vo, 3s. 6d.

Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare. With 24 Illustrations by BYAM SHAW.

NEW EDITION, REVISED. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Cities and Sites of Spain. A Handbook for Travellers. By Mrs. A. LE BLOND (Mrs. Main). With numerous Illustrations and Maps. With a Note by Mr. G. F. CHAMBERS, F.R.A.S., on the coming Total Eclipse of the Sun.

THE ART GALLERIES OF EUROPE.

With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s. net each.

NEW VOLUME.

The Art of the Louvre. By MARY KNIGHT POTTER. Previously published: THE ART OF THE VATICAN.—THE ART OF THE PITTI PALACE.

FOURTH EDITION. Post 8vo, 5s. net.

How to Look at Pictures. By ROBERT CLAREMONT WITT, M.A. With 35 Illustrations.

"This book, which we have read with great pleasure, shows that the author has both wide sympathy and knowledge, and it cannot but be largely helpful to those who wish to increase their interest in pictures. A better gift for people who are dimly fond of pictures, but who regret 'that they know nothing about them,' could not be found."—Spectator.

THE YORK LIBRARY.

A NEW SERIES OF REPRINTS ON THIN PAPER.

Small 8vo, 2s. net in cloth, and 3s. net in leather.

NEW VOLUMES.

Cervantes' Don Quixote. Motteau's Translation, Revised. With Lockhart's Life and Notes. 2 vols.

Emerson's Works. Edited and Collated by GEORGE SAMPSON. Vol. IV. Containing Miscellaneous Pieces.

Coleridge's Table Talk and Omnia. Arranged and Edited by T. ASHE, B.A.

Draper's History of the Intellectual Development of Europe. 2 vols.

The Thoughts of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. Translated by GEORGE LONG, M.A. With an Essay on Marcus Aurelius by MATTHEW ARNOLD.

Others to follow.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS,
Portugal Street, Lincoln's Inn, W.C.

THE LIFE & LETTERS OF R. S. HAWKER.

(VICAR OF MORWENSTOW). By his Son-in-Law, C. E. BYLES. With numerous Illustrations, including a Water-Colour Portrait by the EARL OF CARLISLE, Lithographs by J. LEY PETHYBRIDGE, &c. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

TIMES.—"Dr. Johnson's wrath at the suggestion that a friend's eccentricity of dress and religion should be counted to him for madness is a matter of history. . . Mr. Byles has a better case than Dr. Johnson had, and his effort to disprove the charge results in . . . a triumphant acquittal. . . A well-written life is not, as Carlyle declared it to be, almost as rare as a well-spent one; it is a much rarer thing indeed. Mr. Byles . . . has given us a book which will earn the gratitude of those whose love of poetry urges them to a knowledge of the poet. Hawker dedicated his works to Prince Posterity, and the dedication will be accepted by many readers of the new biography, who will find in Robert Hawker one of the knights of his own Sangraal, 'thorough men.'"

OUTLOOK.—"Hawker, though the fact is only now beginning to be recognised, was one of the few real poets of his generation, and perhaps the greatest of all the poets who have also been clergymen of the Church of England: greater than Heber, greater than Keble, greater than John Henry Newman, greater even than George Herbert. 'The Quest of the Sangraal' has a vigour, a movement, a certain crusading energy, that one seeks in vain in Tennyson's better-known poems. This admirable biography will be doubly welcome if it wins a larger public for his writings."

ACADEMY.—"His fragment of the 'Sangraal' is worthy to be compared with Tennyson's treatment of the subject."

MORNING POST.—"Gratit de is distinctly due to Mr. Byles for his new life of his father-in-law. . . There are many excellent illustrations. . . Mr. J. Ley Pethybridge has the very spirit of the West Country."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"As soon as the volume is opened one finds oneself in the presence of a real original, a man of ability, genius, and eccentricity, of whom one cannot know too much. . . He was every inch a man. . . No one will read this fascinating and charmingly produced book without thanks to Mr. Byles and a desire to visit—or revisit—Morwenstow."

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"This admirable memoir . . . the definitive life of Hawker. . . We think of him not as a theologian, but as a poet, a writer, and, above all, as a man who lived—a burly, humorous, domineering, full-blooded, pugnacious, erratic, lovable personality, a child who never grew up, a character that an Elizabethan dramatist would have gloried in."

DAILY NEWS.—"Here at length is the authentic life—the record, mainly in his own letters, of one of the most fascinating, wayward, independent personalities of the nineteenth century. The man here wrote out his heart's confession. The comparison is, indeed, with Carlyle. Each possessed a spiritual vision denied to the common crowd; each mingles passages of eloquence and lamentation with outbreaks of fury and a shaggy, boisterous humour. Hawker was a unique figure in Victorian England."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"There is scarcely a page of this book that does not tingle with the ruddy and exuberant vitality of one of the most living men of his day. . . In all his letters he shows that command of nervous, straightforward English which makes his prose such good reading. Those who want the portrait of Hawker the man must, in future, come to Mr. Byles's work. Hawker . . . will live long in the memory of Cornwall and of England."

WESTERN MORNING NEWS.—"A book that will be dear to all who revere Hawker's memory and to all who love the West Country . . . thorough and satisfactory, final in its authority, inclusive and exhaustive in its first-hand material. . . The poet-vicar, whose memorial is the whole glorious coast of North Cornwall and its Devon border, has here another fitting memorial, and the literary endurance of his fascinating personality is assured."

WITH THE PILGRIMS TO MECCA

The Great Pilgrimage, A.H. 1318, A.D. 1902. By HADJI KHAN M.R.A.S., and WILFRID SPARRO. With an Introduction by Prof. VAMBERY, and many illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"One of the most enlightening and captivating books about the East ever written."

DAILY NEWS.—"A most vivid and interesting account."

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.—"A most impressive picture . . . capital reading throughout."

THE POEMS OF WILLIAM WATSON

Edited and Arranged, with an Introduction, by J. A. SPENDER. 2 vols., with Portrait and many new Poems, crown 8vo, 9s. net.

TIMES.—"He is in a line with the high priests of poetry, reared, like Ion, in the shadow of Delphic presences and memories."

SPECTATOR.—"The two volumes before us . . . will, we are sure, be joyfully welcomed by the poet's numerous admirers. There is a pleasure in the possession of a complete edition of a great writer's works."

THE TWENTIETH-CENTURY CHILD

By EDWARD H. COOPER. Cr. 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition in the Press].

LADY WARWICK, in the DAILY MAIL.—"This delightful book is written as few men, I imagine, can write of children, in love and tenderness, wisdom and understanding. I had no idea that a man could know all that there is to know about children."

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.—"The volume brings him to the front rank, proclaims him a leader. . . This deliciously fresh and unconventional book."

DAILY NEWS.—"A most welcome and interesting study. . . Humour is in all the volume. . . Most excellent reading."

BOOKS AND PERSONALITIES

By H. W. NEVINSON, Author of "The Plea of Pan," &c. Cr. 8vo, 5s. net.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Masterly appreciations."

DAILY NEWS.—"His own criticism of Mr. Hardy could be applied to himself. He also is 'full of the pity of mortality, full of its laughter and amazing ways.'"

6/- New Six-Shilling Novels. 6/-

HELEN OF TROY, N.Y.
BEFORE THE CRISIS.

W. S. JACKSON.
F. B. MOFF.

A NEW PAOLO AND FRANCESCA.

ANNIE E. HEULDSWORTH.

CONSTANCE WEST.

E. R. PUNSHON.

HELEN ALLISTON.

The Author of "Elizabeth's Children."

THE MANITOBA.

H. H. BASHFORD.

WIDDICOMBE.

M. P. WILLCOCKS. [March 14.]

JOHN LANE, PUBLISHER, LONDON & NEW YORK.

Digitized by Google

Chatto & Windus, Publishers

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

Richard Marsh's New Novel.

A SPOILER OF MEN. By RICHARD MARSH, Author of "The Beetle." [March 23.]

TALES OF THE FIVE TOWNS. By ARNOLD BENNETT, Author of "Anna of the Five Towns."

"These tales are capital. . . Each one is a carefully finished little drama."—Ladies' Field.

"Admirably clever work."—St James's Gazette.

"All lovers of short stories should at once send for the book."—Spectator.

"Some of the cleverest character-sketching we have seen for a long time."—Sheffield Telegraph.

FLEUR-DE-CAMP: A Daughter of France.

By A. GODRIC CAMPBELL.

"A very winning heroine."—Week's Survey.

"A capital romance."—Court Journal.

"A strong and picturesque book."—Scotsman.

HEIRS OF REUBEN. By CHRIS HEALY,

Author of "The Endless Heritage."

"A book of strong meat. . . Mr. Healy is a man with a clever pen, and he does his work well."—Vanity Fair.

"The book is admirably written, and is readable from beginning to end."—Yorkshire Post.

"Very vivid and graphic, full of interest, and now and again brimming over with excitement."—Lloyd's News.

"Told with a graphic power that is very striking."—World.

THE YOUNGEST MISS BROWN. By FLORENCE WARDEN

Author of "The House on the Marsh." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

[On April 3.]

THE ERROR OF HER WAYS. By FRANK BARRETT, Author of "Fettered for Life."

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. [On April 27.]

THE ISLAND OF TRANQUIL DELIGHTS.

By C. WARREN STODDARD, Author of "Summer Cruising in the South Seas." With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. net.

Works by Richard A. Proctor.

CHEAPER ISSUE. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each.

EASY STAR LESSONS. MYSTERIES OF TIME AND SPACE. With 24 Illustrations. With Star Maps for every Night in the Year.

FLOWERS OF THE SKY. THE UNIVERSE OF SUNS. With 11 Illustrations. With 55 Illustrations.

FAMILIAR SCIENCE STUDIES. SATURN AND ITS SYSTEM. With 13 Plates. Demy 8vo, cloth, 6s.

THE ESSAYS OF ELIA (Both Series). By CHARLES LAMB. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net; leather, gilt edges, 3s. net.

LITING OF LONDON. By GEORGE R. SIMS ("Dagonet"). Fcap. 8vo, picture cover, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d. [Shortly.]

New Three-and-Sixpenny Books.

AS LUCK WOULD HAVE IT. By WILLIAM WESTALL

A PRINCE OF GOOD FELLOWS. By ROBERT BARR. Illustrated by J. F. SULLIVAN.

HAVILAND'S CHUM. By BERTRAM MITFORD.

THE MAN-HUNTER. By DICK DONOVAN.

A New Edition. Crown 8vo, picture cloth, flat back, 2s. [Shortly.]

The St. Martin's Library.

Printed in clear type on fine paper; full size of page, 6½ by 4½ inches. Cloth, gilt top, 2s. net each.

IMPORTANT SERIES OF ELEVEN NEW VOLUMES IN THE PRESS.

MACAULAY'S

HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

JUSTIN MCCARTHY'S

THE REIGN OF QUEEN ANNE. In One Volume.

A HISTORY OF THE FOUR GEORGES AND OF WILLIAM IV. In Two Volumes; and

A HISTORY OF OUR OWN TIMES FROM THE ACCESSION OF QUEEN VICTORIA TO 1880. In Three Volumes.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111 St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS

THIRD IMPRESSION IN THE PRESS

The Life of the Marquis of Dufferin and Ava

By SIR ALFRED LYALL, P.C.

With Portraits, &c, demy 8vo, 2 vols., 36s. net.

"A masterpiece of biographical art. The writer never obtrudes his own personality, devoting sound judgment and consummate skill to moulding in just proportion the figure and lineaments of his subject."—Punch.

NOW READY—TWO VOLUMES OF ESSAYS

By the Late Lord Salisbury

Essays on Foreign Politics

Large crown 8vo, 6s. net.

Biographical Essays

With Portrait, large crown 8vo, 6s. net.

The Friends of England

An Inquiry into the cause which has produced the Empire and regulates its cohesion, together with an estimate of the dangers which threaten it in the future. By the HON. GEORGE PEEL. Author of "The Enemies of England." Demy 8vo, 12s. net. [Now ready.]

Notes from a Diary

1896—Jan. 23, 1901. By the Rt. Hon. Sir MOUNTSTUART E. GRANT DUFF, G.C.S.I., F.R.S. Seventh Series. 2 Vols. Crown 8vo. 18s. [Ready next week.]

The Balkan Question

A Series of Studies of the Present Condition of the Balkans and of European Responsibilities. By VARIOUS WRITERS. Edited by LUIGI VILLARI. With a Map, demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [Just out.]

"A book of great value and importance."—Athenaeum.

A New Edition (Ninth) of The History of India

The Hindû and Mahometan Periods. By the Hon. MOUNTSTUART ELPHINSTONE. With Notes and Additions by E. B. COWELL, M.A., late Principal of Sanskrit College, Calcutta. With Maps, demy 8vo, 15s. net. [Just out.]

Bird Life and Bird Lore

By R. BOSWORTH SMITH, Author of the "Life of Lord Lawrence," &c. Square demy 8vo, with Illustrations, 10s. 6d. net. [Ready next week.]

A CHEAP EDITION OF MRS. BISHOP'S WORKS

(ISABELLA L. BIRD)

Large crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net each

Hawaiian Archipelago

The Palm Groves, Coral Reefs, and Volcanoes of the Sandwich Islands. With Illustrations. [Just out.]

Unbeaten Tracks in Japan

Travels in the Interior, including Visits to the Aborigines of Yezo and the Shrine of Nikhō. With Illustrations. [Ready next week.]

POPULAR EDITION OF SAMUEL SMILES' WORKS

With Illustrations. Large Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. each.

Self Help

Other volumes to follow immediately.

NOW READY

The Monthly Review

Edited by CHARLES HANBURY-WILLIAMS

No. 54.

MARCH, 1905.

2s. 6d. net

MAN—Maxim Gorki

THE MILITARY DEADLOCK—Stratiotes

EDWARD BURNE-JONES—Julia Cartwright (Mrs. Ady)

AN EMPIRE IN THE MAKING—II. Sir Vincent Caillard

SOME PROBLEMS IN SALMON FISHING—W. Earl Hodgson

THE EFFECT OF THE WAR ON RUSSIAN PUBLIC FEELING—L. Villari

THE BLACK VENGEANCE—By the Author of "The Greatness of Josiah Porlick"

MUNICIPAL ASPECTS OF THE HOUSING PROBLEM—Benjamin Taylor

BOND STREET—Arthur H. Adams

ON THE LINE

BEAUJEU (Chapters IX-XI.)—H. C. Bailey

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	225	A Literary Causerie	237
Literature		The Sayings of Children	238
Mrs. Humphry Ward's New		On a Redbreast Singing at the Novel	227	Grave of Plato	239
Claverhouse	228	Fiction	240
Tragedy	229	The Bookshelf	242
A New Novel, by Anatole		The Drama	242
France	231	The Orestean Trilogy	242
The Trojan Women	232	"Elga"	243
William Bodham Donne and		Fine Art: George Morland	244
his Friends	233	Science: The Limits of Human
Hakluyt	234	Knowledge	245
Florence	235	Music: Bach in Churches	246
Compulsory Greek	236	Correspondence	247
Books Received	248

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17s. 6d. a year

THE LITERARY WEEK

ONE of the most interesting topics of the hour is the revival of the first-class weekly newspaper. It is a fact very difficult to explain that in the 'sixties and 'seventies weekly journalism was better than ever it has been since. Perhaps this was due in some measure to the splendour of the old Saturday Review. The unthinking may perhaps take its greatness as merely legendary, but those who have been at the pains to make themselves familiar with the old files know well that there is no exaggeration. The paper was not only brilliant, it was most able. Yet Douglas Cook, who edited it, was not distinguished in the way that many journalists of to-day are. He was not himself in any sense a writer, and his command over language was chiefly shown by the volubility of the oaths with which he would address a contributor. Yet somehow he got the right men into the right place, and produced a Review which has had no equal in the history of literature. The causes for its decay are clear enough to those who have studied the history of English journalism.

The pendulum is ever swinging backward and forward, and a great change came over public taste in the early 'eighties when the influence of American journalism began to make itself felt. It found expression chiefly in a revolt from the somewhat formal and stately language that had been in fashion, and writers began to try how they could be most vivid and pictorial, bringing to their aid slang and colloquial expressions that had not hitherto been considered dignified. Like every other movement this had something right and a great deal that was wrong in it. The new journalist, carrying things to an extreme, began to set the old laws at defiance and write with a licence that his elders had not permitted themselves. But the disease produced or is producing its own cure. For some time past the public has given unmistakable signs of being surfeited with the cheap appeals made to its weakness, and at the present moment there is a decided revival of interest in the higher class journalism, witness the friendly and honourable rivalry between our contemporaries, the Saturday Review and the Outlook, a rivalry that promises to be a benefit not only to these journals themselves, but to the general public whose attention will be once more directed to a more serious kind of writing than that to which they have been accustomed.

It would perhaps be arrogant in any one writer to lay his hand on a certain weakness and say that this is the reason why the better-class journalism has decayed. Still, one of the changes may be pointed out without offence. In the reviews published when English journalism was at its very best, the work was all impersonal and the use of the capital I was forbidden. It was an innovation to introduce signed articles, and not only introduce signed articles, but encourage the writers of them to be as personal and egotistical as was possible. No doubt the journalists themselves try to dignify their work by calling it impressionism, but it is impressionism run mad. Now that a serious attempt is being made to resuscitate the glories of the best class of English newspaper, it will probably be discovered that herein lay the great error. Let any one take an essay written in the old style with intentness on the subject and not on the writer and compare it with one of the compositions common now in almost every newspaper wherein liver plays as large a part as individuality, and the decay will be apparent.

Cambridge University has conferred the degree of Doctor of Science (honoris causa) on Dr. Edward Burnett Tylor, Professor of Anthropology at Oxford. No one has done more than Professor Tylor to advance the study of anthropology and animism in England. His first researches were into the customs and history of Mexico, on which he published a work when he was only twenty-seven. Six years later came the "Researches into the Early History of Mankind," and in 1871 he published his most famous work, "Primitive Culture." All subsequent explorers in the field of animism, said Dr. Sandys, the Public Orator at Cambridge, had been influenced by Professor Tylor's investigations. He may almost be said, indeed, to have created the science.

In June next the town of Sherborne in Dorset, will hold a "pageant" in celebration of the twelve-hundredth anniversary of the founding of the bishopric, town and school. It was in 705 that Ina, King of the West-Saxons, divided off a portion of the diocese of Winchester, and sent St. Aldhelm to "Scirburne" as first Bishop. Sherborne remained a see for three hundred and seventy years, when the bishopric was removed to Old Sarum. The school, which is now well known as a public school, is one of the many in England which reckon Edward VI. as their founder, the truth being that Edward only replaced under improved conditions the means of education that his father had destroyed in the destruction of the religious orders.

The pageant (full particulars of which can be obtained from the Hon. Secretaries of the Sherborne Pageant, the Parade, Sherborne) will include many scenes from the long history of the town, including the arrival of Alfred the Great at Sherborne School, and a tableau of Sir Walter Raleigh at Sherborne. It was to Sherborne, it will be remembered, that Raleigh retired on being released from the Tower after his intrigue (or secret marriage) with Elizabeth Throckmorton; and here he built Sherborne Lodge, or Sherborne Castle, as it is sometimes called, in the grounds of the old castle, which dates from the reign of Henry I.

On March 27 Messrs. Sotheby will sell by auction the library of the late Mr. John Scott, C.B., of Halkhill, Largs, Ayrshire. It includes an imperfect first folio of Shakespeare, and—more important still—a book said to have been presented by the Earl of Southampton to Shakespeare. The book is a black letter small 4to of 1550: "Carion (John) Thre Bokes of Chronicles gathreed wyth great diligence of the beste Authours that have written in Hebrue Greke or Latine. . . . to thys year 1550"; and the catalogue adds: "The title bears the signatures Wm. Shakespeare and Southampton; the reverse of title a note indicating that the book was presented to Wm. Shakespeare by the Earl of Southampton. Another note signed W. S. is on reverse of fol. lxxxiii; on a blank leaf before the table is a long note signed Wm. Shakespeare." If these notes and signatures are genuine, the book is one of the most exciting finds of recent years.

Associations seem never so vivid as when they are on the point of being broken up. Now that half Southampton Row is revealing itself transformed out of all recognition by County Council subways, and the assimilation of the other half is only a question of time, the lover of Thackeray treads all that grey and stately quarter with keenly regretful interest. It was round the corner into Southampton Row, of course, that Amelia Sedley used to step out from the house in Russell Square to "buy a ribbon, followed by Black Sambo with an enormous cane," and the name of the place recurs often in those chapters of "Vanity Fair." On the whole, however, it is noticeable how much more closely it is possible to-day to revisit the homes and haunts in London of Thackeray's characters than Dickens'. The cause of the difference is to be found in the contrasting strata of society from which the two novelists mainly drew their characters. Dickens' characters lived in those queer rookeries, corners, and alleys which were the first to feel the hand of the municipal reformer, with his attendant band of housebreakers. But Thackeray's figures dwelt in surroundings of ease and comfort, if not of fashion and luxury, and their homes bid fair to stand for many a year yet, though they have, many of them, experienced a long and gradual decline from their palmy days of two or three generations ago.

The London Topographical Society will hold a Conversazione at Drapers' Hall, Throgmorton Street, on Thursday, March 16. The President of the Society, Lord Rosebery, will be present.

The copyright of "The Writers' Year Book" having been purchased by A. and C. Black, the next edition will be published by them on December 1, in their series of reference books.

People passing through St. James's Park, still in process of transformation, are little likely to associate it with a literary celebration of last week. But Edmund Waller, the poet, the tercentenary of whose birth was more or less ignored on the third of this month, was inspired in his day with a congratulatory poem of about seventy couplets, "On St. James's Park, as lately improved by His Majesty," and nothing could more emphatically mark the changes from those days of the second Charles to these of the seventh Edward than a comparison of the literary expressions which welcomed the seventeenth-century improvements in St. James's Park and those which welcome the twentieth-century alterations. Then the park was a "Paradise," the sheet of water was at once a "sea" and a "river," while in it there was "A living gallery of aged trees:

Bold sons of earth, that thrust their arms so high,
As if once more they would invade the sky."

The park Waller finally used to point a moral, and closed his poem—after glancing at Westminster Abbey, the House of Commons, and so on—by apostrophising Charles the Second as

"A Prince, on whom such different lights did smile,
Born the divided world to reconcile!
Whatever heav'n, or high extracted blood
Could promise, or foretel, he will make good:
Reform these nations, and improve them more,
Than this fair Park, from what it was before."

The London County Council has devised a pretty scheme for naming the vessels of its new fleet of "penny steamers" after distinguished men whose lives or works were in any way connected with the Thames from the time of King Alfred to that of William Morris. Among the proposed list of names there are many men of letters, beginning in point of time with Chaucer and including Shakespeare, Jonson, Marlowe, Pepys, Gibbon, and Carlyle. The connection of these men with the Thames is often of the slightest—they may have lived near it for a while, or referred to it in their works—but the plan is nevertheless one that will no doubt meet with general approval. It is rather surprising to find that the fleet of steamers is not, apparently, to include a "Charles Dickens," seeing how unforgettably we have some gruesome aspects of the olden Thames drawn at the opening of "Our Mutual Friend." We miss also an "Edmund Spenser." The poet of the "Faerie Queen" deserved honouring in this connection, if only for the persistent refrain of his "Prothalamion"—

Sweet Thames run softly, till I end my Song."

Then, too, there is Denham who gave us a familiar quotation when he described the River Thames—

"Though deep, yet clear; though gentle, yet not dull; Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full."

Michael Drayton, who duly honoured the river in his "Polyolbion," is another writer who may be claimed. Indeed a list of the worthies who can be associated with the Thames would soon outnumber the Council's requirements in the matter of steamers.

The papers on the "Work of Herbert Spencer," which Dr. Saleeby contributed to the ACADEMY last summer and autumn, are being used by him as preliminary sketches for a volume on Evolution regarded as the master thought of all speculation and the guiding hypothesis in all research at the beginning of the present century. Dr. Saleeby is especially devoting himself to a consideration of the new discoveries in physics and astronomy, in comparative mythology and ethics, which have been illuminated by and in turn have illuminated the theory of Universal and Ordered Change, since the publication, just fifty years ago, of the initial volume in which Herbert Spencer approached the study of mind as no constant quantity but a dynamic product of "æonian evolution." It is hoped that the book may be ready for publication here and in America in the autumn. It will form a companion volume to the "Cycle of Life," a series of essays reprinted from these pages.

Much indignation has been expressed in France on account of the compulsory retirement, at the age of seventy-eight, of M. Leopold Delisle from the chief librarianship at the Bibliothèque Nationale. Librarians, and those who use libraries, all over the world, know M. Delisle, and to English bibliophiles he is especially well-known on account of a smart piece of detective work which he once carried through in this country. A certain Count Libri had, in the reign of Louis-Philippe, been made Inspector-General of French Public Libraries, and had stolen rare books and precious manuscripts right and left. His principal abstractions were from the Bibliothèque Nationale, and M. Delisle was allotted the task of tracing, and if possible recovering, the lost treasures. He followed the trail like a sleuth-hound, and found that the plunder had been sold in England: half of it to the British Museum and the remainder to Lord Ashburnham.

Then M. Delisle entered upon negotiations for the restitution of the booty. The British Museum Trustees, anticipating the entente cordiale, promised to give up, without compensation, any stolen goods, if M. Delisle could clearly demonstrate that they were French property. This was not easy, since all the labels and secret marks had been carefully effaced by the thief; but M. Delisle, with the friendly assistance of the Museum librarians, overcame the difficulty, and carried off his treasures in triumph. Lord Ashburnham's heirs were more difficult to deal with. M. Delisle, they said, might have any of the books, if he liked to pay for them. And if not, not. The French Government refused to vote the money, and M. Delisle had to devise a means of raising it. He did this by selling to the German Emperor an old manuscript collection of German songs, which was of relatively small value to the French Library, but which the Emperor was particularly anxious to present to that great collector of such curiosities, the Grand Duke of Baden.

A Committee has been formed to save from destruction what remains of the house at Rouen in which Flaubert wrote "Madame Bovary" and "L'Education Sentimentale." The house itself in fact has been pulled down, and a factory stands on the site on which the novelist denounced the bourgeoisie; but there remains a sort of summer-house on the banks of the Seine in which he used to work. He used to walk up and down on the path by the river, searching for his "inevitable" adjectives; and his gigantic figure, enveloped in an ulster of somewhat loud pattern, excited the remark of his neighbours. Mothers, it is said, used to frighten their children, by threatening them that, if they were not good, they should be sent "chez M. Gustave," or "chez M. Flau"; but his literary renown was respected in the most unlikely quarters. There exists somewhere a copy of "Madame Bovary" in which is written the surprising dedication: "Presented to Made-moiselle So-and-So with the respectful compliments of the author's valet."

French tastes in periodical literature are showing the same tendency as those in costume. English influence is, of course, very marked in such a paper as the Matin, and is certainly not less so in the new "encyclopaedic" magazine which has just appeared under the odd title Je Sais Tout. The editor, M. Pierre Lafitte, is decidedly a publisher "nouveau style." He has a respectable little budget of four periodicals now well established. In Je Sais Tout the make-up of some of the popular English magazines has been somewhat closely followed, but the final result is individual and French. Parisians, by the way, seem to be particularly fond of an abundance of tiny and curious pictures of a semi-scientific nature.

M. Lafitte has succeeded in persuading a score of men and women of letters to unveil the secrets of their work-rooms. For those who like these confessions of method, here are a few of the most interesting. M. Anatole France wakes at five or six in the morning and works in bed. He has a peculiar habit of sticking down on his original MS. little pieces of paper bearing his corrections. M. François Coppée writes his poems with the speed of the lightning and his stories with that of the snail. As for M. Paul Hervieu, he paces up and down amid piles of books and papers, sounding and resounding his phrases in an undertone. M. Paul Bourget has also the passion for a multitude of documents, and is always making searches when not writing. And the brothers Margueritte work assiduously, their father's sword hanging above their desk; so perfect is their collaboration that when a work is complete neither brother can determine his own precise part in it.

On February 24 the remains of D. L. Michalovski, a Russian who made English poets and dramatists familiar to his countrymen, were laid in their last resting-place. He was seventy-eight years of age at his death, and was a native of St. Petersburg. His literary activity was long and intense. The Sofremeniiki printed his translation of Byron's "Mazeppa" in 1857, and his "Outlines of the Latest Italian Literature" in 1859; besides a series of translations from Byron and other foreign poets in the sixties. Again between 1868 and 1880 he contributed to the Otets Sapiskach some translations from Longfellow, Tennyson, many German authors, and others. Many Russian periodicals were indebted to his pen for original poetical works. His greatest contribution to Russian literature was the translation of Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, King Richard II., King Henry V., Antony and Cleopatra, and Romeo and Juliet. He also edited an edition of the complete works of Shakespeare. Many historical and social romances were translated into Russian by him; some of them anonymously. He did not do so much as an original poet as a translator. But amongst the best of his original works was the "Three Tombs."

It is announced from Paris that Captain Klado is on the point of publishing a book entitled "The Russian Navy in the Russo-Japanese War." The Paris correspondent of the Daily Telegraph, who appears to have seen some part of the work before publication, quotes certain extracts which justify him in remarking that it "does not shine from the point of view of good taste or moral elevation."

LITERATURE

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S NEW NOVEL.

The Marriage of William Ashe. By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

WITH all her popularity and despite her many splendid gifts Mrs. Humphry Ward has not succeeded so far in establishing herself as a novelist for novelists, a writer's writer. The more fastidious judges of literature held that the venture which first brought her to the front was more in the nature of a treat than a work of art, and that since then she has followed somewhat too closely in the steps of George Eliot, who lacked only one quality to be a great authoress. Needless to say that quality was style. It is, however, to Mrs. Humphry Ward's credit that there is no going backward in her art. The latest of her novels is perhaps the most promising attempt she has yet made to overleap the barriers by which she has hitherto been surrounded. In conception "The Marriage of William Ashe" is almost French and might easily have come from the Abbé Prévost or the elder Dumas. It is mainly the study of a young girl of somewhat doubtful birth, badly educated in a French convent, endowed with beauty but also the possessor of a temperament which is bound to spell misfortune. A very fair idea of this young lady may be gleaned from the account of her first appearance when she arrived late for dinner:

"'Certainly not, she has had ample time,' said Lady Grosville, and rang the bell beside her.

"Suddenly there was a whirlwind of noise in the hall, the angry barking of a small dog, the sound of a girl's voice laughing and scolding, the swish of silk skirts. A scandalised butler, obeying Lady Grosville's summons, threw the door open, and in burst Lady Kitty.

"'Oh! I'm so sorry,' said the newcomer in a tone of despair. 'But I couldn't leave him upstairs, Aunt Lina! He'd eaten one of my shoes, and begun upon the other. And Julie's afraid of him. He bit her last week. May he sit on my knee? I know I can keep him quiet!'

"Every conversation in the library stopped. Twenty amazed persons turned to look. They beheld a slim girl in white at the far end of the large room struggling with a grey terrier puppy which she held under her left arm, and turning appealing eyes towards Lady Grosville. The dog half frightened, half fierce, was barking furiously. Lady Kitty's voice could hardly be heard through the din, and she was crimson with the effort to control her charge. Her lips laughed, her eyes implored. And to add to the effect of the apparition, a marked strangeness of dress was at once perceived by all the English eyes turned upon her. Lady Kitty was robed in the extreme of French fashion, which at that moment was a fashion of flounces; she was much décolletée; and her fair abundant hair, carried to a great height and arranged with a certain calculated wildness around her small face, was surmounted by a large scarlet butterfly which shone defiantly against the dark background of books.

The setting in which Mrs. Humphry Ward places this young lady is typical of her methods. Her people, with the exception of a journalist or two, are all in the highest rank of society, indeed the majority have titles, and the only attempt made to represent those belonging to other grades is that of a somewhat tearful maid, who is limned slightly yet tenderly. But the political interest centres round no less a person than a Prime Minister, who is an entirely imaginary person called Lord Parham, and this indeed is somewhat absurd. From the references made to such men as William Morris and Burne-Jones and to the fact that one of the ladies has taken up the æsthetic craze very violently, we can practically give a date to the story.

and know that, if history were adhered to, Mr. Gladstone would be Premier or at least Leader of the Opposition. But we do not regard the volume as an attempt to deal with real personages under fictitious names. Lord Parham is no travesty of Mr. Gladstone or of Lord Beaconsfield, and Lady Parham was certainly never evolved out of Mrs. Gladstone nor out of Lady Beaconsfield. William Ashe himself is a rising statesman, who is passing on from office to office with a clear prospect before him of attaining the highest honour which the State can bestow. He is not only clever but rich and well-born, and the world seems to lie before him like an oyster which there would be no difficulty in opening. But he falls in love with Lady Kitty, and almost deliberately ruins his life. She is the most irresponsible of creatures, guided by nothing save wayward instinct; warm-hearted and true in her own way, but entirely lacking in any principles of conduct that would keep her on a straight path. After a year or so of married life she seems to lose command of her will and begins to act in such a manner as to get herself talked about. One example will illustrate the sort of conduct we refer to. The heir to a European monarchy had been recently visiting London, and his melancholy and apathy piqued her vanity:

"Kitty failed to meet him in society; certain invitations that for once she coveted did not arrive; and in a fit of pique she declared that she would make acquaintance with him in her own way. On a certain occasion, when the princeling was at the play, his attention was drawn to a small and dazzling creature in a box opposite his own. Presently however, there was a commotion in this box. The dazzling creature had fainted; and rumour sent round the name of Lady Kitty Ashe. The Prince despatched an equerry to make inquiries, and the inquiries were repeated that evening in Hill Street. Recovery was prompt, and the Prince let it be known that he wished to meet the lady. Invitations from high quarters descended upon Kitty; she bore herself with an engaging carelessness, and the melancholy youth was soon spending far more pains upon her than he had yet been known to spend upon any other English beauties presented to him. Ashe and Kitty's friends laughed; the old General in charge of the princeling took alarm. And presently Kitty's audacities, alack, carried away her discretion; she began moreover to boast of her ruse."

Such conduct was not calculated to further the political ambitions of her husband, yet this incident was only the prelude of another. A certain Geoffrey Cliffe, a poet, cynic, demagogue, man of letters, journalist, with a past behind him in which he had played no praiseworthy part towards women, moves in and out of the book, a disagreeable figure to which Mrs. Humphry Ward has not been able to give much actuality. However by dint of intellectual and other charm he fascinates the girl, and although Kitty remains at heart true to her husband, her adventures with Cliffe were of a kind that would have estranged most men. But Ashe had made up his mind to all this before marrying her, and had resolved to be husband and lover first, statesman afterwards. She is imprudent again and again, and in his very forgiveness there is cause for estrangement. It is a very true touch to show, as Mrs. Humphry Ward does, that an erring sinner never feels very kindly towards one who from a sense of duty, be it derived from where it may, is always ready to extend forgiveness before it is asked.

Probably if the old Adam within him had asserted himself the young wife would have been happier. But all goes on from bad to worse until the curtain falls in ruin and tragedy. We may leave our readers to find out the details of the story for themselves. It is one of the best that Mrs. Humphry Ward has written, the chief fault of it being the wearisome middle. The story starts brightly and well with Kitty's first appearance in London, and the manly and fine love-making of William Ashe. Then for many chapters it is a revel of uninteresting intrigue in which there is little plot and less character. The work is not organically built up, and though the interest revives towards the end we still feel that the book is imperfect. One can well understand that it would have been twice as good if Mrs. Humphry Ward possessed the saving gift of humour, but she takes many things in life and particularly her own sex much too seriously. To read some passages one would think that the destinies of empires were really in the hands of the political women in London, whereas the truth is that women are but butterflies playing on the outside of politics. They only make-believe in order to please their husbands, lovers and friends. How can they be a real force without any means of rendering themselves effective? They have no votes, no representatives of their own sex. No doubt offices may and often are filled through petticoat influence, but the man who makes a reputation in the country stands clear and independent of the cliques and salons. In the relations between husband and wife too, Mrs. Humphry Ward shows at the same moment genius and ignorance. Her study of the girl is acute and in every way excellent. She has laid bare the feminine mind with a precision that is almost scientific, but its counterpart, the masculine spirit, is beyond her. William Ashe is not more of a man than are the trousered old maids who stalk through the novels of George Eliot.

CLAVERHOUSE

John Graham of Claverhouse, Viscount of Dundee 1648-1689.
By C. SANFORD TERRY. (Cons.able, 12s. 6d. net.)

JOHN GRAHAM of Claverhouse has suffered in his reputation, as all must suffer who pass into legend before they have found their own proper place in history. The bugbear of eloquent Whigs, he has been represented as a monster of wanton cruelty, who slaughtered the peaceable, God-fearing Covenanters for no better reason than the vain lust of blood. When Wodrow and Walker, Peden and Defoe had done their worst, then Macaulay took up the tale, and in the careless temper, which loves prejudice better than truth, did his best to blacken the character of a brave soldier and a great gentleman. But it is not the Whigs alone who are to blame. Sir Walter Scott himself, whose "Bonnie Dundee" will keep the name of Claverhouse alive for ever, has done the hero a profound injustice. "This remarkable person," says he, "united the seemingly inconsistent qualities of courage and cruelty, a disinterested and devoted loyalty to his prince, with a disregard of the rights of his fellow subjects." We regret the more that Sir Walter should have thus mistaken the character and devotion of Claverhouse; for, had his judgment not been warped by tradition, he would have left us a splendid portrait of one who lived for duty and who died for his King. Modern historians, however, have means of discovering the truth which were denied to their predecessors, and by this time Claverhouse is well on the road towards rehabilitation. Of the many writers who have helped him on his journey, none has served him more faithfully than Professor Terry, whose biography is not only well arranged and well written, but is based upon an exhaustive study of original authorities.

The eldest son of a distinguished house, John Graham was born in 1648, and, after receiving such education as the University of St. Andrew's had to give, "travelled into France for his improvement," and then took service as a volunteer under the French King. He next followed the profession of arms in Holland, and, if rumour may be trusted, saved the life of William of Orange at Seneffe. But France and Holland were alike but a preparation for his career at home, which began when, in 1678, he received the captaincy of a troop of horse in Scotland. Henceforth for many a year it was his duty to free his country from rebellion, a duty none the less reputable because it had not the glamour of foreign service. The south-west of Scotland was savagely disaffected to the Government. A rising had been planned with care and forethought. Arms had been collected with a greater zeal even than bibles, and the field-conventicles were nothing but camps hostile to King and country. To suppress rebellion is not the most brilliant task for an ambitious soldier, but Claverhouse, always obedient to his superior officers, did what he was told with energy and devotion. If he had been the miracle of brutality which he is represented, he must needs have exceeded his orders. But, as Professor Terry points out, he was so careful to obey that Linlithgow found his scruples frivolous. "I must acknowledge," said he, "that till now in any service I have been in, I never inquired further in the laws than the orders of my superior officers." Nor was it his business now to go beyond his commission. The Covenanters were rebels, whom the law was determined to suppress. The fact that they were bound together by the ties of religion did not mitigate the purpose of their revolution. They denied the King and flouted the Government; their hope was to establish an imperium in imperio, which could do naught else than perpetuate strife and hatred. "Political necessity," said Professor Terry, "was the root of religious intolerance in the seventeenth century in Scotland as in England," and until we realise that truth we shall be unable to do common justice to the cause which Claverhouse was bidden to espouse. Moreover, our ancestors did not make war with their gloves on. The barbarities which they committed were characteristic of their age, and to ask the fighters of the seventeenth century to conform to our modern standard of humanity is to be guilty of hopeless confusion. The King's men were cruel, no doubt; but they encountered a cruel foe. The Covenanters, in their pious camps, kept gallows always ready, in case they should catch a Royalist, and they even took a pride in the brutalities which they committed. But, like all rebels, they objected to retaliation. They fondly hoped that they could make omelettes without breaking eggs, and their champions have claimed for them this supernatural privilege. In the eyes of certain historians, they were always right, their opponents always wrong, and the chief difficulty of Macaulay and others is to reconcile the miscreant Monmouth, who fought at Bothwell Bridge, with the ever-glorious hero who denounced James II. as a parricide and unfurled the flag of revolt in the West.

At the same time, Claverhouse, in obeying orders, did no violence to his own religious convictions. He also was a religious man, and a devout Episcopalian. The Covenanters attributed it to him as a grave sin that he did not share the vices of the age. He was so deeply sunk, said they, in cruelty and blood, that the minor debaucheries had no charm for him. The reason, of course, is absurd, the truth being that he was an honourable gentleman of a clean life and lofty ideals. Accordingly to uproot rebellion appeared to him a plain duty and a sacred trust. What could he do better than serve his King at the risk of his own life? And so well armed were the Covenanters, that he was more than once in danger. At Drumclog he rode headlong from defeat, and wrote to Linlithgow in a characteristic despatch: "This may be counted the beginning of the rebellion." The battle of Bothwell Bridge, as Sir Walter has pointed out, was not without an element of comedy. Even before the face of the enemy one faction had no other ambition than to purge the camp of Erastians. Now one preacher claimed that he alone should be heard; now another insisted that the gospel was upon no other tongue than his. But the enthusiasts could not understand that military skill and united counsels were necessary for victory, and so courted defeat by their misplaced zeal. However, such were the rebels, that for ten years Claverhouse pursued and punished, and when we remember that many of them were more active with the tongue and the pen than with the sword, it is not astonishing that they have brought innumerable charges against him. The worst of these Professor Terry has examined with admirable judgment, and he has no difficulty in clearing Claverhouse's character from an undeserved reproach. In brief, the story of his murders is a story of falsehood, and "Bloody Clavers" is but the puppet of a lying legend.

From the moment that James II. found refuge in flight, Claverhouse played a different, and a more romantic part upon the stage of history. If at the very moment of ruin his King made him a Viscount, he returned the favour with a whole-hearted devotion. As to William, he treated him with an honourable outspokenness. He asked what security he might expect if he should go and live in Scotland without owning his government. But he never owned that government, and was free unto the end to fight for him whom he still regarded as his rightful King. When the Convention declared him a fugitive and a rebel, his course was clear, and the small remnant of life that was left him he freely gave to glory and fidelity. His raid across Scotland was a brilliant feat of arms, which has not yet been surpassed, and it is not strange that the story of the raising of the clans still stirs the enthusiasm of loyal Scots. But his supreme effort was made at Killiecrankie, and there he won victory and death. Sure of the justice of his course, sure of the loyalty of his men, he looked forward to a splendid triumph. "All the world will be with us, blessed be God," he wrote in his last letter, and had not death interposed, the prophecy might have been verified. Mackay, defeated, fled through the night, fearing that Dundee was pursuing him. But Dundee himself had fallen at the last volley of Mackay's own regiment. When the battle was over, he was found dying on the field. "How goes the day?" he asked. "Well for the king, but I'm sorry for your lordship," was the reply. "'Tis the less matter for me," he answered, "seeing the day goes well for my master." Thus he died, and, despite the detraction of hostile historians, thus he still lives, breathing, whenever his name is mentioned, the spirit of lofty heroism and of ancient romance.

TRAGEDY

Shakespearean Tragedy: Lectures on Hamlet, Othello, King Lear, Macbeth. By A. C. BRADLEY, LL.D., Litt.D., Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford. (Macmillan, 10s. 6d. net.)

THE world ought to be very thankful that the spoken words of Professor Bradley were not suffered to die on the unperpetuating echoes of a University lecture-room, but that his studies of Shakespearean tragedy have been committed by him to the commemorative medium of print.

Here will be found the work of no dissector, nor of the curator of a Shakespearean museum. Professor Bradley is not one to wrest the text to suit a preconceived theory of his own, nor is it an ambition of his to tell us how many arm-chairs there were in Shakespeare's library at Stratford-on-Avon, nor in what attitude he used to sit in them when composing a drama. But what he does help us to comprehend is the attitude of Shakespeare's mind when writing such and such a passage, and he shows the relations which this passage bears to others, and to the play as a whole. This is the kind of Shakespearean lore which is of true interest—this is the real editing of Shakespeare—the editing of his mind.

Professor Bradley's book is popular in aim. He desires to propagate a familiarity with Shakespeare's work, and to convey a correct general view of each play, as well as an insight into the co-ordination of its parts. Yet it does not deserve the title, "Shakespeare without tears," and still less "Shakespeare with groans and sweat"; it is not on the one hand elementary, nor, on the other, is it laborious, German, dry. But hear the author himself on his aim:

"Our one object will be what . . . may be called dramatic appreciation—to increase our understanding and enjoyment of these works as dramas, to learn to apprehend the action and some of the personages of each with a somewhat greater truth and intensity, so that they may assume in our imaginations a shape a little less unlike the shape they wore in the imagination of their creator."

—in short, to hold as 'twere the magnifying-glass up to the Shakespearean nature. This is the kind of book that all lovers of Shakespeare, erudite and unscholarly alike, stand in need of and will receive. This is the type of work which will convert the large body of the apathetic to the worship of Shakespeare, which except a man keep whole and undefiled without doubt he shall (from a literary point of view) perish everlastingly.

That which chiefly tends to render Professor Bradley's book an essentially popular one is the method of criticism employed. Every question, every controversy, theory, view, or supposition which arises, he subjects to the same test. His divining-rod is in every case guided solely by an appeal to the written words. This is the sound bed-rock of his criticism, and it is surprising how comparatively simple each difficulty is likely to become when a collation of relevant passages is made and reasoned upon. It is even more surprising to note how many theories have been airily advanced with a more or less marked indifference to the text. Whether the author is reasoning on the question of Hamlet's sanity, or on the question whether the Ghost was a ghost or an hallucination, or on Hamlet's foul words with Ophelia, in every case he proves his point by an appeal to the text, and shows the position of his adversary to be impossible by a resort to the same tribunal. It is another merit of the book that every question is submitted to common-sense argumentation, which, tempered as it must necessarily be with the spirit of sympathetic appreciation, yet is never superseded by the pedantry or enthusiastic rhapsody that often takes the place of reasoning in modern criticism.

The arrangement of the book is admirable. The first two lectures include what is common to all the four tragedies discussed, and the subsequent ones treat of the four plays severally in order. The second lecture is an interesting and illuminating disquisition on dramatic construction; but the first lecture, perhaps the least good in the book, is suspiciously like a sop thrown to the "Dons." It consists in a generalisation with regard to the substance of Shakespearean tragedy in the abstract, a subject which would never occupy the attention of any one except a professional academic critic. And indeed it is not a matter of great importance, even for such an one, that the "tragic fact" should be accurately defined. For the lay reader, at all events, it is quite enough that he recognises, in Hamlet or King Lear, a play which fully answers to the vague general conception he may have formed as to the meaning of the word tragic; and, moreover, he is inclined to resent the dogmatic laying down of hard and fast lines within which the tragic conception must necessarily be contained. An apposite illustration is furnished by the lecturer himself when he points out most acutely and truly how King Lear and Othello are distinguished for pathos, while Hamlet and Macbeth are more truly tragical: and yet who will pretend to say which of the four is the most tragic piece of work? The truth is that the "tragic fact" cannot be reduced to a definition, and there is no difference between tragic pathos and pathetic tragedy.

The larger the theme Professor Bradley is engaged upon the better and more admirable is his work. He is particularly good in his introduction to Macbeth, when he describes the deep brooding blackness of the atmosphere within which the action of the play is cast, and in his analysis of the dramatic devices by means of which such an effect is procured. He draws attention to the number of scenes that take place in the darkness of night or in some dark spot. The murders of Duncan and of Banquo, and the sleep-walking scene are enacted in the blackness of night. The Witches are found dancing on the thick air of a storm, or receive Macbeth in the darksome cavern of the "black and midnight hags." Even the phraseology itself helps to add sombreness to the general murkiness of the play. Lady Macbeth calls on thick night to come palled in the dunest smoke of hell, and even in her sleep it is of the darkness of hell, not of hell itself, that she expresses her fear. Macbeth bids the stars hide their fires that his black desires may be concealed, and numerous other instances are adduced to procure the general effect of black tragedy. Professor Bradley is not equally happy where he goes on to establish a parallel picture of colour beside the one of blackness already drawn. To support this new and somewhat incompatible thesis he cites the lightning in the storm, the gleam of the dagger in the air, the torches borne in different scenes by different people, the taper carried in the sleep-walking scene, the flame under the Witches' cauldron, and above all, says he, the colour is the colour of blood. All of which one is inclined to regard as mere fancifulness, into which Professor Bradley is but rarely betrayed, and as weakening the force of his previous remarks on the real dominant atmosphere of the play.

In his biggest undertaking, however, the hand of a consummate workman is observable. In diagnosing the character of Hamlet, the author has made himself more explicit than would have seemed possible in a matter of such complexity and controversy. He clears the ground by declaring that he will confine his attention to sane views of Hamlet's character. He refuses to argue with the kind of person who asserts that Hamlet was a clever and wicked youth who wished to oust his innocent uncle, and so accused his mother of adultery and of being accessory before the fact to his father's murder, and who accordingly "faked" a ghost. This theory is comparable only to Gilbert's Rozencrantz and Guildenstern which puts forward a passion for soliloquising on the part of Hamlet as the explanation of his inaction, or to the theory that Hamlet's soliloquies were addressed to an Irish confidant, who is another Horatio and who does not appear: "Now could I do it, Pat," with a capital P. Proceeding in a logical and convincing manner, all the theories of Hamlet's character are disposed of, and generally on the score of their incompleteness. First, the theory that Hamlet is prevented from executing his purpose by the force of external hindrances; secondly, the conscience theory; thirdly, the sentimental view of an effeminate Hamlet as enunciated by Goethe—"a most lovely, pure, and moral nature, without the strength and nerve which forms a hero, sinks beneath a burden which it cannot bear, and must not cast away"; and fourthly, the Schlegel-Coleridge theory, which accounts for Hamlet's dilatoriness by reference to his habit of intellectual reflection and introspection.

It is impossible in a few words to give a complete summary of Hamlet's character, but Professor Bradley's elucidation proceeds somewhat on these lines. Hamlet's nature is dominated by three chief influences. First, Hamlet is not mad, but is oppressed with an abnormal melancholy which paralyses action, and of which his reflective habit is more a symptom than a cause. This melancholy is the first fact portrayed in the play, and it is made clear that the cause of it is the overwhelming shock which Hamlet has sustained in becoming acquainted with his mother's unfaithfulness. The second ingredient in his nature is his refined and acute sensibility which magnifies the enormity of this unfaithfulness in mankind, and especially in womankind, including even Ophelia. The third factor in Hamlet's nature is the intellectual genius by which he sees every side of any particular question so clearly that action of any kind is impossible. When we observe Hamlet's many-sidedness—the courtier's, scholar's, soldier's, eye, tongue, sword—as the chief feature of the play, it is only natural that the true index is to be found in a combination of a few leading characteristics, rather than in a single, isolated, dominant quality of mind, which almost inevitably must result in a partial view of the character of Shakespeare's greatest creation. It is this very tendency to generalise that has hitherto led critics into taking a partial view.

The time and space devoted to the analysis of Hamlet's nature one feels is well spent, and yet one cannot help regretting that the minor characters had, in consequence, to be disposed of so summarily. Ophelia, Gertrude and the King, whose character is second only to Hamlet's in interest, are the only ones touched upon at all. The author holds a brief for Ophelia—a piece of heterodoxy which every one must welcome. He is a crown-prosecutor in arraigning Queen Gertrude, to whom he applies such epithets as weak, sensual, luxurious. He charges her with what might be called a moral inertness, and he accuses her of adultery. As to the King, he recognises the nobility of his bearing, but he construes his character in the ugliest light, which interpretation, in the opinion of most people, would subtract somewhat from the interest of the play.

Interesting as Professor Bradley is upon the larger questions, he does not therefore disdain to use the microscope on the minutiae of the dramas. He does not profess to discuss matters of textual criticism or to go into questions of style, diction or versification, and yet often he cannot choose but pause over the many beauties which otherwise might be overlooked,

"To find some knowledge at each pause,
Or some new thing to know,"

as Rossetti says. For instance he draws attention to a certain trick of verbal repetition, continually affected by Hamlet, which even a careful reader might fail to notice. One is rather prone to think mere accident is accountable for this; but Professor Bradley asserts that the trick attains to the dimensions of a habit in Hamlet, and that it is a mannerism peculiar to him. Here are instances: This from the first soliloquy.

"O God, God,
How weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable
Seem to me all the uses of this world,
Fie on't! Ah, Fie."

And again:

"Thrift, thrift, Horatio, Wormwood, wormwood."

And even more characteristic are:

- (1) "HORATIO. It would have much amazed you.
"HAMLET. Very like, very like. Stayed it long?"
- (2) "POLONIUS. What do you read, my lord?
"HAMLET. Words, words, words."
- (3) "POLONIUS. My honourable lord, I will most humbly take my leave.
"HAMLET. You cannot, sir, take from me anything that I will more willingly part withal, except my life, except my life, except my life."
- (4) "OPHELIA. Good my lord,
How does your honour for this many a day?
"HAMLET. I humbly thank you well, well, well."

Though we may not agree that this is deliberate on the part of the author, yet we are bound to concede to Professor Bradley that there is food here for interesting discussion, and it may be that the playwright desired to give the actor scope for the exercise of his art in differentiating the emphasis and inflection on each repetition of the same words.

R. Y. TYRRELL

A NEW NOVEL BY ANATOLE FRANCE

Sur la Pierre Blanche. Par ANATOLE FRANCE. (Paris: Calmann Lévy. 3 fr. 50.)

In a world beyond the reach of change and motion there would be no time, but things would persist in a perpetual nunc stans. Most of us who are prone to a habit of reverie waste many an hour in imagining a sphere so lofty that thence we might discover present, past, and future displayed in simultaneous grandeur. In one of his recent books ("Histoire Comique"), M. France assures us that this little globe of ours (which, after all, is just as high in the heavens as any other) may be the theatre of that magnificent survey. As we sit on the lawn after dinner, for instance, we may watch a star a-twinkle just beyond the tender pointing spire of the poplar in the hedge; the pale beam caresses the moist and gummy leaves. They make a part of our present. And yet a hundred years may separate the leaf and the ray. Yon light fell from yonder star before the oldest of us was born; the tree is in its future as the star is in our past.

For when we speak of the future we merely mean something which a turn in the road prevents us from seeing as yet; it is there, and has been there long enough, and we shall come up to it in time. Like most stargazers (who, looking on the moving skies, have noted how every transit is the result of previous motions), M. France is a disciple of Necessity. He holds, with Hobbes, that if a shot sparrow fall to the ground it is because (the solar system being what it is) shot and sparrow were bound to clash at a given point. He is a fatalist; or, if you like it better, he is a determinist philosopher; or (to play a third variation on the same air) he is a classic poet.

A man of his temperament likes nothing better than to examine the causes of things and to deduce their consequences. As a rule he is a man of science, but he may be (like M. France) the most delicious and wilful of artists. In that case he will not revel in invention, but will prefer to explain rather than to create. There is indeed much of the critic and something of the historian in our novelist. So much for the intellectual side of him. Endow this delicate and scrupulous observer with an extraordinary sense of beauty; an irony ever more in the thought than in the expression; something of the grossness of goat-footed Pan; and the mettle of a militant apostle—and we have M. France, whom the nations delight to honour, but whom they might quite conceivably have summoned in the police-courts (like Socrates) or shot to death on a barricade—had things been just a little otherwise.

There is something of all these qualities in the book before us. It is a midsummer night's dream in which past, present, and future meet, illuminating one vexed question: how so to frame a society that every one in it shall give what he best can give, and get what he most requires. We have called the book a novel, but it is in fact a platonic dialogue, hardly less brilliant and no less serious than those which Renan composed in the Park at Versailles, while the Commune lit a line of bonfires on the horizon towards Paris. Neither emotions, nor actions, nor even the study of character divert the philosopher's attention from his theme. He imagines a little group of contemporaries—himself (Nicole Langelier), a worthy stupid Nationalist (M. Goubin), with three or four other dilettanti—to whom the Cav. Giacomo Boni explains the recent excavations in the Forum at Rome, where they are assembled. They converse on philosophy and current politics; one of the party reads a tale about a Roman proconsul; another relates a personal experience of his own in the distant future; and that is all.

Were history but a series of fortuitous episodes, we would leave it to the picturesque historian, but we all know that it repeats itself, and an experiment that stands the test of repetition is always interesting. In history, as elsewhere, similar causes produce similar effects (so that, for instance, Petersburg in 1905 reproduces Paris in 1789). The delicacies of their difference are the zest of the game, and the lesson of their likeness the use of it. M. France has given us both the zest and the lesson in his imaginary portrait of the Proconsul Gallion, Lucan's uncle, Seneca's brother. He shows us a man whose elegant mediocrity, humane sensibility and love of natural history recall the Farmers-General and grands seigneurs of the reign of Louis XVI. After all, what is more probable? If there be only a given number of elements in the universe, in the process of ages they must recombine in the old patterns, like the figures in a kaleidoscope. The Proconsul Gallion may very likely have resembled Dupin de Franceuil or the Duke of La Rochefoucauld-Liancourt, in real life as well as in the imagination of M. France. French readers know the name of Gallion because they have read their Renan, and English ones because of chapter xviii. of the Acts of the Apostles. Gallion was the magistrate who heard the case between St. Paul and the Rabbi of Corinth; like Pilate, he washed his hands of it. In M. France's story, when he was called to judge this little local affair, which he thought supremely unimportant, Gallion was discussing with his cultured friends the probable future of religion in Rome. At that moment he came in contact with the little bleary-eyed, quarrelsome Jewish tentmaker, who spoke such bad Greek. But no thrill ran through him. After all, Rousseau appeared no more portentous to the amicable and liberal Dupin de Franceuil.

Gallion and his friends naturally ignored St. Paul; they hesitated between the cultus of Hercules and the worship of Orpheus. Were they wholly in the wrong? Most ages and races have had two religions, in fact if not in name; there are those who have deified Suffering, who have gone down with their god into the abyss of the under-world, whose praying hands have been raised there towards some beloved departed spirit, some Eurydice lingering in the shade; and there are those who adore Strength, whose magnanimous Hercules does not even pretend to be divine and yet does battle with death, succours rather than consoles, brings back to her hearth the wife and mother given up for lost, and goes on his way rejoicing. transiens bene faciendo. The reasonable Gallion would find to-day many to join him in the cult of Hercules.

Monsieur France would fain be wiser than Gallion, whose mediocrity amuses him, and to whom he seems to say (like Flaubert's Saint Antoine to the Catableps) "Ta stupidité m'attire." He, too, converses with his personages on the future, not only of religion but of society. But it is difficult to be wise before the event. M. France knows his authors, and cites with ease Sir Thomas More and Daniel Halévy, William Morris and Mr. Wells. To him, as to the moderns among them, the characteristic of Europe in the future will be a general urban exodus. There shall be no more towns. It is evident that already, in Belgium, special trains take the workmen from the hamlets to the mines and factories, and restore them to their country homes at night; while Emile Vanderveldt has dreamed of great palaces of industry built by the watersides in the bottoms of green valleys, each solitary in its country place, with the farm buildings clustering round. But it is probable that by the twenty-second century we shall have passed through this phase and come out somewhere quite different—who knows where? Perhaps a chemical synthesis will have dispensed with food: we shall live on a little air and a few grains of carbon, as the ancient Persians dreamed, telling of an age when mankind, happy and regenerate, should need no aliment and cast no shadow. Perhaps new resources will have utterly changed the conditions of life. There are forces in the universe which may possibly act on matter by means which we cannot as yet conceive, and which we must apprehend by other ways than those which our reason or our senses afford us. Gallion, therefore, there are things in heaven and earth undreamed of in your philosophy! And, as you left the Villa Said, to carry your predictions to the printers, perhaps, Monsieur France, you brushed against some haggard youth, in no wise remarkable as yet, whose genius may transform the world we live in more utterly than the inspiration of Paul was to change the ancient face of Rome. There is no harm done by hoping, and we exclaim with old Montaigne: "O la courageuse faculté que l'espérance, qui, en un subject mortel, va usurpant l'infinité, l'immensité, l'éternité! . . . Nature nous a là donné un plaisant jouet!"

MARY DUCLAUX.

THE TROJAN WOMEN

The Trojan Women of Euripides. Translated into English Rhyming Verse with Explanatory Notes by GILBERT MURRAY, LL.D. (George Allen, 2s. net.)

ONE may confidently say that, regarded as a play, this is a work of genius, and that the author is a scholar of the first rank and a poet of no mean order. Not a beauty in the very beautiful play of Euripides is missed or slurred or spoiled. We will not say that there are not here and there omissions of a thought in the original, but never of a really beautiful or outstanding thought. Dr. Murray has managed his rhymed couplets throughout with amazing skill, so as never to produce that effect of meanness or triviality which usually besets rhymed couplets, especially in dialogue. But it is not in man to translate a whole play in rhyme without ever inserting or omitting something in the interests of the rhyme. For instance, in v. 20 (we give the numbers of the lines in the Greek play, as there is no numeration in the English) "and decay" is metri gratia; so are "not a frown," 71; "the garnered East," 477; "as a cup of death," 893; and how can ἀνδομαρα, 1187, mean "the pattering welcomes of thy feet"? On the other hand, in 565 a thought in the Greek (not a very striking one) is omitted, and in the italicised words a new thought is interpolated:

"And in the wedded rooms of sleep,
Lo, the desolate dark alone,
And headless things, men stumbled on," a graphic touch, and quite in the spirit of the passage, but not to be found in the Greek. Again, a few lines further on, "her wave-born breast," can hardly be accepted as a rendering of εἰσαία μαρτῶν, whatever may be the meaning of that very obscure, yet somehow fascinating, phrase.

This is the reason why we would venture to say that Dr. Murray's work is better as a play than as a translation, though in many ways admirable even in the latter capacity. It is full of fine expressions which are also faithful renderings, e.g. (27):

"All God's spirit there
Is sick and turns from worship";

"Kindred and long companionship withal
Most high Athena, are things magical"—(51, 52):

Again, κηρήν (192) is "a winter-frozen bee" not "a drone," which spoils the application to the aged Queen.

To take longer passages, the speech of Andromache in which she apostrophises her dead husband (660-671) is both literal and spirited:

"One night.
One night—aye, men have said it, maketh tame
A woman in a man's arms. . . . O shame, shame!
What woman's lips can so forswear her dead,
And give strange kisses in another's bed?
Why, not a dumb beast, not a colt will run
In the yoke untroubled, when her mate is gone—
A thing not in God's image, dull, unmoved
Of reason. O my Hector! best beloved,
That, being mine, wast all in all to me,
My prince, my wise one, O my majesty
Of valiance! No man's touch had ever come
Near me when thou from out my father's home
Didst lead me and make me thine."

And this passage in the wail of Hecuba over Astyanax is faithful to the Greek and full of tenderness (1178-1187):

"Ye tender arms, the same dear mould have ye
As his; how from the shoulder loose ye drop
And weak! And dear proud lips, so full of hope
And closed for ever! What false words ye said
At daybreak, when he crept into my bed,
Called me kind names and promised, 'Grandmother,
When thou art dead I will cut close my hair,
And lead out all the captains to ride by Thy tomb.' Why didst thou cheat me so? 'Tis I,
Old, homeless, childless, that for thee must shed
Cold tears, so young, so miserably dead."

Here, too, is a very literal lyric and one full of dash, the first strophe of the finest choral ode in the play (794-806):

"In Salamis, filled with the foaming
Of billows and murmur of bees,
Old Telamon stayed from his roaming
Long ago, on a throne of the seas;
Looking out on the hills olive-laden
Enchanted, where first from the earth
The grey-gleaming fruit of the Maiden
Athena had birth;

"A soft grey crown for a city
Beloved, a City of Light:
Yet he rested not there, nor had pity,
But went he forth in his might,
Where Heracles wandered, the lonely
Bow-bearer, and lent him his hands
For the wrecking of one land only,
Of Ilion, Ilion only,
Most hated of lands!"

On the whole, it would perhaps have been better if Dr. Murray had followed the example of Mr. Way, and used blank verse save in the lyrical parts. A comparison of his version with Mr. Way's will show that the latter comes much nearer to the Greek in the non-lyrical portions of the drama, but not so near in the lyrical. We will not sit in judgment on the rival versions beyond saying that Mr. Way's is more of a translation and Dr. Murray's more of a poem, while both renderings are liberally endowed with both qualities.

The Trojan Women is, perhaps, as regards construction, the weakest of the extant Greek tragedies. It has little plot and little or no relief or variety. It is, in the fine words of Tennyson,

"A fiery scroll written over with lamentation and woe."

The date of the play was the eventful year 415 B.C., which was the beginning of the downfall of Athens. The year before, while Euripides was composing the tragedy, witnessed the atrocious butchery and enslavement of the Melians by Athens. Dr. Murray sees in the play a reflexion of a time which for thinking people must have been full of pity and foreboding. He calls the play "the crying of one of the great wrongs of the world wrought into music." It is "an intense study of one great situation . . . four figures clearly lit and heroic, the others in varying grades of characterisation, nameless and barely articulate, merely half-heard voices of an eternal sorrow." The notes are full of original observations on mythology and subtle analysis of the dramatis personæ.

WILLIAM BODHAM DONNE AND HIS FRIENDS

William Bodham Donne and his Friends. Edited by CATHERINE B. JOHNSON. With 16 illustrations. (Methuen, 10s. 6d.)

THE more vividly a natural genius for friendship in an individual is felt by contemporaries, the more difficult it is to present in such a way as to be realised by posterity. It resembles in fact the art of interpretation as applied to music and the drama. The achievements of the great singer or player can only obtain a secondary sort of immortality. They must be taken by those who come after on trust, on evidence of the effect produced at the time, as when Donne says of Jenny Lind, "I would be of no religion that interdicted me from hearing such a divine creature." William Bodham Donne, though a scholar and critic of taste, judgment, and humour, is yet remembered before all else for his incomparable gift for friendship, and in the present collection of letters Mrs. Johnson, his granddaughter, has succeeded, so far as it was possible to succeed, in portraying his personal fascination, which indeed she compares with that of his cousin, the poet Cowper.

The Donnes were probably not descended from the famous Dean of St. Paul's, though Cowper, whose mother was a Donne, believed they were. W. B. Donne was born in 1807, the only child of a Norwich doctor, who, it is said, might have sat to Bulwer-Lytton for the portrait of old Mr. Caxton, even to his tame duck. Both Donne's parents were clever people, and it is most interesting to note the literary associations which began to surround him from his earliest years. At Bury Grammar School he boards with the father of Arabella and Louisa Shore, and he reads with Williams, the friend of Charles Lamb. At Cambridge he is a member of the Apostles' Club together with Tennyson, Arthur Hallam, Monckton Milnes, Spedding, Trench, John Sterling, J. M. Kemble, and Charles Buller, whom Mr. Leonard Courtney recently celebrated in a speech which was a perfect model of graceful appreciation. Afterwards Donne is elected to the Sterling Club. His life was uneventful. He married a cousin, who bore him six children, but she was always delicate, and died in 1843. He was fairly happy as a small country gentleman in Norfolk, writing for Fraser, the Edinburgh, and similar good publications, combined with what was almost hack-work for publishers. In 1852 he was elected Librarian of the London Library, living in the old house in St. James's Square and busying himself immediately with the catalogue, as to which Mrs. Johnson quotes some interesting figures from THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE. He also acted as deputy to Kemble as Examiner of Plays, and on Kemble's death in 1857 was appointed to succeed him, when he gave up the London Library. Queen Victoria, who had a high opinion of him, employed him to manage theatrical performances at Windsor, and allowed him to edit the "Correspondence of George III. with Lord North," which revealed the causes of the American War of Independence. It is pathetic to record that Donne also compiled, at the command of the widowed Queen, a "Register of the Burials of the Prince Consorts." He resigned his examinership in 1874, and died in 1882.

The truth is that Donne's friends were really more remarkable than Donne himself, and most remarkable of all was Edward FitzGerald. His correspondence, unlike some of the other letters, is here published for the first time, and it gives an altogether delightful picture of "Old Fitz." Donne calls him "Diogenes without his dirt." He confesses to so much ease as to make it a question whether, since he cannot find, he should not create for himself some salutary trouble, and consults me if he should marry, or open a Banker's Book. I advise him, however, to let well alone." Fitz did marry, long afterwards, a daughter of the Quaker poet, Bernard Barton, another of Donne's cronies. Fitz employs Donne in 1868 to tell Quaritch his views about a new edition of "Omar"—"the whole thing is not worth two letters or two conversations about." Fitz wanted his profit after fifty copies had been sold, but the sale would be slow—"I believe my ghost will have to call upon B. Q. for a reckoning." We have glimpses of Fitz playing the organ in a village church, boating in Norfolk wherries, and slandering a respectable firm of lawyers named White and Barrett by calling them "Bite and Worrit." He likes Carlyle "because he pulls one the opposite side to which all the world are pulling one"; he revels in Trollope's "Phineas Redux" and "Is he Popenjoy?" but he cannot stand Browning, there agreeing with Donne; Newman's "Apologia" he thinks very honest and with some very fine things in it. Here is a fertile passage:

"The Prime Minister's 'Sybil' I found heavy and—strange thing for him—ditto Lord Lytton: so I fastened on 'Bleak House' and thanked God for it and Dickens! Then I bought at the Railway Stall 'Elsie Venner' by O. W. Holmes; very well worth reading, absurd as the motive is, and disproportionate as the Narrative. Holmes is I think a Man of Genius. I believe I never could read Hawthorne's Stories. Ste. Beuve has given me a desire to try 'Gil Blas' once again; which I never could get on with: an odd thing to myself. This time I will begin in the middle and so back if I get to the end."

These must serve as indications of the literary feast which Mrs. Johnson has spread before us. But we cannot resist quoting some of the amusing quips and stories of Donne himself. He finds in his great aunt's diary: "1754, Aug. 7. Nearly choked by a piece of veal—such are thy mercies, Lord, to me, a sinner." In another letter he writes: "Fred has a son. . . . Born at Aden, I imagine it is black; had it been a girl it would have been—a toast." Again, he tells the story of a certain Dr. H., who, in advanced age married a young wife. "Her gossips were condoling with her after the marriage on the long dull evenings she must spend with her old man. She said, 'Oh! they are not dull at all; we play at crocodile.' 'Crocodile, my dear, what's that?' 'Why, after dinner Dr. H. goes on all fours round and round the room, and I ride on his back.'" We like, too, the story of the gamekeeper who repented of his marriage: "'It is very strange how fond I was of that woman; I could have eat her'—adding, after a pause, 'and I wish to God I had.'" Considering the difficulty of the task before her, Mrs. Johnson has succeeded remarkably well, and though it takes a great subject to make a great biography, no little of the charm and humour of William Bodham Donne may be found in these welcome pages.

HAKLUYT

Hakluytus Posthumus: Purchas His Pilgrimes. Contayning a History of the World in Sea Voyages and Lande Travells by Englishmen and Others. By SAMUEL PURCHAS, B.D. Vols. I. and II. (MacLehose, 12s. 6d. each.)

"IF Man had continued in his first integritie," says Samuel Purchas in one of his quaint asides, "Meum and Tuum had never proved such quarrelling Pronounes, to make War more than grammaticall, in setting all the Parts of Speech together by the eares." "But sinne entered into the world," and the Anabaptists and Papists did the rest. How Britain might have fared if some of her hardy sons had not defeated the machinations of the greedy world outside her borders, Master Purchas gave his life to explain. To him, "Navigations" needed something more than casual commendation. "By sinne Man became a worldly Pilgrime." He works up a vast fabric of argument on this theme with all the elaboration of a piece justificative. Of course, theological bias must be discounted. The man who flatters his king and country by assuming that Psalm 147 was written in their honour is doubtless guided by a theory of history which is untenable. And the apologies of Purchas for tediousness are not ill-timed. Still, his great work remains a treasury of information, and Messrs. MacLehose of Glasgow are to be congratulated in making accessible to a larger public what scholars have long regarded with a quite peculiar affection.

Born in Essex, Purchas gloried in the East Anglian name. In one sense, if never physically, he was himself invigorated by the air he breathed. His surroundings infected his imagination, and imagination is everything to an historical writer. Thus he came to write calmly of the fact that he never travelled into any of the lands whose wonders touched his mind so strongly. With this intense, this unconquerable belief that the work he was attempting had the life-germ of interest within it may be contrasted the limitations of which he must have been conscious. Hard-working, upright, benevolent, and successful; never at a loss for a friend or a patron; he might well have sunk to the level of his predecessors and successors in the cures he held. But the wonders of the distant lands enchained his thoughts, and the sea, close at hand, set them working for posterity. Not vainly did he observe—"The Sea is a School of Sobrietie and Temperance." Your land-lubber, less vigorously inspired, might easily be misled by travellers' tales. Purchas, indulging in a form of word-play which other writers have tried without much success to make fashionable, warns his readers that they must not come to him for "wonder-foole fables." The scientific spirit had few more valiant precursors.

Of the material success which rendered this vale of tears tolerable to Purchas little need be said; and his very difficulties elude the searcher. As Vicar of Eastwood he spent ten years; another decade was given to London work; and then the end. The second period followed very naturally on the first. From one point of view the Eastwood period is the more interesting. In that parish, of which the records go back to the days of the Confessor, his name stands out on an otherwise insignificant roll. And there, in sight of Thames broadening to the sea, and with sailor-men ever coming and going to inspire him, he daily renewed his determination that he should make and leave something behind for which discoverers of his own and the England of a later day should be grateful. This plan residence in London enabled him to fulfil.

Except in one point—to lovers of literature the most important—Purchas neither claimed nor aimed at greatness. We should suppose that, on the whole, he might contentedly rest himself upon "the modest but indispensable virtues of a compiler." His aim was to collect all the information of travel possible, not merely to incorporate with sundry speculations of his own the materials which Hakluyt had left at his disposal. He might have anticipated, and probably did anticipate, that the facts which he garnered with such assiduity would be utilised as a quarry for historians and biographers to draw from. For this we may be grateful. Purchas preserved a great deal which must otherwise have been lost. He stands, as it were, at the threshold of a new age, an age of discovery. It is when a great new movement is beginning that the danger of losing important records is the greatest. This Purchas recognised, and he acted accordingly. We are the gainers.

If this were all, even the enthusiasm of the Hakluyt Society, which has never lost sight of Purchas, would be insufficient to justify the elaborate re-publication of these records. Their real claim to consideration lies in their style. In their pungency, their wit, their unexpected turns of expression, their irresistible quaintness, we find what will grow, if we are not mistaken, till Purchas reaches the enviable position of a quoted and quotable classic.

There is an equal quality about the book regarded as a whole. To break out into rhythmical praise of the greatness of the world or the goodness of the Almighty is of second nature to Master Purchas. The fact enhances the interest of the narratives of travellers which he has so methodically collated and preserved. Here pictures are drawn by eye-witnesses which lack nothing in brilliancy, boldness, or candour. Take, for instance, the exploits of Thomas Candish, a cheerful plunderer from Essex, who navigated "alongst" the coast of Chili, burning and sinking everything he could not turn to his own advantage, which pleasing intelligence he communicates, with due respect, to the Lords of the Privy Council. Trade naturally followed to the profit of these adventurous souls; some, on the other hand, were engineered by peaceable acceptance of the rights of others. All is grist to this collector's mill, and the only beings against whom Purchas inveighs with unreasonable rancour are the Dutch. That sentiment is easily explained, whilst one of the most interesting of the records of travel in these copious volumes may serve to discount it. For William Adams, whose memory to this day receives annual tribute in the streets of Yedo, obtained his earliest Japanese concessions through his connection with Dutch trade. The rest he did for himself. His dealings with Iyéyasu are as romantic as any recorded in the history of travel. Not less valuable to those who are interested in geographical research are the chapters of these volumes which deal with the illustrious Drake, with the intrepid Magellan, with Smith, Lancaster, Davis, Michelborne, and a host of others; whilst every page connected with the gradual rise of the fortunes of the East India Company is worthy, not merely of perusal, but of careful study.

Three thousand pages (a fragment of the whole) naturally contain some redundancies; but nothing could be swept away without injuring the whole. A worthy breadth of purpose underlies the enthusiasm of the author for everything relating to a wider knowledge of the world. Whilst he stands for England, first and last, there is a rejoicing over the worthy and heroic exploits of other nations, over the Ophirian triumphs of the past, or over the nearer achievements of Prince Henry the Navigator. These things would be of less conclusive import if the method of the writer were less vigorous or his style less picturesque. The style is the man, after all; and you have but to read the worthy scholar's will to realise his power over the English tongue. Ever and anon in the course of fervid argument or reasoned appeal he pours out his heart in language which deserves to stand with that of the familiar English Prayer-book. Overshadowed though Purchas may have been by the fame of Hakluyt, and different in quality from that of his friend though his work must be reckoned, the world would be poorer without these volumes; and we congratulate those who have spiritedly put them forth in this most worthy, well-printed, well-illustrated form. It has been said that, as an editor, this untravelled observer of his fellow pilgrims was not always judicious or, as a witness, faithful. There is dross with the gold, no doubt, but the mass is genuine; and a science somewhat neglected amongst us will be appreciably served by a fuller recognition of the merits of Samuel Purchas, whose name should stand henceforward a degree higher upon the roll of East Anglian worthies.

FLORENCE

Florence and Some Tuscan Cities. Painted by Colonel R. C. GOFF, described by CLARISSA GOFF. (Black, 20s. net.)

COLONEL GOFF'S water-colours of the landscape and old towns of Tuscany have been much admired in London, and those who know them will rejoice that he was chosen to illustrate Florence in the pleasant series of colour books that Messrs. Black are bringing out. Residing at Fiesole during many months of the year, he has had opportunities of painting Florence and the hills that bound Valdarno in storm and sunshine, in wintry weather, on windy days of March, and in summer glow, so that his choice of subjects is far more varied and his knowledge of the atmospheric conditions far more intimate than those of the passing tourist from England can ever be. The process of reproduction adapts itself equally well to gay and sombre subjects; to studies of dazzling sunshine like "The Steps of San Girolamo," or such cool, quiet landscapes as "The Old Road to Fiesole," lined by that delightful cypress avenue which has often furnished the artist with subjects for his etching needle.

In Florence itself he is especially inspired by the Ponte Vecchio and the strange, tall houses that rise near it, sheer from the Arno. Then he takes us out to the country, to Arcetri, the Certosa di Val d'Ema (described by an oversight as a Cistercian convent), and Fiesole; and then still further afield to Prato, Pistoia, Pisa, Viareggio, where the shipbuilding yards and pinewoods most delight him and us, and at length to Lucca. Would that we could travel in his company on to Volterra, San Gimignano, and Siena; but a plentiful feast has been provided, and it would be greedy to ask for more, when there are seventy-five water-colours already to bring a ray of Italian sunshine into our dusky London rooms.

To this charming series of pictures Mrs. Goff has provided an agreeable and easily-written commentary. Too easily written, we fear, to be quite exact in all its information; but this is not a text-book, and we need not be too angry when we read of frescoes by Raphael in the Sistine Chapel, and of a pupil of Ghirlandaio working forty-eight years before the master was born. Mrs. Goff is at her best when she leaves the town for the country, and when she turns from history to describing the life of the Tuscan people of to-day, their festivals, quaint observances, and ancient superstitions. The last chapter of the book is devoted entirely to such subjects, and it is one of the most enjoyable.

HEREDITARY ROYAL NURSES

"When thou wast young, I bore thee in my arm
Full tenderly, till thou began to gang;
And in thy bed oft happit thee full warm.
With lute in hand syne sweetly to thee sang;
Sometime in dancing feirallie I flang;
And sometime playing farsis on the flure;
And sometime on my office taking cure."

THE latest report of the Historical Manuscripts Commission is on the papers of the Earl of Mar and Kellie. Those old charter chests, interesting to historians and antiquarians, have also yielded up much that will delight the novelist and the student of social progress. The Erskines for over a century were the hereditary guardians of the royal Scottish children and must have had no small part in moulding the characters of their future rulers. The third Lord Erskine was guardian of James IV. The fourth Lord was killed at Flodden; to the fifth was given the charge of James V. There is a curious tenderness in the arrangements made for the boy at Stirling Castle. Lord Erskine has to instruct him in all "gude vertuis & to ly in the King's chalmers." It is supposed that the confinement there will be very irksome for a spirited boy such as James V. would be, for it is further decreed that if he wishes "to pas for solace to the Park of Stirling or the Abbay of Cambuskynneth" it must be "in right fair and soft wedder." Did that good knight of old in his faithful care really employ such modern coddling in his anxiety? One of the boy's tutors was "Sir David Lindsay of the Mount, Lord Lyon King at Arms," and to this fine old courtier he would call, with the inveterate love of nicknames and the kindly familiarity of those early times, "Pa-Da-Lin." He was the "nurse" who wrote the verse we commence with. That James gratefully remembered the fidelity and love of this John Lord Erskine is shown in his testament in 1540. He is going on a voyage "to our Ilis be sea & knowing the uncertane adventures that may fall to all maner of men great & small" he leaves his dearest son in Erskine's keeping. Later this same Lord had charge of Mary for a time in her infancy, and it was she who ennobled him as Earl of Mar. To his son again, in 1566, she wrote: "We haif thought gude to put in your hands our dearest sone your naturall Prince to be conservit, nurist and upbrocht within our said Castell of Striveling under your tutill & guidance." It would seem that the lonely boy James VI., fatherless and with a runaway mother, yet found real parent love in this Earl and the Countess his mother. After all, Mary, unable to guard and tend him herself, selected the best she had experience of, in this loyal nurse. Among the numerous servants in the royal establishment at Stirling there are four "Violaris," named Hudson, brothers apparently who had a servant to wait on them. So James was not to be without the refining influence of sweet sounds. We wonder whether Mary with her passion for song and music had with motherly love provided for some probable instinct in the boy. It could hardly be an ordinary detail, four musicians in attendance on one child. There were also seven "Rokaris," some of them apparently ladies of birth, for, beside the very plebeian Jeane Crummy, there appears The Ladie Kyppinross. "Rok" is an old Scots word for spinning-wheel. The life of women, great and simple, in old Scotland must have been largely bound up with that curious word "Rok." The next entry speaks at once of French civilisation. It concerns the "Lavandrie" (the laundry), the head of which is "Margaret Balcomie, lavender." In strict fashion the piety and learning of James is provided for. Godly, honourable conversation must be used always "as a pattern to so notable a personage," and no example of "ungodly & lycht behaweour be gewin be any persone quhair of the imitation may do hurt to his Hychtnes tenderness." Perhaps this training, so peculiarly Scottish, accounted for a British Solomon eventually adorning the throne and providing inspiration for the translators of the Bible. There is no doubt that James returned the affection and care spent on him by the Earl and Countess. He addressed the Countess in a letter as "Lady Minny" (Minny is old Scots for mother), thanking her for fruit, and boyishly adding he is ready for more whenever she pleases to send it! He is looking forward to seeing her "quhilk sall be as schortlie as I may, God willing, & sa fair ye weill as I do, thanks to God." His love and familiarity with his foster-father shows in the nickname he calls him by, "John Slates." In one letter he says, "John Slaitis your long absence has made me so to long." There are several letters to the Earl and Countess from Elizabeth testifying her gratitude for their care of "our dear yong coosyn, the Prince," and that in any peril she will always give her assistance for his safety. The Countess, his "governant," has the especial thanks of her "lovinge frenle Elizabeth R." When James comes to the throne Mar is his adviser, and to him he entrusts all the money matters which had been mishandled by "cair-less & greedie officairis." He gives his son Henry into his charge, saying in the ordinance that "his fader & guidshire be three discentis togidder hes had the custodie & governance of the soverane princes of this realme in thair tender & younge aige." In the household of this prince at Stirling there occurs a name which has since become famous—"Gilbert Prymrois, chirurgiane." After that the name occurs frequently. In 1622 the Earl sends a letter to the Marquess of Buckingham by a bearer, "Archibald Prymrois one of his Majesty's old servants," and James writes of sending the same messenger. In the next generation there is a Clerk to the Privy Council, James Primrose, and before the report closes we find the Earl of Rosebery residing at Barnbogle Castle on the Forth. As governors, tutors, guides, friends, it can be guessed the influence those loyal Erskines must have had in moulding the characters of their future kings in whose hands was the conduct of these stormy times. A letter from James in 1594 to Mar conveys, even in the midst of its affectionate wording, a sense of that sovereign's ever present feeling of divinity. "Because Milorde youre house hes bene sa honest to my forebearis, youre self had the honour to be brocht up with me, sensyne marrit my aunte & gottin the keeping of my tua greatest strengthis, and (quhilke is maist of all) of my eldest & only sonne, I thinke of reason I can lippin maire to nane & nane can be maire obleist to me." In spite of an endeavour to balance the mutual obligations there is a pathetic note in this. But for the Erskines, James' lonely and unhappy youth had been doubly hard, and now, surrounded by self-interested counsellors and officers, he has no one to "lippin to" in the old Scots phrase. Many of James' letters to Mar are concerning cases of wrong-doing and suffering among his subjects, and his interest in the needy and in old pensioners is a very pleasing feature of his character. He keeps an eye, too, on any product of Scotland of which he thinks the best is due him. In 1620 he writes: "Wee understande that these manie years there have not bene so manie nor as good hawkes bred in that our kingdome as have bene this year, notwithstanding whereof we have not had anie sent to us. This yee must cause be amended for if wee be unfurnished from thence wee shall forgette to cause pay your pension." James in the character of an irate and defrauded sportsman is not the James of history. James was not generous, and he writes painfully about a pension "for an olde servant that hath long served us being at great charges everie yeare to bring us houndes & attend us in our winter sports," winding up conscientiously, "wee are verie willing to do him good." Another letter from James to his wife, Anne of Denmark, should be quoted in full. She had been annoyed that when James succeeded to Elizabeth's throne, Henry, her eldest son, continued to stay in the charge of the Earl of Mar, and thought that James was in some plot to deprive her of her son. To her expostulation he answers: "I thanke God I carrie that love & respect unto you which be the law of God & nature I ought to do to my wife & mother of my children, but not for that ye are a king's daughter, for whether ye waire a king's or a cook's daughter ye must be all alyke to me being once my wife." What we know of Henry Stewart disposes us to imagine that his training had been wiser and more determined than that which moulded or left "to hang as it grew" the unfortunate character of Charles. When Charles began his ill-judged and autocratic methods this same Mar endeavoured to hold him back. He gives long accounts of the discussions of the Scottish Privy Council and the remonstrances and answers of Charles.

COMPULSORY GREEK

It is no wonder if the main point of the question came to be obscured by the discussion at Cambridge; for the reformers, so long as they were banded together against the abuse, held an unassailable position, but as soon as they faced the practical difficulties, and formulated a scheme, they fell a prey to criticism, and divided even their own party. The essence of the matter will, however, with every discussion win wider attention, until some remedy is devised. The complaint is that the majority of boys educated at our public schools and universities waste the most of their time and receive a comparatively useless education.

Of the advantage of Greek to those who really learn it, and of the importance of maintaining its study in England, there can hardly be two opinions; but this conviction cannot be made a reason for imposing the study upon that large class of boys who are found by experience to resist the instruction, and at the end of ten years to know nothing of it that can be regarded as of value.

Considering the universal aptitude of youth to learn, and the invaluable nature of the opportunity for useful and sound teaching, which, if it be not seized at the hour, is for ever lost, it is a blunder of almost superhuman stupidity to arrange our national education so that the majority should have enforced on them the study of a subject, in which it is foreseen that they will never acquire any proficiency.

With few exceptions the boys who thus fail are not stupid; they are merely not inclined towards that particular kind of thinking. They are brimful of life-interests, curiosity, nascent emotions and common sense; and if they do not take kindly to the details of the grammar of a dead language, that is owing to a not wholly ungenerous bent of nature, and it is absurd to fight against it.

That so large a proportion of assistant masters should have condemned the present system is an overwhelming testimony of active experience against it. Traditional institutions in full working order do not often condemn themselves.

My friends sometimes tell me that I am extreme and optimistic in my opinions about education; however that may be, my belief is that it is generally waste of time to attempt to teach any one anything which he does not wish to learn. I say, if a boy does not take an interest in his work, then that is due either to the work being unsuited to his present capacity, or to its being wrongly presented to him. The boy is full of lively interest, and it is only by his interest that he can be educated. The old Greek notion of education being the delightful employment of leisure was perfectly sound, and holds still. Human nature has not changed; and if the teachers in our schools find the boys unapt to learn, then that is due to the matter or manner of the teaching; unless perhaps the vulgar conventions of a luxurious home have deadened a boy's soul, in which case he has to be reawakened, and in good company may easily be awaked.

The enormous waste of time which the present tuition of Greek entails in a boy's education is best appreciated by reckoning up what might have been pleasantly taught to him in the same time.

And it is not only a mere negative damage; for the boy may come to dislike all his work, and to distract his mind from it. He is then thought stupid, and then he thinks himself to be stupid, until he really sometimes becomes stupid. For his developing mind needs to be led, encouraged and assisted; not to be hemmed in, bullied and thwarted.

I think it a good practical suggestion that boys should not begin Greek before fifteen years of age. I do not see why every one should not agree to that. Those who began at fifteen would know as much at seventeen as they do now: and it would be easier at fifteen than at eleven or twelve to distinguish those who were fitted for the study. The reason why Greek is begun at an earlier age is, I suppose, because of the numerous money-scholarships which are yearly given away to precocious and to overworked boys, whose successes advertise the efficiency of rival preparatory schools. This is an abuse very difficult to combat, but discreditable to our system of classical education, with its boastful repudiation of immediate practical results. The throwing open of all scholarships to general competition seems to be merely a premium on precocity and an early cramming of the classics; and it must be an actual discouragement to all other kinds of merit.

Some most desirable reforms are now likely to be ensured by the activity of the Classical Association. First among these must come a reasonable pronunciation of Latin, which would be the basis of sound philology; and this means a re-editing and reprinting of all the Latin textbooks; then a real familiarity with the language, gained by intelligent and wider reading: then a reform of the examinations, which must learn to smile on real attainment, not on the minimum of faults. And I would advocate the utter extermination of the unreadable compendiums and summaries of history, which are a torture of disgust and dreariness, and should be replaced by the full narratives, whether originals or translations, which are as naturally attractive as the others are repelling.

I do not wish to deny the existence of the famous "utilitarian spirit of the age," nor of "the popular demand for efficiency;" but no credit is to be got out of inefficiency; and if we look to the Universities to save us from vulgar ideals, they must justify learning by ridding it of abuses; indeed this safeguarding of classical education and the humanities is almost their primary duty. And since it is obvious that neither Oxford nor Cambridge can ever expand so as to teach fully and completely all the branches of modern science and art—nor indeed to compete in this manner with such a University as Berlin—it might perhaps be the first step of a wise policy for the old Universities to decide exactly what they are capable of containing, and what they would determine not to meddle with: in which case they could keep what are sometimes called the historic subjects in their present pre-eminence: and with respect to Greek it would seem to me that the standard of the study would be immediately raised, if it was confined to those who understood it, and intended to prosecute it: but here no doubt the main difficulty lies, and I do not pretend to know the solution.

ROBERT BRIDGES.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

GEORGE HERBERT

AMONG the books that I love to have in my bedroom "The Temple" is a chief favourite, but perhaps something ought to be said about what I regard as the leading characteristic of a bedroom book. To begin with negatives, it ought not to be such a book as will allure one into continuous reading, because that leads to excitement, and excitement does not conduce to sleep. It ought not to be a book that one turns to for reference, but rather one full of interesting passages, interspersed in a desert of sand, and I confess that is how I regard George Herbert. There are some hundreds of his verses which seem to have no appeal at all. They are all of them clever, many too ingeniously so, and they are all pure and fresh, but the spirit that evoked them is one that has passed away. Possibly enough there are as many devout people living to-day as there were when Herbert was preaching at Bemerton, but their devotion has taken a new form, and it is with a certain regretful pathos that one recalls the pure and simple faith of childhood, when the village choir seemed to discourse heavenly airs and the white-haired rector, I fancy I can see him now, spoke with a kindness native to himself and an authority that seemed to come direct from heaven. Perhaps then Herbert might have had more appeal than he has now.

What a great deal is blown from our mind by the winnowing fan of time! Yet it is chaff, or at the most light grain, that goes to the breeze; it is the solid corn that remains, and there are passages in George Herbert's poems as eternally living as the gravest passages in the "Odyssey" or as the "Book of Job" itself. Witness this as a sentence to go to sleep with, yet as no benediction but pregnant with the melancholy indifference of the wind itself:

"Yet still Thou goest on,
And now with darkness closest wearie eyes,
Saying to man, It doth suffice:
Henceforth repose; your work is done."

To remember this is much better than to read it, because in the very next verse we find Herbert reverting to his merely irritating ingenuity. If he had left the poem ending on that solemn phrase "Your work is done," it would have been a masterpiece, but he must needs proceed:

"Thus in thy Ebony box
Thou dost inclose us, till the day
Put our amendment in our way,
And give new wheels to our disorder'd clocks."

It is curious that the first verse of this poem and the last should be equally bad, whereas the two middle verses and the one we have quoted give at its best that fine melancholy which was one of Herbert's most remarkable characteristics.

"What have I brought thee home
For this thy love? have I discharged the debt,
Which this dayes favour did beget?
I ranne; but all I brought, was fome."

"Thy diet, care, and cost
Do end in bubbles, balls of winde;
Of winde to thee whom I have crost,
But balls of wilde-fire to my troubled minde."

It is the misplaced ingenuity which renders so much of Herbert unreadable to-day. In verse ingenuity is a very varying quantity. The intricate and difficult measures which have to be threaded before the very artificial verses which the French delighted in making can be imitated or produced, demand an ingenuity the effect of which is delightful, but to torture words so that when the poem is printed it may resemble a pair of Easter wings or a communion chalice is to sacrifice the poetic to the merely ingenious. That, however, was the turn of George Herbert's mind, and without it he never could have constructed "The Temple" with all its different phases, stages and steps. It is very easy to imagine the gifted and whimsical parson walking by the river that ripples past the sweet old garden at Bemerton, his face lighting up at one moment with the look that follows poetic inspiration, at another twinkling curiously as he devised some new conceit that would surprise and please his friends at the moment, however dull we may find it now. And there is no doubt that he wanted artistry to have been a great poet. Take the best known and the most exquisite of all the poems he has written; and it will be seen that the first two verses have won for the poem its reputation.

"Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright,
The bridal of the earth and skie:
The dew shall weep thy fall to night
For thou must die

"Sweet rose, whose hue angry and brave
Bids the rash gazer wipe his eye,
Thy root is ever in its grave,
And thou must die."

The are still delightful to read, delightful to remember but in the third the inspiration has gone and the poet is flat and ingenious.

"Sweet spring, full of sweet days and roses,
A box where sweets compacted lie,
My musick shows ye have your closes,
And all must die."

The fourth verse suffers too from this vice of ingenuity but is almost saved by the strength and beauty of the metaphor it contains:

"Onely a sweet and vertuous soul,
Like seasoned timber, never gives;
But though the whole world turn to coal,
Then chiefly lives."

Somewhat sadly one reflects at times on the little that is really immortal. Out of the whole body of English literature there is after all only enough verse of the very highest quality to make a moderate sized volume, and when we take a particular poet, a tiny leaflet would be enough to hold all that is vital of him. One turns the pages of Herbert and says with Browning on a different occasion: "Not verse, now, only prose." His Church Porches and his Jordans, his Church Music and his Monuments, even his sighs and his groans, the verses he made for Easter and Christmas and the other Church festivals, his outpourings on obedience and the other Christian virtues, how dull and dead they all seem to us to-day! To look over the book seems like wandering in a desert of sand, though it makes us all the happier to come upon a green oasis like this:

"Love built a stately house; where Fortune came;
And spinning phantasies, she was heard to say,
That her fine cobwebs did support the frame,
Whereas they were supported by the same:
But Wisdom quickly swept them all away.

"Then Pleasure came, who liking not the fashion,
Began to make Balcones, Terraces,
Till she had weakened all by alteration:
But rev'rend laws, and many a proclamation
Reformed all at length with menaces.

"Then enter'd sinne, and with that Sycomore,
Whose leaves first sheltred man from drought and dew,
Working and winding sliely evermore,
The inward walls and Sommers cleft and tore
But Grace shor'd these, and cut that as it grew.

"Then Sinne combined with Death in a firm band,
To rase the building to the very floore:
Which they effected, none could them withstand
But Love and Grace took Glorie by the hand,
And built a braver Palace than before."

Yet if the treasures are few they are very precious. In certain moods perhaps even they would lack attraction, but there are other moods in which no poet seems to have more power to console, none more ability to sustain than George Herbert. You may out of his whole collection of verse gather one sweet little posy that may well remind you of the handful of flowers that no doubt were again and again plucked by him in the sweet and tranquil garden past which the Arun runs, and which the parsonage he restored still overlooks. There is no other spot in England which imparts to the visitor such a feeling of peace and rest, just as the tiny church at the other side of the road touches a religious instinct which would have no response in the stateliest cathedral. I think that for the bedside there is no more suitable book than "The Temple."

THE SAYINGS OF CHILDREN

WILLIAM BARNES, the poet, was pleased when a little child referred to honey as Bee-jam. "That's interesting," he said, "to the philologist. Every mother should keep a book of the sayings of her child." And certainly, one thinks with regret of the gems that must fall untreaured so often by frolicking companions or unimaginative maids. What brother or sister would register the phrase of the little girl so comfortably tired by fun that even bed-time lost its sting? "I don't mind going, I really don't. . . . It's quite the favourite of my treat." Or the prettiness of her saying when her father was away: "When he comes home then, you'll tell him my love?"

Wynken and Blynken are a girl and boy, and Nod is a younger boy. Blynken has seven years and a half and an unparalleled flow of words. He thinks in images, and metaphor to him is a frequent part of speech.

"Well, I took off the top, and just put in the spoon and all the egg came caterpillaring out."

Or, in description of curling up in bed: "I don't like being straight out! I lie like the Moon, like D, when I lie in bed."

Or again:

"We didn't mind—we were as cheerful as rats in a kitchen, but Nannie had on, rather, her lock-up scowl."

A lady of great finish in social manner called on his mother, when she was out.

"Did you like her?"

"Yes, I did. But you know, she was rather an O-how-sweet, O-how-precious kind of lady. I don't care much, you know, for those sort of kiss-about women, do you?"

It was, he, too, who showed his mother the eulogy of a lover when she seasoned some rebuke with praise.

"I have to say this to make it clear to you, just because you are all the world to me."

"And you," with both arms tightly encompassing, "And you, are Heaven and the North Pole to me."

Nod is less articulate and altogether of a more sober cast of mind. He is five years old, and misplaces words perfectly now and then. A hair-cutter, pleased with the silky mousiness of his head, said "nice hair" in his foreign voice. Nod drove home a little later with slightly colouring cheeks.

"I heard that man telling you what gentle hair I had."

Their mother has learnt many things in their company, but one fact definitely, is hers. It is that on the whole her children teach her more than she teaches them. What a flood of light Blynken's answer let in on the subject of merit and reward. For if we are honest because honesty is the best policy how shall honesty profit then the soul? Something disagreeable was required of him, and to gain his own ends he carried on a conversation from the floor, on the flat of his back.

"Are you going to put your boots on?"

"No."

"You'd be sorry if the others went without you?"

"No."

"Well, get ready quickly and you shall each have a banana to eat upon the way."

And a voice from the floor with no hint of movement in it: "This enticing makes no difference."

His mother sat down to think.

Wynken reads to herself with great zest and application. She is not one to stay for the individual word, she is after the sense of the matter. "One of those great generals, you know, Trepoleon or somebody."

But how she illumined the situation when she exclaimed, quivering in some childish rage: "By mistake, I will pinch Nod."

Like some pellucid stream that gives in half-veiled imagery the surrounding reeds and trees, so in the transparent depths of child-nature, we may often see, to our confusion, a semblance of our own. How little we change, after all! Wynken had a doll-negress by whom she set great store. "Black Mairly's broken, mummie." Face and voice alike of woe.

"O, I'm sorry, how did it happen?"

"Well, it happend this morning, when I was . . . very quietly . . . breaking her, in bed."

The infinite variety of a child's mind makes it the sure purveyor of the unexpected. As when Blynken started on this cheerfully-chanted list in the animated hour of the bath. "The towel has the bath, and the bath has the soap, the soap has the fat, and the fat has the pig. The pig has the bran and the bran makes the sausages. Man has the sausages and God has man."

Or, again, it confers the power of acute alternative. The preacher mounted the pulpit, bowing his head in prayer.

"Is he Jesus?"

"No."

"Then, is he Punch?"

Nod may not be so glib of tongue, but he has his thoughts, and long ones. He is a dreamer, too. "You know, moth', sometimes I get fixed in such dreadful dreams. Houses all broken and tumbling, and ground turning to water."

Men fighting and scrambling, all like this . . . and people walking in burnt places." But it was Blynken who said after a feverish sleep, "He'd been jumping out of stuff-balconies all night." And does not that give you the sagging foothold of a dream?

"Go to the window, Nod, and tell me what kind of day it is."

"A very shining one. There's a sun, but I can't see the round sun. The sky's yellow, you know, not a moon. And I don't see the sun, only the lightening of it."

It was Wynken who asked her mother: "Why do grand-dukes and grand pianos have the same name?" And it was she who cried out in her great pleasure on the beach: "I wonder how God got it in his heart to make the Sea!"

The doctor prescribed a powder with a grain of mercury in it; and Blynken: "Am I to swallow Jupiter's messenger then?"

He was amusing himself with a dusting brush in his hand one day, and he stopped in front of a mantelpiece. It represented a nymph in floating draperies, poised on one impossible toe. It held his full and considering eye for a moment. Then he twirled his brush in her face. "Up! hussy, with your needless dancing."

It was he also who enumerated to his mother the grateful pleasures of returning home. "And there'll be Nannie, so glad to see us, standing at the door with her Hippodrome-grin on."

"Do you know, moth', in your garden, very nearly you've got a poppy?"

And "there's the moon, there's the moon," shouts Nod.

"Yes, there's the moon," answers Blynken; "and there's the melancholy face I always see in the moon."

"This fly in amber lived thousands of years ago."

"Did it? . . . Then perhaps it settled on the nose of an early Briton."

There are those who add something to the talk; who bring bricks to the building.

"Aren't we radiant people?" his happy voice exclaims as he springs upstairs full of some preposterous plan.

But there are times when even a mother's comprehension is nonplussed, or at least must stand at gaze.

"And I know what 'smell' is in French, moth'!"

"What?"

"Phlegm."

Or "Some people, I suppose, if they didn't quite know, might speak of the Virgin Mary as Mrs. God?"

And those last surprising questions, that are put just before dropping off to sleep; sometimes in such astonishing conjunction.

"What does 'tabernacle' mean?" . . .

"Oh does it? I thought it was some kind of bait." Then a pause with a comfortable yawn in it.

"Do you think God has got a God?"

Their mother is employed and entirely edified when she is one of this company of four. She is profoundly contented while with them, too, and can sit looking at a field or a wood for some time in a state of fatuous contemplation of her calling. She is fond, as every woman must be, of going upstairs and seeing them in bed. For she never tires of the contrast the spectacle affords—these rollickers, these madcaps, "snared by sleep."

One night, for the sheer love of it, she lingered in the darkened room. Nothing but the sound of quiet breathing; a thing so ineffably soft that you must stoop to hear it. The slender ray of the night-light hardly penetrates the shadows, and she sees three pillows barely dinted, in repose.

Then a rustle; and one head raised.

"Moth', how many sausages could you make out of a pig?"

PAMELA TENNANT.

ON A REDBREAST SINGING AT THE GRAVE OF PLATO

(IN THE GROVE OF ACADEME)

THE rose of gloaming everywhere!
And through the silence cool and sweet
A song falls through the golden air
And stays my feet—
For there! . . .
This very moment surely I have heard
The sudden, swift, incalculable word
That takes me o'er the foam
Of these empurpling, dim Ionian seas,
That takes me home
To where
Far on an isle of the far Hebrides
Sits on a spray of gorse a little home-sweet bird.

The great white Attic poplars rise,
And down their tremulous stairs I hear
Light airs and delicate sighs.
Even here
Outside this grove of ancient olive-trees,
Close by this trickling murmuring stream,
Was laid long, long ago, men say,
That lordly Prince of Peace
Who loved to wander here from day to day,
Plato, who from this Academe
Sent radiant dreams sublime
Across the troubled seas of time,
Dreams that not yet are passed away,
Nor faded grown, nor grey,
But white, immortal are
As that great star
That yonder hangs above Hymettos' brow.

But now
It is not he, the Dreamer of the Dream,
That holds my thought.
Greece, Plato, and the Academe
Are all forgot:
It is as though I am unloosed by hands:
My heart aches for the grey-green seas
That hold a lonely isle
Far in the Hebrides,
An isle where all day long
The redbreast's song
Goes fluting on the wind o'er lonely sands.

So beautiful, so beautiful
Is Hellas, here.
Divinely clear
The mellow golden air,
Filled, as a rose is full,
Of delicate flame:
And oh the secret tides of thought and dream
That haunt this slow Kephisian stream!
But yet more sweet, more beautiful, more dear
The secret tides of memory and thought
That link me to the far-off shore
For which I long—
Greece, Plato, and the Academe forgot
For a robin's song!

FIONA MACLEOD.

FICTION

Gossip; a Novel. By BENJAMIN SWIFT. (Duckworth, 6s.)

THE writer who calls himself "Benjamin Swift" has by his previous work gained for that name a reputation—a reputation which we believe to have been deserved. But assuredly it was not by work such as this. Had the critic to judge him solely by the present novel, it would be difficult to understand at all Mr. Swift's admitted repute. These things unfortunately happen. When a writer has achieved the difficult conquest of a name, and publishers are ready to pay for that name, it is no easy virtue, under the urgency of circumstances, to refrain from profiting by their readiness. He may well accommodate his conscience to make the many facile books pay for the occasional book written with serious art. This, perhaps, rather than slovenliness or lack of earnest purpose, explains the backsliding which too often follows success, whether represented by the letters R.A. or by a circulation at Mudie's.

If we are to regard this novel as the harmless necessary pot-boiler (is it so harmless, though it may, alack, be necessary?) or from whatever cause, the fact remains that "Gossip" will not allow the reviewer enthusiasm. It is a novel of which the formula holds that "there is nothing in it." It calls for no activities of blame, it is negatively virtuous; but it has no positive quality on which praise can fasten. It is a plain story plainly and directly told. Now to tell a plain story plainly is surely an excellent good thing, and an excellence not very common in these days. But it is a negative merit, an eschewing of the superfluous, and (unless the telling, besides plainness, have charm) leaves the tale dependent on its inherent interest. But Mr. Swift's narrative-manner—here, at least—is plain without charm; and the tale is not of inherent interest. The plot is not particularly original, does not aim to be exciting, and therefore holds the reader with but a languid attention. Evidently, one would say, the plot is not the thing: one is reduced, from all outward tokens, to conceive it planned as a novel of character.

Now, character may be treated analytically, or it may be treated synthetically—the persons may reveal themselves in talk and their reaction to circumstance. The methods are not mutually exclusive; and it is by the predominance of the one or the other that we classify novel and novelist. So resolved an analyst as Mr. Henry James makes large and subtle use of characterisation through dialogue and even (though much less) through act. Scott, whom no one calls analyst, has yet his passages of analysis. We will not say that "Gossip" is never analytic; but certainly it will trouble no reader by subtle dissection of motive. There remains the synthetic method, the display of character in talk and act. This, we are bound to think, is what Mr. Swift intended. There is talk and there is act; and, Mr. Swift being a practised novelist, both have a measure of significance. But it is an obvious measure. Except in this mild, nay, elementary measure, they are not revelatory; their suggestion of personality "hangs fire," it has a perfunctoriness. In a word, there is no character, save after the ambling, semi-conventional fashion possible to far weaker novelists. Only a certain sureness and cultivated ease in the performance hints a hand capable of stronger work. But these figures, blocked out at the beginning, and arousing an interest of expectation as to what the sculptor will make of them, are carried no further. Not one of them ever wakes to life. The author, we feel, has no warmth towards them, and cannot therefore breathe into them the heat, the seedling-spark of vitality. They are not creations, for he does not feel the love of the creator towards his creatures, without which nothing is created. The life of the artist transferred to his imaginations vitalises the caricatures of Dickens. For lack of that inbreathed life, these sober and rational figures do not live.

Practically, in truth, there is no character. And what remains? Some occasional description, which has a literary touch, without being remarkable. And a novel which arrests not by plot, nor character, nor charm of narrative, is surely a novel which fails. The best we can say of it is that the characters, if they had been realised rather than unfulfilled intentions of character, are at least not conventional types. Mr. Swift can and should do better things than "Gossip."

Barham of Beltana. By W. E. NORRIS. (Methuen, 6s.)

MR. NORRIS' large public will doubtless give a cordial welcome to this book which is quite up to his average and shows on every page the hand of an experienced storyteller. The scenes are pleasantly varied, the situations quietly effective, and the characters consistent though not vital. As we expect, the new world meets the old. The Barhams, father, son and daughter, decide to come to England from Tasmania—a place that somehow suggests apples in everyday life, and in the realm of fiction convicted felons of fierce determination—in order that they may renew their acquaintance with the Marches, a fine old Sussex family, again consisting of father, son and daughter. Such are the dramatis personæ, together with Lady Warden, who has large mastiffs, many eccentricities and a ghost in her house. The father of Barham of Beltana does not appear; he was a convicted felon, but innocent, for the money he is supposed to have stolen from the Marches was really stolen by one of the Marches themselves. Still the cloud gathers at the crucial moment over his family, and is dispersed in an ingenious way—the deus ex machina being the ghost—in order that the true love marriages of the two young couples may take place amidst showers of golden sovereigns. The story is readable because it runs smoothly from start to finish, and the interest is allowed to accumulate cleverly; it will be read, because, as was once said, your Mudie subscriber is the most loyal of individuals. Whether it be worth reading is another matter. It has all the drawbacks and all the advantages of a strictly non-alcoholic beverage.

Amanda of the Mill. By MARIE VAN VORST. (Heinemann, 6s.)

MARIE VAN VORST quotes no former work upon her title-page, but her book is strangely unlike the effort of a beginner. To begin with, it fulfils the one ambition of the modern novelist—it breaks fresh ground. It is the tragedy of the hill-folk, or "po' white trash" of South Carolina. These people, farouche, uneducated, ignorant, superstitious, passionate and naïve, have been of late years drawn into cities and swallowed up by mills and factories. If Miss Marie van Vorst is to be believed, the twentieth-century conditions of labour in free America are worse than they were in England when Elizabeth Barrett Browning wrote "The Cry of the Children." The achievement of the writer is that she takes a well-worn theme—the fiery demagogue, the able strike leader, turns out to be the unacknowledged son of the purse-proud manufacturer—and invests it with a freshness of circumstance and atmosphere which makes it vivid reading from first to last. The character of Henry Euston is a most unusually faithful portrait; the weakness of man, his dependence on woman for moral and spiritual strength, is apparently what the author aims to teach. It is a pity such a book should be disfigured by a certain fleshliness apparent throughout: but, apart from errors in style, and, here and there, in feeling, there is a capacity to portray life which shows real power.

The Silver Key. By NELLIE K. BLISSETT. (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)

THE opening chapter of this story gives a discouraging taste of the writer's literary quality: for a few pages it seems doubtful whether it is not intended to be a caricature of certain popular romances wherein the heroes are gentlemen of France in quest of adventure. It is however a seriously planned semi-historical tale in bad imitation of Mr. Stanley Weyman's style of narration, and follows—at some distance—upon his lines of plot and incident. Here we find Lady Diana Royal and the Marquis d'Oréville going through the marriage ceremony, at midnight, in an out-of-the-way French village, Lady Diana believing that she is wedding a lover disapproved of by her guardian, while the Marquis is only vaguely aware that he is being married at all, and does not even guess at the identity of his bride, thanks to a man with ill-matched eyes and a magic powder. As Lady Diana is a ward of Charles II. it affords an opportunity for the appearance of Charles and the English court at Dover on the occasion of the visit of Madame d'Orléans. These chapters are something of a surprise, the scenes are possible, effective, and altogether excellently done, which suggests that Miss Blissett has no need to resort to imitation, and is capable of doing much better work than might be inferred from the perusal of three-fourths of her present story.

In Search of the Unknown. By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS. (Constable, 6s.)

THERE is considerable humour in the treatment of these mock scientific researches, yet as a whole they leave a confused impression as of strange disordered dreams. The story in which the great-aunt's spirit passes into a white cat, and the professor and his pretty daughter are alternately visible and invisible presences, provides rather a tiresome kind of fun; so also does the description of the hatching of the great ux eggs. Several of the chapters have previously appeared in magazines, and in that detached form were probably more entertaining than as a continuous narrative; even the most amusing jokes and whimsical fancies can be too often repeated. With a lively remembrance of "The Maid-at-Arms," and other stirring tales from the same pen, the reader feels some regret for the fooling indulged in here, and while he may laugh at many of the absurd situations presented to him he will still retain a hope that Mr. Chambers will return to his earlier manner and his romantic stories.

Rice Papers. By H. L. NORRIS. (Longmans, 6s.)

The Mirror of Kong-Ho. By ERNEST BRAMAH. (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)

MR. L. NORRIS' "Rice Papers" possess all the delicate attributes which properly self-respecting rice papers should have. They are as light as feathers. Blow any of them into the air and it will flutter for a few moments most entertainingly; nor will you be able to guess with any accuracy where it is going to fall. Held up to the light each "paper" discloses its watermark—a Chinaman very wittily presented. There is Fung Wa Chun, for instance, the grave and venerably bearded personage with the perfect English and the American phrases, who deigns to relate his life-story to the officers of one of his Majesty's gunboats. Mr. Fung was born, he thought, in a sampan, of honourable parents who gained an honest living by neatly disposing of passengers at night by means of the comfortable and ancient device of a collapsible bamboo shelter in the stern-sheets. It is regrettable that upon the demise of such excellent people he should have passed into the care of an uncle who really was a bad man, and lived like a spider within a circle of man-traps. From the point of view of diamond cut diamond, however, this was strictly necessary, and we keenly appreciate the symmetrical villainies of those merchants. A far pleasanter and most humorous personage is Hong, "the massive and burly gate-keeper of the British Consulate," whose adventures, related to Master Jack and Miss Dorothy, also of the Consulate, are quite the cream of a clever book. Hong had been many things in his day. As an actor he had once caricatured a magistrate, and had been, by way of a gentle and amusing punishment, bound neatly down across a narrow passage communicating directly between a crowded theatre-house and the refreshment booths outside. Blandly surviving this ordeal, Mr. Hong shortly afterwards exercised a little humour on his own account, gaining an amiable livelihood by pushing people into a river from which his partner in the business pulled them out. But this, too, came to an end, and perhaps his most strenuous days were spent in the service of a very funny mandarin, who never laughed at his own jokes, and sadly but promptly executed any one else who so much as dreamed of doing so. This, no doubt, was why Hong never laughed at the antics of the chow puppy at the Consulate. The mental and moral Chinese background to all these tales is very subtly touched in. The tortures, too, throughout, are only less ingenious than exquisite; and since, as Mr. Norris says, "they possess the merit of not being true," the critic has nothing to do but enjoy them. We perfectly realise, too, the undertone of the true word spoken in jest, especially in the tale of Feng Shuey; "'My tankee you velly much,' said Dorothy; 'that no belong hollible stoly, Hong.' And Hong smiled inwardly."

We feel somewhat nervous as to the possible results of confronting Mr. Ernest Bramah's Kong Ho with Mr. Norris' vigorous Chinamen. Like the famous and chivalrous Mr. Bindabun Bhosh, Mr. Kong came to England and saw life from a boarding-house and other places. That, at least, is his account of himself. Yet in those letters to his "venerated sire," in which he has "described with undeviating fidelity the customs and manner of behaving of your accomplished race," we seem to detect unmistakable signs of the mere satiric foreign-devil in disguise. We will pursue this painful suspicion no further. There is a proverb to the effect that "a broken vessel can never be made whole, but it may be delicately arranged so that another shall displace it." Possibly Mr. Norris' friendly Chinamen have "delicately arranged" Mr. Kong to be "displaced" as a spy. We refuse to shake him down. If he is a sly dog, he is at any rate amusing.

The Vicissitudes of Evangeline. By ELINOR GLYN. (Duckworth, 6s.)

No one can deny that Mrs. Glyn is clever. Take the dedication of this book, "To the women with red hair." It is very clever—with a little, finicking, acute cleverness that crops up at every moment in the pages of the story. It is the cleverness of Gyp—with a difference. For Gyp, it must be admitted, has something besides her cleverness. Not only is every sentence of her best work a stroke of wit; she has a philosophic breadth and depth, a knowledge of life and a keenness of perception that make her books far more than they pretend to be. By her side, Mrs. Glyn, amusing as she is, is a petty satirist. She is all cleverness, where Gyp is cleverness and much more. But, of course, she is hampered by the fact that she is writing for English readers. Could she be free of the conventions, as Gyp is, she would do better. For her naughtiness is not that of one who, like Gyp, takes naughtiness for granted. She knows it is naughty; she treats it with a conscious smirk of daring, not the smile of one perfectly at ease. The result—that her books never "taste quite nice"—is not Mrs. Glyn's fault, but it seems to us to stand in the way of her achieving the success her cleverness deserves. In fact, if she wrote in French she could be twice as naughty and not half so "improper." But we must not give a wrong impression of the propriety and impropriety of "The Vicissitudes of Evangeline." There is nothing improper in it—and yet it leaves an impression of impropriety. It is very amusing and bright and worldly, though not so amusing as "The Visits of Elizabeth"; and since any girl who could take Evangeline, the red-haired "adventuress" as she calls herself, for a model would be a born idiot to start with, it is scarcely necessary to discuss the probable moral effect of her sprightly vicissitudes. The coloured miniature which forms the frontispiece is not nearly so natural or engaging as one that appeared in a previous book by Mrs. Glyn; it is too frankly, in appearance at any rate, a made-up thing, not a genuine portrait; and in that it resembles, to some extent, the book itself, which lacks something of spontaneity.

THE BOOKSHELF

The Problem of Personality. By JOSEPH NEWTON. (Hodder and Stoughton, 5s.)

It is some years now since Professor Seth struck a blow at the idealists and Hegelians with a little volume which questioned the persistence of consciousness. When the individual, the ego, returns to the eternal whence it came, does it remain conscious of its own existence, or is it entirely resolved into the One? "The Spirit of Man," by Dr. Arthur Chandler, now Bishop of Bloemfontein, was a notable contribution to the study of the question, and the hesitation of those idealists who reserve judgment on matters of the Christian faith has been considerably affected by the views of those who have found through Green and Hegel the road to the acceptance of the doctrines of revelation. Among the supporters of the belief in the persistence of consciousness may be reckoned the author of the book before us. His subject is the whole subject of the ego, its possession, its purpose, its persistence, and its perfection; and under that third head: "The saint," he says, "'loses' himself in God only the more intensely to realise himself. Absorption in God does not mean the extinction, but the extension of this 'I.'" His book will hit the taste and help to resolve the doubts of many whom we might perhaps describe as amateur philosophers. It is the work of a well-read and thoughtful man.

South Africa. A Glance at Current Conditions and Politics. By J. H. BALFOUR BROWNE, K.C. (Longmans, 7s. 6d. net.)

Although Mr. Browne modestly styles his book "jottings" and "a glance at current conditions" he admits that he had, while in the Colonies, "exceptional opportunities of seeing the life of some of them, and of making myself acquainted with Colonial opinion." His opportunities must indeed have been extraordinarily exceptional, for from internal evidence he only set sail from Southampton on or about October 5 of last year, and within five months we have here a two-hundred-page volume of impressions, views, opinions, deductions, and half-baked facts, which can only be characterised as superficial and misleading when they are not absolutely inaccurate. Many of the Dutch names are wrongly and ignorantly spelt; much of the information is inaccurate. Vierfontein, for instance, does not mean "four streams," but "four springs"; there is no such place as "Rooicop" in all South Africa; a "pacht" is not a pact, although it looks like it; and lawn-tennis is not played upon "courts made of live ant-heaps." It would be easy to multiply instances of these silly mistakes, but it is unnecessary. Mr. Balfour Browne, doubtless with the best intentions in the world, spent a very few weeks in South Africa, was whirled from Cape Town to Johannesburg and back again, was told many strange things, which he believed implicitly, was the acute observer of many other things, which he misunderstood, and has committed to paper a vast amount of untrustworthy information. All of which is a pity, because it can do our new colonies no good to be misrepresented. Perhaps the best summary of this somewhat arrogantly entitled work would be a "Padgett-book."

The Problem of the Immigrant. By JAMES DAVENPORT WHEPLEY. (Chapman and Hall, 10s. 6d. net.)

"The positive and ever-present evils of unrestricted immigration," writes Mr. Whelpley, "have been so borne in upon the wage-earners of Great Britain, that no 'interest' [Mr. Whelpley means commercial and transportation interests] can long render futile the demand of the native population that some barrier be erected, not only against the insanitary alien, but the competitive alien as well." The vast difference of opinion as to the advisability of erecting such a barrier and as to the form it should take is not likely to be decreased until the question has been studied in a more scientific and less prejudiced or party spirit than has at present been the case. Such a spirit Mr. Whelpley's book should tend strongly to induce. He has studied with great care and thoroughness the emigration and immigration conditions in thirteen countries in Europe, besides Great Britain, her Colonies, and the United States, and has presented the results of his researches in a volume which, though it does not pretend to cover the whole field, lays a foundation on which all future workers will be compelled to build. Undoubtedly this matter of immigration is shortly to become the burning question for politicians and sociologists, all of whom are likely to be either partial in deduction and ill-informed in fact unless they either already have Mr. Whelpley's knowledge or keep his book at their elbows. The book is not a technical law-book, but in each case the character of the legislation is clearly indicated, and its main points stated.

Twenty Years Ago. By EDMUND DOWNEY. (Hurst & Blackett, 6s. net.)

Mr. Downey's collection of anecdotes and reminiscences is interesting chiefly for the light it throws on the change that has come over the world of authorship, publishing and journalism, in the last thirty years. In 1879 he entered the publishing house of Tinsley Brothers. "At that time," he writes, "literary Bohemianism was decadent. . . . The banquets were fast becoming Barmecidal feasts." And yet Mr. Downey's book seems at a first reading to be full of talk of the taverns, bars, and other regions of Bohemia. The general effect of it is to lift the veil. Naturally enough, his stories are more concerned with the business side of literature than the artistic. We read of the sums paid, the bargains struck, the speculations, gains and losses. Some there may be who like facts of this kind; for ourselves, we are still romantic and young enough to shudder a little at the thought that there is a business side to these things at all. That Mr. Hardy got "five-and-twenty down" for "Under the Greenwood Tree," which was "got out in two volumes"; or that there was "no great money" in "A Pair of Blue Eyes," are things one would rather not have known; while the phrase: "Wouldn't you think that was good enough to knock 'em?" applied to "Rhoda Fleming," seems little short of sacrilege. Still, there are amusing stories in the book, and it will be of some little value to the compiler of obituary notices.

THE DRAMA

THE ORESTEAN TRILOGY ("AGAMEMNON"—
"LIBATION-BEARERS"—"FURIES") AT THE CORONET THEATRE

IN 1880 Mr. F. R. Benson played Clytemnestra in the Agamemnon of Æschylus in Greek, in the hall of Balliol College, Oxford, and ever since, it appears, he has desired to play the whole trilogy in English. When an actor, a professional histrion, is anxious to produce a play, it is not, as a rule, on account of the teaching it involves, the loftiness of its philosophy, the profundity of its comment on life; it is because he sees in it something "actable," something that will ensure its touching the emotions or the visible faculties of the bulk of the average public of his day. At Stratford-on-Avon in the spring, and now again at the Coronet Theatre, Mr. Benson has fulfilled his ambition, and from all accounts he has every reason to be satisfied with the success of an experiment which does him great honour.

Æschylus has the reputation, and not without deserving it, of being difficult. Those who read him at school will remember him best as the author of certain stupendously bombastic lines (ἐφεψαλώθη κάεζεβροντήθη σθένος is the stock instance) and certain most abstruse speculations on philosophy and religion. That he was the author of fine acting plays will probably never have occurred to any but those who have studied him for themselves after leaving school. The explanation is simple. The choruses are the most difficult parts of a Greek play. The speeches of the characters and the dialogue are comparatively easy; they deal with the matter in hand, or that which led up to it; a knowledge of history or legend explains them sufficiently. The choruses are the vehicle for the speculations, the comments, the philosophy of the author. They take the place, in that respect, of the soliloquies in Shakespeare, and especially in Hamlet. Their language and their thoughts are both difficult; and therefore it is but natural that students of Greek language and thought should have their attention specially directed to them, until the "beastly chorus" becomes the schoolboy's bugbear. And of all choruses, the choruses in Æschylus are the most difficult. Thought, in his day, had only begun to struggle free of the traditions of early religion, and in its struggles had to make use of a language less perfectly developed than that which Thucydides found insufficient for his needs. And the thought of Æschylus is not easily expressed, even in the most complete and perfected language. In his famous trilogy he took the ideas of crime and punishment; of a family curse brought on by sin—heredity, we should call it now—and the possibility of lifting it by atonement; of retributive justice and the claims of equity, of that which is juster than justice itself. He asked of the nature of the gods and their relation to human error; of human pride and its relation to the jealousy of the gods; of fate, and what fate was, and how it stood as regards the moral law. The stage in his day was pulpit and lecture-room and Press; he addressed, for the most part, a leisured and cultivated audience, to whom such questions were as full of interest as theology to a Byzantine or a Scot; and what he meant, what exactly is the interpretation to be placed on his utterances, is still a matter of debate among philosophers and scholars.

Such a playwright, it would seem, could have had little chance of interesting a modern audience. And yet Mr. Benson was right. For Æschylus, besides being a philosopher and politician, was the first of the playwrights. That would be clear if not a line of his writings survived, since we know from Aristotle that he added a second to the one actor who, with the chorus, had previously formed the whole of the "cast." He created, in fact, dialogue, which is as much as to say that he created the drama; and this trilogy, the one complete surviving instance of the drama he created, remains to this day a living thing—a monument of early speculation on questions that are still unsettled, but at the same time a story of human suffering and sin and love and despair that still has power to touch the heart of the ordinary observer.

And that it does, it is needless to say, through the characters of the play; Clytemnestra, the woman of passionate love and passionate jealousy, whose only daughter has been killed that the fleet may sail to Troy, and whose husband, the great Agamemnon, returns after ten years absence with Cassandra, a beautiful slave, only less beautiful than Helen herself, as part of his spoils; Ægisthus, Clytemnestra's paramour, who has consoled her during Agamemnon's absence, and holds the rule by force after Clytemnestra, with a strange and womanish mixture of daring and caution, has snared her husband in his bath in a net and murdered him with an axe; Orestes, her son and Agamemnon's, her slayer at the god's behest,

"The boy
With his white breast and brow, and clustering curls,
Streaked with his mother's blood, and striving hard
To tell his story ere his reason goes;"

for when the deed is done madness must fall on him and the Furies hunt him from place to place; Electra, his sweet and gentle sister, bearing her load of grief and horror in patience until Orestes shall return and free the land. All these, when you see them before you in flesh and blood, are no far-off archaic survivals, but men and women who, for all their difference from ourselves, are still human like ourselves. To-day we do not murder an unwelcome husband—we seek the Divorce Court; a jealous god no longer touches our lips with his tongue that in the agony of prophecy we may see with clear eyes the doom that awaits us; we are not hunted by visible gorgon shapes,

"Dusky their robes and all their hair enwound—
Snakes coiled with snakes—

Black blood of hatred dripping from their eyes!"

but madness falls like a stroke from heaven, and remorse has not lost its terrors.

Regrets are unavailing. Literature and the drama have the laws of their development which they must follow, laws that are too intimately dependent on the life of the times to be alterable at will. The aim of criticism must be to help them forward to their best on the lines of those laws. But it is impossible not to regret that our modern drama has so little room for the larger aim of fine tragedy. In the eighteenth century the fashion for tragedy led to its abuse. They wore it out, concocted it from any materials, so they were strange enough and far enough from the life of the day, and turned it into vacuous bombast. Since then we have had none. Our more complicated and faceted life needs, no doubt, a different expression, and the best of modern plays offer attractions—subtlety of characterisation, realism, complexity of idea and development—which no tragedy, old or new, can provide. But every day the number of minds who find even our English tragedies, Hamlet, King Lear, or Othello, uninteresting or meaningless, is on the increase; and after seeing this great trilogy of Æschylus, this simple stupendous story of crime and retribution and expiation, great passions and great sufferings, one feels that, for all the obvious differences between ourselves and these ancient Greeks, between the actors as we see them and the characters as they were, fine tragedy has still something to offer which is missing from all modern plays. The tragedy of our own days has yet to be invented; meanwhile it is good to be "purged by the pity and terror" of the tragedy of days gone by.

Mr. Benson's production was worthy of all praise. It cannot be pretended that the acting was in any sense great—except, perhaps, that of Miss Gertrude Scott as Cassandra—but it was all, as usual, adequate. Mr. Benson's Orestes suffered from Mr. Benson's well-known faults, but was still a winning figure, while Mrs. Benson achieved no little tragic dignity as Clytemnestra. Miss Mabel Moore was delightful as Electra, and Mr. Cyril Keightley and Miss Roxy Barton made a very handsome Apollo and Athena. An augmented chorus sang incidental music by Mr. Christopher Wilson, and the staging showed care and excellent taste.

"ELGA." A NOCTURNE BY GERHART HAUPTMANN

In his new play Hauptmann has broken fresh ground, which, it must be confessed, lies on a level somewhat lower than that of his best plays. The dramatist of suffering humanity has in Elga come down from his tragic heights and satisfied himself by giving an able if slightly hackneyed version of the old story of the injured husband. The gulf, in fact, between Elga and the bulk of Hauptmann's dramas is so wide that some explanation is necessary of the circumstances under which it was written. In the beginning of 1896 Hauptmann's historical drama, Florian Geyer, was produced at the Deutscher Theater in Berlin, and proved one of the most signal failures that the German stage had known for some years past. In the February of the same year Elga was casually dashed off in three days. The inference would seem to be that with the failure of his other plays still ranking in his mind, the dramatist cynically resolved to come down to the level of the public, and to give them, if not pure melodrama, at any rate, a play slightly tinged with that melodrama which he knew would be appreciated. On the same principle, though with somewhat different success, Mr. Pinero, stung by the public's failure to appreciate the psychological studies of Letty and Iris, gave them A Wife Without a Smile, which was obviously intended to be a case of "mud before swine." Hauptmann, however, did not even trouble to invent a new plot, and contented himself with adapting Grillparzer's tale of "The Kloster of Sendomir." In this tale Starschenski, a Polish count, marries a wife who though of noble birth has been reduced to the utmost destitution. Not content, however, with rescuing her from beggary, he succeeds in procuring the rescinding of the exile of her father and brothers, and cripples his estate in his efforts to reinstate her family. His whole life is concentrated on his wife, and for some years he enjoys an ideal happiness. He then finds that he has been deceived throughout, and in a fit of passion kills his wife. In his subsequent remorse he founds a monastery, into which he retires, and Grillparzer's tale consists in the narration by the count himself of his own story to a few travellers who are spending the night within the monastic walls. Hauptmann has on the whole kept close to the original, but what few changes he has made are for the most part unhappy. That the form of the play should be recast into the form of a dream seen by the traveller, who was spending the night within the monastery, was obviously necessitated by dramatic exigencies; but there is small excuse for Hauptmann's cavalier treatment of some of the most powerful passages in Grillparzer's story. The scene for instance in which the husband becomes aware of his wife's infidelity through the likeness which her child bears to a likeness of her cousin and lover is far too hurriedly passed over. The great climax, moreover, of the original tale, where the husband offers to spare his wife's life if she will kill her child, in order to convince himself yet further of her baseness is omitted in toto in the drama. And while in Grillparzer's story the husband kills his wife when he discovers her falsehood, after the manner of the true Polish nobleman of the period, in Hauptmann's play he contents himself with killing his rival. This is to reduce to a minimum the genuine force of the original and is inferior both psychologically and dramatically. By way of compensation, however, Hauptmann gives us two new scenes of indisputable power. The first is a triangular conversation between the wife, lover, and husband, in which the latter revelling sardonically in the false position of the guilty couple, gradually discloses his knowledge of their infidelity. In the second the count takes his wife into a secret room wherein, concealed behind curtains, lies the dead body of his rival. The wife is ignorant of what has happened and a splendid touch of irony is imparted when the count's retainer grimly lights the candles so as to give the mistress a better view of the body of the lover.

In Elga Hauptmann has attempted nothing either great or phenomenal, but has contented himself with the production of a vivid and vigorous dramatic episode. As such the play well merited its signal success, to which, however, the extraordinary brilliance of the principal actors largely contributed. Fräulein Irene Treitsch rendered admirably the rôle of the fascinating and coquettish wife, while Herr Rittner was superb and dignified in the usually invidious part of the injured husband.

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS

OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti,
Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from FREDK. HULLYER, 8 Pem'roke Square, London, W.

Illustrated Catalogues 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

FINE ART

GEORGE MORLAND

The Life of George Morland. By GEORGE DAWE, R.A. With an Introduction and Notes by J. J. Foster. Illustrated by plates from examples in the National and Private Galleries. (London: Dickinsons [3 guineas and 10 guineas] 1904.)

THE centenary of the death of George Morland, which took place on October 29, 1804, has been celebrated by three events of importance to all who love him and are interested in his life and in his works. The first of these was the exhibition held in the spring of last year at the South Kensington Museum of more than a hundred oil paintings by, or attributed to, the prolific artist. The second was the capital biography by Dr. G. C. Williamson, with whom Mr. Ralph Richardson (the compiler of the well-known catalogue raisonné of Morland's works) joined forces. And the third is the issue of the beautiful volume before us, on which the arts of the painter have been spent to good effect.

This book is a reprint of the last of the four biographical studies published after the artist's death, and is by a good deal the best of them all. It appeared in 1807, and was written by George Dawe, Morland's trusted friend, although eighteen years his junior—that is to say, two years before Dawe was admitted an Associate of the Royal Academy, and when he was only twenty-six years of age. This "Life" has always been accepted as the work of Dawe, but it is difficult to believe that so young a man could have written a book so full of knowledge of the world and of experience, even allowing that he had the native gift of style and of the sober judgment of character here depicted. And he could tell his story with spirit too, with a lurking sympathy for Morland's escapades, for all that he appears as a witness of truth, and as stern and even didactic a moralist as becomes an eighteenth-century biographer.

Mr. Foster is right, then, in re-echoing the claims of this biography, and we may be grateful for the reprint; but we could wish that the editor had extended his own introduction and made it more worthy of Dawe's memoir, at the same time rendering the arrangement more useful to the reader. He states in the text, quite correctly, that "the 'Red Lion,' Paddington," is by James Ward, R.A., but in the list of illustrations (which fails to give the pages where the plates may be found) he says that it is by William Ward, thus confusing the painter with the elder brother, the engraver. He disagrees with Dawe's estimate of Morland, that "he did not understand the effect of contrast, either in colour or chiaroscuro," and points to The Inside of a Stable in the National Gallery as a refutation. But it is just this picture, and a very few others, like Sir Samuel Montagu's little masterpiece, The Post-boy's Return—formerly known as The Leather Breeches—that bring into relief by contrast the monotony of tone and colour that so commonly detracts from the effect and beauty of Morland's work. Dawe's criticism is perfectly sound, and the words in which the artist concludes his biography of his friend are to be recognised as true to-day as they were when they were written.

The position of Morland in the art of England, nevertheless, has never been in doubt for an instant, because the artist gave the public what the good taste of the public desired, and imparted to nearly everything he touched a beauty and grace that were always virile and always charming. His faults sprang from the same fountain as his merits—he was a genius. His fatal facility destroyed him in the end as an artist, as his genius's waywardness destroyed him as a man. He was endowed with amazing power of observation as a child, and the severity of his father's training of him practised his hand as the obedient servant of his eye. His precocity was remarkable. Dawe states that "at the age of ten, he exhibited, at the academy, some chalk drawings, tinted with crayon, which possessed considerable merit." Now this "academy," as a matter of fact, was no other than the Royal Academy, and the drawings, catalogued "No. 357. Sketches by Master George Moreland," were admitted that year among the "Honorary" contributions of other amateurs, such as Dr. Wall of Worcester, Captain Francis Grosse, and the admirable and ever delightful draughtsman and caricaturist, William Henry Bunbury. Then four years later he was bound apprentice to his father for a period of seven years; afterwards he became a student of the Royal Academy, acquired a taste for dram-drinking, and started on the inglorious, sordid, miserable life, illumined by a lurid sort of enjoyment, that has been made the text of a thousand futile sermons. What were his orgies concerns us little now; his faults—which perhaps were not so much vices as appetites—never appear on his canvases, save in the form of carelessness and haste. Instead, we find much of that goodness of heart which fill his pictures with healthy sweetness, whether in his pictures of domestic life, of children's happy occupation, of the sportsman's country life, and the joy of the open air. Look at his pictures by class of subject and see how the wholesome energy of the man dominates his own mortal weakness. His early visit to Margate, to Mrs. Hill, like his later sojourn in the Isle of Wight, filled him with the love of the sea, and the salt spray seems to impregnate the wind that flies across his canvases. So he paints us wrecks and wreckers by the dozen, for he had seen such scenes; and fishermen landing and sea-shore pictures—all apparently planned in their design, more or less by recipe. It was the recipe that many of the painters of the day adopted—notably De Louthembourg. How well we all recognise the familiar scene! the break in the rocks or cliffs, looking out to sea, where the great waves are rolling and bursting in, and where the ship lies labouring dangerously close in shore—a cable's length, maybe—or where, forcing her timbers and breaking her back, a group of sturdy sailors are dragging valiantly at a rope that connects her to the shore.

From these we glance at the tender domestic pieces wherein Morland, painting his pretty wife and sisters, proves a charming sense of female beauty, closely allied to that of Wheatley and of Rowlandson. Highly moral pictures these, with the lovely and even touching compositions of children at play—boat-sailing, fishing, bird's-nesting, and the like. For Morland had the knack of painting anecdote so well that the triviality of it is lost in the charm of its presentation. Turn, then, to his long series of stable pictures. Who would believe that these were the outcome of his hobnobbing with post-boys and ostlers, and taking potmen and labourers for his boon companions? His finest pictures of this class have rarely been surpassed; and it was his stable-yards and farm-yards, perhaps, that inspired Campbell's immortal lines on the triumphant artistic rendering of unsavoury realities. He paints the interiors and exterior of inns as though he loved them, as of course he did, and gipsies in their encampments he renders in a fraternal spirit—for did he not live and "pig it" with them? Yet he would turn from the portrait of a hog to another of his wife, or Mrs. Jordan, or himself, with ease and imperturbability, and the better draughtsmanship he would lavish on the latter was due rather to necessity than to any enhancement of interest. Not that he was a poor animal painter. Few have been more convincing when he chose to be. But, although he would always paint from nature when he could, he had no time to be careful, such was his pressing need of money throughout his life. Horses and dogs, cattle and pigs, were his constant subjects; yet he preferred the picturesque varieties—the shaggy and the old, that would come well in a picture, lying in the grass, or half hidden in shadow. At the same time he loved sport for its own sake; he had seen much of it in Leicestershire and elsewhere, and a poacher appealed to him in the countryside much as a smuggler did in the sandy cove. The Death of the Fox, Breaking Cover, Hunting Scene, Setters, Pheasant Shooting, Partridge Shooting, he painted them all, and his heart was in them. Londoner as he was, Morland loved country life, and the country was the setting of the vast majority of his pictures. It was not landscape that appealed to him so much as bits of the country; a broad landscape he was incapable of coping with, and in a contest he would have made a poor show beside Old Crome, Constable, or Gainsborough, for technical reasons which there is not space here to argue. To the last-named painter he owed much, for his example showed Morland how to break away from the tight finicky rendering of a tree which he had learned from the Dutch masters he had studied, and how to develop a loose handling. Yet his trees are not often entirely satisfactory; they are frequently too perfunctory. His boughs are usually so very jerky, and his leaves so conventionally like saucers seen on edge—as he himself said, "like silver pennies." Often, as Dawe points out, they are more like cabbage-leaves. In trees, such as the oak, it is not so much the elbow-angles as the straight pieces between which impress the eye when seen in nature; in Morland's pictures the reverse is the case; and all the while we are conscious of his touches, as if his landscapes were not painted but made up of mosaic. This is because he could not or would not "finish"—the fundamental reason why there is the sameness of tones and light in so many of his pictures of which Dawe complained, but which Mr. Foster somewhat unreasonably challenges. There is no need for special pleading here, for with all his conventionality (which no doubt passed for originality in his day) and with all his limitations, Morland charms us in his rural pieces; and his woodlands and his pastorals, seen though they are quite close, without much vista to stir our imagination, rarely fail in their appeal. Not less in his snow pieces, of which he painted many, does he prove his love of nature. Of these Mr. Foster shows us one, Sliding; eight of them were seen at South Kensington, painted when there was a run on this class of subject.

Morland, indeed, never lacked recognition. He was acclaimed almost from the beginning, and nowhere did he find more appreciation, at least for his domestic scenes and pictures of ladies and children, than in France. Never has he been, like so many of his day, the toy of public taste, and at the present day he is more firmly established than ever in public favour as one of the Great Little Masters of England.

SCIENCE

THE LIMITS OF HUMAN KNOWLEDGE

It has lately been asserted that science, as long centuries of psychological study have proved, can herself set limits to human knowledge. But before we look somewhat more closely at this statement, we must observe that it presupposes a certain theory as to the "external world." Two other theories, neither of which lacks energetic support, lead to another than this agnostic conclusion.

Of these, the oldest and simplest and meanest and most generally accepted, is what has been well called crude realism; and is more commonly known as materialism. This theory ignores the share of mind in the formation of our ideas, and accepts resistance and extension as the ultimate truth about a chair or a pebble. On this theory our knowledge, whilst doubtless incomplete, is nevertheless perfect as far as it goes; and its ultimate completeness of detail is merely a matter of time. Why should we hesitate to admit that Reality may be known, when we daily sit upon it, see it, and eat it?

This theory we may leave. Its rival, which resembles it only in leading to a gnostic and not an agnostic conclusion, is idealism; which claims the support of many of the noblest names in the history of thought—Plato, Berkeley, and many another. On this belief the ultimate reality is the Idea; and as it is assuredly ideas of which we have immediate and unqualified knowledge, Reality may be known to us, if we will but earnestly ensue it.

Modern science, however, guided by its most subtle and important study, which is that of mind, declares neither for Crude Realism nor for Idealism; but for what we may know as Transfigured Realism. This teaches that the external world does indeed exist, whether we be there to perceive it or no; but that our sense-knowledge of it is conditional and qualified by the nature of the sensory process. The most noble presentation of this theory is assuredly to be found—we need not now inquire into its author's own meaning—in that moving and memorable fable of Plato, who pictures a group of men doomed for ever to sit facing a blank wall, upon which are thrown the shadows of the Real, which moves behind them. Might such an one but turn his head for a moment and then resume his doom, could he, like his comrades, remain content with shadows? Not so; for to him has been granted a moment's vision of things not as they seem, but as they are.

So, according to science, we know but shadows or phenomena: the Noumenon (Plato), Reality-in-Itself (Kant) or Substance (Spinoza), being for ever hidden from us. A correspondent has lately remarked to me that Agnosticism is in need of sanitation and antiseptis: but I submit this conclusion, whether false or true, as at any rate reverent, modest, and decent.

But there arises a sublime question. Granted that most of us are for ever chained upon a bench which permits us but to gaze upon shadows, have there ever been, can there ever be moments during which the thrice-happy few may turn their heads—to use the Platonic image—and attain a clearer, a transcendental vision of the Transcendent? If, in truth, there be Mind underneath all, and if our minds be indeed fragments or sparks of the All-Sustaining Mind, may not it sometimes be granted to the pure in heart that "they shall see God?"

Let me put the question in the clear words of one of my readers:—

"You say that Reality is, strictly speaking, Unknowable, yet we can infer somewhat of its nature by the behaviour of its appearances! It seems to me that this should commend itself to everybody, so long as our ordinary faculties are relied on. But does this anxiety to escape beyond the limits of consciousness necessarily preclude our arriving at Reality? What of that higher consciousness which pantheists possess: that ardour, that feeling of association with Nature and the Universe, often tempered with a deep sense of Beauty, which we meet with in Wordsworth, Shelley, Richard Jefferies, Walt Whitman, and others? Does not this consciousness within the consciousness lead to Reality? Is it too much to say that Reality is limitedly known to the Pantheistic Mystic?"

Here, indeed, is a question to be approached bare-footed, lest we be on holy ground. If answered at all, it can be only after a serious study of Mysticism in all places and ages—some such study as Professor Seth's. Thereafter is answer to be made in general and comprehensive terms by any student? or must we make personal experience our guide? And if so, what shall those say who have no such experiences? Are they to explain away, or to accept, or to withhold judgment? Ere we continue, let us hear the case as put by Plotinus the Alexandrian. "The Finite, as Finite, can never know the Infinite, because it cannot be the Infinite. The faculty by which the mind divests itself of its personality is Ecstasy, in which, operated from individual consciousness, it contemplates Reality, becoming absorbed in the Infinite Intelligence from which it emanated." Thus Neo-Platonism.

Save once, when the Scherzo of the C Minor Symphony passed into the Finale, and the Heavens seemed opened, I have never had an ecstasy; and am therefore negligible. We must inquire of those who have had experience. One such, who has suffered greatly, writes to tell me of his case; but, alas, he speaks of his disillusionment "when reason returned." With infinite regret, and hope perhaps not quite extinguished, the student must declare that, as far as he can see, Ecstasy is not the Vision of the Soul. For we know ecstasy not merely as Wordsworth knew it,

"I have felt
A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts:—"

but also as a sad phenomenon of the asylum and the mind diseased. If the one be a veritable Vision, what of the other? If ecstasy be vision, what of agony? Here I leave what is too high for me.

But whatever be the true answer to these awful questions, there is more than mere negation for us to whom the moment of vision, if indeed it be such, has been denied. Though not illuminati or mystics, we may yet learn to know Reality, and surely some measure of knowledge may be attained by a study of scientific truth. At least Reality cannot be inconsistent with its appearances. The inter-relations of Phenomena, as we have already seen, lead us to the assured inference that the Noumenon is not many but One. We must not follow those whose laughter Solomon has described as the "crackling of thorns under a pot," and fancy that the term Unknowable excludes the possibility of all knowledge. To assert the existence of an Unknowable is to assert some knowledge of it. To find all its phenomena interrelated is to assert its Unity. To state the doctrine of the conservation of energy is to assert that though ultimately incomprehensible yet we may know It to be Eternal and Uncreated. To assert the existence of mind is surely to assert that there is an Intelligence at the heart of things. To make any assertion about it is to assert that it is Intelligible and therefore in intimate relation with our intelligences. If, then, we must apparently deny the Validity of the Vision of the Soul, can we continue to do so when the Vision of those who have so seen coincides with the exclusions reached by Reason? The Mystic and the Realist may agree that Reality is One, is Eternal, is Intelligent, is intelligible. May not conclusions reached by such different methods be regarded as valid?

Indeed there is a cloud of witnesses. For if the Mystic and the Realist can agree that Reality is one, so certainly will the Idealist; and he too will regard It as Uncreated and Eternal, though he may not go so far with the Athanasian Creed as to admit that It is Incomprehensible. It may surely then be maintained that, even if we question the evidence of Ecstasy, yet witness of so many orders may be accepted when it teaches that Reality, whether knowable or unknowable, is One: and intelligent, or endowed with something—to quote Spencer—"as much transcending intelligence and will as these transcend mechanical motion."

But reader and writer are each keenly aware of a conceivable attribute of which mention has not been made: and that is Benevolence. Here, indeed, the witnesses disagree. The majesty of the Athanasian Creed is disfigured by its denial of benevolence in the awful language of its later clauses. The idealist inclines to attribute benevolence to the Eternal: the scientific realist is inclined to the view that when we speak of benevolence we are in the chains of anthropomorphism. The mystics assure us that their ecstatic visions show them Love as the supreme attribute of the Supreme. Yet this question, on which the witnesses differ, is of more import to us, hearing each other groan than any on which they agree. Can we do more than "faintly trust the larger hope?"

C. W. SALEEBY.

MUSIC

BACH IN CHURCHES

IN 1788, Mozart chanced to pass through Leipzig and to hear in St. Thomas's Church a cantata by Bach. Whether he was led thither by respect for Bach, kindled by a knowledge of his instrumental works, is not known, but at any rate what he heard there was entirely new to him. He exclaimed in enthusiasm: "Heaven be praised, here is something new; from this something is to be learnt," and when the performance was over, he collected the parts together (no score was to be had) and spent hours in comparing them and forming a mental score from them. Bach is scarcely less new to us to-day than he was in 1788. Nobody, except a few scholars, knows all the Church cantatas, but it is not that that makes him ever new. The same may be said of the oratorios of Handel, or the symphonies of Mozart or Haydn, yet we, amongst the rank and file of music lovers, who know some half-dozen of Handel's great choral works and the greatest of Mozart's symphonies; if we pick up a score of some oratorio unknown to us, or by chance hear one of the less-known symphonies played, are not struck by the sense of newness; rather the impression is of the opposite kind, we enjoy it easily for its strong family likeness to that which we know; it is like meeting an old friend under fresh circumstances, rather than making a new acquaintance.

With Bach, however, the case is different; with each new instance of his genius we have fresh problems to encounter. The great freedom of his musical subjects and his extraordinary command of every contrapuntal device, led him naturally to express his ideas through a more complicated structure than that employed by any other great composer. This complexity has always stood in the way of his popularity, and continues to do so. It would be a serious weakness were it not the only means possible to his mind of expressing itself. The difficulties of the means are justified by the greatness of the end, which was to find an almost infinite variety of expression for a no less variety of ideas. So in each one of the Church Cantatas with which we make acquaintance we find a new character, an individuality of its own from which, as Mozart said, "something is to be learnt." No doubt Mozart was struck by the freedom of the counterpoint, the ingenuity of invention, and the great technical skill of Bach's music, but it is hardly likely that in the year in which he himself wrote the "Jupiter" Symphony he came to Bach merely for a lesson in counterpoint, or found something to be learnt which was worth the study of hours, in mere technical dexterity. We may, I think, be pretty sure that it was in the spirit of Bach, in the way in which all his complicated means combined to breathe forth this spirit, and not to glorify themselves, that Mozart found his lesson.

Very probably the performance Mozart heard was bad enough; judging from the accounts of the performances in Bach's own day, which was only some forty years before, one wonders that the music was able to make sufficient impression to be heard again. To a musician as cultivated as Mozart, this would not, of course, much matter; he would be able to discern the true Bach spirit striving for utterance beneath a prosaic, even a faulty rendering; but to the ordinary hearer the imperfections of performances have been, and still are a serious impediment to the real understanding of Bach and delight in him. The technical difficulties of performances necessarily take so much time to overcome that when such efficiency is achieved, singers and conductors alike forget that that is the moment at which interpretation, their real work, begins. True, the spirit is there, inherent in the music, and those who have ears to hear may hear, but the vast majority of people need help, and even those who are sufficiently educated to enjoy unaided, find it a cold task, and are painfully struck by the discrepancy between the soul of the music and the soulless regularity with which "leads" are attacked, and the mathematical accuracy of precision by which the chorus are held together.

This applies equally to performances in churches and concert-rooms, but the thought is suggested at the beginning of Lent, because we may shortly expect to hear of the usual round of performances of the two great "Passions" in our cathedrals and churches. Moreover, it seems that here, if nowhere else, church music has a chance which cannot be wrested from it by the music of the concert-room. The choral works of Bach stand as the one supreme monument of music which cannot be taken away from the church without corresponding loss. The masses of Palestrina share this quality with Bach's work, that they are indigenous to the soil, but with this difference, that the former are so purely ecclesiastical that no one could wish for them apart from the spiritual atmosphere of their natural surroundings, while in Bach the human element is so strong that men of all types feel they have their share in them and that their influence ought to be wider than that of any religious community. Still, that their natural home is in church all must admit, and for the most part it is left to church musicians to administer them. One would suppose too, that here would be a unique opportunity for a feeling and beautiful performance of Bach. Such choirs as attempt to sing the Passion Music are, or ought to be, small bodies of picked voices such as our cathedrals possess, so that the initial difficulties of technique and ensemble, which beset large choral bodies, are at once overcome. Yet it must be confessed that the majority of church performances of Bach are singularly lacking in the interpreting qualities which make the music able to appeal to the unlearned, for whom the performances are primarily intended. I say this, because I know of one single exception in a London church, where "Passion" services have been held for some years, and which has brought the contrast particularly home to me. At the church of which I am speaking the hearer is untroubled by the intricate intertwinings of the double chorus in the St. Matthew Passion; he is not led to wonder at the marvellous ingenuity of the counterpoint or to feel surprise at the skill of the singers, who keep together without a conductor. His intelligence is engaged on a higher level; he is in no danger of mistaking the means for the end, because unless he directs his attention by a conscious effort toward the means, he does not notice them. Nevertheless, the means all play their own part in building up the great impression which the work produces; moreover, it is no mere general impression of imposing choral effect, but a very definite, clear and simple one of genuine beauty of thought and expression, used to give vitality to the contemplation of the great subject.

This is, of course, only what one demands of any attempt to interpret great music. We could never be satisfied with any unimpassioned and merely correct performance of the Ninth Symphony or the "Emperor" Concerto. But with Bach, probably because of the difficulties of attainment and the presence of purely abstract beauties which musicians alone can enjoy, we have got into a habit of accepting a far lower standard, a state of things which deadens the perceptions of audience and performers alike. It is time to shake off conventional acceptances, to try to look at Bach's work as it really is, full of vitality and the most intimate human feeling, and to strive to express that, and bring that home to those whose perceptions are less acute than our own. We all have good reason to respect the heroic efforts of those who have inaugurated and maintained these annual services of Bach, often in the face of tremendous difficulties, and nothing could be further from my intention than to depreciate such efforts, however imperfect the result. It cannot but be helpful, though, to look at the example of Mozart, to imbue ourselves with his spirit of fresh enthusiasm, to come to our Bach, whether it be the well-known Passion Music or some hitherto unexplored region, with the conviction that here is something new, here is something to be learnt.

CORRESPONDENCE

Eastern Lodge, Brighton,
March 3, 1905.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY.

DEAR SIR,—An accident which prevented me reading, prevented me thanking you for the review in THE ACADEMY. I took counsel before inserting the letters you think I might have condensed—but I did not like to describe, as I should have to have done, as "cheerless, heartless, hopeless," the letter of the present Archbishop. It would have been thought libellous without the letter. In other cases the documents were proofs without which my statement would be open to question. But in the light of your suggestion I see that I might have made some abridgements with advantage. By which I am indebted, as well as for the review.—Very truly yours, G. J. HOLYOAKE.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ASTRONOMY.

Flammarion, Camille. Astronomy for Amateurs. Authorised Translation by Frances A. Welby. Unwin, 6s. (Illustrated. The copy sent us lacks the Introduction and Index which the Table of Contents promises.)

BIOGRAPHY.

- Dennis, John. Dr Johnson. Bell's Miniature Series of Great Writers. Bell, 1s. net.
- Johnson, Catharine B. William Bodham Donne and his Friends. Methuen, 10s. 6d. net. (See review, p. 233.)
- Scott, Eva. The King in Exile. The Wanderings of Charles II., from June 1646 to July 1654. Constable, 15s. net.
- Terry, Charles Sanford, Burnett-Fletcher Professor of History and Archaeology in the University of Aberdeen. John Graham of Claverhouse, Viscount of Dundee, 1648-1689. Constable, 12s. 6d. net. (See review, p. 228.)
- Harrison, Frederic. Chatham. Macmillan, 2s. 6d.
- Temperley, H. W. V., Fellow of Peterhouse, Cambridge, Lecturer in History in the University of Leeds. Life of Canning. Finch, 7s. 6d. net.
- In full and glad surrender. The story of the Life and Work of Martin J. Hall (C. M. S. Missionary in Uganda) by his sister. With a preface by the Rt. Rev. the Lord Bishop of Durham. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s. (Mr. Hall was drowned in August 1900, in Lake Victoria Nyanza, at the age of thirty-six, after a brief but ardent life of missionary work. The book consists largely of extracts from his journals, and is illustrated with a number of portraits and views.)
- Downey, Edmund, Twenty Years Ago, a book of anecdote illustrating literary life in London. Hurst & Blackett, 6s. net. (See review, p. 242.)

DRAMA.

Pinero, Arthur W. A Wife without a Smile, A Comedy in Disguise in three Acts. Heinemann, 1s. 6d.

EDUCATIONAL.

- Morris, William. The Story of the Glittering Plain, which has also been called the Land of Living Men or the Acre of the Undying. The Man born to be King. (From "The Earthly Paradise.") Longmans' Classics of English Literature. Longmans, 1s. 6d. net each.
- Chancellor, William Estabrook. American Schools, their administration and supervision. Heath, 7s. 6d. (A practical treatise on modern American educational polity from the point of view, not of the teacher, but of the manager or administrator, and dealing chiefly with the smaller schools and school systems.)
- Hakluyt's English Voyages. Selected and edited with Introduction, Notes and Glossary by E. E. Speight. With a Preface by Sir Clements R. Markham. Marshall, 2s. 6d. (With some spirited illustrations by R. Morton Nance.)
- The Carmelite Classics. Horace Marshall & Son. Milton's Samson Agonistes, edited by C. T. Onions, B.A., 6d. Macaulay's Lays of Ancient Rome, edited by N. L. Frazer, B.A., 6d. Coleridge's The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, edited by N. L. Frazer, B.A., 4d. Gray's Elegy written in a Country Churchyard, and other poems edited by N. L. Frazer, B.A., 4d. Goldsmith's The Traveller and R. L. Frazer, B.A., 4d. (Well printed little paper bound volumes for the use of students and teachers, with brief but sound notes, and questions on the text.)

FICTION.

- Barlow, Jane. By Beach and Bog-Land. Unwin, 5s. (The first story in this volume is one of the best Miss Barlow has ever written, and the whole collection is as good as her work invariably is.)
- Agnew, Gertrude. The Countess, a Summer Idyll. Gay & Bird, 2s. 6d.
- Fairless, Michael. The Grey Brethren, and other fragments in prose and verse. Duckworth, 2s. 6d. (A collection of papers and verses by the lady who wrote "The Road-mender," and died soon after its publication.)
- Blissett, Nellie K. The Silver Key. Chapman & Hall, 6s.
- Drummond, Hamilton. The King's Scapegoat. Ward, Lock & Co., 6s.
- Silberad, Una L. The Wedding of the Lady of Lovell and other matches of Tobias's Making. Constable, 6s.
- Norris, W. E. Barham of Beltana. Methuen, 6s. (See review, p. 240.)
- Wilson, Theodora Wilson. Langbarrow Hall. Harper, 6s.
- Le Queux, William. The Valley of the Shadow. Methuen, 6s.
- Ward, Mrs. Humphry. The Marriage of William Ashe. Smith, Elder and Co., 6s. (See review, p. 227.)
- Lee, Aubrey. A Gentleman's Wife. George A. Morton, 6s.
- Gerard, Morice. The Adventures of an Equerry. Cassell, 6s.
- St. Aubyn, Allen. A Coronation Necklace. White, 6s.
- Nisbet, Hume. A Colonial King. White, 6s.
- Birmingham, George A. The Seething Pot. Arnold, 6s.
- Glyn, Elinor. The Vicissitudes of Evangeline. Duckworth, 6s. (See review, p. 241.)

HISTORY.

- Durham, M. Edith. The Burden of the Balkans. Arnold, 14s. net. (The troubles in the Balkan Peninsula, says Miss Durham, "are largely of racial, not religious origin." Her aim is to give the general reader a somewhat truer idea of the position of affairs than he usually possesses, and incidentally to persuade him that money subscribed for the Balkans is not money given to the cause of Christianity.)
- Walker, T. J. The Local Examination History of England. Edited by George Carter. Relfe, 2s.

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Tebbs, Louisa A. The New Lace Embroidery. Punto Tagliato. Chapman and Hall, 2s. 6d. net. (A practical handbook to the embroidery invented by Miss Tebbs; fully illustrated.)
- Burford, A. W., A.M.I.C.E. Building a Lathe. Dawbarn and Ward, 6d. net. (No. 9 of the Home Worker's Series of Practical Handbooks, edited by H. Snowden Ward. Illustrated.)

PHILOSOPHY.

- Swift, Morrison I. Human Submission. Part Second. Philadelphia: The Liberty Press, 25 cents. (Part I, "Our Servile Religion," has not yet been published. Part III. is to deal with "The Confiscation of Wealth.")

PSYCHOLOGICAL.

- Münsterberg, Hugo, Professor of Psychology at Harvard University. The Americans. Translated by Edwin B. Holt, Ph.D., Instructor at Harvard University. Williams and Norgate, 12s. 6d. net. (A translation for Americans of a volume originally written for Germans. Its subject is "The Philosophy of Americanism"—a study of the American man and his inner tendencies.)

REPORT.

- The Carnegie Trust for the Universities of Scotland. Fourth annual report.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- Becke, Louis. The Jalasco Brig. Compton, Herbert. A Free Lance in a Far Land. Treherne's Shilling Novels. Treherne, 1s. each.
- Holmes, Oliver Wendell. The Poet at the Breakfast Table. Dent, Temple Classics.
- Careless, John. The Old English Squire. Methuen, 3s. 6d. net. (Illustrated Pocket Library of Plain and Coloured Books.)
- Elphinstone, The Hon Mountstuart. The History of India. The Hindu and Mahometan Periods, with notes and additions by E. B. Cowell, M.A. Ninth Edition. Murray, 15s. net. (This edition has been revised, and the list of qualities in the chapter on Philosophy has, for the first time, been completed.)
- Juliana, edited by William Strunk, junior, Ph.D., Assistant Professor of the English Language and Literature in Cornell University. Evangelium Secundum Johannem. The Gospel of Saint John, in West-Saxon, edited from the Manuscripts, with Introduction and Notes by James Wilson Bright, Ph.D., Professor of English Philology in the John Hopkins University, with a Glossary by Lancelot Minar Harris, Professor of English in the College of Charleston. Evangelium Secundum Mattheum. The Gospel of Saint Matthew in West-Saxon, edited from the Manuscripts by James Wilson Bright. Browning, Robert. A Blot in the 'Scutcheon, Colombe's Birthday, A Soul's Tragedy and In a Balcony, edited by Arlo Bates, Professor of English Literature in the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. Webster, John. The White Devil and the Duchess of Malfy, edited by Martin W. Sampson. Boston and London: D. C. Heath and Co. (The above are all parts of "The Belles Lettres Series.")
- Gardner, Edmund G. Dante's Ten Heavens. A Study of the Paradiso Second Edition. Constable, 5s. net.

SCIENCE.

- Joly, Charles Jasper. A Manual of Quaternions. Macmillan, 10s. (A mathematician whose time is limited is frightened, says Professor Joly, at the magnitude of Sir William Rowan Hamilton's "Elements of Quaternions." The aim of this book is to guide the student by the shortest and simplest route to a working knowledge of the calculus.)

SPORT.

- "Cut-Cavendish." The complete Bridge Player. Werner Laurie, 2s. 6d. net. ("Cut-Cavendish" is an authority on his subject, but his book would have been the better for illustration.)

THEOLOGY.

- Collett, Rev. Edward. Narrow Windows, or Little Glimpses of Heavenly Light. A Lenten Day-Book. Brown, Langham, 1s. 6d.
- Pfeiderer, Otto. The Early Christian Conception of Christ. Its Significance and Value in the History of Religion. Williams and Norgate (Crown Theological Library), 3s. 6d. (Expanded from a lecture delivered by Professor Pfeiderer before the International Theological Congress at Amsterdam in 1903. His object is to study the primitive conception of Christ in the light of the history of comparative religion, not simply in "the isolation of Christian tradition," nor in the phrases of the New Testament idea of Christ, which are acceptable to the thought of to-day, and used exclusively by, for instance, Renan and Harnack.)
- Dargan, Edwin Charles, D.D., LL.D. A History of Preaching. From the Apostolic Fathers to the great Reformers A.D. 70-1572. Hodder and Stoughton, 7s. 6d. (Written and printed in America. Dr. Dargan is Professor of Homiletics in the Baptist Theological Seminary, Louisville. There will be two more volumes, dealing with modern European Preaching, and with the history of Preaching in the United States.)
- Newton, Joseph. The Problem of Personality. Hodder and Stoughton, 5s. (See review, p. 242.)

TRAVEL.

- D'Humières, Vicomte Robert. Through Isle and Empire. Translated by Alexander Teixeira de Mattos, with a prefatory letter by Rudyard Kipling. Heinemann, 6s.
- Fairbanks, Harold Wellman, Ph.D. The Western Wonderland. Half-hours in the United States. Heath, 5s. (Dr. Fairbanks describes a number of prominent scenic features of the United States, with special reference to their geological and climatic history. His book is well and lavishly illustrated.)

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

MESSRS. METHUEN have just published a book of the greatest charm and the most poignant interest:—

DE PROFUNDIS. By OSCAR WILDE. Third Edition. Crown 8vo. 5s. net.

"From such a work as Oscar Wilde's 'De Profundis' the literary critic stands aside. It is a human document of the most tragic and poignant kind or it is nothing. Poets, novelists, and dramatists have tried to imagine for us what a man feels as he stands on the scaffold, or as he drinks to the dregs the cup of humiliation and suffering which his own sins or human justice have prepared for him. And we judge whether they have done well or ill according as they realise what our own imagination suggests to us and express it in language which appeals to our literary sense. In this case no such question arises. Here is a man reporting of himself in the actual case, writing from his prison cell, not with the halo of martyrdom about him, as Condorcet on the night before his execution, but in the depths of a squalid catastrophe which seems to have no redeeming feature. It is useless to argue whether he ought to have said this or that, or whether he has said it well or ill, we have simply the fact that he felt thus and wrote thus under the stress of an overwhelming experience and that, given the circumstances, this is the result. . . . The words are strange and rather jarring, but no man can read far without feeling them to be sincere. Thus, and only thus, could he think about himself and about life. . . . There is nothing which rings truer in this book than the profound self-abasement with which he looks back upon this life of pleasure with its emptiness, its artificiality, its detachment from all the realities of life. . . . There is nothing profoundly touching in the pages in which he tells us he will cast out bitterness and rebellion, realise his whole experience, refuse to be ashamed of his penalty, and start on his 'new life' a new man with a deeper and more serious character."—Westminster Gazette.

MINIATURES. By DUDLEY HEATH. With 9 Plates in Colour, 15 in Collotype, and 15 in Photogravure. Wide royal 8vo, 25s. net.

This book is a history of the Art of Miniature Painting from its earliest origin and development in the Illuminated Manuscript under Byzantine, Carolingian, Celtic, and Saxon influences, and in the French, Flemish and Italian Schools of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, showing the growth of realistic expression in the Miniature, and tracing its subsequent history as an independent art of portraiture "in little" down to the present day.

GREAT ZIMBABWE. By R. N. HALL, part Author of "The Ancient Ruins of Rhodesia." With numerous Plans and Illustrations, royal 8vo, 21s. net.ENGLAND UNDER THE STUARTS. By G. M. TREVELYAN, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, Author of "The Age of Wyclif." With Maps and Plans. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This is the fifth volume, though the first published, of the six volumes of a new HISTORY OF ENGLAND (edited by Prof. C. W. OMAN), from the earliest times down to the year 1815.

WILLIAM BODHAM DONNE AND HIS FRIENDS. Edited by Mrs. BARHAM JOHNSON. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

W. B. Donne, cousin of the poet Cowper, was a man of letters; successively Librarian at the London Library, and Licensor of Plays; better known as the intimate friend of Edward FitzGerald, Mrs. Kemble, John Mitchell Kemble, &c., letters from whom are included in this correspondence; besides others written to Archbishop Trench, Dean Blakesley, &c.

SHRINES OF BRITISH SAINTS. By J. C. WALL. With numerous Illustrations and Plans, demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.OLD GORGON GRAHAM. Crown 8vo, 6s.

This is a pendant to Mr. Lorimer's "Letters from a Self-Made Merchant," a book which has had, both here and in America, an almost unprecedented success. In this book the father tells the story of his own rise with the same inimitable wit and racy wisdom. "Precisely the same robust and racy humour as the author's previous book. It makes excellent reading."—Scotsman.

"Lovers of homely humour and shrewd common sense will be delighted."—Morning Post.

A MODERN CAMPAIGN: or War and Wireless Telegraphy in the Far East. By DAVID FRASER, the Times special correspondent. Illustrated, crown 8vo, 6s.

"An interesting book."—Athenaeum.

SICILY. By DOUGLAS SLADEN. With 334 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

"It is absolutely encyclopaedic in its range. There is nothing in, around, or about the island of which the author does not touch."—Daily Telegraph.

JEREMY BENTHAM. By C. M. ATKINSON. Demy 8vo, 6s.THE OLD ENGLISH SQUIRE: a Poem. By JOHN CARELESS, Esq. With 20 Coloured Plates after the style of T. Rowlandson. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. 6d. net.

[The Illustrated Pocket Library]

ANECDOTES OF SOLDIERS. Edited by J. H. SETTLE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

This book contains over 1500 stories of soldiers in peace and war. "An inspiring collection of battle incidents, heroic and inspiring."—Daily Express.

LIFE'S QUESTIONINGS. By W. R. PATTERSON. (Benjamin Swift.) Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

This Edition is limited to 750 copies, and will not be reprinted. The form of the book is unusual, at least in English literature. It is a criticism of life done in the manner of the French epigrammatists.

A HISTORY OF RUSSIA FROM PETER THE GREAT TO ALEXANDER II. By W. R. MORFILL, Oriel College, Oxford. With maps and plans. A cheaper edition, crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL. By A. M. SCOTT. With Portraits and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"Mr. Scott has chosen his hero well, and Mr. Churchill is happy in his biographer."—Daily Mail.

A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM. By WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE. Edited by H. CUNNINGHAM. Demy 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

"Both in the correction and in the interpretation of the text something has been done to place this handsome and well-printed edition in advance of what has preceded it."—Scotsman.

THE GOLDEN POMP. A Procession of English Lyrics. Arranged by A. T. QUILLER-COUCH. Second and cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

[Half-crown Library]

MILLET. By Miss N. PEACOCK. With 30 Illustrations. Demy 16mo, 2s. 6d. net.

[Little Books on Art.]

TIMON OF ATHENS.—TROILUS AND CRESSIDA. By WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE. Edited, with Introduction and Notes by W. J. CRAIG. Pott 16mo, leather, 1s net each.

[Little Quarto Shakespeare]

ENGLAND'S RUIN. Discussed in Sixteen Letters to the Right Honourable Joseph Chamberlain, M.P. By A. M. S. METHUEN. Crown 8vo, 3d net.

Kindly write to Messrs. Methuen for particulars of their Two New Series, "METHUEN'S HALF-CROWN LIBRARY" and "METHUEN'S SHILLING NOVELS."

METHUEN & CO., 36 Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

NEW NOVELS

THE GOLDEN BOWL. By HENRY JAMES. Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Nothing more exquisitely and pathetically beautiful than the character of Maggie, the heroically patient, persistent, developed little wife and daughter, is to be found in the gallery of modern fiction."—Standard.

"It is impressively clever. The mind out of which this work is spun is of astonishing capacity and insight."—Daily Mail.

"To give any idea of the infinite subtlety and delicacy with which the author narrates his story is beyond the strength of mortal reviewer."—Daily Chronicle.

"The novel is masterly. The three leading women are differentiated with the nicest skill; each is living and persuasive."—Academy.

FOURTH EDITION IN THE PRESS

THE SECRET WOMAN. By EDEN PHILLPOTTS. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"'The Secret Woman' is beyond all question one of the greatest novels in literature. It is a masterpiece. It sets Mr. Phillpotts among the immortals. By virtue of this superb achievement he enters the company of the masters. He is the fellow of Fielding and Scott, Dickens and Thackeray, Meredith and Hardy, Turgeniev and Tolstoi. . . . I have said nothing of the noble prose in which this great novel is written. I have said nothing of the great vitality of the minor characters. I have said nothing of the deep humour of the rustics, who are, indeed, the best rustics since Thomas Hardy's challenged Shakespeare's. The scene between Barbara Westaway and Arcott is profoundly dramatic. It is as fine as anything George Eliot ever wrote. Joseph Westaway is a wonderful piece of humorous portraiture. So is Joshua Bloom. So is Mr. Tapp. Altogether I do not hesitate to say that Mr. Eden Phillpotts has added a masterpiece of the first order to the treasury of English Fiction."—JAMES DOUGLAS, in the Star.

MRS. GALER'S BUSINESS. By W. PETT RIDGE. Cr. 8vo. 6s.THE CASTLE OF THE SHADOWS. By MRS. C. N. WILLIAMSON, co-Author of "The Lightning Conductor." Crown 8vo, 6s. Illustrated.BARHAM OF BELTANA. By W. E. NORRIS. Crown 8vo, 6s.THE VALLEY OF THE SHADOW. By WILLIAM LE QUEUX. With 2 Illustrations by A. H. BUCKLAND. Crown 8vo, 6s.THE SYSTEM. By PERCY WHITE, Author of "The West End," &c. Third Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Very lifelike and intensely readable."—Daily Mail.
"Mr. White's good things are not only excellently said, but also, it seems to us, tolerably true. He has never been happier in his exposure of the taste of the age in which we live."—Athenaeum.

"'The System' is in Mr. White's best manner and contains both thought and pleasantries admirably mixed."—Morning Leader.

"Mr. White is not less interesting than usual, and his firm touch, his quiet humour and criticism, his assured methods are all here."—Standard.

"The novel is deeply interesting and excessively clever."—Academy.

"A clever and interesting book. It is well written: its sketches of character are vivid and ably contrasted."—Scotsman.

THE GATE OF THE DESERT. By JOHN OXENHAM. Author of "Barbe and Grand Bayou." With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo. Second Edition. 6s.

"Mr. Oxenham tells his story with vigour and vividness. A lively and entertaining story of modern adventure."—Outlook.

"'The Gate of the Desert' stands out above the author's own ordinary high level of exciting fiction by reason of an entirely original character in it—Cohen, the Jewish Financier and adventurer."—Morning Leader.

HIS ISLAND PRINCESS. By W. CLARK RUSSELL. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 6s.

"Devised with unusual invention."—Daily Mail.

"Interesting, surprising, and exciting."—Morning Leader.

"There is abundant life and colour and movement, sympathy and tragedy and plenty of incident."—St. James's Gazette.

THE TEMPESTUOUS PETTICOAT. By ROBERT BARR. Author of "The Countess Tekla," &c. Illustrated. Second Edition in the Press. Crown 8vo, 6s.THE WEANS AT ROWALLAN. By K. FITZPATRICK. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A delightful book. Indeed, we think it is one of the best books about children published since the days of Mrs. Ewing."—Speaker.

"Quite unusually good, and the humours of life in the Irish house are set forth with much gusto, cleverness, and sympathy."—Daily Mail.

HE THAT EATETH BREAD WITH ME. By H. A. MITCHELL KEAYS. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A really interesting and remarkable novel."—Guardian.

"A remarkable book and of much solid power."—Morning Leader.

"Great is the power of atmosphere and greater still the charm of good writing."—Daily Graphic.

HEART OF MY HEART. By ELLIS MEREDITH. Cr. 8vo, 6s.

"Curious, unique, informing, obviously the outcome of experience."—Standard.

"Delicate fancy, descriptive vigour, and uplifting moral."—Glasgow Herald.

"A book of unusual merit, written with genuine literary charm and distinction."—Daily Mail.

THE VIRGIN AND THE SCALES. By CONSTANCE COTTERELL. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Written with freshness of inspiration. The story is good, very good, and captures the mind with the freshness of early flowers."—Black and White.

"Bright and lively and clever."—Speaker.

MADAME BUTTERFLY. By J. LUTHER LONG, co-Author of "The Darling of the Gods." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

The "Country Life" Library

Roses for English Gardens.

By GERTRUDE JEKYLL and EDWARD MAWLEY, Hon. Secretary of the National Rose Society. Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net.

Daily Chronicle.—"All the roses of England, blooming in a counterfeit summer of black and white, seem to be gathered together into Miss JEKYLL's charming book. The pictures are really pleasant to look at; near or far, a rose photographs quite as well as a beautiful face, and carries with it its own individual look. No one can fail to be captured by Miss JEKYLL's enthusiasm and fine discrimination."

Lilies for English Gardens.

Written and compiled by GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.

Westminster Gazette.—"LILIES FOR ENGLISH GARDENS' is a volume in the 'Country Life' Library, and it is almost sufficiently high commendation to say that the book is worthy of the journal. Miss JEKYLL's aim has been to write and compile a book on Lilies which shall tell amateurs, in the plainest and simplest possible way, how most easily and successfully to grow the Lily—which, considering its great beauty, is not grown nearly so much as might be expected. We certainly think that in the future there will be less neglect of this flower, for after looking at some of the illustrations (all admirable and admirably produced), there will not be many garden owners who will be content to be Lilyless."

Wall and Water Gardens.

By GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."

Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds, Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page illustrations. Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net.

Times.—"WALL AND WATER GARDENS."—He who will consent to follow Miss JEKYLL aright will find that under her guidance the old walls, the stone steps, the rockeries, the ponds or streamlets of his garden will presently blossom with all kinds of flowers undreamed of, and become marvels of varied foliage. More than a hundred photographs help to enforce Miss JEKYLL's admirable lessons."

The Century Book of Gardening.

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 illustrations. 21s. net.

Times.—"No department of gardening is neglected, and the illustrations of famous and beautiful gardens and of the many winsome achievements of the gardener's art are so numerous and attractive as to make the veriest cockney yearn to turn gardener."

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net.

So great has been the success of this gardening book for beginners, that a third edition has been called for and is now ready. This work is for those who are about to begin gardening, nothing that will help the beginner over first difficulties being omitted.

About 100 diagrams will explain certain practical operations better than mere descriptions. There are also nearly 200 illustrations, prepared in the best style, of flowers, fruit, vegetables, and trees and shrubs.

Spectator.—"Full of information about both the useful and the ornamental, and as far as we have been able to test it, eminently practical. The beginner, by the way, will have gone a long way before he has assimilated the contents of this stout volume of nearly five hundred pages; but then alia alius cura, and the wider the choice that is offered by a volume of this kind the better."

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens.

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net.

Gardener's Chronicle.—"A good book on trees and shrubs is a real want. Few books are more often inquired for, and until now we have had a difficulty in replying to our correspondents who have asked for information on the point. In the days of trashy gardening books, it is a pleasure to come across one which bears the stamp of original observation, judicious inference, and industrious research."

VOLS. I. AND II. NOW READY

Gardens Old and New.

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450 Superb illustrations in each volume, printed on treble thick Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.

Birmingham Daily Post.—"One could not, if one would, overpraise the charm of this beautiful book. As an example of the beautiful in books, it is a long time since we chanced on anything so noteworthy as 'GARDENS OLD AND NEW.'"

The Fruit Garden.

By GEORGE BUNYARD and OWEN THOMAS. Price 21s. net. Now Ready. 507 Pages. Size 10½ by 7½ in.

"THE FRUIT GARDEN" gives full instructions for the culture of every fruit that is worth growing in Britain, either out-of-doors or under glass, and, in addition, contains chapters upon the Value of Fruit Trees as Flowering Trees, Whole Fruit Preservation, Tropical Fruits and How to Grow Them, the Construction of Fruit Houses, Fruit Trees in Pots, Injurious Diseases and Insects, Fruit Culture in America, France, and the Channel Islands, etc.

Review of "The Fruit Garden," from the R.H.S. Journal for May 1904.—"Without any doubt the best book of the sort yet published. There is a separate chapter for every kind of fruit, and each chapter is a book in itself—there is, in fact, everything that any one can need or wish for in order to succeed in fruit growing. The book simply teems with illustrations, diagrams, and outlines. The diagrams on pruning are particularly admirable; we cannot speak too highly of them, and from them any one should be able to teach himself to be an expert pruner. The book winds up with 100 pages of outline drawings, which should be a wonderful aid to identification."

The Field, February 27, 1904.—"Written by Experts . . . In all thirty chapters, and these contain practically all that is really essential for the reader to know as to the modern methods employed in the selection, culture, protection, and increase of trees, and the harvesting, storing and preserving of fruit as grown in the garden or fruit farms of to-day."

Sweet Violets and Pansies. and Violets from Mountain and Plain.

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc. Price 3s. 6d. net.

The Book of British Ferns.

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British Fern Society. Price 3s. 6d. net.

St. James's Gazette.—"Has been most carefully done; no fewer than 700 choice varieties are described. The book is well and lucidly written and arranged; it is altogether beautifully got up. Mr. DRUERY has long been recognised as an authority on the subject."

WILL BE PUBLISHED SHORTLY

Carnations and Pinks.

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net.

MR. JOHN LONG'S NEW LIST

New Six-Shilling Novels (All Ready)

OLIVE KINSELLA Curtis Yorke
 LITTLE WIFE HESTER L. T. Meade
 THE FACE IN THE FLASHLIGHT Florence Warden
 THE MASK William Le Queux
 ROSAMOND GRANT Mrs. Lovett Cameron
 CONFESSIONS OF A YOUNG LADY Richard Marsh
 THE FATE OF FELIX Mrs. Coulson Kernahan
 LORD EVERLEIGH'S SINS Violet Tweeddale
 LOVE AND TWENTY John Strange Winter
 COUNT REMINY Jean Middlemass
 THE PROVINCIALS Lady Helen Forbes
 LORD OF HIMSELF Mrs. Aylmer Gowing

STRAINED ALLEGIANCE R. H. Forster
 THE NIGHT OF RECKONING Frank Barrett
 FROM THE CLUTCH OF THE SEA J. E. Muddock
 THE TEMPTATION OF ANTHONY Alice M. Diehl
 THE INFORMER Fred Wishaw
 THE WAR OF THE SEXES F. E. Young
 HIS REVERENCE, THE RECTOR Sarah Tytler
 THE IDENTITY OF JANE Alice Methley
 THE STORM OF LONDON (14th Edition) F. Dickberry
 RONALD LINDSAY May Wynne
 IN SPITE OF THE CZAR (5s. Illus.) Guy Boothby

Forthcoming Six-Shilling Novels

THE MAID OF THE RIVER Mrs. Campbell Praed
 ALIX OF THE GLEN Curtis Yorke
 WHO WAS LADY THURNE? Florence Warden
 THE WHITE LADY May Crommelin
 AN INDEPENDENT MAIDEN Adeline Sergeant
 SAINT ELIZABETH OF LONDON Lucas Cleeve
 THE TERROR BY NIGHT J. MacLaren Cobban
 THE HARVEST OF LOVE C. Ranger-Gull
 THE OPAL SERPENT Fergus Hume
 ALTON OF SOMASCO Harold Bindloss
 THE REBEL PRINCE (Frontispiece) Seth Cook Comstock

HIS MASCOT L. T. Meade
 THE ROOK'S NEST G. W. Appleton
 JANE SHORE. A Romance of History J. E. Muddock
 CHILDREN OF EARTH Sydney Paterson
 A DAUGHTER OF THE MANSE Sarah Tytler
 THE TENDERFOOT W. J. Sheppard
 THE BRANGWYN MYSTERY David Christie Murray
 A BOND OF SYMPATHY Col. Andrew Haggard
 MADEMOISELLE NELLIE Lucas Cleeve
 THE SECRET PASSAGE Fergus Hume
 THE CHOICE OF EMELIA Adeline Sergeant

Not since the publication of "Dr. Nikola" has the late Mr. GUY BOOTHBY written a more enthralling Romance than IN SPITE OF THE CZAR, now in its Fourth Edition. Price 5s. Illus.

Other Novels by Mr. Guy Boothby:—"A Cabinet Secret" (2s. 6d. New Edition and 6d. People's Edition), "The Lady of the Island" (5s. Illus.), "A Bride from the Sea" (5s. Illus.).

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, price 5s.

THE SUBURBANS. A Book of Humour. By T. W. H. CROSLAND, Author of "The Unspeakable Scot," "Lovely Woman," &c.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d. each

HORSES I HAVE KNOWN. By "G. G." (H. G. HARPER), Author of "The Chaser's Luck," "A Fairy in the Pigskin," &c.

FLASHES FROM CAPE DIAMONDS. A Book of Humour. By JACK, THE CONNAUGHT RANGER.

General Literature

MATILDA, COUNTESS OF TUSCANY. By Mrs. MARY E. HUDDY. Demy 8vo, with 4 Photogravure Plates, 12s. net.

. The only Life of the "Great Countess" that has yet appeared in this country.

IN OLD NORTHUMBRIA. A Volume of Verse. By R. H. FORSTER, Author of "The Last Foray," "In Steel and Leather," "Strained Allegiance," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. net. Illustrated by R. C. REID.

CRICKET DRILL AND TRAINING. By A. O. D. With numerous Illustrations and Diagrams. 12mo, price 1s. This instructive little book should be in the hands of all lovers of the national game.

THE STORM OF LONDON. By F. DICKBERRY. Crown 8vo, paper cover, price 1s.

. This Novel was one of the most popular of last Season, and it is anticipated that in the Shilling Edition it will have a phenomenal sale. The volume will be a handsome one of 320 pages, and will be published in May. Orders should be sent at once.

JOHN LONG'S SIXPENNY COPYRIGHT NOVELS. New Vols. for 1905

THE WORLD MASTERS (Just out) GEORGE GRIFFITH
 BENEATH THE VEIL (Just out) ADELINE SERGEANT
 THE BURDEN OF HER YOUTH (April) L. T. MEADE
 LE SELVE OUIDA
 NO. 3, THE SQUARE FLORENCE WARDEN

MIDSUMMER MADNESS MRS. LOVETT CAMERON
 SWEET "DOLL" OF HADDON HALL J. E. MUDDOCK
 THE LADY OF THE ISLAND GUY BOOTHBY
 THE MAGNETIC GIRL RICHARD MARSH
 THE JADE EYE FERDUS HUME

. Kindly write to Mr. John Long for his Complete Spring and Summer List.

LONDON: JOHN LONG, 13 & 14 NORRIS STREET, HAYMARKET.

SWAN SONNENSCHN & CO., LTD.
NEW LIST.

The Principles of Physiological Psychology.

By Prof. W. WUNDT. A Translation of the Fifth and wholly Rewritten (1902-3) German Edition by Prof. E. B. TITCHENER, M.A. In 3 Vols. Vol. I. with 156 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s.

"Anything more finished and judicial than Wundt's description of the Anatomy of the brain we have never met anywhere."—Academy.

"Prof. Titchener has done his part of the work with notable success."—Scotsman.

The Growth of the English Manor.

By Prof. P. VINOGRADOFF. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d.

"Seems likely at once to take rank as a leading authority upon its subject."—Scotsman.

"Prof. Vinogradoff's method and the mastery of the details of his subject combine to produce a notable book."—Academy.

NEW SOCIOLOGICAL WORK

A Vision of the Future.

By J. H. CLAPPERTON.

Crown 8vo. 349 pages, 3s. 6d.

"A remarkable work. . . . It is not often in visions of the future we get such good common sense allied with such exalted beliefs."—New Age.

"In the volume before us Miss Clapperton re-states her belief in the future, when society has been reorganised so as to provide for the individual happiness of an ethical quality."—Labour Leader.

NEW LIGHT ON THE SHAKESPEARE-BACON CONTROVERSY.

The Shakespeare Story.

By GEORGE PITT-LEWIS, K.C., Ex-M.P., Author of "Taylor on Evidence," &c. Crown 8vo, paper covers, 1s. 6d. net.

THREE NEW VOLUMES OF THE "SOCIAL SCIENCE SERIES."

Each crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

The History of the English Corn Laws.

By J. S. NICHOLSON, M.A., D.Sc.

The Philosophers and the French Revolution.

By P. A. WADIA, Professor of History and Political Economy, Gujarat College, Ahmedabad.

The Biology of British Politics.

By CHARLES H. HARVEY.

A NEW EDITION OF

Frances Power Cobbe's Autobiography.

1 vol., crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

THREE NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

When the World Went Wry.

By M. F. WILSON, Author of "When the Swallows Come Again," "How the Dreams Came True," &c.

"Well written, and in many parts exceedingly graceful."—Glasgow Herald.

"A story that all through controls attention."

Dundee Advertiser.

Bendish.

By WILLIAM ST. CLAIR, Author of "Prince Baba and his Wives."

A Queen of Unrest.

By HARRY TIGHE, Author of "Archie Wynward."

The Student's Text-Book of Zoology.

By ADAM SEDGWICK, M.A., Fellow and Lecturer of Trinity College, Cambridge. Demy 8vo, 18s.

SWAN SONNENSCHN & CO.,
25 High St., Bloomsbury, W.C.

Sands & Co.

THE ANGEL OF SYON

THE LIFE AND MARTYRDOM OF

BLESSED RICHARD REYNOLDS,

BRIDGETTINE MONK OF SYON,

MARTYRED AT TYBURN, MAY

4, 1535.

BY

DOM ADAM HAMILTON, O.S.B.

TO WHICH IS ADDED

A SKETCH OF THE HISTORY OF THE BRID-

GETTINES OF SYON, WRITTEN BY FATHER

ROBERT PARSONS. SJ., ABOUT THE

YEAR 1595, EDITED FROM A MS. COPY

AT SYON ABBEY, CHUDLEIGH.

WITH FOURTEEN ILLUSTRATIONS.

Crown 8vo, price 3s. 6d. net.

Edinburgh: London:
13 Bank Street. 23 Bedford St., Strand.

"A Thought-provoking Book."

THE CYCLE OF LIFE

According to Modern Science.

By C. W. SALEEBY.

An Examination of moral, physical, and social life from the scientific standpoint.

"Dr. Saleeby is one of the few to whom it is given to write on scientific subjects for a popular audience. His style is distinctly attractive; he knows what he is writing about."—Westminster Gazette.

"The author writes so well on science because he knows other things besides science. A few words cannot do justice to this thought-provoking book; we have read it with profit and pleasure."—Academy.

THE CYCLE OF LIFE.

By C. W. SALEEBY.

Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

SONGS OF THE VALIANT VOIVODE.

Roumanian Folk-Songs, &c.

By HÉLÈNE VACARESCO. Small 4to. Price 10s. 6d.

"A quite delightful and refreshing volume. . . . Passionate, vivid, and wild as were those of the first collection" (The Bard of the Dimbovitza).—The World.

THE CLUB OF QUEER TRADES.

By GILBERT K. CHESTERTON. Illustrated by the Author. Crown 8vo. Price 6s.

"The Club of Queer Trades" is an eccentric and Bohemian club, of which the sole condition of membership is that the candidate must have invented the method by which he earns his living—it must be an entirely new trade.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

LANGBARROW HALL.

By THEODORA WILSON-WILSON.

Miss Wilson-Wilson lays the scene of her new novel chiefly in her own county, Westmoreland. It is the story of an entangled estate, and the ingenious fraud which wrests it for a time from the rightful heir.

THE FORTUNES OF FARTHING.

By A. J. DAWSON, Author of "Things Seen in Morocco," &c.

A novel of distinguished merits. Whether dealing with the countryside (Dorset) and Farthings Hall, or with Morocco and the Moors—whither the hero is kidnapped—Mr. Dawson is always convincing.

MY TURKISH BRIDE.

By ARTHUR CRAWSHAY.

"My Turkish Bride" is a very remarkable novel; partly on account of its vivid presentation of the Russian secret police and their marvellous system of espionage.

A DOG'S TALE. By MARK TWAIN.

(Illustrated.) Large crown 8vo. Uniform with "Adam's Diary." Price 2s. net.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
45 ALBEMARLE STREET, LONDON, W.

GREENING'S POPULAR BOOKS.

At all Libraries, Bookshops, and Railway Bookstalls.

THE SCARLET PIMPERNEL.

A Romance of the French Revolution and the Time of King George the Third. By the BARONESS OROZY. 6s.

THE SCARLET PIMPERNEL.

Daily Telegraph says: "It is something distinctly out of the common, well conceived, vividly told, and stirring from start to finish."

Daily Mail says: "An excellent historical novel of adventure."

Morning Leader says: "The novel is a thoroughly exciting one, and what is more, a careful and sincere piece of work."

6/- THE SCARLET PIMPERNEL. 6/-

Third Edition Now Ready.

Fourth Edition at Press.

The successful play founded on this exciting and dramatic story is now being presented at the NEW THEATRE by Miss JULIA NEILSON and Mr. FRED TERRY.

THE SCARLET PIMPERNEL.

Truth says: "I can recommend you to read it. The interest is kept up quite naturally at an intense pitch. Especially thrilling is the scene in the little French inn at the close."

AT SUNRISE. 6/- THE PILGRIMS. 6/-

By HERBERT SPURRELL.

By E. BELASYSE.

Record says: "A powerful romance. . . The idea is well worked out, and the story is full of vivid incident."

Daily Telegraph says: "A good story. The plot is unhackneyed and the characters vividly and boldly drawn."

FOR SATAN'S SAKE. 6/-

A Novel by ELLIOTT O'DONNELL.

"Miss Corelli has a serious rival in Mr. Elliott O'Donnell."—Graphic.
"An extraordinary but clever and powerfully-written book."—Daily Telegraph.

ASK AT YOUR LIBRARY FOR THE FOLLOWING NOVELS.
YOU WILL BE WELL PLEASED.

WASTED FIRES.	By HUME NISBET.	6s.
WHEN IT WAS DARK.	By GUY THORNE.	6s.
SHARKS.	By GUY THORNE AND LEO CUSTANCE.	6s.
IN DEEP ABYSS.	By GEORGES OHNET.	6s.
HIS SHARE OF THE WORLD.	By AMY GRIFFIN.	3s. 6d.
A DREAMER'S HARVEST.	By MOUNT HOUHAS.	6s.
THE PUPPET'S DALLYING.	By LOUIS MARLOW.	6s.
TALES FROM SPAIN.	By J. G. P.	6s.

A VAGABOND IN ASIA.

By EMDUND CANDLER, Author of "The Unveiling of Lhasa." With Map and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

OSCAR WILDE.

The Story of an Unhappy Friendship. By ROBERT H. SHERARD. With Several Portraits. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net.

Complete Catalogue post free on Application.

LONDON: GREENING & CO., 18 & 20 Cecil Court, Charing Cross Road.

JUST PUBLISHED.

8vo., cloth extra.

10s. 6d. net.

Modern Industrial Progress

By C. H. COCHRANE,

Author of "The Wonders of Modern Mechanism."

Over 400 Illustrations.

A new volume which describes in plain, practical, and yet accurate manner what has been done in the last few years, especially in the fields of invention and mechanical construction. The book tells of the making of sky-scrapers and of armour-plates, of great guns, &c.; of the discovery and application of the principles of wireless telegraphy; in fact, it covers the whole field of industrial progress. Profusely and beautifully illustrated with reproductions from photographs, drawings, &c.

RECENTLY ISSUED.

In 3 vols., medium 8vo, cloth extra. Price £2 5s. net.

HISTORY OF THE MOORISH EMPIRE IN EUROPE.

By S. P. SCOTT.

"A book of deep and real interest."—Athenaeum.

"A rich harvest of material for the history of the inner life of the Moors in Europe."—Speaker.

"Suggestive and interesting in a very high degree."—Daily Chronicle.

A NEW NOVEL BY THE AUTHOR OF "HUGH WYNNE."

With Illustrations. 12mo, cloth. 3s. 6d.

NEW SAMARIA

By S. WEIR MITCHELL.

7th Edition. Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

AT THE TIME APPOINTED.

By A. MAYNARD BARBOUR,

Author of "That Mainwaring Affair," now in its 10th Edition.

"A highly romantic story, full of thrilling adventure and sentiment. . . . The situations and episodes are full of interest to the end."

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY,
5 HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, LONDON.

ISBISTER & COMPANY'S SPRING LIST

THE REBELLION OF THE PRINCESS.

By M. IMLAY TAYLOR. Crown 8vo, price 6s.

A dramatic story of Court life in Russia.

"Ask for 'The Rebellion of the Princess' and see that you get it."

Morning Leader.

"A good adventure story of an attractive class."—Globe.

TWO CHOICE REPRINTS from the Works of

FREDERICK WEDMORE,

Author of "The Pastors of France."

TO NANCY.

Post 8vo, art boards, 1s. net.

DREAM OF PROVENCE.

(Orgeas and Mirndon.) Post 8vo, art boards, 1s. net.

"Characteristic examples of their author's refined and imaginative art certain of a wide welcome in the attractive form."—Scotsman.

"Mr. Wedmore is a fine literary artist. His style is a delight and his knowledge of humanity extraordinary. Both these little books are delightful."

Daily Express

JEHANNE.

A Romance of Modern Normandy. By E. A. GILLIE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A beautiful story excellently told.

STORIES OF AUTHOR'S LOVES.

By CLARA E. LAUGHLIN. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Many great names cross the pages—Dante, Balzac, George Eliot, Hawthorne, Tennyson, Carlyle, are of the worshipful company, but nothing has been set down in malice, and the book will have failed of its purpose if it does not heighten the sympathy of all who read it, for those who wrote with magic will words which have augmented the literary capital of the world.

THE WOMAN STEALERS.

By J. H. KNIGHT-ADKIN, M.A. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"You should certainly look at Mr. Knight-Adkin's clever and convincing picture of the West of England in pre-historic times."—Review of Reviews.

"The author's considerable gifts are shown in almost every page. We shall hear a good deal more of this writer."—Athenaeum.

PEEPS INTO NATURE'S WAYS.

By J. J. WARD, Author of "Minute Marvels of Nature." Illustrated by upwards of 150 photographs and photo-micrographs taken by the Author. Small demy 8vo, gilt top, 7s. 6d.

"Mr. Ward is one of the best known of our writers on Natural History. We have here a volume of intense interest. It is worth a bushel of current fiction."—Glasgow Evening Times.

"The book should be read with both profit and pleasure by all classes of readers in search of scientific knowledge."—Scotsman.

Books by ROBERT HUGH BENSON, M.A.,

Priest of the Diocese of Westminster.

(1) BY WHAT AUTHORITY.

Second Edition. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Pall Mall Gazette says: "It reminds one of John Inglesant."

"This delightful book gives Mr. Benson a claim to high rank among novelists; but it also gives him a claim to something which we think he will esteem much higher, in the gratitude of Catholics for an important work likely to do valuable service to the cause of their Church in this country."—The Tablet.

(2) A BOOK OF THE LOVE OF JESUS.

A Collection of Ancient English Devotions in Prose and Verse. Limp lambskin, 3s. 6d. net.

"Beautifully printed, tastefully bound, creditable to every one concerned. We cannot too strongly recommend it."—Catholic Book Notes.

"Its well-chosen verses and meditations have a distinction which will recommend the book to devout readers."—Scotsman.

"As a collection of devotion the book is unique."—Dundee Courier.

(3) THE LIGHT INVISIBLE.

Fifth Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"The literary style is of a high order, at once eloquent and dignified."

Yorkshire Post.

"Told in wonderfully delicate and restrained language. Mr. Benson has imagination, delicacy, and—that rare gift—spiritual refinement."—Guardian.

THE BOOK OF THE MOMENT.

THE SIMPLE LIFE. By CHARLES WAGNER. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

A NEW AND POPULAR EDITION in the Press, ready MARCH 15. Price 1s. net.

LONDON: ISBISTER & CO., 1 AMEN CORNER, E.C.

ELKIN MATHEWS' SPRING LIST.

ODETTE D'ANTREVERNES: a Fairy Tale for Weary People. By ARTHUR ANNESLEY R. FIRBANK. Pott 4to, One Florin net.

[Immediately.]

A HYMN TO DIONYSUS, and other Poems. By LADY MARGARET SACKVILLE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

[Immediately.]

THE GREEK KALENDS: a Comedy mainly in Verse. By ARTHUR DILLON. Roy. 16mo., 3s. 6d. net.

[Immediately.]

A MAINSAIL HAUL. By JOHN MASEFIELD. With Frontispiece by JACK B. YEATS. Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net.

[Immediately.]

DANTE: Six Sermons. By P. H. WICKSTEED. Globe 8vo, 2s. net.

[Sixth Edition in the Press.]

WINGS OF THE MORNING. By CICELY FOX SMITH. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

[Now ready.]

"A small volume, but big with promise and representative of no small achievement."—Manchester Chronicle.

DAYS OF OLD ROME. By ARTHUR LEWIS. Illustrated by EDITH CALVERT. Pott 4to, 3s. 6d. net.

[Now ready.]

THE GARDEN OF FRANCESCA. By HENRY CULLIMORE. Pott 4to, 3s. 6d. net.

[Now ready.]

New and Forthcoming Volumes in

VIGO CABINET SERIES.

LOVE'S FUGITIVES. By ELIZABETH GIBSON. Royal 16mo. 1s. net.

AN AUTUMN ROMANCE. By ALICE MADDOCK. Royal 16mo. 1s. net.

PLAYS: THE SHADOW OF THE GLEN, AND RIDERS TO THE SEA. By J. M. SYNGE. Royal 16mo. 1s. net.

LONDON: ELKIN MATHEWS, VIGO STREET, W.

JARROLD & SONS' NEW BOOKS

Authorised Translation from the Hungarian.

'NEATH THE HOOF OF THE TARTAR;

OR, THE SOURCE OF GOD. 6s.

By Baron NICOLAS JOSIKA. Translated from the Hungarian by SELINA GAYE. With Preface by R. NISBET BAIN. Also Photogravure Portrait of Baron Josika.

"A thrilling story of the Tartar invasion of Hungary in the Thirteenth Century, a terrible and even horrible irruption of savagery, redeemed by romantic passages of absorbing interest."—Truth.

Fourth Edition. Translated from the Russian of Maxim Gorky by Nisbet Bain.

TALES FROM GORKY. 6s.

With Photogravure Portrait and Biography of Maxim Gorky.

"The style of one whose gift of realistic description is unsurpassed by any European writer."—Daily News.

Jókai's Famous Russian Novel. Eighth Edition.

THE GREEN BOOK;

OR, FREEDOM UNDER THE SNOW.

By Dr. MAURUS JÓKAI. Translated by Mrs. ELLEN WAUGH. With Portrait of Dr. Jókai. 6s.

"Truly an astonishing book dealing with the Empire of Russia. All the superficial culture and essential barbarism of the country are depicted in these pages."—Daily Telegraph.

A Thrilling Story of Nihilistic Adventure.

BY ORDER OF THE BROTHERHOOD.

By LE VOLEUR. 3s. 6d.

"We find ourselves at one moment in a secret stronghold of the Nihilists, and at the next in the Palace of the Czar; but wherever we may be the absorbing interest of the story is not allowed to flag. Incident is piled upon incident in luxuriant profusion."—The Speaker.

A Popular Exposition of Phrenology.

THE BRAIN BOOK

AND HOW TO READ IT. 6s. net.

An Exposition of Phrenology in Theory and Practice.

By H. C. DONOVAN.

With over 40 specially prepared illustrations.

"Can be confidently recommended to those who have made some little study of phrenology. To those who have not it will come as a revelation in the study of a fascinating science."—Civil Service Gazette.

LONDON:

JARROLD & SONS, 15 & 11 Warwick Lane, E.C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIUMS.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books
Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS

The Morning Newspaper for Aberdeen AND THE

Northern Half of Scotland.

Reviews of books appear on Mondays and Thursdays, and on other days as required.

Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.

NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.

LONDON OFFICE: 149 FLEET STREET, E.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper

THE DAILY CHRONICLE

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes.
Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art,
and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art Specially dealt with

Fulllest Reports of All Current Events and Special
Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S.
appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR
PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY.

SUBSCRIPTIONS opened at any date for THREE, SIX and TWELVE Months. Town
Subscriptions, 21s. Yearly. Books of past
Seasons, 10s. 6d. Yearly.

Terms for Country, Suburbs; and Parcel Post, sent on application to MUDIE & CO., 30-34 New Oxford St., London.

H. R. ALLENSON'S
SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS.

TAULER'S LIFE AND SERMONS.

Translated by Miss WINKWORTH. With CHARLES KINGSLEY'S Preface. Crown 8vo, 6s. This New Edition receives the following special commendation by Dr. Alexander Whyte, of Edinburgh:

"You are doing all lovers of first-class spiritual books a great service by putting on the market a new and properly edited issue of 'Tauler.' His name is fragrant to all who know him. And many more will know him, I feel sure, through this fine enterprise of yours. Be sure I shall do my best to make your 'Tauler' known here."

A DAILY MESSAGE FROM MANY MINDS.

Thoughts for the Quiet Hour from Fénelon, Jeremy Taylor, Wordsworth, Robertson, Phillips Brooks, Hawthorne, &c. Roan 32mo, 2s. 6d. net.

Uniform with India paper Edition of "Great Souls at Prayer."

THE RELIGION OF A GENTLEMAN.

By CHARLES F. DOLE, Author of "The Coming People," &c. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

THE QUEST OF THE INFINITE;

or, the Place of Reason and Mystery in Religious Experience. By BENJAMIN A. MILLARD. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

[Early in April]

PROFESSOR HUXLEY AND RELIGION.

(GRESHAM LECTURES, Michaelmas Term, 1904.) By W. HALLIDAY THOMPSON, LL.D. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

[Ready.]

JESUS SAITH:

Studies in some "New Sayings" of Christ. By J. WARSCHAUER, M.A., D.Phil., Author of "Anti-Nunquam," &c. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

THE CURE OF CARE.

By W. J. HUMBERSTONE. Foolscap 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.

[This week.]

BRIGHT AND BRIEF TALKS TO MEN:

a Series of 21 P.S.A. Addresses. By F. W. ATKIN. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d.

[Early in April.]

THE GOLDEN WINDOWS.

By L. E. RICHARDS. (Presentation Edition.) Crown 8vo, Lambskin, gold, gill edges, 5s. net.

[Ready.]

IMMORTALITY.

By ALF. W. MOMERIE, M.A., D.Sc., LL.D. New Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

HEROES AND HERO WORSHIP.

By CARLYLE. New 12d. paper Editions. Demy 32mo. Limp lambskin, 2s. net; cloth, 1s. 6d. net.

ROOT PRINCIPLES IN RATIONAL AND SPIRITUAL THINGS.

By T. CHILD. Demy 8vo, 6d.

Heart and Life Series.

(An entirely New Series of Artistic Booklets.)

The Loneliness of Christ.

By F. W. ROBERTSON. Fcap. 8vo, 6d. net.

An Easter Sermon.

By BISHOP PHILLIPS BROOKS. Fcap. 8vo, 6d. net.

The Purpose and Use of Comfort.

By BISHOP PHILLIPS BROOKS. Fcap. 8vo, 6d. net.

Selection from Faber's Hymns.

Fcap. 8vo, 6d. net.

Sixpenny Series.

(Additional Volumes.)

Eleven Sermons.

Completing First Series. By F. W. ROBERTSON. Demy 8vo, 6d.

Heroes and Hero Worship.

By CARLYLE. Demy 8vo, 6d.

Ten Sermons.

By F. W. ROBERTSON. 6d. (New Edition.)

Belief in God.

By A. W. MOMERIE. 6d. (New Edition.)

London: H. R. ALLENSON, 1 & 2 Ivy Lane, E.C.

WATERMAN'S IDEAL FOUNTAIN PEN

DESK WORK if the pen is not just right, IS DREARY And a pen can be very annoying, and often reduces a writer to desperation. A Waterman's Ideal reduces desk drudgery by freeing the writer from pen irritations. It has all the good qualities of a perfect pen and none of the bad qualities of a poor pen.

WE SAY THIS

1. It is the best
2. It writes the best
3. It gives no trouble
4. Saves its cost in time

The test of what we say is in the PEN we sell

MR. S. R. CROCKETT, the celebrated novelist, says, "To give away a Waterman's Ideal is to make a friend for life." To have a Waterman's Ideal is to have a friend for life. Mr. Frankfort Moore, the novelist, wrote over 2,000,000 words with one Waterman's Ideal without it once getting out of order. These facts prove how useful Waterman's Ideal is to all who write. We say that a Waterman's Ideal is the best Fountain Pen ever made, and we have the public of two continents behind us in millions.

Send for Dainty Illustrated Brochure, post free, on our Pens

From 10s. 6d. in Silver and Gold for Presentation. Of Stationers, Jewellers, &c.

L. & C. HARDMUTH, 12 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Paris: 6 Rue de Honore. New York: 173 Broadway

Advertisements of Books (not Current Literature), Fine Art Publications, and Musical Compositions WANTED, FOR SALE, and in EXCHANGE, are inserted, if PREPAID, at the rate of 3d. for every 8 words, but every SUBSCRIBER is entitled to a WEEKLY FREE ADVERTISEMENT if the published conditions are complied with.

* * Subscribers are requested to state clearly on their Advertisement Copy whether "Wanted" or "For Sale," and also to write distinctly.

Wanted

FRANCE, vol. i. by T. Allom. Fisher & Son, Somner's History of Canterbury, Sartorius' Doctrine of Divine Love, Armstrong's Life of Lorenzo de Medici.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

BOOKSELLERS IN BIRMINGHAM.

"Mr. E. Baker is a very experienced bookseller."—Bazaar Exchange and Mart. All out-of-print books supplied, no matter what the subject. The most expert bookfinder extant. Please state wants. BOOKS WANTED—£30 offered for Vanity Fair, 20 Nos., 1847-48; £50 for Walton's Angler, 1653; £10 for Jorrocks' Jaunts, 1843; £20 for Orme's British Field Sports, 1807; £20 for Shelley's Queen Mab, boards, 1813; £3 for Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare, 2 vols., 1807; 2 for Poetry for Children, 2 vols., 1809; 25s. for Rosamund Gray: a Tale, 1798.—Baker's Great Bookshops, John Bright St., Birmingham.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE Xmas No. 1903. Price and condition to W. Lee, Palm Road, Romford.

DEPROFUNDIS, Edition de Luxe, and Faber's works.—Brash, A.D., County Hotel Buildings, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

OSCAR WILDE—Poems, Picture of Dorian Gray, Salome, Ballade of Reading Gaol, Starry, Starry Minstrel, Portable Commentary (4 vols.), Ducange Glossarium Latinitatis (6 vols.)—A. and R. Milne, Aberdeen.

WORKS by Wilde, O.; Whistler; Beardsley; books in large and small quantities purchased.—J. Jacob, 149 Edgware Road, Hyde Park.

MAGAZINE and Review Articles on Oscar Wilde (English or French). Also reviews of books. Klingender, Iver, Bucks.

ECOLE Francaise, Les Estampes en Couleurs du xviii siècle, double set of proofs, 1885.
Eden, State of the Poor, 3 vols. 4to Edinburgh University Magazine, Jan. to April, 1871, or any.
Edwin and Angelina, 1765.
Egan (Pierce), Life of an Actor, 1825.
—Book of Sports, 1825.
—Sporting Anecdotes, 1804, 1825, or 1827.
—Any of his Works.
Elements of Morality, 3 vols, 1791.
Eliot (J.), Poems, 1658.
Eliot (George), Scenes of Clerical Life, 2 vols. 1858, or either.
—Adam Bede, First Edition, 3 vols, 1859.
—Romola, 3 vols. 1863.
—Agatha, 1869.
—Brother and Sister, by Marian Lew's, 1869.
Elliott's History of India, 6 vols.
Emerson (R. W.), Nature, Boston, 1836.
—Poems, 1847.
—Complete Works, 11 vols., 8vo., large paper, Riverside Press, 1883.
Emma, 3 vols., 1816, or odd.
Emaux de Petitot (Lec.), 1862.
Empedocles on Etna and other Poems, by A., 1852.
England's Parnassus, 1600.
Englefield's Beauties Isle of Wight, large paper, folio, 1816.
English Lakes, 48 coloured plates, imp. 4to, Ackerman, 1821.
English Pilot, fourth book, large folio, 1761.
Ethen, or Traces of Travel, 1844.
Walter T. Spencer, 27, New Oxford Street, W.C.

For Sale

TIMES LITERARY SUPPLEMENT from commencement. What offers? H. Fircroft, Englefield Green, Surrey.

EXPOSITOR, 1st Series, 12 vols. and Index, 25s.; 2nd Series, 8 vols. and Index, 18s.; 3rd Series, 10 vols., 18s., all in pub cloth, good condition.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

ENGRAVING of Millais' Early Portrait of Tennyson, price one guinea; Rochelle Thomas' Copper Medallion Tennyson Portrait, handsomely framed, price 30s.—X, 1 Regent Terrace, Cambridge.

BALDRYX "Wallace Collection," Goupil, "Victoria" Goupil series. What offers.—John D. Ballile, Grand Pump Room, Library and Reading Room, Bath.

Exchange

THE ACADEMY weekly for Bookman monthly, or Academy and Black and White Budget for Country Life.—Miss P. Ross, Hopehaus, Kersal, Manchester.

"ACADEMY" FREE ADVERTISEMENT COUPON.

Insert attached advertisement on the conditions named, of (here say Book, Picture, &c.)

Name

(Mr., Mrs., or Miss)

Address

March 11, 1905.

THE WILLIAMS TYPEWRITER

('ACADEMY' MODEL)

is a high-grade machine developed from the Williams No. 2, and featured with modern improvements. Many thousands of the model 2's are used in the United Kingdom, and are standing advertisements as to durability and convenience.

Increased manufacturing facilities enable us to produce the improved machines in larger quantities, and with a view to increasing the output we have decided to sell direct to the consumer at 40% less than the former price. This means that the price has been reduced from £21 to £12. 12. 0. Brief size to £14. 14. 0. net cash on delivery.

Further, we are offering this machine by a deferred payment plan—25/- on delivery and 12/6d. per month until the machine is paid for. This figures at 5d. a day for the use of the machine, covering a period of nearly two years. The machines are guaranteed against mechanical imperfections, and we have Agents in almost every important town ready and willing to attend to machines if any accident occurs.

It is not good policy to buy a cheap machine which is likely to have its limitations; it is not profitable to buy a second-hand machine, which is likely to need constant repairs, when you can get a new Williams No. 2 Improved 'Academy' Model at £12. 12. 0. or by monthly instalments of 12/6d.

Write for Catalogue and full information, or call and see the machine

WILLIAMS TYPEWRITER COMPANY FOR EUROPE:

LONDON - - 57 Holborn Viaduct

ABERDEEN - - 115 Union Street	EXETER - - 31 Queen Street	MIDDLESBOROUGH - Royal Exchange
BELFAST - - 71 Ann Street	GLASGOW - - 69 Bothwell Street	NEWCASTLE - - 21 Collingwood Street
BIRMINGHAM - 28 High Street	LEEDS - - 3 Park Lane	NOTTINGHAM - - Prudential Buildings
BURNLEY - - 9 Grimshaw Street	LEICESTER - - 60-64 Halford Street	PORTSMOUTH - - 154 Queen Street
CARDIFF - - 8 St. John's Square	LEIGH - - 64 Bond Street	SHEFFIELD - - 72 Queen Street
DUBLIN - - 5 Upper Ormond Quay	LIVERPOOL	SOUTHAMPTON - - 12 Portland Street
EDINBURGH - - 19 Shandwick Place	MANCHESTER - - 267 Deansgate

MAR 21 1905

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1715

MARCH 18, 1905

PRICE THREEPENCE

The Small Advertisements on this page are inserted at 6d. per line, in the readable type shown (minimum 5 lines).
The Displayed Advertisements are charged at 5s. per inch.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

EDUCATION ACTS, 1870 to 1903.

THE LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL invites applications for the following appointments in the Education Department.

Four Divisional Inspectors, who will have the general superintendence of large districts and give special attention to the co-ordination of education within their areas. Their chief duties will be to inspect pupil teachers' centres, secondary schools, training colleges, science and commercial centres, polytechnics, and all institutions for higher education aided by the Council. Candidates will be required to possess special qualifications in one of the following subjects:—(1) English language and literature. (2) Modern languages. (3) Mathematics and science. (4) Technology (including mechanical and electrical engineering). The salary will be in each case £600 a year, rising by annual increments of £25 to a maximum salary of £800 a year.

One Art Inspector, whose chief duties will be to inspect the art teaching in elementary and secondary schools, art schools, and polytechnics. The salary will be £400 a year, rising by annual increments of £20 to a maximum salary of £500 a year.

One Inspector of Wood and Metal Work, whose chief duties will be to inspect the teaching in wood and metal work in manual training centres and elementary and secondary schools. He will also be required to inspect certain classes at polytechnics. The salary will be £400 a year, rising by annual increments of £20 to a maximum salary of £500 a year.

One Inspector of Women's Technical Classes, whose chief duties will be to inspect technical classes for women (including upholstery, flower making, needlework, millinery, dressmaking, and dress-cutting), in evening schools, girls' clubs, and polytechnics. The salary will be £300 a year, rising by annual increments of £20 to a maximum salary of £400 a year.

The persons appointed will be under the control of the Chief Inspector, and will be required to give their whole time to the duties of the office, and will in other respects be subject to the usual conditions attaching to the Council's service, particulars of which are given in the form of application.

In connection with the appointments there is no restriction with regard to sex.

Applications should be made on the official form, to be obtained from the Clerk of the London County Council, at the County Hall, Spring Gardens, S.W., or at the Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C. The applications must be sent in not later than 10 A.M. on Saturday, the 1st day of April, 1905, addressed to the Education Offices as above, and accompanied by copies of not more than three recent testimonials.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for appointment.

G. L. GOMME,

Clerk of the London County Council.

Spring Gardens, S.W.
2nd March, 1905.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN, Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W. Tuesday next, March 21, at 5 o'clock, Professor W. E. DALBY, M.A., B.Sc., M. Inst. C.E. First of two lectures on "Engineering Problems." Half a guinea the course. Thursday, March 23, at 5 o'clock, THOMAS G. JACKSON, Esq., R.A., M.A., F.S.A. First of two lectures on "The Reasonableness of Architecture." Half a guinea. Subscription to all Courses in the Season, two guineas.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTER-ETCHERS AND ENGRAVERS, 5A Pall Mall East, S.W. Twenty-third ANNUAL EXHIBITION, including Etchings and Engravings by Sir F. SEYMOUR HADEN, P.R.E. OPEN 10 to 6 Admission 1s.—HAROLD CHILD, Secretary.

WALSALL EDUCATION COMMITTEE. School of Art. Applications are invited for the post of HEAD MASTER of the WALSALL SCHOOL OF ART. Salary £250, rising by £25 per annum for meritorious service to £300. Applications to be received not later than APRIL 7, 1905.—Further particulars and prescribed Form of Application can be obtained from the DIRECTOR OF EDUCATION, Education Offices, Walsall.

LING'S SWEDISH SYSTEM. THE EDFORD PHYSICAL TRAINING COLLEGE, 37 Lansdowne Road, Bedford. Principal, Miss STANSFELD. Students are trained in this College to become Teachers of Gymnastics in Colleges and Schools. The course of training extends over 2 years, and includes Educational and Medical Gymnastics on the Swedish System, Massage, Anatomy, Physiology and Hygiene, Dancing, Fencing, Hockey, Lacrosse, Cricket, Tennis, &c.

To Let

ELIZABETHAN Cottage to let, furnished. Three acres of land. Opposite Golf Links. Copthorne, Sussex. £2 2s. a week till June.—W., c/o "Academy," 5-7 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

ILLUSTRATION.—To Authors, Publishers, &c. Books, Periodicals, Articles illustrated. Refined, realistic, original. Moderate terms. Specimens submitted.—W. FREUND, 13 Norland Square, Kensington, W.

BOOKS FOR SALE.—A Gentleman has a number of rare books for sale, including Gregory's Decretalia, Coburger, 1482; Dolce's Transformationi, 1553; Las Casa's Tratado Comprobatorio, 1553; Calvin's In Librum Psalmorum Commentarius, 1557; Herrera's edition of Garcillaso de la Vega, 1580; Fulke's Defense and Confession, 1583; Sidney and Golding; De Mornay, 1587; Speght's Chaucer, 1598 and 1602 editions; Daniel's Vision of the Twelve Goddesses, 1623; Bunting's Travels of the Holy Patriarchs, 1636; Thomas Nabbes' the Bride, 1640; Ogilby's Homer, 2 vols., 1669; Dryden and Lee: The Duke of Guise (with music) 1683; Charles Davenant's Circe, 1685; Aphra Behn's Miscellany, 1685; De Hondt's Dutch Edition of Dampier, 1698-1704; the German English Prayer Book printed by Grooke in Dublin, 1710; Woodes Rogers' Cruising Voyage, 1718; the Baskerville Milton, 1758; Walpole's Works, 5 vols., 1798; Wordsworth's White Doe, 1815; Dickens' Our Mutual Friend (monthly parts), 1864; Curzon's Persia, 1892; Underdowne's Heliodorus, 1895; Ricci's Correggio (Japanese vellum), 1896. Kindly address offers to ACADEMY, Claremont, Shaldon, Teignmouth.

LEIGHTON'S ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE of EARLY PRINTED and other INTERESTING BOOKS, MANUSCRIPTS, and BINDINGS. Part VIII. SI—T, with 144 Illustrations, price 2s. JUST ISSUED. Parts I.—VII. containing A—SH, with 1050 Illustrations in Facsimile, price 17s. the 7 Parts.—J. & J. LEIGHTON, 40, Brewer Street, Golden Square, W.

A LARGE Stock of Old and Rare Books in English Literature, including Poetry and the Drama—Shakespeariana—First Editions of Famous Authors—Manuscripts—Illustrated Books, &c. Catalogues free on application.—Bertram Dobell, Second-Hand Bookseller and Publisher, 77 Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

THE INTERNATIONAL BOOK CIRCULAR, No. 139.

Containing a special article, entitled: "SOME CONTEMPORARY FOREIGN CHEMISTS."

By Dr. M. O. FORSTER, together with an exact bibliography of their publications and a double plate of their portraits.—Specimen copies gratis.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, Book Importers, 14 Henrietta St., Covent Garden, W.C.

THOMAS THORP, Secondhand Bookseller, 100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND 4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

JUST PUBLISHED.

CATALOGUE of the Second Portion of the Library of the late Prof. YORK POWELL, comprising History and Biography, Antiquarian Works, European and Oriental Literature and Philology, &c.—B. H. BLACKWELL, 50 & 51 Broad Street, Oxford.

[In last week's ACADEMY the above Catalogue was announced as "Ready Next Week" instead of as "Now Ready."]

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS., 10d. per 1000, all descriptions; neat, prompt, accurate; duplicating a speciality. Shorthand, testimonials.—Mrs. MICHEL, 23 Quarrendon Street, Fulham, S.W.

AUTHORS' MSS., Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, &c., carefully typed at home (Remington), 9d. per 1000 words. Orders promptly executed.—M. M. L. 7 Vemon Road, Clapham, S.W.

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. from 10d. per 1000 words; qualified proof reader; testimonials; accuracy; promptitude, Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

TYPEWRITING (Smith Premier).—Scientific, Legal MSS., Plays, Translations, Duplicates, Novels, 9d. 1000.—Miss HANDLEY, Berkhamsted, Herts.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS., Sermons, &c., accurately, neatly and promptly executed at 8d. per 1000 words. Unsolicited Testimonials.—Miss A. MASSIE, "Strathairn," New Bield, Kent.

* Advertisers are requested to state clearly on their Advertisement Copy whether "Wanted" or "For Sale," and also to write distinctly.

Wanted

BOOKSELLERS IN BIRMINGHAM. —

"Mr. E. Baker is a very experienced bookseller."—Bazaar Exchange and Mart. All out-of-print books supplied, no matter what the subject. The most expert bookfinder extant. Please state wants. BOOKS WANTED—£50 offered for Vanity Fair, 20 Nos., 1847-48; £50 for Walton's Angler, 1653; £50 for Jorrock's Jaunts, 1843; £50 for Orme's British Field Sports, 1807; £50 for Shelley's Queen Mab, boards, 1813; £3 for Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare, 2 vols., 1807; 2 for Poetry for Children, 2 vols., 1809; 25s. for Rosamund Gray: a Tale, 1798—Baker's Great Bookshops, John Bright St., Birmingham.

GIRLS' REALM, November 1901. Autocar, April 16, 1904. No. 443, Vol. 12.—W. E. Clegg, 30 Market Place and Peter Street, Oldham.

ONE VOLUME EDITION (abridged) of the Memoirs, Journal and Correspondence of Thomas Moore, London, 1860.—J. C. L. Clark, Lancaster, Mass., U.S.A.

CRICKET SCORES, any scarce—Madden's Master William Silence, 1897.—The Chaucer Book Co., 37 St. Martin's Court, W.C.

THE ECLECTIC REVIEW, 120 Vols, 1805 to 1865, "runs" or smaller portions of which a list can be obtained.—Charles Higham, 27A Farringdon Street, E.C.

OLD Views (not very small) of Richmond, Kew, Sheen, Petersham, Isleworth, Mortlake, Twickenham, and neighbourhood.—Hiscocke & Sons, Richmond, Surrey.

MEMOIRS of the Distinguished Men of Science living in the years 1807-8 (being a Key to a large Engraving) 1862. The Engraving also wanted.—A. Iredale, The Strand, Torquay.

THIBAUT, Purity in Musical Composition. Fechner, Life After Death. Dévinne, Parish of Birse. Inglis, An Augustine Parish. Augustine, City of God (cheap edition).—A. & R. Milne, Aberdeen.

DRYDEN'S Virgil, good type. Dion Areopagita, Parker's trans., 2 vols. Evelyn Diary, 1827, Vol. 5. Books on Cyprus before 1800.—H. H. Peach, 37 Belvoir Street, Leicester.

SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE, Xmas No., 1903. Price and condition to W. Tee, Palm Road, Rumbold.

PARADISE OF ENGLISH POETRY, 2 vols., (Beeching); John Morley's Works; Matthew Arnold's Essays; Hours in a Library.—X., Green Royd, Fulwood, Preston.

THE TREASURY for September 1903. Hon. Librarian, 14 Avonmore Gardens, Avonmore Rd., W.

For Sale

FIRST Editions. Pickwick, cloth, uncut, 25s. Oliver Twist, 3 vols, half roan, 21s. Bleak House, half calf, 10s. Nicholas Nickleby, half calf, 10s. Cricket, cloth, 6s. Battle of Life, cloth, 5s.—David Cadney, Cambridge.

ENGLISH Revolution of Twentieth Century, dealing with Taxation, Housing, Land, Drink, Education and Woman Questions, 488 pages, art linen, gilt, 2s. only, post free.—Joseph Edwards, Reformer's Year Book Office, Ki-kintilloch, Glasgow.

VAN LENNER'S Dex Ross van Dekama, Pleegzoon, Elizabeth Musch, Huyck, 8 vols. Cloth as new. 21s.—Galloway and Porter, Booksellers, Cambridge.

COLLECTION of Hymn Books, about 500 Vols., all different. For particulars apply to W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

VANITY FAIR.—20 vols. from 1872-86. Mrs. Highmore, Worcester Park, Surrey.

WARING'S Art Treasures of the United Kingdom, 100 beautifully executed Coloured Plates, folio calf, extra gilt, 50s.—Hiscocke & Son, Richmond, Surrey.

A BARGAIN. The Popular Encyclopædia, illustrated, 14 vols., roy. 8vo, cloth, £ (cost £8 8s.).—George T. Jukes & Co., Booksellers, Birmingham.

DRAWING by her late Majesty Queen Victoria. "Islay," an Aberdeen Terrier, the favourite dog of the Queen, drawn from nature, Sept. 1840. What offers?—P., 8 Dolphin Row, Slough.

"TO-DAY," complete, clean run of the two-penny issue, from start in '93 to conclusion last February. What offers? H. M. Prideaux, Literary and Philosophic Club, Bristol.

HUTTER'S Hebrew Bible, date 1587, folio, good condition, re-bound 120 years ago.—Ross, Hope House, Kersall, Manchester.

PIPSYCHIDION, Verses addressed to the Noble Lady Emilia V.—1821.

Erasmus, Praise of Folly, Englished by Chaloner, sm. 4to, 1549, or 1569.

Essay on the External Use of Water, 4to, 1752.

Essays of Elia, 1823.

E-tienne (H.), Art of Devises, 4to, 1650.

Euphranor, a Dialogue on Youth, 8vo, Pickering, 1851.

Evans (J.) Ancient Stone Implements, 1872.

Evelina, 3 vols, 1778, or vol. 3.

Evelina, any edition in 2 or 3 vols. before 1820.

Evelina, or Female Life in London, 1821 or 1822.

Experienced Angler, 1668.

Experiment and Observations on Electricity, London, 1751.

Exquisites (The) a Farce, 1839, with 4 plates, private circulation, 8vo.

Eyton (R. W.) Antiquities of Shropshire, 12 vols, 8vo, 1854-60.

Fagan's Engraving in England, 3 vols., large folio, 1893.

Faithorne (W.) The Art of Graving and Etching, 8vo, 1662.

Falconry in the British Isle, 1873.

Fancy (The) or True Sportsman's Guide, 2 vols., 1826.

Fashionable Boreds, &c., by Peter Quiz, oblong 4to, 1824.

Faulkner, a Tragedy, by W. Godwin, 1807.

Faulkner's History of Chelsea, roy. 8vo, 1810.

History of Fulham, roy. 8vo or 4to, 1813.

Faulkner (T.) History of Kensington, 4to, 1820, or any of his Histories.

Walter T. Spencer, 27, New Oxford Street, W.C.

STUDIO, Nos. 75-81 to 87, 89 to 93, 95 to 97 100, 101, 104, 105. Altogether 20 Monthly Parts, 10s. 6d. The Pageant, 1897, 3s. 11d.—J. W. Thompson, 45 Pasture Street, Grimsby.

EDWARD FITZGERALD, Letters and Literary Remains, 3 vols., edit. by Wright, 30s.; Morley's History of English Literature, 5 vols., bound in 3, half calf, 17s. 6d. Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

LETTERS to A. G. and H. G. (Gladstone) by John Ruskin, privately printed, 25 shillings. Ashbee's Reprint Wren's Parentalia, No. 94 (250 copies), £3 10s.—X., 1 Regent Terrace, Cambridge.

THE LONDON PLEASURE GARDENS OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY, by Warwick Worth, 15s. net for 7s. 6d. The Sabbath in Puritan New England, by Alice M. Earle, 6s., for 2s. 9d. English Lyrics, Chaucer to Poe. Selected by W. E. Henley, 6s., for 3s. 8d.—Young's Library, 179 Kensington High Street, W.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIUMS.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper

THE DAILY CHRONICLE

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes. Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art Specially dealt with

Fullest Reports of All Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

NOTICE.

"THE ACADEMY" is POSTED FREE (52 issues at 3d.) to every ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying 13s. FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a PREPAYMENT of 17s. 6d. will secure it being sent Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy. Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or Newsvendor, or direct to the Publisher, 5-7 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST & AFTER DINNER.

& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SURPLUS LIBRARY BOOKS & NEW REMAINDERS

OFFERED AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

The MARCH LIST, NOW READY, contains Popular Works on Sport, Travel, Biography, and Fiction.

Sent POST FREE on application to

MUDIE'S LIBRARY,

30-34 New Oxford Street, London.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

FOUNDED 1837.

Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Invested Capital £30,000.

A UNIQUE INVESTMENT offered to London Booksellers and their Assistants. A young man or woman of twenty-five can invest the sum of Twenty guineas (or its equivalent by instalments), and obtain the right to participate in the following advantages:—FIRST.—Freedom from want in time of Adversity as long as need exists. SECOND.—Permanent Relief in Old Age. THIRD.—Medical advice by eminent Physicians and Surgeons. FOURTH.—A Cottage in the Country (Abbots Langley, Hertfordshire) for aged members, with garden produce, coal, and medical attendance free, in addition to an annuity. FIFTH.—A furnished house in the same Retreat at Abbots Langley for the free use of Members and their families for holidays or during convalescence. SIXTH.—A contribution towards Funeral expenses when it is needed. SEVENTH.—All these are available not for Members only, but also for their wives or widows and young children. EIGHTH.—The payment of the subscriptions confers an absolute right to these benefits in all cases of need. For further information apply to the Secretary, Mr. GEORGE LARNER, 23 Paternoster Row, E.C.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS

JIU - JITSU ;

or, Japanese Physical Training.

Jiu-Jitsu is the Japanese method of physical training.

Jiu-Jitsu has been practised by the Japanese 2500 years.

Jiu-Jitsu means "muscle-breaking."

Jiu-Jitsu helps the weak to master the strong.

Jiu-Jitsu is the most wonderful of all systems in building up the Perfect, Healthy Body.

For further information read Mr. Irving Hancock's timely works.

All these volumes are most excellently and numerous illustrated with Full-page Photographs taken from life.

They are of a handy size, 7½ by 5½ inches, and well produced in cloth binding. We will send any volume, post free, on receipt of a remittance. They are published at

EACH 5s. NET EACH

Japanese Physical Training.

Physical Training for Women by Japanese Methods.

Physical Training for Children by Japanese Methods.

Jiu-Jitsu Combat Tricks.

The Case for Physical Culture. (Nearly ready.)

In a certain renowned Japanese wrestling match the expert in Jiu-Jitsu was a mere pigmy compared with his opponent who wrestled by ordinary methods, but within a few seconds of the commencement of the combat the giant was on his back perfectly helpless.

If you want to get some idea of these books before ordering, send us a post-card with your name and address, and we will send you by return a little booklet telling you all about their contents. Please mention this journal.

RABELAIS. Including all the Best Chapters of his famous "Romances of Gargantua and Pantagruel" (the Seventeenth Century Version of Urquhart and Motteux). 1 vol. 8vo, cloth extra, 7s. 6d. net.

FIRST ISSUE IN

French Classics for English Readers.

Edited by ADOLPHE COHN, LL.B., and CURTIS HIDDEN PAGE, Ph.D.

The design of the series is to present the chief French authors in the best possible translation to English readers, to meet the need of many who are interested in French literature and desire to know it directly, but who cannot easily read its authors in the original, and to fill the lack of adequate and dignified representation of these authors in public and private libraries.

OTHER VOLUMES IN PREPARATION :

Montaigne, Moliere (2 vols.), Beaumarchais, George Sand.

THE KAISER AS HE IS : or, the Real William II. (Le Veritable Guillaume II.). By HENRI DE NOUSSANNE. Translated into English by WALTER LITTLEFIELD, Author of "The Truth about Dreyfus," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

CONSTANTINE THE GREAT. The Reorganisation of the Empire and the Triumph of the Church. By J. B. FIRTH, Author of "Augustus Caesar," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, fully illustrated, 5s. No. 39 in the "Heroes of the People."

THOMAS CRANMER AND THE ENGLISH REFORMATION, 1489-1556. By ALBERT FREDERICK POLLARD, M.A., F.R.H.S., Author of "Henry VIII," "England under Protector Somerset," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, fully illustrated, 6s. No. 6 in "Heroes of Reformation" Series.

WOMEN AND ECONOMICS. By CHARLOTTE PERKINS STETSON. A Study of the economic relation between Men and Women as a Factor in Social Evolution. New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

NEW FICTION

A SELF-MADE MAN'S WIFE. Her Letters to her Son. Being the Woman's View of Certain Famous Correspondence. By CHARLES EUSTACE MERRIMAN, Author of "Letters from a Son to a Self-made Father," Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s. [In the press.]

MY LADY OF THE NORTH. The Story of a Gray-Jacket. By RANDALL PARRISH. Author of "When Wilderness was King." Crown 8vo, cloth extra, with 4 Illustrations in Colour, 6s.

THE GIRL OF LA GLORIA. By CLARA DRISCOLL. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s. A charming love-story of Texas. The heroine, Ilaria, is the lost of an old Mexican family who have gradually been dispossessed of all their lands by the grasping Americans.

"WANTED A COOK." By ALAN DALE. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s. An uproariously funny comedy-novel of a self-conscious couple in contact with the servant question, the farce and satire of the æsthetic-home-life-in-a-flat paradox, told in Mr. Dale's brightly entertaining manner, all centring about the ludicrous predicaments with "Cook."

NEW LISTS AND ANNOUNCEMENTS NOW READY-

From Duckworth & Co.'s List

NEW BOOK By ELINOR GLYN,
Author of "The Visits of Elizabeth."

"She is at this moment our leading novelist of modern manners."—SPHERE.

THE VICISSITUDES OF EVANGELINE.

Coloured Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The author gives us distinct characters in dexterous touches, with capital scenes and situations from the comedy of life. Very charming."—The World.

"Mrs. Glyn possesses the power of presenting her scenes in such a way that they appear to be acted under our very eyes. She tells her tale in simple nervous language. We feel we are looking at real men and women. Gives a vitality which many more thoughtful writers fail to attain. Very effective."—Standard.

"Mrs. Glyn set all society laughing. The clever, satiric pages will find thousands of readers. We have all the portrait-painting, cynicism, and humour that we expect sprinkled through the pages."—Daily Express.

GOSSIP

By BENJAMIN SWIFT, Author of "In Piccadilly," "Life's Questionings," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Very characteristic of the author's undoubted talent."—Speaker.

"Full of 'brains' and of skilful work."—To-Day.

"A magnificent book," says The World, of PROGRESS

By R. B. CUNNINGHAME-GRAHAM. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Rich in observation. Briefly, he is in this volume a master of the sublime, the showy the pathetic, the picturesque."—See The World.

THE GREY BRETHREN

By MICHAEL FAIRLESS, AUTHOR OF "THE ROADMENDER." Uni m with "The Roadmender." Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

BOOKS AND THINGS

By G. S. STREET. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Most delightful reading, full of the kindly cynicism and whimsical philosophy one has grown to expect from Mr. Street's diamond-pointed pen."—World.

AUGUSTE RODIN

By CAMILLE MAUCLAIR. With 40 Illustrations. Photogravure Frontispiece, Crown 4to, 10s. 6d. net.

The life, ideas, and work of the great French sculptor, who has succeeded Whistler as President of the International Society, are here presented.

"The most complete and authoritative account. M. Maclair has the advantage of being an intimate friend. . . . Many photographs of unusual excellence."—Daily Chronicle.

ALBERT DURER

By T. STURGE MOORE. With four Copper-plates and 50 Half-tone Engravings. Pott 4to, 7s. 6d. net.

GIOTTO

By BASIL DE SELINCOURT. 45 Illustrations. Pott 4to, 7s. 6d. net.

VELAZQUEZ

By AUGUSTE BREAL, Author of "Rembrandt." With 45 Illustrations. Cloth, 2s. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net. (In the "Popular Library of Art.")

Ask your Bookseller to show you all the Volumes issued in

DUCKWORTH'S POPULAR LIBRARY OF ART.

Cloth, 2s. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

CRITICAL STUDIES AND FRAGMENTS

By the late S. ARTHUR STRONG With Memoir by LORD BALCARRES. Royal 8vo, with 22 Illustrations. 16s. net.

METAPSYCHICAL PHENOMENA

By Dr. JOSEPH MAXWELL. With Prefaces by Sir OLIVER LODGE and Prof. CH. RICHET. Large Crown 8vo, 10s. net.

IDEALS AND REALITIES IN RUSSIAN LITERATURE

By PRINCE KROPOTKIN. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

3 HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN.

H. J. GLAISHER'S LIST

New Volume of Poems by the Author of
"The Pageant of Life."

Vox Clamantis: Sonnets and Poems.
By GEORGE BARLOW, fcap. 8vo. 1s. 6d. net.

The Philosophy of Dickens: A Study of his Life and Teaching as a Social Reformer. With Portrait. By Mrs. BAILLIE SAUNDERS. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

X-Rays: Their Employment in Cancer and other Diseases. By R. J. COWEN. Crown 8vo. 2s. 6d. net.

The Cancer Problem in a Nutshell. By ROBERT BELL, M.D. Demy 8vo. 1s. net.

A Short Essay on Insanity. By CHARLES WILLIAMS, M.D. Demy 8vo. 1s. net.

Graphology Made Easy. A Manual of Instruction in Character Reading from Handwriting, with Illustrations. By R. DIMSDALE STOCKER, with an Appendix by INA OXENFORD. Cheap Edition. Crown 8vo. 6d. net.

H. J. GLAISHER, 57 Wigmore St., London, W.

Newnes' Thin Paper Classics

Printed in large, clear type on extremely thin but thoroughly opaque paper. Photogravure Frontispiece and Title-page. Narrow fcap. 8vo (6½ by 3½), Gilt Tops, Cloth Limp, 3s. net. Limp Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net per Vol.

SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS AND POEMS.
In 3 Volumes, with Glossary.

MILTON'S POEMS.

BURNS' POEMS.

DON QUIXOTE.

BACON'S WORKS.

SHELLEY'S POEMS.

PEPYS' DIARY.

KEATS' POEMS.

POE'S TALES.

EVELYN'S DIARY.

LAMB'S WORKS.

THE VISION OF DANTE.

PEACOCK'S NOVELS.

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON. 2 Vols.

HAWTHORNE'S NEW ENGLAND ROMANCES.

TENNYSON'S POEMS. 1830-1859.

LANDOR'S SHORTER WORKS.

WALPOLE'S LETTERS.

INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.

POEMS OF WORDSWORTH. Edited by PROFESSOR KNIGHT.

MRS. BROWNING'S POEMS. 2 Vols.

THE TRAVELS OF MARCO POLO.

THE LIFE AND VOYAGES OF CAPTAIN COOK.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENVENUTO CELLINI.

HOMER'S ILIADS. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.

HOMER'S ODYSSEYS AND SHORTER POEMS. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.

SWIFT'S JOURNAL TO STELLA. With other Writings relating to Stella and Vanessa.

COLERIDGE'S POEMS. Edited by Professor KNIGHT.

EARLY ITALIAN POETS. By D. G. ROSSETTI.
"Newnes' elegant and compact series of classics in limp leather. We expect a great success for these editions."—Athenæum.

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

THE GARDEN LOVER'S SERIES

Edited by ALFRED H. HYATT. Royal 18mo. 3s. 6d. net each volume. The set of three volumes, uniformly and artistically bound and enclosed in canvas case, 10s. 6d. net.

(i) A GARDEN LOVER'S BIRTHDAY BOOK

This birthday book contains extracts taken by permission from the writings of the most popular authors of the day, and of the most eminent poets, essayists, and novelists of the past, and so arranged as to form in some measure a garden calendar and anthology.

"The anthology is very full and well chosen."—Country Life.

"Exactly the right thing. A dainty volume."—Yorkshire Post.

(ii) A BOOK OF SUNDIAL MOTTOES

Preface by ALICE MEYNELL.

"A pretty book, the mottoes (with translations) from many books dating back to 1635; with extracts, 'In Praise of Sundials.'"—The Times.

"An admirable collection of quaint mottoes."—Daily News.

"An ideal table-book—pleasant to look at, and suggestive to look into."—The Leisure Hour.

(iii) THE GARDEN OF PLEASANT FLOWERS

Being a description of the most familiar of our English garden flowers, from the famous collection of John Parkinson. Chosen and arranged by ALFRED H. HYATT. 3s. 6d. net.

This selection from "the best book about gardening ever written" gives in reasonable compass the essence of the bulky volume entitled Paradisus Terrestris, which has always held the highest place in every garden-lover's library.

"An exquisite little volume."—Country Life.

"Mr. Hyatt has made an exceptional collection."—Academy and Literature.

"A charming manual for any one who is fond of old books and fresh flowers."—Scotsman.

"If only most books purporting to be artistic were as well done!"—F. L. GRIGGS (The well known Black-and-White artist).

THE MUSIC OF THE MASTERS

Edited by WAKELING DRY.

The following volumes of this series are now ready. 2s. 6d. net per volume.

(i) WAGNER

By ERNEST NEWMAN.

(ii) TCHAIKOVSKI

By E. MARKHAM LEE, M.A., Mus. Doc.

(iii) BEETHOVEN

By ERNEST WALKER, Mus. Doc.

"Attractive, handy, and of real value to the student and concert-goer."—Unanimous opinion of "THE PRESS."

PHILIP WELLBY, 6 HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.

VOL. IV. NOW READY.

DIARY AND LETTERS OF MADAME D'ARBLAY.

(1778-1840). As Edited by her Niece, CHAR-LOITE BARRETT. With Preface and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON. With Photogravure Portraits and other Sketches. In 6 vols. Vol. I., 1778 to June 1781. Vol. II., 1781-86. Vol. III., August 1786 to June 1788. Vol. IV., July 1788 to July 1791. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net each.

WILLIAM RATHBONE: A Memoir.

By ELEANOR F. RATHBONE. With Portraits. Extra crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS.

NEW SERIES.

Crown 8vo, gilt tops, flat backs. 2s. net each.

EDWARD FITZGERALD.

By A. C. BENSON. [Shortly.]

SYDNEY SMITH.

By GEORGE W. E. RUSSELL.

TWELVE ENGLISH STATESMEN.

CONCLUDING VOLUME.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. each.

CHATHAM.

By FREDERIC HARRISON.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.—"Though there have been several admirable books in this series, this is one of the best. Lucid, amid a tangle of details, vivid without being too highly coloured, faithful to the statesman, while mindful of the man, it comes near the model of what such a book should be."

PREVIOUSLY PUBLISHED.

WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR. By EDWARD A. FREEMAN, D.C.L., LL.D.

HENRY II. By Mrs. J. R. GREEN.

EDWARD I. By Prof. T. F. TOUT.

HENRY VII. By Dr. JAMES GAIRDNER.

CARDINAL WOLSEY. By Bishop CREIGHTON.

ELIZABETH. By Prof. E. S. BEESLY.

OLIVER CROMWELL. By FREDERIC HARRISON.

WILLIAM III. By H. D. TRAILL.

WALPOLE. By JOHN MORLEY.

PITT. By Lord ROSEBURY.

PEEL. By J. S. THURSFIELD.

THE BRITISH ARMY (1783-1802).

Four Lectures delivered at the Staff College and Cavalry School. By the Hon. J. W. FORTESCUE.

Author of "A History of the British Army." With Maps. 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY.

ROMAN SOCIETY, From Nero to Marcus Aurelius.

By Prof. SAMUEL DILL, M.A., Litt.D., LL.D. 8vo, 15s. net.

MORNING POST.—"The book is one of the best we have read for a long time."

THE LOGIC OF HUMAN CHARACTER.

By CHARLES J. WHITBY, B.A., M.D. Cantab. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net. [Tuesday.]

A NEW VOLUME OF LENTEN READINGS CHRIST THE LIFE AND LIGHT.

Lenten Readings selected from the Writings of the Right Rev. PHILLIPS BROOKS, D.D. By W. M. L. JAY. Crown 8vo, 6s.

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.

THE DIARY OF A CHURCH-GOER.

Crown 8vo, gilt top, 3s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN'S NEW NOVELS.

Crown 8vo, 6s. each.

MAURICE HEWLETT.

FOND ADVENTURES. Tales of the Youth of the World. [April 7.]

RHODA BROUGHTON.

A WAIF'S PROGRESS. [Shortly.]

GERTRUDE ATHERTON.

THE BELL IN THE FOG, and Other Stories.

ARTHUR TRESIDDER SHEPPARD.
THE RED CRAVAT.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	261	Marcel Schwob	276
Literature :		A Literary Causerie	277
Coventry Patmore	265	Bedlam in Literature	278
Tragedy [Second Notice]	266	Slang	279
Chatham	267	The Two Arrows	280
Balzac	268	Fiction	280
Wilhelm Hauff	269	The Bookshelf	281
England's Friends and Enemies	270	The Drama : "Agatha" at His Majesty's Theatre	281
Two Italian Cities	271	Fine Art : Miniatures Ancient and Modern	282
Fiji Folk-lore	272	Science : On Atomic Architecture	283
Old Furniture	272	Music : The "Symphonia Domestica" — Another View	284
A Fifth-Monarchy Man	273	Correspondence	285
Scholar and Martyr	273	Queries and Answers	285
Classical Economics	274
On the Snaffle	274
Canning's "Anti-Jacobin"	275
Books Received	286

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17s. 6d. a year

THE LITERARY WEEK

WITH Mr. Carruthers Gould as prior or chairman, Sir Edward Grey as chief guest, and a great number of other notabilities, including Lord Rosebery and Mr. Winston Churchill among those present, the annual dinner of the Whitefriars Club, held at the Trocadero last Friday night, must be described as brilliant. Many changes have come over this club since the days when it consisted of a knot of journalists who met every Friday in Anderton's Hotel to consume a modest dinner and chat over the events of the week. It has greatly increased in size and influence, and its dinners are stately and elaborate, with a toast list as carefully drawn up as the list of speakers at a Lord Mayor's banquet. Even in its modest early days it frequently attracted men of eminence, but now it sparkles with what our transatlantic friends would call "a galaxy of brilliance." On Friday night thin black lines of editors stretched from point to point, and were only broken by the occasional intrusion of distinguished lawyers and men of letters.

The speech of the evening was undoubtedly that of Sir Edward Grey. It was literary in the best sense. Sir Edward's clear-cut features suggest his style of oratory. Yet it was not the clearness and precision that lent charm to the speech, but what we may call the sub-tint, the under-current, above which the jest and laughter and wit were but as the surface ripples on a wind-swept stream. Below there was the desire older than Horace, old as poetry itself, for that golden age in the life of man when work being over he may "close the shop," be the shop politics or art or business, and betake himself to the house he has dreamt of where the garden is always fair and a stream runs by for ever. The passionate desire for this rest gave to Sir Edward's words a nameless charm, a fine fragrance not often found in what this was in the main, a witty and entertaining after-dinner speech. It was none the less felt because of the unconsciousness and spontaneity of the speaker.

Among the definite opinions ventilated by Sir Edward Grey was one that the vital reading of a man is usually done between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-five. There are no doubt precocious children who attack masterpieces before they get to their 'teens, but the majority of us gorged ourselves with rubbish in childhood. Once in our lives Mayne Reid and Marryat and Dumas were the literary kings. But the healthy advancing mind throws the rubbish aside as time goes on and the maturing judgment begins to drift and search for the mental food that the individuality requires. About thirty-five, however, the bones of the intellect, to write in a metaphor, begin to indurate. After forty the minds of few men continue to expand though the judgment may continue to ripen. The page we turn later is "not verse now, only prose." Quite true, yet so various and versatile is man that it is unsafe to repose too implicitly in the general. To the writer's mind comes the memory of a pair of old but fine grey eyes, a white beard, an enthusiastic face, and while the vibrating voice that went with these features keeps ringing in his mental ears he will ever be careful to set no limit to the age of human development.

A certain amount of regret will be felt at what practically amounts to the merger of the St. James's Gazette in the Evening Standard, the two papers on Tuesday being for the first time issued as one under the title of The Evening Standard and St. James's Gazette. It carries us a long way back to remember the origin of the St. James's. It was, as most of our readers will know, the invention of Mr. Frederick Greenwood, who for many years previously had been editing another paper that he founded himself, the Pall Mall Gazette. The history of the latter had been peculiar. Its beginning was something new in English journalism, something that was better than any preceding attempt. Never before had an editor tried to present to his readers day by day so much literary work of the highest class and so much opinion and comment that always were, so to speak, on the top of the intellectual wave of the moment. But the English public does not rush in its myriads to support an innovation of this kind, and though the Pall Mall Gazette reflected the utmost credit on all who had to do with it, it did not yield the fabulous fortune which later journals have done.

When Mr. Greenwood's first evening paper changed hands it changed principles also, and in the high-minded way which is part of his nature he left it and ultimately founded the St. James's Gazette. It was a pleasure to read this paper as long as it was under his direction, since he had a wonderful gift for attracting the rising talent of the day and developing it. Richard Jefferies had been his most important discovery in his first venture, and in his second he had the pleasure of leading Mr. J. M. Barrie forth to the light. But he never depended on one contributor for the brilliance of the journals with which he was associated, and during his editorship the St. James's Gazette read like a first-class magazine issued nightly. On his resignation, which was brought about under circumstances that need not be described here, he was followed by his very capable lieutenant Mr. Sidney Low, who is now literary editor of the Standard, and Mr. Low in his turn was succeeded by Mr. Hugh Chisholm, now the acting editor of the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

It would be difficult to follow the subsequent fortunes and vicissitudes of this evening paper, which seemed to some of us to lose a great deal of its charm while gaining or attempting to gain what is popularly known as go and actuality. It has, we understand, had many editors during the past few years, clever and capable men no doubt, but wanting in the knack of interesting the most cultivated circle of readers. The amalgamation is very singular, because the distinction of the Evening Standard has always lain in the promptitude of its news service, while the traditions of the journal now merged in it are those of leisurely and quiet culture. However, out of the two it is possible that something original may be created. We can only hope that the new editor will do his best to keep his paper up to the highest standard, and not play down to the multitude. He has plenty of contemporaries who are doing that already.

In this connection it is pleasant to know that the friends of Mr. Frederick Greenwood are to give a banquet to his honour in the beginning of April. Mr. Greenwood, who is now in his seventy-fifth year, has been far more than an ordinary journalist. Oftener than anybody else he has been asked to give counsel as to the government of the country, and many important measures, such as the purchase of the Suez Canal shares, were due to his initiative. Mr. George Meredith, in the letter which has been published announcing the dinner, does no more than justice to the most distinguished publicist of his time.

Admirers of the late Mr. W. E. Henley will be glad to know that adequate steps have been taken to commemorate one of the most striking and potent personalities that ever figured in the literary circles of London. Leave has been given for a statue to be erected to him in Westminster Abbey. It is the work of M. Rodin and is done from the one with which Mr. Henley's friends are familiar. In his old school there is to be instituted a Henley Gold Medal that will be given as a prize for literature. Probably, if he were alive, he would not wish for any more suitable means of keeping his memory green. The number of those who knew him personally is bound to dwindle now as the years glide away, and though his works will remain, it will be as difficult to hand down the memory of his vital personality to succeeding generations as it is to preserve the effect produced by some "well graced actor" on the stage.

We found the following in the letter-box: "Your remarks in last week's issue about the decadence of the best weekly reviews are no doubt just as far as they go, and I hope your forecast of their revival will be justified by the event, but you do not admit an essential part of the explanation. In the 'sixties literary criticism was practically confined to a very small number of journals; now it is diffused over the morning and evening papers. These have improved to an immense degree, and do you not think that their treatment of books is on the whole prompt and adequate to the needs of the general reader? A small but select minority of fastidious and cultivated book-lovers may require more, but the ordinary man or woman who asks for a review simply to order the right book for his or her library will surely find all he requires in the book department of his political or commercial newspaper." This communication was signed "Senex."

Willingly and gladly is it admitted that English daily journalism has improved enormously, and that the newspapers of 1865 are not for wealth of news, accuracy, and intelligence of comment to be compared with those of 1905. Much of the reviewing in the latter, perhaps the greater part of it, is well done, yet we have to remember, as no less an authority than Mr. George Meredith has pointed out, that a great deal is lacking in outspoken frankness or good judgment. It happens that an apt illustration is before us as we write. The subject of the review is "A Secret Woman" by Eden Phillpotts, an author for whom we have the greatest respect. "The Secret Woman" is a piece of honest good work, but hear how it is described in the columns of an evening contemporary by a reviewer who signs himself "James Douglas." Within the space of a few lines it is referred to as "one of the greatest novels in literature," "a masterpiece," "a superb achievement," and "a masterpiece of the first order." It happens that the author in question knows what a masterpiece really should be, and he must have blushed at reading this.

But the reviewer is not exhausted. He finds that by virtue of this novel Mr. Eden Phillpotts has entered into "the noble company of the masters," and is now the fellow of Fielding and Scott, Dickens and Thackeray, Meredith and Hardy, Turgeniev and Tolstoy. The humour of his rustics is compared to that of Thomas Hardy and Shakespeare (!) and declared to be "as fine as anything George Eliot ever wrote." If Senex does not consider this to be a fair example of what is offered as literary criticism we would ask him how many "masterpieces" and "superb achievements" are discovered in the course of a fortnight by the daily reviewers, and if any trust is to be placed in those who at small provocation gush in this manner over the most unexpected subject. Mr. Eden Phillpotts is to be commiserated for having been made the subject of such foolish remarks. He has won a high place for himself, but the only effect of the comparisons here instituted must be to make him appear ridiculous. Now, Senex, if this is the character of your "diffused" criticism there is plenty of room for a different style of journalism.

We still seem to be at sixes and sevens—or to be more precise at fives and sixes—over the date of Edmund Waller's birth, which has come to be generally accepted as having taken place on March 3, 1605. There is no doubt, however, that it actually occurred a year later, as may be verified by a reference to the Amersham Parish Register of March 9, 1606, on which day he was baptized. A certain "writ of oustre" declaring that on October 4, 1616, Edmund Waller was ten years — months old (the number of months is obliterated) might easily have attracted the attention of one or another of his editors to a discrepancy, but no one seems to have thought of consulting the Register till Mr. T. G. Drury cited it in the introduction to his edition of the poet. The mistake is no doubt initially attributable to the old practice of beginning the New Year on March 25. Curiously enough, Mr. Saintsbury's "Short History of English Literature" gives both dates, 1605 in the text and 1606 in the index.

It would no doubt be possible for a special pleader to contend that English literature has gained by its insularity more than it has lost. "Every nation mocks at other nations," he might quote from Schopenhauer, "and all are right." He would find, however, few arguments to support his theory in the literary past. The debt of Chaucer to France, of the early sonneteers to Italy, and of Coleridge to German thought, would be formidable obstacles in his path. Boundary commissions, in fact, have little jurisdiction in the world of letters, and, to say nothing of other professions, the more the writer knows of the literature of other countries the less will his outlook be narrowed by passing conventions. For this reason the action of Oxford University in suspending the Taylorian scholarships in French, German, Italian, and Spanish is to be regretted. For fifty years these scholarships have proved an inducement to students to go beyond the strict limits of the academic course, and the roll of scholars, if it does not include others of the calibre of the first winning candidate, Mr. Swinburne, contains the names of several whose subsequent success may be traced in a measure to this encouragement to the study of modern languages. The suspension may be sound finance, but it is bad policy.

Mrs. Humphry Ward's new novel raises the whole question of the roman à clef. In France this is almost a term of abuse; though there is at any rate one great writer, Anatole France, who "puts real people" into his stories. Thus, in "Le Lys Rouge" it is not difficult to perceive the portrait of a well-known English woman writer. In "The Marriage of William Ashe," Mrs. Ward has not only adopted the story of Lord Melbourne and Lady Caroline Lamb, and utilised the picturesque personality of the most gorgeous Lady Blessington, who appears as Madame D'Estrées, but has not disdained to employ, with hardly any alteration, social episodes, and even minor social scandals of much later, indeed almost contemporary date. The actors in these are still very much alive, and in no sense the "pale ghosts" Mrs. Ward refers to in her preface!

The appearance of a fresh instalment of "Sherlock Holmes" may give point to a reminiscence of an earlier Sherlock Holmes—a Sherlock Holmes, in fact, who flourished in North America in the seventeenth century. The story is of an Indian who, finding that some venison had been stolen from his hut, set out to pursue the thief. He had not gone far before he was heard to inquire from some travellers whom he met whether they had seen a little old white man with a short gun, accompanied by a small dog with a little tail. He was asked how he had arrived at that description of the marauder, and his answer was:

"The thief I know is a little man by his having made a pile of stones to stand upon in order to reach the venison; that he is an old man I know by his short steps, which I have traced over the dead leaves in the wood; and that he is a white man I know by his turning out his toes when he walks, which an Indian never does. His gun I know to be short by the mark the muzzle made in rubbing the bark off the tree on which it leaned; that his dog is small I know by its tracks; and that it has a short tail I discovered by the mark it made in the dust where it was sitting at the time its master was taking down the meat."

These, it is clear, are the methods of Sherlock Holmes and of no other. But does any one—does Sir Arthur Conan Doyle himself—know the source of the quotation? We are almost tempted to offer a prize to anyone who will detect its origin, but decide on second thoughts to disclose the secret. It comes from the works of Charlevoix, the Jesuit traveller who explored the Saint Lawrence and the Mississippi.

Two French houses with interesting associations claim mention—the one because it is to be pulled down, the other because it is to be preserved as a place of pilgrimage. The former is the house in the Rue Notre-Dame-des-champs, in which Victor Hugo wrote "Hernani," and from which he was evicted because of the disturbance made by the many friends who called to congratulate him on the success of that famous play which launched the romantic movement. "I am very sorry. I shall miss you," said the proprietress, who herself occupied a flat in the building, to Madame Hugo. "But what am I to do? I came here for tranquillity, and there is always this coming and going on the stairs. How sorry I feel for you, my dear lady! What a hard trade it is that your poor husband follows!"

The other house is "Les Charmettes," at Chambéry, where Madame de Warens, Claude Anet, and Jean-Jacques Rousseau had their curious "ménage à trois." The description of the life forms one of the most idyllic passages of the "Confessions." The French Government has voted £1000 for the acquisition of the villa which is to be classed with "historical monuments," and will doubtless receive the sentimental homage of many tourists in the course of the summer.

Most of the original furniture, including the harp-ichord, is still at "Les Charmettes," but there is question of purchasing an interesting relic in the shape of Jean-Jacques' writing-desk for installation there. This was bought at Clarens, during the Emigration, by another distinguished French author, Joseph de Maistre, to whom it was a joy to sit at the philosopher's desk in order to confute the philosopher's doctrines. It is now in the possession of his grandson, Count François de Maistre, at the Chateau of Vendeuil, in the department of the Oise.

The English reader who chances to light on Guillaume's latest volume of sketches, "Les Unes et les Autres" ("Both Sorts"), will be well advised not to let credulity mingle too freely with his amusement. Society under the Third Republic, though not essentially virtuous, is by no means wholly given to the occupation of infringing the seventh commandment—as the uninformed might be tempted to suppose from these clever pictures. Leaving this aspect of the artist's work aside, the volume will be found remarkably pleasant as a collection of sidelights on Parisian character. The undertaker's clerk who explains to two sorrowing relatives that white drapings are not suitable for the funeral of a "démouille" aged 89, because "they make people laugh so," is a type from life. Lovers of art will appreciate Guillaume's passion for experiment, of which nearly every sketch bears evidence. In some cases English influence is apparent—notably that of Dewar and Du Maurier.

The French Société des Gens de lettres has appointed Mr. G. Herbert Thring, the Secretary of the Incorporated Society of Authors, and also of the Authors' Club, to be its London solicitor. Mr. Thring is a son of the famous headmaster of Uppingham, and was at Hertford College, Oxford, in the early 'eighties. Before succeeding Mr. Squire Spriggs in his present post, he was in practice as a solicitor, and at an earlier date he was a stockbroker.

It may be noted that the Société des Gens de lettres is the oldest of all the Associations for the defence of literary property, dating from as far back as 1837. Among the eminent men concerned in its foundation are included Théophile Gautier, Eugène Sue, Frédéric Soulié, Victor Hugo, and Honoré de Balzac; while George Sand, Alexandre Dumas, Etienne Arago, and Henri Martin were among its first adherents. It is much richer than the Society of Authors, since its members, in addition to paying their entrance fees and subscriptions, cede to the Society their second serial rights. The moneys thus provided are devoted to a pension fund, designed to grant annuities of 300 francs to all necessitous members over sixty years of age. Paul de Musset (Alfred's less famous brother) was one of the early pensioners, though he subsequently fell upon more fortunate times, and repaid the advances made to him.

A Bill to remove, or at least relieve, a copyright grievance, is to be introduced into the United States Legislature next autumn. The proposal is to accord English authors a six months' grace after the publication of their works in England before it shall be permissible for the American to reprint their writings without their leave. It would be a more civilised proceeding for the Americans to adhere to the Berne Convention; but the concession will at any rate be a good deal better than nothing. The unknown author who unexpectedly "booms" will have his chance of finding an American market; while the sale in America of the articles contributed to English magazines, at present very difficult to arrange, will be much facilitated. The cabling now necessary to secure simultaneous appearance on both sides of the ocean is an unmitigated nuisance to every one concerned except the Cable Companies; and these are happily too high-minded to mingle in the agitation.

The annals of criminology have received a notable addition by the publication of Signor Bianchi's "Autopsia di un Delitto" at the Libreria Editrice Nazionale, Milan. The subject of the book is, of course, the extraordinary Murri-Bonmartini case now undergoing trial. More than a passing literary interest attaches to the crime, which in its uncommon horror raises comparisons with the Caponsacchi case of "The Ring and the Book" or the Roman tale of murder and passion unfolded by Froude in one of his most engrossing essays. Signor Bianchi's analysis of this terrible mixture of refinement and ignorance, love and remorseless hatred, will have its value as a very curious study in morbid psychology (to coin a phrase) long after the case will have been forgotten by the public.

Italy is growing somewhat concerned at the ever-increasing English flood which threatens to undermine the pure Tuscan speech. So numerous have foreign neologisms become that Signor Alfredo Panzini has felt called upon to compile a "Dizionario Moderno," in which the interested will find many amusing English and quasi-English terms. Sporting words, as might be expected, are by far the most numerous, among them being "match" (popularly spelt "machk"), "sportsman," and "football." Cookery terms come next with "plum pudding," "grill-room," "sandwich," and "beef-steak."

Englishmen will not object to the naturalisation of "business," "club," "leader," "self-government," and "self-help," and will feel nothing but gentle curiosity at the fact that the Jameson incident has left its mark in Italy, as well as in France, with the word "raid"; but a respectful protest must be raised against the retention of such words and phrases as "spleen," "five o'clock tea," and "high-life," which learned cardinals and professors are wont to repeat with much satisfaction to themselves. Most strange of all, however, is the use of the word "smocking." The origin of this peculiar term is wrapped in mystery, but no member of the cercle at Milan has any doubt that "smocking" is good current English for a smart dress coat.

Visitors to Yasnaia Poliana, says the Novosti, report that Count Tolstoy has of late abandoned the reading of the newspapers, being content to get current information from his friends. He roams about a great deal, especially in the woods. His wounded leg, injured by a fall from his horse, has healed—and he feels more lively than ever. He works hard, and has finished and is revising three more works. In one of these he portrays a political criminal who, converted to true Christianity in prison, goes to the scaffold with the Gospel in his hands. These three works, one of which, "Chadji Murata," has already been outlined in the press, will only be printed after his death.

The engagement of Princess Margaret of Connaught to the son of the Crown Prince of Sweden and Norway has—indirectly—a certain literary interest. In this way: The Swedish Royal Family is perhaps the most bookishly inclined of any of the reigning families (excluding Carmen Sylva of Roumania). The prospective bridegroom's father is a notable folk-lorist, the patron and friend of Ibsen and Bjørne Bjørnesen, and is suspected of having had a hand in the compilation of Hans Lien Brekstad's "Swedish Fairy Tales." His grandfather, the King of Sweden and Norway, has always been profoundly interested in literature. He was the "protector" of Hans Christian Andersen, and helped much to popularise his exquisite tales. It is on record that although a Dane, the King of Sweden offered Andersen a home in Stockholm should he desire to change his residence, and on more than one occasion he called the great story-teller from his native Denmark to visit him in his summer quarters at Marstrand, Drottningholm, or Jönköping. The Slottet or palace at Stockholm has a remarkable library fully supplied with the most modern books in English, French, and German, and the Kungliga Biblioteket, or Royal Library, has 350,000 volumes and 8000 MSS.

A large bookseller in the West End is responsible for the statement that a quite considerable demand has recently sprung up ("recently" implying the last two or three years) for popular plays running at fashionable theatres. "I have been asked at least a dozen times lately," he said, "for copies of The Walls of Jericho, and nearly as often for Beauty and the Barge. Of course, I have had to reply that they were not—as yet—printed." It would seem that the only three playwrights who allow their plays to be printed are Mr. Pinero, Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, and Mr. George Bernard Shaw. There are, of course, various business considerations, questions of acting rights, copyright and the like to be considered, which may in many cases render publication undesirable, but it is questionable whether with the growing demand for "plays to read at home," some working arrangement might not be come to whereby a successful play, such as Peter Pan or The Duke of Killiecrankie, might be purchaseable almost as soon as its popularity is assured. One can usually, though not always, buy a French play very shortly after the first night. French law is, however, in some ways, kinder, or, at least, more flexible.

Messrs. Sotheby sold last week at their rooms in Wellington Street a very interesting collection of manuscripts and early printed books belonging to the library of the late Mr. Flower, of Guildford. The "Acta Sanctorum," wanting eleven volumes, realised £28 10s.; the "Two Books of Francis Bacon of the Proficiency and Advancement of Learning," first edition, an excellent copy and rare (1605), £19; Balzac's works (in French), on Japanese paper, fifty volumes, £14; Biblia Sacra Latina (1480), £19; Burlington Fine Arts Club Exhibition of Portrait Miniatures, £20; Chaucer's Works, black letter (1542), £34; Dante (1477), £50; Dante, the rare first edition of the first French translation (1597), £11 15s.; The Dictionary of National Biography, complete set, sixty-nine volumes, £40 10s.; Michael Drayton's Polyolbion, fine copy (1622), £17; Mary Stuart, by John Skelton (Goupil), £11 10s.; Queen Elizabeth, by Creighton, same series, £10; Higden's Polychronicon, imprinted at Southwerke by Peter Treveris (1527), £29; Holbein's Imitations of Original Drawings in the Collection of the King (1792), £33 10s.; Buxton Forman's edition of Keats, four volumes (1883), £8 10s.; Chaucer's Works, with design by Sir E. Burne-Jones, £49; Lord Lilford's coloured figures of the Birds of the British Islands, seven volumes (1891-1897), £50; Maund's Botanic Garden, £12; Sir Thomas More's History of Richard III. (1821), £8 10s.; Redoute (P. J.), Les Lillacées, Paris (1802-16), £75; Scott's Waverley Novels, "Border Edition," (Nimmo, 1892-1894), £16; Shelley's Works, edited by Buxton Forman, £10; Sheridan's Works, with Life by Browne (Bickers, 1873), £25; Sir Philip Sidney's Works (1825), £31; Silvester's Paléographie Universelle (1840), £9 10s.; Spenser's Faerie Queene, &c. (1611), £14 5s.; Symonds' Renaissance in Italy, five volumes, £11 15s.; Walton and Cotton's Complete Angler (1839), £11 15s.; A holograph letter of Peter Vannes to Cardinal Wolsey, and other letters, £73. In all, the sale, which lasted four days, realised £2502 19s.

In the review of "The Garden of Pleasant Flowers," which appeared in the "ACADEMY AND LITERATURE" of March 4, it should have been stated that the book is published by Mr. Philip Wellby, the price being 3s. 6d. net.

Two lectures delivered almost simultaneously at the Sorbonne and at the Royal Institution raise the question whether the need of a large-sized hat is a proof of intellectual capacity. The size of the head, we learn, depends upon the size of the individual, and the researches of phrenologists do not bear out the theory of the correspondence between a large brain and intellectual gifts. It is true that Turgenev's skull was slightly above the average in size, and that Cromwell and Byron were endowed in this respect with an even weightier article than the Russian novelist; but Gambetta was below the average and Jeremy Taylor by no means abnormal in cranial development, while Dante's skull is supposed to have been less than that of the average Englishman. Probably mental gifts depend on both brain and body. Schopenhauer hints somewhere that broad shoulders are an inevitable appurtenance of the man of genius, though it is easy to cite instances to the contrary.

The general tendency among historians of the present day to argue that the devil, far from being as black as he is painted, is conspicuously whiter than other people, has apparently spread to the poets, for it is announced by Mr. Stephen Phillips that he will occupy himself in his next forthcoming work with a vindication of the character of Nero. It will be interesting to see how convincing a case he is able to present for the inclusion of his hero among the much maligned characters of history. There is good ground for a partial reconsideration of the traditional view both of Nero and Tiberius, for apart from its inherent improbability, as depicting mere Bluebeards rather than men, it is mainly based upon the account given by Tacitus, which, with all its vivid brilliance, is only the case for the prosecution. Still, even for Tiberius, the utmost result of the labours of his champions has been to win him pity rather than esteem; and Tiberius offers a much less refractory surface for the brush of the whitewasher than Nero has to show. In an outline of his intended defence,

Mr. Phillips claims that Nero was merely an æsthetic placed in a position of omnipotence. The difference between the popular Nero and Mr. Phillips's own seems after all to be chiefly one of terminology.

To-day (March 18) is the one-hundredth and thirty-seventh anniversary of the death of Laurence Sterne. The author of "Tristram Shandy" died in lodgings above a silk-bagwig-maker's, at 41 Old Bond Street, attended only by a hired nurse and observed by a footman, who had been sent to inquire after his health. From that footman we have the account of Yorick's last moments: "I went to Mr. Sterne's lodgings; the mistress opened the door. I inquired how he did; she told me to go up to the nurse, I went into the room, and he was just a-dying. I waited ten minutes; but in five he said, 'Now it is come!' He put up his hand as if to stop a blow, and died in a minute." Within a week, according to the gruesome tradition, he had been buried in the new burying-ground near Tyburn; the body-snatchers, or "resurrection-men," had rifled his grave and sold the body to an eminent surgeon, and a friend invited to a scientific demonstration recognised his dead companion in the "subject" on the dissection table.

A reader who has unexpectedly lighted upon the source of the title of one of Mr. Kipling's most successful books suggests that novelists on the look-out for names for their wares might well follow in the steps of the author of "Captains Courageous," and glance through the "Percy Reliques," or some other collection of our virile and suggestive old ballads. The title referred to will be found in the opening stanza of the sixteenth-century song, celebrating "Mary Ambree," the Amazonian heroine of the Siege of Ghent in 1586:

"When captains courageous whom death could not daunt,
Did march to the siege of the city of Gaunt,
They mustered their soldiers by two and by three,
And the foremost in battle was Mary Ambree."

LITERATURE

COVENTRY PATMORE

Coventry Patmore. By EDMUND GOSSE. (Hodder and Stoughton, 6s.)

To allocate to the late Mr. Coventry Patmore the place he is entitled to hold in English literature is a most difficult task, yet it is the one question that arises from a perusal of this book by Mr. Gosse. The facts about his life were made known by the Memoirs and Correspondence published by Mr. Basil Champneys in 1900, and it is scarcely worth while repeating them here, except so far as to recapitulate some of the more salient incidents. First we have to remember that he had a father who according to the most charitable construction was far from being a desirable person; indeed the father's reputation was an obstacle to the young man's progress, as the following incident narrated by Mr. Gosse will show:

"Robert Browning told me that when, in 1846, at the house of Barry Cornwall, he asked Thackeray to let him introduce the young Coventry Patmore to him, the novelist boisterously refused, adding, 'I won't touch the hand of a son of that murderer!' That Thackeray, in his generous way, immediately repented, acknowledging that the son was not responsible for the father, and that he hastened to help the former as 'a most deserving and clever young fellow who will be a genius some day,' does not detract from the impression which the original outburst gives us of P. G. Patmore's being regarded as a kind of social outlaw."

It was in the famous duel between John Scott the editor of the London Magazine and Lockhart's friend Christie that the elder Patmore acted in a way which earned him the title of murderer. Christie had fired his first shot in the air, and Scott, it was thought, would have done the same if Patmore, who acted as his second, had not insisted: "You must not speak, you have nothing for it now but firing." He did fire and Christie's second bullet went through his heart. Now this cannot be called an accidental divagation on the part of the elder Patmore, since a great deal of his conduct showed a touch of this same brutality. We would not endeavour to recall it, but for the fact that in all the refinement of his son some trace of this hereditary characteristic is to be found. We discern it even in the kindly personal reminiscences which give a flavour to this biography. Mr. Gosse says:

"In 1879 I met him for the first time at the Savile Club, of which he was for a short while a member. It was in company with several other and younger men, and he made a highly disagreeable impression on me; I thought him harsh and sardonic; he said little and what he said was bitter. But, in the course of 1880, after his removal to Hastings, we began to correspond on the structure and function of the Ode, a subject which he had illustrated both in theory and practice, and on which his views were curious and, I ventured to think, on some points technically heterodox. At length, soon after New Year's Day, 1881, I was invited to Hastings to spend a Sunday with him; I went down in some trepidation, remembering that countenance as of a sourer Macchiavelli which I had seen at the club, and my reception was a surprise and an enchantment."

And in his attitude towards critics and readers, which grew more arrogant and intellectually aristocratic as he grew older, we find what might have been, as it were, the sediment of this characteristic. It is found even in his poetry, as when he proudly sings:

"Therefore no 'plaint be mine
Of listeners none,
No hope of rendered use or proud reward,
In hasty times and hard;
But chants as of a lonely thrush's throat
At latest eve,
That does in each calm note
Both joy and grieve;
Notes few and strong and fine,
Gilt with sweet day's decline,
And sad with promise of a different sun.
'Mid the loud concert harsh
Of this fog-folded marsh,
To me, else dumb,
Uranian Clearness, come!
Give me to breathe in peace and in surprise
The light-thrill'd ether of your rarest skies."

Probably the second strong influence in his life was his association with Tennyson, and it is significant that Tennyson did not like the man. Mr. Gosse gives a description of the great Laureate in the 'forties that certainly deserves to be quoted:

"While they walked the streets at night in endless perambulation, or while they sat together over a single meal in a suburban tavern, Tennyson's dark eyes would suddenly be set as those of a man who sees a vision, and no further sound would pass his lips, perhaps for an hour. These peculiarities were endured with patience by the younger of the two companions, partly because he was himself inclined to reverie, but particularly because his extreme admiration for Tennyson made him more than indulgent."

In later life Patmore was accustomed to say that he had followed Tennyson like a dog, but that the great poet had never really cared about him, and had merely accepted his companionship to escape from his own thoughts, and that Tennyson's conversation had always been egotistical and useless. Nevertheless it is very evident to the reader of Patmore that the greater poet exercised an extraordinary influence over him. The third influence on his life was his marriage with his first wife. She had only been with him fifteen years at her death, and her memory was ever fragrant and full of inspiration. Mr. Gosse quotes a description of her by Robert Browning in verse that is probably as true to life as the portrait by John Everett Millais or the medallion of Woolner:

"If one could have that little head of hers
Painted upon a background of pale gold
Such as the Tuscan's early art prefers!
No shade encroaching on the matchless mould
Of those two lips, that should be opening soft
In the pure profile—not as when she laughs,
For that spoils all—but rather as aloft
Some hyacinth she loves so leaned its staff's

Burden of honey-coloured studs to kiss
Or capture 'twixt the lips, apart for this.
Then her lithe neck, three fingers might surround,
How it should waver on the pale gold ground
Up to the fruit-shaped perfect chin it lifts."

His second wife was not so potent and seems always to have been more or less afraid of her husband. Mr. Gosse says:

"She was a woman of taste and even of a little learning, pious, gentle and somewhat timid. Her husband's loud protestations and emphasis of statement kept her in a perpetual tremor, but she was entirely devoted to love and admiration of him. The faithful biographer of Coventry Patmore, Mr. Basil Champneys, has been obliged, after baffling search, to record of Marianne, the poet's second wife, that 'the extraordinary self-effacement and reticence which was characteristic of her in life seems fated to attend her memory.'"

These and his conversion to Roman Catholicism are the facts in the life of Patmore that are of essential value to the student of biography, but to state them in this crude manner would not lead us to expect that exquisite grace which distinguished so much of his poetry. His was the task to hymn nuptial love and that virginity of the heart which marriage purifies and enhances rather than destroys. The merits and also the limits of Coventry Patmore's verse are shown as clearly in the following piece as in any of his writings:

"Whene'er I come where ladies are,
How sad soever I was before,
Though like a ship frost-bound and far
Withheld in ice from the ocean's roar,
Third-winter'd in that dreadful dock,
With stiffen'd cordage, sails decay'd,
And crew that care for calm and shock
Alike, too dull to be dismay'd,
Yet, if I come where ladies are,
How sad soever I was before,
Then is my sadness banish'd far,
And I am like that ship no more;
Or like that ship if the ice-field splits,
Burst by the sudden polar Spring,
And all thank God for their warming wits,
And kiss each other and dance and sing,
And hoist fresh sails, that make the breeze
Blow them along the liquid sea
Out of the North, where life did freeze,
Into the haven where they would be."

TRAGEDY

Shakespearean Tragedy: Lectures on Hamlet, Othello, King Lear, Macbeth. By A. C. BRADLEY, LL.D., Litt.D., Professor of Poetry in the University of Oxford. (Macmillan, 10s. 6d. net.)

SECOND NOTICE

"To attempt to give a description of the play itself or its effect upon the mind is mere impertinence." This is a mot of Hazlitt's à propos of King Lear. Professor Bradley's book "Shakespearean Tragedy" is a living refutation of the dictum. One would be more inclined to lay it down that it is impossible to get a thorough grasp of the play as a whole without the aid of such a book as the one before us. Dr. Aldis Wright unfortunately is not on my side. He would be compelled, if he wishes to abide by his former opinions, to call Professor Bradley a "showman," his style of work "sign-post" criticism, and his method an "anachronism." In his Clarendon Press edition, he confesses that he purposely omitted so-called æsthetic criticism, "because," he says, "one main object of these editions is to induce those for whose use they were expressly designed to read and study Shakespeare himself, and not to become familiar with opinions about him." In answer, one has only to ask, what could better whet one's appreciation of Shakespeare's dramas than a knowledge of the many varying opinions to which they give rise, and what could better conduce to an original study of the text itself than the necessity imposed on the reader of selecting the right view out of many plausible ones on the same subject?

But further, to say nothing of textual difficulties, are there not necessarily many latent beauties in a dramatist of Shakespeare's genius, which deserve to be pointed out by one specially skilled in his craft? For instance, to the ordinary reader, Iago's cry, "I bleed, sir, but not killed," seems at first sight like a cowardly cry for protection against further attacks on him by Othello. But this is a wrong interpretation, and, if it was right, the appeal would be quite out of character; for Iago was nothing if not a brave and daring man. The words are in reality an answer to Othello's "If that thou be'st a devil, I cannot kill thee," and Iago's "I bleed, sir," is a further example of his arrogance and obduracy, meaning: "You see I am a devil and I won't die." This callous contumacy reaches its height ten lines later when, in answer to Othello's pathetic request,

"Will you I pray demand that demi-devil
Why he hath thus ensnared my soul and body?"

Iago answers so cruelly:

"Demand me nothing: what you know, you know,
From this time forth I never will speak word."

Again, but for Professor Bradley's note, the meaning of

"There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, Than are dreamed of in your philosophy,"

might puzzle even a careful reader, who might think the usually princely Hamlet guilty of a piece of bad taste in slighting the philosophy of his best friend, especially as Hamlet must know that Horatio's philosophy was likely to be of a character rudimentary enough. Your in this passage is, of course, used in the sense which the gravedigger employed it when he said "Your water is a sore decayer of your whoreson dead body."

It is easy to see that King Lear is Professor Bradley's favourite Shakespearean play, as it was also the choice of Lamb and of Hazlitt. King Lear is the favourite of nearly all critics. The reason of this is that the critic is not primarily a theatre-goer, and hence he is not affected by its undoubted structural defects as a stage play, while he is fascinated by the largeness of its poetic conceptions. In Hamlet and Lear, and to a lesser degree in Macbeth, we find this ampler poetic atmosphere, this more extended intellectual field, suggesting the limitlessness of the scope of Shakespeare's mind. In these plays are opened up vague issues of universal powers, working in the world of individual fate and passion—"Huge cloudy symbols of a high romance." In Othello, on the other hand, as Professor Bradley himself points out, something of this is lacking, something of what is highest in the poetic genius of Shakespeare. Yet this very want is one which conduces to the continued representation of Othello on our modern stage, just as it militates against the success of King Lear in the theatre.

There are other causes, however, which retain for Othello its reputation as a drama second only to Hamlet. Like Hamlet, its dramatic technique is admirable—the best of all the plays; and, like Hamlet again, its poetry, as evidenced in the phraseology of the hero, is unequalled in any other of the dramas. But the modernity of Othello is what most of all recommends it in a theatre of our own times. It was a play of contemporary life in the Elizabethan age, and it is the same to-day. The tragedy is a private or domestic one rather than one of nationality, in this respect unlike Hamlet, Lear, and Macbeth. It is a drama of intrigue, and accident plays a much larger part in the unfolding of the story than is the case in Hamlet for instance. But what makes it the most poignantly painful of all the tragedies is the seeming lack of a merciful providence, not to say the hostility of heaven to man. The ease with which the desperate events might have been averted under slightly different circumstances suggests gratuitous cruelty to the star-crossed mortals on the part of callous or vindictive gods:

"As flies to wanton boys are we to the gods,
They kill us for their sport."

This painful feeling of helplessness would be too poignant but for Emilia's grand and unrestrained denunciation of Othello and Iago, which gives utterance to the pent-up and almost bursting indignation of the audience. She speaks their feelings for them in invective more scathing than ever they could have uttered themselves, and that is why every one in the theatre always falls in love with Emilia rather than with Desdemona.

"If he say so, may his pernicious soul
Rot half a grain a day: he lies to the heart,
She was too fond of her most filthy bargain."

The everyday theatre-goer feels an affinity with the robust and unafraid common sense and even vulgarity of Emilia, while he is untouched and even irritated by the refined, pure, and submissive self-restraint of the heroine.

One meets everywhere in Professor Bradley's work unerring taste, of which there is a fine example in the lecturer's note on Othello, iii., 3, 50 ff.—the passage about the Pontic Sea. With this is combined exact scholarship, for instance, where he points out that conscience in the most famous (though not in the greatest) of Hamlet's soliloquies does not mean the moral faculty—which would introduce hopeless confusion into the whole train of thought—but reflexion, "the craven scruple of thinking too precisely on the event." Textual criticism Professor Bradley puts on one side. One wishes he had not always done so. One can endure a conjecture foisted into the text when it is beautiful, like Theobald's "'a babbled of green fields.'" But one feels indignant when a tasteless conjecture ousts an excellent reading, as in Othello, iv., 2, 64:

"Patience, thou young and rose-lipped cherubin, Aye, there, look grim as hell."

How could Patience (personified) be described as a "young and rose-lipped cherubin"? Surely she would be pictured as a gentle, wasted sufferer, pale and worn. Though she is imagined as "smiling at grief," surely the smile is the wan smile of endurance. Now, the books agree in the reading "I here look grim as hell," which to me seems quite satisfactory. Othello has just spoken of finding in some place of his soul a drop of patience. The whole speech is a soliloquy, though Desdemona is present, up to the last three lines of it. Then he calls on Desdemona to look on the work she has done, and indignantly exclaims Patience! that is, "is this a thing endurable?" Then he becomes conscious, as he does so often throughout the play, of the physical disparity between Desdemona and himself—she a "young and rose-lipped cherubin," while (he reflects) "I here look grim as hell."

In our opinion a book like that which is before us is not much less essential for the complete comprehension of Shakespeare's tragedies than an atlas is for the fruitful study of geography.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

CHATHAM

Chatham. By FREDERIC HARRISON. (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.)

MR. FREDERIC HARRISON has written a Life of William Pitt, the Elder, without sympathy and without conviction. There is no reason, indeed, why the High Priest of Positivism should understand a statesman who put patriotism before political philosophy, and who did not care what system he followed so long as he saved his country. But there are many reasons why a philosopher, in whose eyes colonial expansion is a doubtful virtue, should not criticise a minister who loved the Empire with a passionate devotion, and who saw that the true seat of England's greatness was overseas. It is perfectly easy not to write the Life of Chatham, as is proved by the fact that he still awaits a competent biographer, and Mr. Harrison would have done more wisely had he stayed his hand from the Great Commoner.

Inspired, no doubt, by the best motives, Mr. Harrison reproves his victim in the tone of an usher who finds fault with an unruly schoolboy. He admits that he does not pretend to judge Pitt's manoeuvres "from a true standard of honour and patriotism," which is lucky for Pitt; but even the modest standard which he adopts is far too high for the minister to pass with credit or distinction. William Pitt, then, was violent, passionate, even furious, in his eloquence. He relied upon theatrical gestures and bombastic periods to obtain his effects. He was, moreover, always ready to sacrifice a principle for what he deemed expedience. Of course he was. He had enough sense to know that policy must change with circumstances, that what seems wrong to-day may be necessary to-morrow; and he stood in the House of Commons not to illustrate a pedantic theory of government, but to save his country. To whichever side he turns, Mr. Harrison finds him tripping. "If he loved war for itself," says the biographer, "it is an indelible blot upon his name." And when he opposed a fruitless war with France, Mr. Harrison is ready with a sneer. "The fire-eating and terrible cornet of horse now had a conscientious horror of war," says he, "such as Walpole might have envied." Pitt's policy is clear enough. He was prepared to fight, when something might be gained by it; it was never his aim to waste blood and treasure on unprofitable campaigns. Mr. Harrison, however, does not easily conceal his prejudice. He confesses that Pitt, when appointed Paymaster, gave public proof of his integrity. He refused to hold £100,000 in advance, that he might take the interest, or to accept a percentage upon foreign subsidies. By so doing he introduced a habit of honourable dealing into a government that had long been corrupt. But Mr. Harrison cannot record the truth without a qualification. "Pitt," he complains, "was not the man to let his burning zeal for public duty remain under a bushel." What then should he have done? Should he have pretended, in all modesty, that he was thieving as fiercely as his predecessors, and thus rob his good example of its weight? Mr. Harrison does not explain, and one thing only is evident, that Pitt cannot by peace or war, by integrity or corruption, win the approval of his austere biographer. And having acknowledged the statesman free from chicanery, Mr. Harrison condemns on the next page what he terms his "self-interested ambition." "He thirsted for power," says the biographer, "not for money nor for influence, but with a gnawing passion to be able to carry out his great designs, and to put an end to the sordid bungling of his official chiefs." If this pronouncement have any meaning whatever, it is that patriotism and self-interest are one and indivisible, and that a desire to serve one's country is synonymous with an evil-hearted ambition.

While Mr. Harrison praises Pitt with a grudging pen, by not a few trivial slips he shows a lack of interest in the time. Describing the state of parties, when Pitt first entered Parliament, and the Prince of Wales was in opposition to his father, he says that "Swift, Gay, Pope, Thomson and Arbuthnot supplied the malcontents with brilliancy and satire." In 1735, Gay and Arbuthnot were dead, while Swift had long since retired to Ireland, and to gloom. Again, in his serious way, he points out that in Pitt's letters to his nephew, "there is nothing about Brunck or Schützius, or German erudition." How could there be anything about Brunck, who in 1751 was a mere boy, and had as yet written nothing? And then, not content with calling the works of Burnet, Bolingbroke, Bacon and Clarendon "meagre compendiums," he gravely complains that Pitt says "not a word about original research in the Record Office or the British Museum." There is nothing to mark that this is ironical, and it has the true accent of the pedagogue. But Mr. Harrison might have discovered what opportunities there were for research in "the Record Office" in the eighteenth century, and he might have remembered that young Pitt could hardly be recommended between 1751 and 1757 to read at the British Museum, which was first opened in 1759.

However, it may be admitted that when Mr. Harrison approaches the years of Pitt's greatest glory, he writes with some show of enthusiasm. He quotes the well-known saying that for a while at least the biography of Pitt is to be read in "the history of the world." Wherever England had a rival, there Pitt made his influence felt. He had perfect confidence in himself. "I know that I can save this country," said he, "and that no one else can." He kept his colleagues in such stern subjection, that, so long as he remained in office, his will was uncontested. He was, in brief, the voice, the brain, the hand of England. In India, as in Canada, he broke the power of France, and it is due to his policy that England's Colonial Empire is still unchallenged. To achieve his lofty purpose, he swept away the hampering prejudices of the services. He advanced his officers not by seniority but by merit, and he put Wolfe, for instance, over a hundred heads. He it was, too, who saw that Clive was a born general, and his judgment of men was never at fault. To carry out his vast schemes a vast expenditure was necessary; but he overrated rather than underrated the cost of his enterprises, and had no scruple in asking for the money which he wanted. The country, on the other hand, received full value for its money, and the name of England was respected throughout the world, as it had not been respected since the time of Marlborough. He was autocratic, may be, but his autocracy needed no excuse. "If I see a child driving a go-cart close to the edge of a precipice," said he, "with the precious freight of an old king and his family, I am bound to take the reins out of his hands." The image caught the fancy of the people, which entrusted Pitt with its destinies, and Pitt rewarded its faith by a succession of brilliant victories.

His triumph lasted four years, during which time he neglected no detail which should ensure success. He planned the campaigns; he looked after the equipment and provisioning of the army himself; and he won the battles, because he had freed himself from the restraints of politics. Fox complained that "he took the whole upon him," and doubtless his just arrogance must have been galling to the Radicals of his day. But England did not grumble, and the army was proud to serve him, the army to which, by enlisting the Highland regiments, he added a body of loyal heroes. Mr. Harrison thinks that "when the ship had sailed across the Atlantic, the Minister at home had no power to influence the issue." We cannot agree with Mr. Harrison. An inefficient Minister can hamper a campaign, even at the other end of the world, by interference and mismanagement. This has been proved a thousand times, and to find an example, we need go no further than Germaine, who, a few years after Pitt himself, made the success of our arms in America impossible.

Had Pitt died in 1761, no shadow would ever have fallen across the sunlight of his glory. But he survived, unfortunately for his fame, to play a part in England's embroilment with America. He espoused the cause of the Colonists with an ardour which is not altogether intelligible. "I rejoice," said he, "that America has resisted," and there is no doubt that his speeches encouraged our fellow subjects to throw off the yoke. But he heartily repudiated the logic of his own words, and had he lived, he would have certainly done his best to retrieve his indiscretion by a spirited policy. His dying words were words of defiance. "My Lords," he said, "I rejoice that the grave has not closed upon me; that I am still alive to lift up my voice against the dismemberment of this ancient and most able monarchy! Shall this great kingdom now fall prostrate before the House of Bourbon? If we must fall, let us fall like men!" With the aid of the French the Americans won their independence. And let it not be said that they won it with the approval of a statesman, who, had he lived, would most strenuously have opposed it. He, at least, fell like a man.

But Mr. Harrison's strangest freak is to drag into a life of Pitt an amicable reference to Mr. Andrew Carnegie. All the world knows that the Laird of Skibo, with characteristic lack of humour, has adopted as his own the epitaph of the younger Pitt: "He lived without ostentation, and he died poor." And now under the auspices of Mr. Harrison he takes his place by the side of the Great Commoner himself. "Neither Pitt nor Washington," says the biographer, in speaking of Pittsburg, once known as Fort Duquesne, "could possibly . . . have imagined how a penniless Scotch lad would one day build up from out its lurid furnaces a colossal business, of which the profits were ultimately to spread across America and Britain the means of learning and culture." Why should they imagine so vain a thing? We are quite sure that if this wild nightmare had disturbed the brain of Pitt, he would have withheld his august name from "the greatest iron and coal centre of the world." But by this eloquent passage Mr. Harrison plainly shows his preference, and he would have been more prudent had he chosen for the subject of his biography not Chatham, who knew nothing of the Record Office and the British Museum, but the valiant Mr. Andrew Carnegie, who has brought "the learning and culture" of the Free Library into every home.

BALZAC

Balzac : l'homme et l'œuvre. Par ANDRÉ LE BRETON. (Paris : Armand Colin, 3f. 50c.)

Aspects of Balzac. By W. H. HELM. (Nash, 3s. 6d. net.)

THOUGH it is convenient for the reviewer, it is unfortunate for Mr. Helm that his study of Balzac appears simultaneously with that of M. le Breton. He is an agreeable essayist, and well read, endowed with humour and equipped with standards of comparison; but accident now makes him figure as an accomplished amateur competing with a professional expert—an expert too who has none of the dullness of the specialist but all the vivacity of the iconoclast. The development of French fiction has evidently been with M. le Breton the study of a lifetime; and he has the air of having studied it for no other purpose than that of, as one may say, putting Balzac in his place. He attacks him in his private life, which certainly was not such as to bear close inspection, and, proceeding to assail him as an artist, plants the humanitarian foot of Victor Hugo upon his neck. Whether assenting or resisting, one is dragged along by the impetuous argument, held by the spectacle of a great gladiatorial combat.

From the point of view of the serious student of literature, M. le Breton's best chapter is that on "the origins of the Balzacian novel." Here, if anywhere, there was new ground to be broken. Balzac has been very generally regarded as the man of genius who had no literary ancestors—who came from nowhere. Let it be granted at once that he is not in the direct line of descent from any of the really notable writers of the generation immediately preceding him. He owes nothing to Madame de Staël, and nothing to Chateaubriand; nothing to Senancour, and nothing to Benjamin Constant; and that list of the great names of the period, though short, is nearly exhaustive. So the conclusion has been drawn by his admirers that he owes nothing to any one—that his reasonable answer to all questions as to his antecedents might have been Napoleon's "Je suis ancêtre." But that is because Balzac's ancestors, like Napoleon's, were obscure, and interesting chiefly, if not solely, on account of their relationship to their distinguished offspring. The novel of Balzac, as M. le Breton justly points out, really grew out of the popular novel which began to flourish at the time of the Revolution.

Until towards the end of the eighteenth century, French novelists addressed an aristocratic public. That was the case even when, like Restif de la Bretonne, they were themselves very far from aristocrats. The tradition of the novel written by gentlemen for gentlemen, or by ladies for ladies, was carried on, even after the cataclysm of 1789, by such literary representatives of the ancien régime as the authors of "Corinne," "René," and "Adolphe." But the Revolution brought up new readers, with new tastes—readers who wanted, to use a modern distinction, not literature but "reading matter." Polished style and elevated sentiment were nothing to them; they only asked to be interested, amused, thrilled, flattered. The demand, as usual, created the supply. The most unlikely people "commenced author," and wrote rubbish for them. The most notable names—notable enough then, though long since forgotten—were those of Pigault-Lebrun and Ducray-Duminil. Their memories are worth reviving.

Pigault-Lebrun came to the writing of romance with a romantic life behind him. Like Mirabeau, and for the same reason, he had been locked up under a lettre de cachet. He had also, though a gentleman's son, eloped with a workman's daughter, and travelled through the provinces with a company of strolling players. He had finally enlisted in Custine's dragoons, fought at Valmy, and been promoted to the rank of adjutant-general. But suddenly he found that he could write, and that there was a public for what he wrote. He wrote, over and over again, to quote M. le Breton, "some incoherent and farcical Odyssey of a child of the people who gets into trouble and gets out of it again by his own unaided ingenuity, drinking like a Switzer and swearing like a waggoner, yet remaining the best fellow in the world, good-hearted in despite of his brutality, gay in despite of his misfortunes, and in the last chapter marrying the daughter of a nobleman to the cry of 'Vive l'égalité!'" When the light-hearted children of the Revolution wanted to be amused, those were the works they read. When they wanted their flesh to creep, they turned to the writings of Ducray-Duminil.

He was a gentle soul, the kindest-hearted dramatic critic who ever lived. "The piece is the work of a man of talent, who we hope will soon take his revenge"—that is the formula with which his review of a dramatic failure invariably concludes. He made his début in fiction with stories for children; but found the true bent of his genius in works whose titles sufficiently indicate their character: "Victor, or the Child of the Forest," "Celina, or the Child of Mystery," "The False Hermit, or the Victims of Destiny." They offer a debauch of horrors. We read of an aged mother "sequestered" for ten years in a fetid cave, with nothing to eat but eagle's eggs; of an innocent bride, who on the eve of her marriage is driven from her father's house, and roams among the glaciers of the Alps in her wedding garments; of some victim of iniquity whose enemies not only cut out his tongue to deprive him of the power of denouncing them, but also amputate his right arm in order that he may be unable to put his denunciations on paper; of all kinds of vice triumphant and all kinds of virtue persecuted until the last chapter brings a happy ending. It is not the sort of stuff of which nowadays one recommends any reader to take a course. But Balzac was brought up on that sort of thing, and on translations of Mrs. Radcliffe and "Monk" Lewis. His early works, no longer read except by the curious, are, as M. le Breton shows by careful analysis of their plots, very much of that character.

